Facing the house of Abdul Baha in Adrianople there was a café. Here every day sat a retired officer of the Turkish Army belonging to the Baktashi’s sect. The Baktashi’s are always on good terms with the Bahais. They are a peaceful people. This retired soldier received a pension of 5 Piasters (25¢) a day from the government. Every morning he would come and take a chair in front of the café and order a cup of coffee. Then the people would gather around him and listen with delight and laughter to his stories until noon. At that hour he would call the waiter and give him five cents to buy him two loaves of bread, two rolls of roast-meat and a dish of salad. Then he would ask for a clean table and use his neat handkerchief as a tablecloth. Every day he invited one of the habitués of the café to lunch with him. “Come here, my friend!” he would say placing a chair on the other side of the table, and leaving before it a loaf of bread, with one of the roast-meats. “Come and be my guest to-day!” Then he would commence to eat. Every mouthful that was taken was followed by the short sentence “Oh God! I thank Thee! How delicious is this lunch!” — till it was finished. Then again he would start his conversation. Always tempered with sharp wit and the joy of living. From time to time he would come to the Mosque of Sultan Suleiman where the Governor and the officers would gather about him to pass a pleasant hour. He would keep them roaring with laughter over his stories. One day, when Abdul Baha was also present, the Baktashi entered with a mat under his arm. Laughingly he saluted every one and said: — “To-day I am going to start on a long journey; therefore, I beg you to forgive all my past shortcomings!” “Art thou going to

Bagdad?” one asked. “Further! Much further!” “Surely to China?” “Very much further.” Then no doubt to Australia?” “Still further.” All this time everybody laughed because they thought that he had a joke up his sleeve. “Please, please,” he pleaded, “I beg you to forgive me. Say that you do!” In order to humor him, they said: “All right, we forgive thee!” Then he said: — “I am now happy. I will also forgive you, my good friends!” Then he walked toward the court of the Mosque; spread on the ground half of his mat, laid himself down and covered his body with the other half. The spectators, thinking that they had reached the climax of the joke, laughed uproariously. Five minutes passed — no movement; ten, fifteen minutes, half an hour, no sign of life. The time grew heavy and strained. They looked at each other, with wonder in their eyes. Then laughing and shrugging their shoulders, they left their places and gathered around the mat. One of them, on tip-toe, cautiously lifted one corner. Wonder of wonders! The Baktashi had breathed his last. Then these men carried him on their shoulders laughing and singing, took him to the undertaker laughing, washed his body laughing and buried him with roars and thunders of laughter. It was a most phenomenal event! This Baktashi used to call on Abdul Baha. He had heard about Baha-Ullah and knew something concerning the Cause. The believers asked him several times to call on the Blessed Perfection, but he always refused, saying: “How can I, the essence of sin, stand in the Presence of the Essence of Holiness! I am not worthy of this privilege. Whenever I find that I have deserved such an honor, I will go; but not now, not now!” Thus this good man lived and died in happiness.

4. Abdul Baha Goes to the Mosque and Gives Money to the Poor

It was about noon when the Master passed by our house and called for Mirza Ali Akbar to follow him. When Mirza Ali Akbar returned he told us that as there was a great festival at the Mosque of Sidi Jaber, the Master had been invited to be present. The Mosque was most beautifully decorated with flags and draperies. The Khedive was there. After the ceremonies, Abdul Baha came out and all the poor men, women and children gathered around him with their tattered garments and dusty appearances. He placed money in their hands, patting each on the shoulder and cheering everyone with his loving glances.

About four o'clock he went to the garden, but this time all alone.

To-day I received letters from our American friends. I read them with much pleasure, and their contents will be presented to the Master at the first opportunity! May this link of spiritual correspondence bring the East and the West closer together!

RAMLEH, EGYPT, AUGUST 23, 1913

1. The Bahais must embody their teachings in their lives. 2. The story of the man who did not know the window in his own room. 3. No power on earth can withstand the Cause of God.

1. The Bahais Must Embody Their Teachings in Their Lives

The Bahai Movement has come into the world principally as a Cause of Love, Spirituality, Unification, Reformation,

[page 223]

Reconciliation, Universal Peace, Idealism, International Language, Unity of Religions, General Education, Brotherhood and Celestial attributes which will contribute toward the Union of the Orient and the Occident. The inevitable conclusion is that those who call themselves Bahais must embody these principles in their lives; so that mankind may discern with their own eyes the concrete, spiritual results of the Bahai teachings and arise to spread them more universally. We all desire to see our ideals realized in a human being. If we admire courage, we would like to see this quality in a hero. If we love Love, we consider it a high privilege to behold this attribute manifested in a person. In brief, we are hungering for results.

2. The Story of the Man Who Did Not Know the Window in His Own Room

The other day Mirza Moneer told us a story which will illustrate this point. There was a young man in Beirut who worked as a waiter in a restaurant. For some time he had lived in a small room on the top of a house. He worked all day and returned to his room at night. One day he met an old friend of his on the street, who had just arrived from his native town. "Where are you going to live" he inquired.

"I am at this very moment looking for a hotel."

"Oh, no! Don't go to a hotel. Come and be my guest."

After some insistence the invitation was accepted.

“Here is the key to my room. Take it. The address is at such and such a place. Go there now and rest. I will come after work, about nine o’clock.”

The man took the key and found the place. As soon as he unlocked the door, a stuffy odor struck him.

He waited outside for a few minutes, and then with much difficulty, entered. He found the room dark and dirty and all the furniture covered with several layers of dust. As he was accustomed to cleanliness, he began to sweep the floor and to dust the objects. In carrying the furniture and boxes from one corner to the other, he uncovered the rusty shutters of a window, apparently untouched for a long time. He opened it with much effort and a flood of light poured into the room. Then, he sat down and waited for his friend till night came, then he went out and bought a candle. He lighted it and began to read a book. Nine o’clock, and his friend did not arrive; ten o’clock and there was no sign of him; at eleven o’clock he got up from his seat and went out to see what had become of him. He saw a man walking to and fro on the veranda.

“Who art thou?” he asked in the darkness.

“I am...and it seems that I have lost my room.”

Realizing that this was his friend he told him that this was his own house. The friend walked in and looked about with evident astonishment:

“I have lived in this room for a long time,” he said, “and never knew that it had a window. I have never lighted a candle. I enter the room by night and feel my way to the bed. I take off my clothes and sleep. Before sunrise, I dress and go out. Thus I have never been here in the daytime. Now, when I came to-night, I looked at the room and saw an open window; so I thought that it surely was not mine, and for more than two hours I have been pacing outside wondering what I should do.”

Now God and His generosity has given us many things, but we have to find them; he has revealed many precepts but we have to live by them. If we close the shutters of our hearts, the light will not come in, the spiritual atmosphere will not become purified, dormant powers will not be awakened, divine susceptibilities will not be obtained; intellectual faculties will not become active; heavenly illumination will not be realized; celestial Love will not be revealed;

results will not be produced, and moral civilization will not raise its standard.

3. No Power on Earth can Withstand the Cause of God

Abdul Baha passed by our house before noon and called for Mirza Ali Akbar. He sent him to Alexandria to attend to an errand and to personally call on an important personage. Then he spent the afternoon in the garden dictating Tablets for the Oriental Bahais. About sunset he came to us. Many believers were here, and he spoke now in Arabic and again in Persian.

He told us that the stories of the prophets recorded in the Koran were not mere historical writings. They were warnings to future generations after Mohammed; so that they might know how former people treated the Messengers of God. Although they opposed the Cause, yet they were defeated in their purpose. Who can stand before the Will of the Almighty? Let me give you an example. His Holiness Christ, after his crucifixion, had only eleven disciples. One of these had betrayed him; another denied him thrice, and the rest had deserted him. On the crucial night of his life, he was left all alone, friendless and helpless; yet in future years the combined forces of the Roman and Greek emperors and philosophers could not stamp out His Power. Like a mighty torrent everything was swept before it. Now after the departure of Baha-Ullah, at least, five hundred thousand men and women believed in Him; thousands having already testified with their blood, and the rest, ready at any moment to give up their lives. If we reflect for one moment and compare the immediate results of the two Movements, we will logically conclude that no power on earth can stand in the path of the progress of the Bahai Cause which is the Cause of humanity.

Then he spoke of some of the incidents which had occurred during the stirring days of Acca, when, the Investigating Committee at the instigation of his enemies had arrived to send him to Feyzan. The events of those years, 1906-7 if collected and written, would form one of the most dramatic chapters in the Master's epic life. They illustrate more than anything else his divine courage, endurance, patience and spiritual control over great difficulties.

1. How Tablets to the American Friends Are Spread All Over Persia.

The other day I observed one of the pilgrims from a faraway town in Persia holding a book in his hand. He was reading it with great attention. Approaching him I looked at the top of the page. To my surprise I read the name of Mr. William Hoar of New York. It was a copy of a Tablet revealed for him by the Master on the eve of his departure from Acca many years ago.

“Do you know whose Tablet you are reading?” I asked.

“Of course I do. It belongs to one of our American brothers,” he said with pride.

“How did you come to get a copy of it?” I asked.

“Oh! It is spread all over Persia,” he rejoined. “By the way,” he said. As though remembering something, “tell me about this Mr. Hoar. When I go away I would like to tell the story to my friends, because we used to read this Tablet at every meeting.”

“Very well. Then ask the others to gather together in the room and I will talk to you about him.” Having told them all I knew about Mr. Hoar, and of what a splendid and upright Bahai he was, I got a copy of the Tablet, and I will share its contents with you; the original is in eloquent Arabic.

2. An eloquent Tablet to Mr. William Hoar of New York

“TO MR. WILLIAM HOAR,

“(Upon him be Baha-Ullah)

“He is God!

“O THOU VISITOR TO THE BLESSED TABERNACLE!

“Verily the Messenger of Confirmation and the Commander of Assistance invited thee and brought thee safely to this radiant Holy Land. Verily thou hast crossed the seas and passed through the cities until thou didst reach to this Center of Lights, this Origin of divine Traces and this Dawning-place of the inspiration of thy Lord, the Mighty, the Master of Destiny! Verily, Verily, I say unto thee, this is a Bestowal through whose mention the Unitarians are rejoiced and for whose attainment the sincere ones are longing. This is a food for the spirit, a sustenance from heaven, a Grace through which the hearts are resuscitated and a favor by which the souls are re-vitalized. Render thou thanksgiving unto the Lord for His Generosity and Liberality. Appreciate thou its value and guard its preciousness.

“I declare by the True One, that if a faithful believer in God, while turning his face toward His Kingdom, the Supreme, arrives at this White Land — the Luminous Spot — and perfumes his nostrils through the Fragrance of Holiness, which is being diffused to all parts of the world, — the most dynamic Power shall aid him, the Glorious Giver shall reinforce him with His Love and Good-pleasure and confirm him in the accomplishment of a matter which shall have no parallel in the realm of existence and no similarity in the World of Visibility.

“But as to thee, gird up the loins of endeavor and return to that distant continent which is thy home and give the Glad-tidings of the Kingdom of God to the people, — the Kingdom whose doors are opened before the faces of all that who live upon the earth and in the heavens; a kingdom for the attainment of which the chosen ones amongst the dwellers of the cities of the Almighty have longed, but have not attained. Verily the capability for the receiving of this uninterrupted Down-pouring, is a grace from the Graces of God and a most glorious gift; and verily the Generosity of Thy Lord is not limited.

“Declare thou unto the people: Verily at this time the Sun is shining, the orbs are gleaming, the stars are sparkling, the lamps are ignited, the fire of the Love of God is flaming high, the heavens are expanding, the seas are becoming tempestuous, the breezes are wafting, the rain is pouring down; the earth is adorned, the Tabernacle of the Lord is lifted up, the rose gardens are embellished, the orchards are in luxuriant growth, the birds are singing, the flowers are blossoming, while Fragrance scatters and the zephyrs blow!

“How long, how long will ye remain asleep in your tombs, and rest upon the beds of negligence! Will ye not awaken from your slumbers, cleanse your ears, respond to the call of your Lord, the Omniscient and become the objects of the Favor of your God, the Clement; reading the verses of His Mercy and worshiping the Adored Countenance in this Manifest Day? Hasten ye! Hasten ye! O ye sincere ones! Hasten ye!

Hasten ye! O ye attracted ones! Hasten ye! Hasten ye! O ye expectant ones! Hasten ye! Hasten ye! O ye longing ones! Ere long ye shall behold the Banners of Guidance waving from the summit of the highest mountains; the Knowledge of God encircling this terrestrial globe and the signs of the Bounties of your Lord manifesting in all directions as the appearance of the sun in midday. On that day the faithful ones shall break into songs of gladness, the people of Unity shall rejoice and the hearts which are filled with the Love of the Living, the Self-Subsistent will become dilated, the heedless ones will be in loss, the violators of the Covenant will regret and the rebellious ones be in degradation.

“O ye servants of God! Avail yourselves of the opportunity which is offered to you through these Favors, and do not ye forget that which was promised you in all the holy writings. This day is the day of attraction! This day is the day of enkindlement! This day is the day of soaring toward the ethereal atmosphere of the Merciful! This day is the day of the Call! This day is the day of Grace! This day is the day of the Most eminent Bestowal! This day is the day of the discovery of the most valuable treasure! Oh ye servants of God!

Deprive not yourselves of the Ocean of Favor, and shut not your eyes to the vision of the signs of your Lord, the Omnipotent. Approach ye toward the Kingdom of Abha, the Supreme Heaven, the Loftiest station with radiant faces, with hearts overflowing with the mention of God and breasts dilated by the verses of God: — so that you may attain to that which was longed for by the righteous ones — the station coveted by the saints and prayed for by the holy souls. Verily this is that which causes astonishment to the people of intelligence.

“Convey my greetings and praise to all the believers of God in that vast and spacious continent and say unto them from the tongues of Abdul Baha: — ‘O ye believers of God! It is incumbent upon you to work mightily (in the Cause), and to strive nobly to declare the Bounties of God; be ye engaged in the commemoration of the Name of God; be ye severed from all else save God; take a firm hold of the rope of virtue, shun obedience to the dictates of self and passion; practice kindness toward all the people of the world; serve the Cause of Universal Peace and show ye love to all the nations of the earth.’

“Upon ye be greetings and praise!

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHA ABBAS.”

3. The Minute Questions Asked of Abdul Baha

I did not see the Master this morning. Having received large packages of letters from the various countries of the East, He was busy reading them. Like simple children they come to Him for advice to solve their problems.

4. Abdul Baha Jokes and Beats His Secretary

At four o'clock I found myself at the door of the Master's house. He was coming down with firm strides.

The carriage was waiting. He had promised to take Mr. Atwood for a drive, and this was the day of fulfillment. In my hand I had a package of letters to be read to Him. Looking at the rather thick package, He laughed and taking it out of my hand, showed it to the upper windows (apparently some of the members of the Holy Family were looking down) saying:

"Look what an amount of work Mirza Ahmad has brought for Me. Does he not deserve a sound beating?" and with the umbrella's handle he gently struck me twice on my back. Then he entered the carriage, after him Shoghi Effendi and next myself. Before reaching the Hotel Plaisance to call for Mr. Atwood, he talked with much humor, laughing all the time.

5. Abdul Baha Says That If People Wish to Sneeze They Ask Him about It

On the way He told us that matters had reached such a point that if the friends wanted to cough or sneeze they wrote to him to do it for them. He has repeatedly written that any realizable plan which has for its aim the spread of the Cause is acceptable. Each one wishes Abdul Baha to free him from his perplexities and to lighten his work; but no one yet has asked to come and be of service to Him; and help to lighten His load.

6. A Talk by Abdul Baha on Creation

Finally we reached the hotel, picked up Mr. Atwood and started again. Mr. Atwood has written two articles on the Bahai Cause. The first has appeared in the Christian Commonwealth, the second will be published in another English paper. On the way he asked two questions, one on creation and its apparent incongruities and anomalies; the other on free will and determination. Abdul Baha answered as follows: If we look upon creation from a remote outlook, we see symmetry and harmony; the apparent differences and anomalies blending into one harmonious whole; but if we study the world of genesis from a partial standpoint, these freaks of nature come to our notice at every turn. All parts, kinds and species of the creational life are interrelated. There is an invisible chain binding all into one mass of homogeneity. Those anomalies of creation which we call freaks are not freaks at all; but are made by a definite wisdom. As soon as we learn the purpose of their creation, they are no longer freaks, but parts of a whole. For example, we know the wisdom of the existence of the eyes, the ears, the teeth, the hands and the feet, but we may wonder why a single hair is grown on the top of somebody's nose. This also has a purpose were we to become cognizant of it. The law of composition and decomposition, amalgamation and dissolution, construction and destruction, protection and danger are two basic principles of creation. An organism — whether living or inanimate — must be decomposed at a stated time; so that through its scattered atoms, elements of other organisms may be composed and created. Creation therefore is based upon the activities of these two fundamental laws. On the other hand, there is the law of the eater and of the eaten. The higher forms of life feed upon the lower species of genesis. The grass takes its nourishment from the soil, and every day grows taller and taller like unto this (extending His hand toward the tall grass waving in the field). The animal in turn (showing a cow grazing in the field) eats the grass and is sustained by it. After a while man appears, kills the cow and eats it. Thus we observe that the various kingdoms of Life feed upon each other; but they have no conscious knowledge of the other's existence. Hence the inferior degree is entirely out of touch with the superior degree, but the upper can look down upon the lower and help it. Therefore, while we are living in this world, we are not informed of the existence of the Spiritual world, but the dwellers of the spiritual world know about us and can assist and help us.

7. Explanation of Free Will

As regards free will. There are two distinct kinds of affairs, the first dominated by man, the second which is beyond his control; the first voluntary, the second involuntary. I am a free man so far as walking is concerned, but I am not free to soar in the air, unless I build an aeroplane.

8. Abdul Baha talks to Sheiks and Young Egyptians of His Trip to the West

While the carriage was rolling on past fields of cotton, palm groves, and primitive hamlets, the Master continued speaking on the above two subjects. We returned about 7 o'clock. Mr. Atwood enjoyed the ride and thanked him for it. At 8:30 Abdul Baha came to our house. There were some Arab Sheiks waiting. After indulging in some poetry and philosophic jargons to which the Master listened patiently, one of them ended by the announcement that his wife and children were sick and he had no money. The Master gave him five Majidis (5 dollars) and he left the house happy. Afterwards six young Egyptian nobles arrived. For more than two hours Abdul Baha spoke to them about the virtues of the English and American people, of their scientific achievement, and of his travels throughout those distant countries, so full of wonders. Then he gave a resumé of his lecture in the Jewish Synagogues of America. He was very lively in his descriptions and laughed throughout this interesting talk. The young Egyptians were all attention.

To-day the Master was very happy and well. And his words created joy and spread sunshine. When he laughed the waves of his mirth rippled over the sea of our lives, creating wider and wider circles of the joy of living.

1. International Bahai Correspondence Conducive to Unity

Most important of all is the establishment of a line of correspondence between the East and the West. Not that it may go on for a year or two only, but that it may continue without interruption. The success of every affair depends upon one's firmness in following it up. Of no less importance is correspondence between the various Bahai Assemblies; for each assembly thus becomes informed of the status of the other, and gives its moral support. It would be well to designate certain active centers in America — Chicago, Washington, New York, San Francisco, Boston, etc., — to correspond regularly with European and Oriental Assemblies and in turn disseminate the news they receive to smaller centers; that the future Bahai conventions may give one or more sessions to the consideration of this important subject; that the secretaries may report on what they have done during the year and how many letters they have written and received.

As a confirmation to the foregoing statement, I translate the following Tablet, and am sure, that after reading it, the Bahais will do their utmost to carry out its contents: —

“The correspondence of the believers of God with all parts of America and from America to all directions is very acceptable and seasonable. It will be the means of drawing hearts together. Display the utmost effort in this matter. The friends of God must be like bouquets of roses, disseminating their sweet fragrances one to another. They should assist each other: — so that, through the powers of the Kingdom, cooperation and reciprocity may be obtained. Correspondence and communication are the two greatest means for solidarity.

“It is said that correspondence is equal to half-meeting.

“Forward a copy of this Tablet to all parts; — so that the friends of God in every city may correspond in a representative way, with other cities; especially with America. This will be the cause of enkindlement and the means of attraction. The souls will become exhilarated, the spirits gladdened, the hearts stirred into cheerfulness, and the breasts dilated.”

2. The Weather in Ramleh

The days and nights of Ramleh are without rain. In the shade it is always cool. The sky is as blue as the bluest turquoise. At night the heavens are illumined with radiant stars. During the winter there is no snow, and the weather is balmy.

3. Receipts of Bahai Reports from America

To-day, at about half past three, Abdul Baha, passing by the house, called out my name, and in a second, I was following after Him. He told me to bring the letters with me. I was glad for this. Reaching the gate of the garden, I knocked at the door, and the gardener opened it. The Master entered, took off his black coat and yellow “aba,” and placed them on the branch of a fig tree. He was now all in white. For a few minutes he walked along the avenues and I could see his wonderful stature through the branches stirred by the wafting of the breeze.

He told me that when the weather was good his constitution responded to it and that he felt like a different person.

Then he started to dictate Tablets.

The third monthly report of Mr. Joseph H. Hannen, from Washington, D.C., was read. As He listened, His face brightened, and recalling different names mentioned in the letter, he exclaimed, "Bravo, Mrs. Belmont," "Bravo, So and So." He directed me to send copies of this report to Cairo and Teheran; — so that they might spread it to other Bahai Centers, and to keep the original for him. In the evening he told the believers that a good report had been received from Washington which made him very happy. They should read it.

4. The Story of Foad Pasha, the Grand Vizier of Turkey

After two hours of dictation he left the garden to see a house which he desired to rent for the coming pilgrims from India and Persia. On the way we met the son of the former Consul of Damascus, Hashem Khan, with the Secretary of the Consulate of Alexandria. They had come to pay their respects to Abdul Baha. After seeing the house, the Master took his guests to the apartment of Mirza Abul Fazl, and there, on the veranda, he conversed with them. As the son of the Consul — a pleasant, polite young man — had just arrived from Constantinople, the conversation naturally turned in the direction of the late war and its dreadful consequences.

Abdul Baha said that the thoughts of the statesmen of the East are atrophied, and their hearts devoid of desire for the progress of the nation. Their ideas are petty, not sublime; selfish, not disinterested; local, not general. They think more of the advancement of their own interests, than of those of the country. They are not far-seeing patriots, but inexperienced tyros. They sell the resources of their country, if they think that by so doing they can fill their own pockets. Except in two instances, the Mohammedan countries of the East have not produced any real statesmen for the last 200 years. When He was in Constantinople He heard on every side the praise of Foad Pasha, the then Grand Vizier. At that time Abdul Baha was about seventeen or eighteen years old. One day He was in the house of Kamal Pasha, the former Ambassador of Turkey to Persia. The latter spoke Persian fluently, and as Abdul Baha had known him when he was an official in Teheran, he called on him during his short stay in Constantinople, and Abdul Baha returned the visit. While they were engaged in conversation Foad Pasha was announced. Abdul Baha thought to himself: "Now I shall have the opportunity of meeting this celebrated statesman, and of hearing words of political wisdom from his lips." As soon as Foad Pasha entered, his first word was addressed to Kamal Pasha. "I could not sleep last night." A statesman who can not sleep all night must of necessity be thinking out the vast plan of some administrative reform, or public or civic welfare. "I did not enjoy one wink of slumber till this morning: the result being the composition of two blank verses," he said. "Do you want me to read them to you?" Abdul Baha was astonished at this state of affairs, that the Grand Minister of an Empire does not sleep all night for the writing of two blank verses. The lines were some poetical exaggeration about the beauty and tresses of his beloved. When he left the room Abdul Baha asked Kamal Pasha: "Why did you praise so volubly those vapid verses?" He said: — "Why, we can't do otherwise."

5. Gaem-maqam — the Persian Statesman

Then Abdul Baha told us another story about this man. He had ordered the killing of several hundred persons, exiled two or three thousand innocent men, and paid a large indemnity of eight millions to one of the European powers, to satisfy their demands based upon certain occurrences which had transpired in Syria. But in Persia, during the Ministry of the Great Gaem-maqam, the Legation of one of the Foreign Nations was burned down and seventy-two people were killed by the populace, yet that far-sighted and astute Persian Minister so dexterously satisfied that Foreign Power without paying an indemnity or killing or banishing anyone, that this one act alone became the greatest political feat of that Persian statesman, Gaem-maqam.

6. The Story of the Sick Soldier and the Watchman

While Abdul Baha was in Adrianople, Khorsheed Pasha, the Vali, one day asked him about the future of the Turkish Empire.

"Do you want me to give you my frank opinion?" Abdul Baha said.

"Yes, of course," he answered.

Then, let me illustrate your position by a story. During the war against a foreign nation, one of the soldiers was stricken with a severe sickness. The military doctor, observing his case, recommended him to the watchman, saying: "This man must not sleep to-night. It is the crisis of his illness, but to-morrow morning he will feel much better. Nurse him very carefully and watch over him." The doctor left, and about sunset the watchman came around to look after the sick man. After an hour or two he saw that he was getting worse, and was moaning and lamenting loudly. In order to alleviate his pain, the watchman gave him an opium pill, as a result of which he slept soundly all night. In the morning, the doctor called and saw that the condition of the patient was worse than the day before. Not being able to understand this relapse, he sent for the watchman. "What did you do for him last night?" "Oh, he was in such a frantic condition that I gave him a pill of opium, after which he slept soundly." "Did you not think that I, who am a doctor, knew this remedy just as well as you, but I did not give it to him because I knew that it would make him worse?" "What do I care? I wanted to sleep and this patient disturbed me. I gave him an opium pill, and it served its purpose. To-night there will be another watchman. If the patient is getting worse, it does not trouble me in the least."

Now, Abdul Baha told the Governor, it is your watch-time. You are not doing anything to improve the condition of the sick country. You are putting it to sleep by giving it narcotics, and when you leave your position, what do you care whether the patient will live or die? You have had your night's sleep. Instead of watching the patient solicitously, and pulling him through, you prefer your own rest and comfort.

1. The Bahais Must Raise a New Voice

Last night Haji Mohammad, the brother of Ahmad Yazdi, arrived from Port Said, and brought us our mail. I had a few letters from America, the contents of which gave much pleasure to Abdul Baha. The breeze of good news must ever waft from the direction of the West to gladden the heart of the Center of the Covenant. May the believers of God, during the coming years plant new seeds in the gardens of hearts, educate new souls in the divine school, adorn with new stars the heaven of Reality, upraise new banners in the army of the Kingdom, cultivate new flowers in the Paradise of Abha, issue a new voice through the pillars of the earth, herald the new message with a new enthusiasm, break through the rank and file of indifference with a new impetuosity, invite new guests to sit around the heavenly table, ask new thirsty ones to drink from the spring of life, create a new motion in the spiritual spheres, throw a new stir in the world of ideals, and pave new highways leading to the Supreme Concourse.

In the morning I went to Alexandria, and having dispatched some letters and attended to duties entrusted to me by the Master, returned. All day our house was an interesting center for the coming and going of the believers and pilgrims. Haji Abbas received permission to return to his home via Constantinople and Russia.

2. The Article .of Arthur Brisbane on “Science” Translated and Published in Arabic Daily and Discussed by Students

In the afternoon I called at the apartment of Mirza Abul Fazl. There were several young Arab Bahais present, and to my pleasant surprise, the subject of discussion was an article by Arthur Brisbane, feature writer of Mr. Hearst’s papers in the United States. The article dealt with the wonders of science and the discoveries of this age. It was translated into Arabic by an Egyptian daily and published in the current issue. Mirza Abul Fazl could not agree with certain statements made by Arthur Brisbane. After much discussion pro and con, he directed Hossein Rouhy to write an answer and to forward it to the editor of the paper. As I sat there, I thought how small the world was! What would Arthur Brisbane say or think did he know that his article, written thousands of miles away, in a new world, surrounded by a complex civilization, was being discussed and criticized by a number of Arabian students, supervised by a Persian philosopher, in a summer resort of ancient Egypt. Truly the world is becoming one!

I may conclude with extracts from some Tablets which I have gathered out of the manuscript book of one of the pilgrims. They reflect the Bahai qualities and spirit.

3. This World Is Dark, It Must Be Changed into a Universe of Light

“O ye friends of God and assistants of Abdul Baha!

“What can I write, and what can I say? That which is in the heart can be neither translated into words nor written on paper, and that which can be moulded into phrases cannot express the susceptibilities of the heart and conscience; therefore, I address you, O ye real friends: — Turn the mirrors of your hearts toward mine. Unquestionably the mysteries of this heart shall become reflected upon yours, and the emotions of this longing one will become evident and manifest in all regions.

“The world is black; the Divine Bestowal is Radiant. This blackness must be changed into light, and this narrow, dark sphere be transformed into a vast, illimitable universe of illumination. The body of the world is a dead corpse, it must be resuscitated; it is withered, it must be made fresh and blooming; it is extinct, it must be enkindled; it is the arena for the expression of animosity, it must be made the dawning-place of love and good fellowship; it is the origin of the emanation of contention, we must make it the axis around which revolves unity; it is the exposition for the baser qualities which lead to eternal disgrace, we must make it the rising-point for the refulgent rays of the Everlasting Glory. The stranger must be instructed in the lesson of neighborliness; the heedless ones be made aware; the enemies must be loved and the hateful ones be shown kindness. We must become flaming torches and burning Fires of God. We must move the world, and illuminate the dark globe. All this depends upon the effort of the friends and the sacrifice of the beloved ones.”

4. Attraction is Not Realized Save through Teaching the Cause of God

“O thou servant of the Almighty! Beg of God that in this world which is groaning with pains and troubles, thou mayst aspire to a breath of rest and that in this sorrow-begirdled globe, thou mayst obtain happiness. This Bestowal will not become unveiled and this Grace will not adorn the Assemblage of the heart except through severance from all else save God and by complete concentration upon the kingdom of Abha. This severance and attention will not be obtained save by attraction to the Fragrances of God, and by enkindlement with the Fire of the Love of God. This attraction and enkindlement will not be realized except through teaching the Cause of God and by firmness and steadfastness in the Covenant and Testament of God. Upon thee be Abha, and upon every one who is severed, attentive, attracted and enkindled; conveying the message while he is firm and steadfast....”

5. Confer upon Every One Spiritual Joy

“O thou who art exhilarated with the Cup of the True One:

“Thou hast the desire to render a great service at the Threshold of the Almighty. Happy art thou that thou art confirmed with this bounteous aim. To-day, ecstasy [sic] and yearning at the Threshold of God, enkindlement with the Fire of the Love of God, attraction with the Fragrance of God and the Song and melody of the Supreme Concourse, are true service. Be thou an ignited torch and cast upon all people the reflection of its rays. Enkindle the Fire of Love and burn away all veils. Confer upon every one spiritual joy and gladness and manifest a merciful nature and disposition. Deliver men from prison and lead them to the Court of Guidance.”

6. A poetic tablet like a bouquet of fragrant flowers.

“O ye who are intoxicated with the Wine of God!

“The Breeze of the Merciful is wafting from the rose-garden of Eternity, the luminous Morn hath dawned from the horizon of significances; the clarion Call reaches to the ears from the Kingdom of Abha; the melody of the wisdom of the nightingale of the meadow of sanctity is raised; the Paradise of unity and the orchard of Abstraction are opened and luxuriant; the roses of idealism, and the flowers of the merciful verities are laughing and blooming; the hyacinths and anemones are fresh and full of fragrance; the trees of the divine Garden are fruitful, their roots firm in the ground; the rivers of life are flowing; the fountain of unending Grace is gushing forth, leaping playfully on and on; the liberty-loving Cypress has raised its branches toward the sky; the longing dove is cooing; the real Leila with a rosy-checked Countenance is manifest; the Manjun of Consciousness with burning heart is evident.”

1. This is the seed-sowing time. 2. This is the day in which to lay the foundation of the house. 3. All efforts must be centralized about the spreading of the Cause. 4. Hope for the Union of the East and the West.

1. This Is the Seed-sowing Time

Teaching the word of God — spreading the Glad-tidings of the Kingdom — conveying the Message of Unity and raising the Flag of International Peace hold the foremost ground in the Bahai Cause. When we receive certain heavenly privileges and spiritual distinctions, we must share them with the rest of our fellow men. The very fact that we have received connotes the idea of giving. By teaching our own knowledge will be increased. When the water is not constantly flowing, it will stagnate, no matter how crystalline and pure. If you have a handful of seeds, you must sow them during the season, so that you may gather a goodly crop at the harvest. Now this is the seed-sowing time of the Kingdom of Brotherhood. This and this alone will yield fruit. We must, like wise farmers, get up early in the morning, and go about our business with no other thought in our minds except sowing the seeds. We must sow all the seeds that God has given us, and if we have scattered our stock, he stands ready to replenish it from his invisible storehouse. Once the seeds are sown; the sun of Providence will shine forth, the Breeze of Mercy will waft, the rain of clemency will pour down, causing the growing of the field, waving with a soft, beautiful verdancy and soon attaining to the stage of fruition — the sheaves laden with golden corns. Then is the time of rejoicing for the farmer, because the result of his labor and industry is spread before his eyes.

2. This Is the Day in Which to Lay the Foundations of the House

Before everything else we must lay the foundation. Then go out and gather mortar, stones, bricks, lime, hauling machinery and laborers to build the house. What benefit will accrue to us if we buy the furniture or utensils before the house is ready? How can we build the roof before the structural framework is put together? A wise builder lays a good basis for his house, collects all the necessary material, and then goes on, step by step, in its construction. Abdul Baha has shown through his life and deeds how this is the most important work of the Cause. The autumn and winter seasons will come in due time. Our supreme duty now is to arise unanimously for the awakening of souls! Should we follow the example of the Divine Farmer, we will reap a great crop in the harvest season, we will see the reflections of our contented faces in the mirror of the Kingdom, and will observe our names inscribed upon the scroll of time with the pen of light. The friends all over the world are longing to serve the Cause. Praise be to God that their aims are humanitarian, their ideas are lofty, their love for the Truth manifest, their eagerness to diffuse the lights of the Sun of Reality and their spiritual susceptibilities warm and aglowing. They are servants of the world of humanity, and heralds of the Kingdom of Light. May they become confirmed to teach the Cause with a new fervor and inspiration!

In a Tablet written by Abdul Baha several years ago he says:

3. All Efforts Must Be Centralized About the Spreading of the Cause

“The believers with the utmost steadfastness and firmness must engage in the teaching of the Cause. They must become united and agreed. They are all the drops of one river, waves of one sea, breezes of one garden, streams flowing from one fountain, birds soaring toward one apex, hyacinths adorning one Park, intoxicated with one wine and their hearts ravished with one melody. ... It is hoped that the friends may become sanctified and holy above all earthly conditions and in concord and harmony, in unity of identity, unity of quality, unity of opinion and unity of thought, set an example for all the believers of other countries and become the spiritual leaders in this arena. Now all aims must verge toward one spring, and all efforts be centralized in one object, and that is: the diffusion of the Fragrances of the Merciful, and the promulgation of the Word of the Almighty. The time of systematization and crystallization shall come. It has not yet arrived. The aim of all the friends must be this: — the diffusion of the Fragrances of Holiness. When a man’s efforts are concentrated on this one object, he will undoubtedly reflect the confirmation of the Manifest Light. Except for the guidance of souls, no other cause is equally confirmed. If any person entertains other thoughts than this, he will unquestionably regret them.

“During the season of seed-sowing you cannot gather a crop and at the time of irrigation, harvesting is unthinkable. The soul who, during the summer season, engages in planting trees, will not reap any reward, for this is the season of fruit-gathering, and not that of tree-planting. In short the purpose is this: During the season of the Divine Spring we must occupy all our time in seed-sowing and irrigation, and not in harvesting and crop-collecting.”

This morning Abdul Baha called on Mirza Abul Fazl, and spoke with him for half an hour on the importance of teaching the Cause in this day, and of the subserviency of all other ideas to the idea of promoting the word of God. In the evening He entertained a Russian Prince and a number of Arab Sheiks at His home.

4. Hope for the Reunion of the East and the West

Letters and cablegrams are pouring in from all parts of the world. The Master is daily growing stronger, and is attending to all the innumerable duties which are laid on His shoulders.

1. The life of the East and the West, and of how the Bahai movement unites them.
2. Abdul Baha writes on the future condition of women.

1. The Life of the East and the West, and of How the Bahai Movement Unites Them

The spiritual life of the East is calm and uplifting. It has a celestial outlook. It purifies one's aims. It ennobles the character. It changes the satan into the angel. There is a subtle influence in this life which works like magic over the hearts of men. It steadies the nerves, confers an equipoise, intensifies spiritual feelings and bestows mental calmness and serenity. The realization of the power of faith and prayer dawns upon the mind; the divine Presence is felt as never before and the holy light breaks upon the dark chambers of the heart. Those who have lived in the East and have experienced this feeling cannot describe it in words. It is a fire the flame of which sets aglow many hearts, and which inspires the imagination with pictures of heavenly attributes.

While the life of the East on the one hand is sweetly contemplative, the life of the West is energetically active; the former is a calm river, the latter a rushing cyclone. One interprets life subjectively, the other elucidates it objectively. The Bahai Movement establishes a balance between the two poles. The materialism of the occident is imbued with spirit and the unproductive mysticism of the Orient is discountenanced when work is constituted as worship. Thus the Bahai Cause is in a position to help both hemispheres with its new spiritual philosophy. Abdul Baha is daily working for the consummation of this object.

2. Abdul Baha writes on the future condition of women

This morning we got glimpses of Abdul Baha as he passed by our house two or three times. He was busy all day. In the evening, the correspondent of the Agdam, published in Cairo, called on him and had a long interview. These days, the Master is devoting much of his time to writing Tablets for the Persian believers. He is fulfilling his promise, that after his return from America and Europe, he would answer all their petitions. I produce herein the translation of one of these Tablets on the "Feminist Question," — one that is very opportune. It is as follows:

"O thou my beloved daughter! Thy eloquent and fluent letter was perused in a garden, under the cool shade of a tree, while the gentle breeze was wafting. The means of physical enjoyment was spread before the eyes and thy letter became the cause of spiritual enjoyment. Truly, I say, it was not a letter, but a rose-garden adorned with hyacinths and flowers. It contained the sweet Fragrances of Paradise and the Zephyr of Divine Love blew from its roseate words.

"As I have not ample time at my disposal, I will give herein a brief answer. It is as follows: — In the revelation of Baha-Ullah, men and women stand shoulder to shoulder, in no instance will the women be left behind. Their rights with men are in equal degree. They will enter into all the administrative branches of the body politic. They will attain to such a high plane that they will be honored in the very highest station of the world of humanity and will take part in all affairs. Rest ye assured of this! Do not look upon present conditions; in the not distant future the world of women will become all-refulgent and all-glorious. For His Holiness Baha-Ullah hath willed it so. At the time of elections the right to vote is the inalienable prerogative of women, and their admittance to all the departments of life an irrefutable and incontestable right. No soul can retard or prevent it. But there are certain matters, participation in which is not worthy of woman. For example, at the time when the community is taking up vigorous defensive measures against the attack of foes, the women are exempt from military engagements. It may so happen that at a given time, warlike and savage tribes may furiously attack the body politic with the intention of carrying on a wholesale slaughter of its members; under such circumstances defense is necessary; and it is the duty of the men and not of the women to organize and execute such defensive measures, because the women's hearts are tender and cannot endure the sight of horror and carnage, even if it is for the sake of defense. For such, and similar undertakings, the women are exempt.

"As regards the Constitution of the House of Justice, Baha-Ullah, in the Book of Aqdas, addressed the men, saying: — "O ye men of the House of Justice!" but (when the members are being elected) the right which belongs to women, as far as their voting and their voice is concerned, is indisputable. When women attain to the ultimate degree of progress, then, according to the exigencies of time and place, and of their capacity, they shall obtain extraordinary privileges. Be ye confident on this account: His Holiness Baha-Ullah has greatly strengthened the Cause of women and their rights and privileges are the special principles of Abdul Baha. Rest ye assured! Ere long the day will come when the men, addressing the women will say: — Blessed are ye! Blessed are ye! Verily ye are worthy of every gift, and deserve to adorn your heads with the Crown of Everlasting Glory; because in sciences and arts, in virtues and perfections, ye have become equal to men and as regards the tenderness of heart and the abundance of mercy and sympathy, ye are superior."

I received several letters from England, France and America, each containing cheering news of the steady growth of the beloved Cause.

1. The College Life and Its Expected Results

One of the Persian poets says:

"All the means are prepared for thee, and yet thou art sitting idle."

The outcome of school and college years must be a useful life for the community. If a child is possessed of happy surroundings, if fortune has smiled upon him, he must avail himself of these opportunities and daily prepare himself — so that when he leaves college, he may enter upon the stage of life, ready to act his part with confidence.

In a spiritual way we are all the children of the Heavenly Father. He has prepared for us the means of advancement. He has placed within our reach the instruments whereby we may obtain an ideal education and fit ourselves for the service of humanity. He has given us lessons in many ways. He has encouraged us with words of wisdom, and has pointed out the glorious goal. Yet some of us play truant, do not learn our lessons, and at the time of examination fail. Do you not think the Father will feel sad and keenly disappointed when He finds that His years of solicitude have brought no results? Let us, therefore, be the studious children of Truth; avail ourselves of all the opportunities prepared for us — so that throughout our lives we may give happiness to others and fulfill the expectation of the Great Teacher.

2. A Talk by an Old Bahai on the Sins of Backbiting

“El-ya-hou” is an old Bahai. In years gone by he has visited Baha-Ullah many times, and as he had been a Jew before becoming a Bahai, he is well conversant with the prophecies of the Old Testament. He has a sweet nature and loves Abdul Baha more than words can express. In the course of conversation he told us that the Cause of the Blessed Perfection is the reality of Love and the means of unity and concord amongst the children of men; so that all of them may become the waves of one sea, the radiant stars studded in one illimitable sphere, the brilliant pearls of the shell of unity and the sparkling gems of the mine of singleness; thus may they serve each other from their hearts; praise and commend each other; unloose their tongues in manifesting the good qualities of each, and thank the Lord for His Graces and Gifts. They must look toward the horizon of everlasting Glory and as they attribute themselves to Baha-Ullah, they must see no evil, and never speak of the faults of others. They must shut their ears to all gossip and backbiting. They must be spiritual beings, with spiritual qualities. A number of souls are walking in this straight path, and, praise be to God, are assisted and confirmed in all countries; but others have not yet reached this exalted, and supreme station, and are not fully established in this Divine Principle. This is a cause of great grief to the heart of Abdul Baha. There is no greater obstacle to the Cause of God than faultfinding and no greater handicap for the word of God. The friends of God must become the essences of union and accord, enter under the unicolored tent of the Almighty, the expression of one great Ideal, walk in one road, forget conflicting opinions, and leave behind them their divergent views. Then Abdul Baha will be pleased with them, because He sees that they have dedicated all their thoughts and energies to the promotion of Love and affection, throwing into the corner of oblivion their differences and growing in the image and likeness of the Creator.

Thus “El-ya-hou” spoke from the depth of his heart.

3. Permission Given to Persian Bahai Students to Come to Ramleh.

To-day we did not see Abdul Baha, but he sent me several cablegrams to be forwarded to various parts of the world. One of these was to Haifa giving permission to half of the Bahai students to come to Ramleh. There are about thirty young Persian Bahais who are students in the American College in Beirut. As this is vacation time they are spending their summer on Mount Carmel. In a few days, half of them will arrive, the other half will come later. To-night we had a meeting at the House of Khourassani. Mirza Mahmoud spoke on the trip of Abdul Baha to Edinburgh. There were many Bahais of different nationalities.

4. Abdul Baha Praises Mrs. Besant, President of the Theosophical Society

An interesting Tablet was sent to Mr. Graham Pole, the Editor of the Scotland Theosophy in Edinburgh, in which Abdul Baha refers to Mrs. Besant, the President of the Theosophical Society. As he has spoken before many of their societies in various cities, both in the United States and Europe, it will not be out of place to quote it herein, so that the friends may become informed of its contents:

“O THOU MY BELOVED FRIEND!

“Thy letter was received from India. From its contents it became evident that thou art occupied, and art spending thy days in the company of that respected lady, Mrs. Besant. I hope thou mayest be ever happy, serene, confirmed and assisted; so that thou mayest become able to render a signal service to the respected lady, Mrs. Besant. The ideal of Mrs. Besant, I say truly is very lofty. She is working and laboring most valiantly, and her utmost hope is to render a service to the world of humanity, and to be the means of the establishment of good-fellowship and love between all the communities of the earth. At all times I am praying in her behalf, so that the Confirmations of the Kingdom may surround her, that she may sow the seed of service in pure, productive soil; and that she may gather many, many harvests; then the heavenly benediction will be obtained the outpourings of the Holy Spirit realized, and her services, troubles and hardships crowned with eternal results. I desire this station for her.

“Consider how many important women have come into this world! How many queens have lived upon this earth! How many distinguished ladies have become the Presidents of Societies! But neither have their names nor any great account of their deeds been left behind! Yet Mary Magdalene, who was only a peasant woman, — because she became inspired to serve the Kingdom of Christ and to scatter his seeds in productive ground — what a great crop she gathered! And through the blessing of that harvest, they are even now building churches in her name! in all the Churches the people glorify and praise her and now, after 1900 years, Abdul Baha is speaking of her lofty station! He testifies to the fact, that, in the Kingdom of Christ, she served more than all the apostles. She even became the cause of the firmness and steadfastness of the Apostles, for, accordingly to the Text of the Gospels, their faith wavered after the crucifixion, but Mary Magdalene inspired them with resolution, and certainty. Consider what a service she rendered to the Kingdom of Christ! That is why, like unto a star, she is shining from the horizon of Eternity.

“Upon thee be greeting and praise.

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHÁ ABBAS.”

While in America and Europe Abdul Baha often stated that the Bahais must associate with the Theosophists because they were nearer to this Cause than many other groups.

1. Spread of Bahai Cause in the Interior of Turkey

Abdul Baha received a letter from the interior of Turkey, the city of Antab where the Bahai Cause is being spread. He read to us a portion of it which describes a lecture given by an Armenian before an audience of five hundred people. The lecturer dwelt upon the trip of the Master of Europe and America, and gave a synopsis of the Teachings. What interested the audience more than anything else was the principle of the Conformity of Science and Religion, philosophy and faith. Science and religion, he told them, have always been in accord, but the despicable, accursed, satans (Ulemas) have always sown seed of discord between them. The Master laughed heartily when he read the above conclusion.

2. Let the American Friends Wait

Then he gave each of us letters just received in our names and while we were sitting in his presence, he wrote several Tablets with his own hand. At last he told us that he was trying to make amends for the past and was devoting all his time to the Oriental friends. Before leaving for America, he wrote that the Bahais must excuse him from any letter-writing, but that after his return he would correspond with them as of old, and now he was fulfilling his promise.

When we left I ventured to say that many petitions from America and Europe were accumulating and solicited his attention. He answered me in a humorous fashion; wait, wait a little longer. Let him now attend to the Persian believers, and the turn of my American friends would soon come.

When we left his house, we were all intoxicated with his divine Love. During our interview the Master spoke a great deal with Mirza Jalal, because one of the Princes of Persia taught by him had written a letter.

3. Story of How a Bahai Feast Was Given in Bagdad

Mirza Jamal, our cook, told us a story about a feast in Bagdad.

“The Bahais in Bagdad,” he said, “were not rich, but were firm and filled with fervor. They kept the nineteen day feast. One morning they sent word to one of the friends that the Feast would be held in his house. He touched his pockets and there was no money. What should he do? He had a watch which he had bought for ten majidis. He took it out of his pocket and sent it to the bazaar to be sold at auction. Accidentally one of the Bahais passed by and recognized the watch. He stopped, and saw that it was going to be sold for two majidis. He raised the price half a dollar and bought it. Quietly he carried it home. When night came, he went to the meeting, and after the refreshments were served, he approached the host and, taking the watch out of his pocket offered it to him as a present. The host was very much surprised, but delighted. All the friends were pleased when they heard the story.”

4. Abdul Baha Writes on the Nineteen day Feast

I may now conclude by quoting from a Tablet, which Abdul Baha writes to Mr. Jos. Hannen:

“O thou who art firm in the Covenant!

“Thy third report was received and its contents imparted the utmost exhilaration. The 19-day Feast was the Lord’s Supper, and its results are eternalized. Although physically Abdul Baha was far away, he was present in that meeting with heart and soul. Truly I say, it was a glorious feast, perfect in every way. Do not ye look upon the present, nay rather, look into the future. The Lord’s Supper during the lifetime of that divine Light, had no importance in the estimation of the public; but consider how the rays of that sun of Reality illumined that meeting afterward. ...O thou my kind, Mr. Hannen! I am most pleased with thy service, and I hope that these services of thine shall make thee a standard in the Divine Kingdom. Announce the utmost kindness to Mrs. Hannen. If Mrs. Hannen can undertake to spread broadcast the diary letters which are forwarded to you from the East concerning the travel and sojourn of Abdul Baha, it is very acceptable. ...”

5. The Mohammedan Month of Fasting Comes to an End

In two days the month of Ramadan will come to a close and all restrictions will be taken away. There will be general feasting and five holidays. To the Mohammedans, this is one of the most important occasions for joy-making and for calling on each other. Already the air is full of expectation for the coming feast!

1. The story of the blind man and the serpent.

1. The Story of the Blind Man and the Serpent

“When I was a Seesan,” said Mirza Jalal Sina, “the friends of God brought to me a very old man with a patriarchal beard, and wished me to speak to him about the Cause. They had often told him of the teachings, but with no evident result. He was simple, yet fanatical, tender-hearted, yet full of religious superstitions. At heart a child, in body a Hercules. He had the strength of a lion, yet his firm belief in dogmas, inspired him with apprehension as to his future. With rough and uncouth gestures he entered the room and squatting on the floor cried out: — ‘Tell me now, what have you to say? I have no patience to sit through a long sermon!’ Immediately I got, as in a flash of lightning, how I must handle this overgrown child of nature. I told him — ‘My friend! I have really nothing to tell you but with your permission I shall relate a story. Will you give me your ears?’ ‘Forsooth I shall. I do love to hear a good story with a moral to it,’ he said, his face already brightening with interest. ‘All right, then listen with attention: — Once upon a time there was a man of good position and fortune. As a public servant he ranked high in the estimation of the members of society. He had a palatial residence, and his servants were innumerable. His stable, stocked with Arabian and Persian horses was the pride of the neighborhood. Many famous men sat at his table and ate of his bounteous food. He dispensed hospitality like a prince, and received people of all ranks with royal courtesy and lavish splendor. As time rolled on the heaven of his fortune became beclouded, and like the thunders of the sky, successive reverses overtook him, breaking the mountain of his wealth into a thousand pieces. Soon he found himself in complete poverty. By this time all his old friends had left him, and in the hour of destitution, no one would condescend to so much as recognize him. From height of opulence, he was thrown headlong into the depth of despair and indigence. As though these humiliations were not enough, the Fates visited him again and made him totally blind. Now indeed, the cup of sorrow was full to overflowing, and all doors were closed forever before his face. He was considered an outcast, and no one would associate with him. Finally through this chain of circumstances, he was forced to become a beggar in the public square. One cold morning in the winter, he left his dirty hovel and went to his accustomed place. While he was walking, his feet stumbled against something. He knelt down and searched for it. He felt a long sinewy thing in his hand and thought it was a silk whip of some special value. He took hold of it and he walked along unconcerned. A passerby, frightened by the sight of the object being carried by the blind beggar, cried out: — ‘Man! Man! Dost thou not see what thou art holding in thy hands? It is a serpent, it will bite thee. It will kill thee. Throw it away quickly.’ ‘No, indeed. No indeed!’ the blind man retorted angrily. ‘This is a silk whip which costs at least five majidis. Feel it with thy fingers, how soft it is. No! I shall not listen to thee. Thou art a covetous, greedy beggar and wantest me to throw it away so that thou mayest take it up and sell it.’ ‘Really, my friend! This is a poisonous serpent, but the cold weather has benumbed it, and soon the rays of the sun will bring it to life.’ ‘No! No! Don’t talk to me like that. I will not throw it away. If thou art very anxious to have it, I will sell it to thee for four instead of five majidis.’ By and by a large crowd gathered, each one calling upon him to throw away the seemingly dead serpent, but he, having lost all confidence in humanity, persisted in believing it was a whip. In order to show his utter contempt of public opinion, he folded the serpent and placed it near to his skin, standing erect in the already rising sun, in the horrified sight of the spectators. ‘What art thou doing? Art thou thine own enemy? The serpent will sting thee with its venomous fangs. Cast it away while there is yet time.’ No! the more they insisted, the closer he hugged it to his breast. The serpent warming up under the downpour of the rays of the star of the day, started to move slowly up and down the body of the beggar, stinging him several times. He shrieked and cried with pain, then fell to the ground in terrible agony. The deadly poison working up rapidly through his body caused his death.

“Now, my old friend, thou art in the position of that blind beggar, because thou art hugging to thy heart the old, superannuated symbols of a decayed and dying religion which will not benefit thee in the least. That serpent, however, caused the death of only the body; this serpent causes the death of the spirit. During the past years all these friends of thine have testified that the old form of religion will not be conducive to thy salvation, but like the old beggar, blindly, thou art in thine obstinacy persisting in that this is a silk whip — my religion is good enough for me — and not a serpent. The serpent of superstition, ignorance and dogma is next to thy skin, and these men cry out to thee to cast it away; so that thy spiritual life may be saved, but no, thou wilt have none of their advice. I portrayed his inner condition so vividly that he commenced to shake and weep. From that time on he became a dweller in the kingdom of Abha, and a most progressive member of the community.”

Abdul Baha went to Alexandria this morning and in order to have some papers signed by the judge, he presented himself in the Court.

During the evening he came to our house for half an hour, and the talk was on the coming national Fête of Ramadan.

1. The watermelons of Acca. 2. Abdul Baha and the story of the policeman of Ramleh. 3. Abdul Baha talks on the power of imagination. 4. Oriental Bahais portray natural spirituality.

1. The Watermelons of Acca

We have received fine watermelons from Acca. Abdul Gasem sent ten big ones for the Master and he forwarded six of them to our house. If we cannot go to Acca now, at least the watermelons of Acca come to us. While we were enjoying them, I said that I wished that I could send one of them to America to show the friends how big and juicy are the watermelons of Acca. Mirza Mahmoud laughingly said: "Though wouldst have sent it if thou didst know how!"

2. Abdul Bah, and the Story of the Policeman of Ramleh

Arising early this morning Khosro entertained us with some sidelights on the current events. He sleeps in this house and goes to the Master's home a little after sunrise to begin his work. This morning he delayed his departure, and explained the reason as follows:

"All the policemen in this quarter have received generous gifts of money and presents from the Master. There is one who stands in Khosro's way every morning and tells him a long story, so that he may repeat it to the Master, who may give him some money. 'I have three children. My salary is not sufficient and since the Pasha, His Excellency (Abdul Baha) has come here, a new hope has dawned from the horizon of my heart. One of my children goes to school, and for him I have bought a pair of new shoes for the coming feast. The other two who are only a few years old, left stealthily their small beds last night and came to me without any noise. They woke me gently and said: "Papa, papa, we are the Furies. If thou dost not buy two other pairs of shoes for us, we may strangle thee right now.” I laughed and hugged them to my breast and sent them back to their beds with a promise that if they are good, behave well and obey their mother, then probably the new “Pasha” may give them the shoes. Now, please, Khosro Effendi, tell this to “Pasha.” Other policemen whose duties are patrolling in other quarters come to Khosro and ask him: “How long is the new ‘Pasha’ going to live here?” He says: “Probably one month!” “Good, good! because after two weeks this quarter will be assigned to us and then the ‘Pasha’ may be as generous toward us as he has been to others.”

3. Abdul Baha Talks on the Power of Imagination

Haji Niaz arrived this afternoon from Cairo and brought us the good wishes of the believers. He is the same happy old man with a nature of sunshine and good will toward all. About 6 o’clock Abdul Baha passed by and called on Mirza Abul Fazl. After a few moments Shoghi Effendi returned and brought me the good news that I was summoned by the Master. I stood before him on the veranda. He was speaking to Mirza Abul Fazl on “imagination,” quoting the epigram of an Oriental Philosopher: “Imagination is the greatest ruler in the human world.” No matter how scientific a man may be, yet at times, “imagination” gains an ascendancy over his mind. For example, while a man is alive he is able to strike, to beat, to kill, yet you sleep with him in the same room. When he is dead, science teaches us that his body returns to the mineral kingdom. He can neither strike, nor kill. The body lies there like a piece of stone, inanimate. But you would not sleep with it in the same room. what is the reason of this? It is the power of imagination. It grips you with its imperial energy and overwhelms you with invisible force. All the convincing proofs of science will not induce you to live in the same room with a corpse.

Then he related a dramatic story to further illustrate the subject, but as soon as he finished it, he turned to me and said: “Don’t write this.” He could see in my face how deeply interested I was! Ere long, he fell into a deep heavenly silence, and the beautiful atmosphere was permeated with a languorous quietness and peace. The brilliant hosts of the sky were arrayed in shining armor of white light, fighting bravely against the deep-coming darkness. With the ears of the spirit we could hear them chanting and praising, because the face of the earth was illumined by the Face of the Lord.

4. Oriental Bahais Portray “Natural” Spirituality

Returning home, I found a number of the friends engaged in conversation. How happy, how carefree, how detached these people seem to me! They are beings created and fashioned in other worlds. Their happiness, their joy, their detachment are all so natural, so unconscious, so outflowing from the springs of their hearts. There is no affectation, no sanctimony, no religiosity. They do not try to be spiritual. It is not through the exercise of the will. How well Abdul Baha echoes the secrets of their inmost hearts when he writes in a recent Tablet: —

“The days of human existence are like vanishing shadows. With the utmost rapidity they are brought to a close. From amongst mankind those who live a heedless life are at the end, afflicted with manifest loss. For the days of their lives will come to a sudden close, leaving no leaves, no blossoms and no fruit. They shall remain in the lowest degree, and no mention of them will be left behind. From kings to servants all walk in this path and live in this circle, except those souls who are freed from all ties. They are not greedy after comfort, nor are they seeking fleeting pleasures. They are not longing for honor, neither are they chasing phantasmal pictures of glory and wealth. They are the devotees (or veterans) of the Blessed Perfection and are in the utmost state of renunciation and evanescence. They are wanderers over mountains and deserts. They call the people to the kingdom of God, and are the cause of the guidance of souls. Like unto candles they are ignited with all the virtues of the world of humanity. This is Everlasting Glory! This is Eternal Life! This is the greatest attainment of the human world! This is the divine sublimity of the Creation of God!”

Daily the cord of correspondence between the East and the West is becoming stronger, and the interchange of ideas more common. Each one of us must do our humble part, no matter where we are; so that the millennium for the coming of which we pray, may soon be established between all peoples and nations and tongues.

Story of a meta-physician and the correction of his book by a teacher. 6. Study of science and true religion must be combined.

1. Moving Picture Theaters in Egypt

This is the second greatest feast in the Mohammedan world, — the feast celebrating the passing of the month of Ramadan. In a way it fills the place of the New Year in America. It is called the Feast of “Beyram” and is a national holiday. All the government departments, offices and stores are closed for from one to five days. The older people pay visits to each other, and the younger generation dressed in bright colors, receive gifts and presents and eat much candy to their great delight. Although a thin air of sadness broods over many hearts owing to the Balkan wars, yet the general impression is that of happiness, gaiety and fun. Life to a simple-hearted Arab is like a moving picture gallery, and he loves to see the scenes of creation unfolding before his eyes without leaving his seat; to this we may attribute the springing up of many nickelodeons and cheap show-places all over Egypt who advertise their pictures in a lurid and sensational manner. These show-places attract a large clientele of heterogeneous elements. On a day such as this, the managers, mostly Italians, Greeks and Levantines, reap a golden harvest.

2. The Feast of Ramadan and Its Spirit of Joy

On the other hand, the religious spirit of the people finds expression in the gorgeous decorations of the mosques and in long hours of prayers and preaching.

Last night Mirza Ali Akbar brought three kinds of candies for the callers to-day, so this morning they were put on different plates ready to be served. The Samovar was boiling and the tea brewing. I was dressed and walking on the veranda, when I saw Abdul Baha coming toward our house. I was glad to look into his face on this Fête day, and my heart sang the songs of joy. What else really do we want except his good pleasure? Is there anything more worth while? Do we not live and move and have our being in him? Is he not the supreme object of our lives? The sum of his unalloyed peace shines upon all and everybody is contented.

How thoughtful and beautiful of the Master to call on Mirza Abul Fazl before anybody else! Is it not just like him?

By the time he returned to us a number of believers and outsiders had gathered on the veranda. He greeted them with affability, and afterwards he wished them a happy and blessed “Beyram.” Then tea and candy were served in turn. He beamed on the friends with heavenly joy and cabled to the Bahai world the glad news: "My health is perfect."

3. Talk on Education and the Story of a Selfish Mother

The subject of his talk was "Education" and the duty of mothers toward their children, — a most appropriate message to go out to the world of motherhood.

He stated that fathers and especially mothers must always think how best they should educate their children, not how to fondle and embrace them too much and thus spoil them. By every means at their disposal, they must knead onto their growing bodies, souls, minds and spirits the basic principles of sincerity, love, trustfulness, obedience, true democracy and kindness toward all races; thus, hereafter the world-civilization may flow in one mighty current and the children of future generations may secure the foundation of human solidarity and good-will. From tenderest childhood, the children must be taught by their mothers the love of God, and the love of humanity; not the love of the humanity of Asia nor the humanity of Europe, nor the humanity of America, but the "humanity of humanity". There are some mothers who have a strange, inexplicable love for their children. One may call it the inversion of love, or as we call it in Persia, "Bearish love". This kind of love does more injury to the child than good. When Abdul Baha was in Akka, during the life of the Blessed Perfection, he entrusted the son of one of the believers to a German carpenter. After a month the mother went to Baha-Ullah and lamented and bemoaned that she wanted her son, because he was unhappy with the carpenter, who cursed his religion. Baha-Ullah told her to consult with Aga (Abdul Baha) and abide by his decision. She went to Abdul Baha and after telling her side of the story, he said to her: 'The Germans do not curse any one. They are not accustomed to it.' She went away and after a month called again with another complaint, saying that this carpenter had forced her son to carry a load of wheat on his back. Again Abdul Baha told her that if the carpenter had done this, it was for her son's discipline. Outwardly Abdul Baha satisfied her, but she was murmuring inwardly. A few months rolled by and she returned with another set of complaints, frankly confessing that she did not want her son to be away from her, for he was the apple of her eye. Realizing how selfish her love was, Abdul Baha told her at last that he would not take her son away, but that he must stay with the carpenter for eight years, until his apprenticeship was over. She yielded to the inevitable. After eight years of study the son left his master, and his mother was very proud of him, because his work was in demand on all sides. In short, mothers must not think of themselves, but of the progress of their children, because upon the children of to-day — depend the molding of the civilization of to-morrow.

All day telegrams poured in from the leaders and important men of Turkey, Egypt, Arabia, etc., congratulating Abdul Baha on this Fête and wishing him a happy “Beyram”!

4. Story of the Theologian and the Sea Captain

There was a caller on Abdul Baha, a theological student of the College of Azhar, and the discussion turned upon the utter futility of Mohammedan theology and metaphysics, and of how some young men wasted their lives on the study of this one branch for twenty or thirty years. Once there was a theologian who took a sea trip. While he was pacing the deck and watching the calm sea, the captain passed by and inquired about his health. Our friend was so full of his theology that he asked the captain: “Dost thou know theology?” he answered “No.” “Then,” the student declared with much pompous dignity, “half thy life is lost.” The captain did not answer him but continued his walk. Next day the sea became very stormy, and the ship was in danger of being wrecked. The captain called on the theologian and found him prostrated with sickness. “Dost thou know how to swim?” he asked. “No.” “Then all thy life is lost,” the captain thundered at him. And you should have heard the Master laugh. Then he quoted several of their metaphysical, hair-splitting axioms over each one of which the theologians wrangle and dispute days and nights.

5. Story of a Metaphysician and the Correction of His Book by a Teacher

Another time, a theological poet, after several years of hardship and privation, finished a book and took it to a learned man to be read and corrected. He read the book and found that the contents were very much like the cobwebs of a spider, or the phantasmal imaginings of a sickly brain. Therefore he marked the first and the last pages, thus conveying the fact that the book was not worth correcting.

In the afternoon the Master sent all of us to the garden of Nozha. We had a pleasant time and on our return we heard that he had been entertaining many Arabs, first at our house and then at that of Mirza Abul Fazl.

6. Study of Science and True Religion Must Be Combined

At noon Abdul Baha told us that he did not mean that religious study must be neglected, but that practical sciences should be learned, so that the lives of the students might become useful. In the future, the theological seminaries must discard all their dogmas which are contradictory to science and reason, and lay a basic foundation, not to be destroyed by the fretting tooth of time. We hope that they will accomplish this task.

1. Persian Bahai Students of the American College Arrive

Last night eleven young Bahais arrived from Haifa. They are students in the American College at Beirut, and have been passing their summer vacation on Mount Carmel, waiting impatiently for permission to visit the Master. These are not all of them. When the present party leaves for Haifa, another one composed of an equal or larger number, will come. They are all young boys from 8 to 18 years, studying in various branches of science, and equipping themselves to become useful members of the body politic. Morally pure, intellectually keen, spiritually susceptible, mentally alive, they combine with these qualities rare power of reserve, simplicity, naturalness and dignity of character, seldom to be witnessed on other youths of the same age. Every one knows by memory many communes and supplications, and this morning after drinking tea, they sat around and chanted Tablets. The American spirit of freedom and activity is in their constitutions. They will become fine and progressive citizens of Persia, when they return to that country. Although their names may sound unfamiliar to our American friends across the ocean, yet they may be of interest. They are as follows: — Mirza Azzizollah Khan, Mirza Ali Mohammed Khan, Mirza Abdul Hossein Khan, Mirza Mahmoud Khan, Mirza Abdul Hassan Khan, all of Shiraz; Mirza Aflatoun of Hamadan, Mirza Ali Aga of Rasht, Mirza Mahmoud Khan of Espahan, Ghodsee Effendi of Haifa and Aga Sayad Gasem of Sabzevar.

Abdul Baha sent for me and after a few minutes talk, told me to go and bring the students. I conducted them to the house and they were ushered into the reception room. Hardly a minute had passed when the Master appeared. They all rose to their feet and although he told them not to do it, yet one after another knelt before and kissed the hem of his garment, his hands or his feet. This is the highest sign of respect, nay rather adoration, and flows from the depth of their hearts.

It is spontaneous and natural, full of sweetness and attachment. It is neither dictated by custom nor ceremony.

2. Persian Students in Paris and London

He told them that they were very welcome! He had been longing to see them, but up to this time the way was not open. Was their vacation spent pleasantly in Haifa on Mount Carmel? The College of Beirut was very good. They could not realize how some of the Persian students spent their time in profitless pursuits in London and Paris. Not only did the Europeans look down upon them, as members of an inferior race and half-civilized, but they (the students) confirm them in this opinion by indulging in the questionable pleasures and vices of the European lower society. They hardly do any study. The major part of their time is spent in the gratification of the appetites, such as sensuality, attending dance halls and theatres, wine drinking, association with undesirable members of the community in which they live, and leading an insipid and voluptuous life, ruinous to themselves and the Persian nation alike.... Praise be to God that the faces of these Bahai students were radiant; the rays of the love of God were shining from their countenances. He was most pleased to have met them. It is very strange that when a face is not illumined with the light of the Love of God, it is dark, and when you look into it, the traces of the divine Glad-tidings are not manifest, but when the light of God shines upon it, it becomes bright and enlightened, as it is said: — “In the faces you shall see the verdancy of Paradise and in their countenances there is the sign of worship.”

3. Abdul Baha Tells the Students How to Study

Afterward the Master left the house to call on Osman Pasha, and in his company, a visit was paid to the Khedive who celebrated the feast yesterday in Cairo, and to-day in Alexandria. Before noon, the Master came to our house to meet the students. He told them that it was his hope that they would make extraordinary progress along spiritual lines as well as in science and art; so that each one might become a brilliant lamp in the world of modern civilization, and upon their return to Persia that country might profit from their acquired knowledge and experience.

4. The Students Read Abdul Baha's Talks in America

In the hands of the students there were copies of Abdul Baha's address given before the Forum Club of San Francisco. He asked one of them what he was holding in his hand? The student presented it to him and he read the last portion concerning the philosophers and the cows, and how the modern materialists should go to the cow to learn the principles of materialism. After speaking on some other subjects, he left us. The students are all eager to take down every word which he says to them and they are writing to their parents and friends the incidents of their trip and of their experiences.

Before he left he told Mirza Ali Akbar to accompany all the students to the Persian Consulate at 4 P.M. as we are quite numerous, both dinner and supper are served in turn; first the students sit around the table, and afterwards the rest of us.

5. Abdul Baha Calls on the Persian Consul

At 4 o'clock, we found ourselves in the large reception room of the Persian Consulate General in Alexandria. For the first half hour we were entertained by the Consul, then the Master came and spoke with him in Turkish. The Consul is a genial old man, and loves the Master very deeply.

When we returned home, the Master had arrived ahead of us, and was talking with a number of prominent callers. At night we had an unusual gathering, full of interest, many of the Bahais related the story of how they first embraced the Cause of God.

1. The story of the royal bird of Gedam. 2. Purity and chastity are the foundations of spiritual life. 3. The brother of the Khedive calls on Abdul Baha. 4. American ice cream for the students. 5. Their love for the Bahai Cause.

1. The Story of the Royal Bird of Gedam

The Eastern mind is a treasure-house of mystic stories, each one fraught with significant lessons. One of these beautiful stories was related to me the other day by Mirza Jalal Sina, and fore-shadows the coming of the Manifestation of God into this world. I report it here without its interpretation, knowing that my readers will supply it by their own imagination: —

Far, far away in a jungle, inaccessible to man, beyond the Indian Ocean, there lived a bird of royal birth, majesty and beauty. Her name was Gedam. Her song was endowed by the Creator of mankind with incomparable beauty, richness, sweetness, and charm. The strains of her natural melodies belonged to other than this material world, which is full of the cawing of crows, the crackling of geese and the twittering of sparrows. Whenever Gedam began to sing, she raised her melody to such a lofty height as to silence all the other birds, who were ashamed of their own weak, discordant noises. Thus were they discomfited and filled with envy and regret, and wondered what they could do to bring about the end of Gedam. Finally they arranged a large meeting in which they might deliberate as to how they should heap vengeance upon her unsuspecting head and cause her death.

After much consultation, they agreed upon the plan of destroying the eggs of Gedam whenever and wherever she laid them; so that her descendants might not increase. In order to carry out this plan with vigilance, they appointed a committee to execute the decree. They agreed amongst themselves that they would continue to break the eggs of Gedam till the time came when she would grow old and die, thus protecting themselves from the power of such a rival. For a number of years Gedam patiently endured the persecution of these little birds who were exulting over the success of their plan in thus systematically destroying her eggs and not letting her progeny increase. Gedam never said anything nor manifested any trace of concern. Then at a time when the birds were away from their nests, she laid one egg in each and flew away, perching on the loftiest branch and singing her own entrancing melody. The other birds, not knowing exactly what had happened, sat as usual on their eggs, and after a while the little ones stepped out of their narrow world into open space. Tenderly and with much solicitude little ones were fed. Soon their dear growing wings were covered with soft feathers like unto velvet, and the parents were delighted to see their darling offspring developing into the size of birdhood. Gadem from the loftiest branch was watching, how day after day, her children were nurtured by these different birds with wistful tenderness and sympathy as though they were their own. Then, when she observed that they had reached the flying stage, she perched on the highest green branch, filling the empty void with her wonderful music, which vibrated, and rocked through the atmosphere. The little birds who were her real children, heard the clear, resonant melody and finding its exact similarity to their own, and realizing from the depth of their hearts, their true kinship with the invisible singer, suddenly fluttered their wings, and up they soared to join their Mother. Out of every nest a number of birds such as doves, partridges, sparrows, crows, nightingales, blue-birds, etc. who had become accustomed to the harmonious companionship of the children of Gedam, joined them in their flight. Although they were of various forms, colors and species, voices and kinds, — they soared together with love and sweet fellowship, toward the azure height and there composed a divine company, circling and circling around their beloved mother, as the songs of thanksgiving and gratitude with soft appealing notes flowed like a clear stream from their hearts.

2. Purity and Chastity the Foundations of Spiritual Life

While the students and other pilgrims were drinking tea, the Master entered the house. He walked through the rooms and inquired about the health of each. Then he went to the veranda and sat down. The first thing that he said, showed his interest in the welfare of the students. He asked Mirza Ali Akbar to take them to Nozha Park. Then, introducing them to an Arab Bahai, he remarked, that these students were doing well with their studies and that in reality they were the cause of his happiness.

He also gave a most interesting talk on what the students should study while in Europe and what they should shun. After giving a minute account of the social customs of the Western people, he told us that chastity and purity are two divine standards of the spiritual and moral law. The greater the aims of a man the nobler his deeds; man must ever be thoughtful of others and polite and courteous toward his fellow beings. This will win for him the good-pleasure of the Lord and the satisfaction of the general public. One's sitting and rising, conduct and manner, speech and conversation, social intercourse and communication must be based upon a firm foundation and be conducive to the Glory of the world of humanity.

3. The Brother of the Khedive Calls on Abdul Baha

In the afternoon Prince Mohamad Ali, the brother of the Khedive, called on Abdul Baha. The Prince arrived in his automobile at the door of our house, and hearing that the Master lived close by in another one, said that he would walk to it. Mirza Moneer was about to go on ahead to notify Abdul Baha, when he appeared in his long, loose, cream-colored coat from the other side of the street. Thus, in the middle of the road, the Master and the Prince met, each offering to the other courtesies designated for the most distinguished men. Every one looking at this strange scene wondered, while trying to imagine what had brought a royal Prince of Egypt to the Threshold of Abbas Effendi. The Master was walking ahead, the prince a few feet behind, and while they were talking in the most animated manner, they disappeared from our view.

4. American Ice Cream for Students — Their Visit to the National Park

Late in the afternoon Abdul Baha came to visit the pilgrims and after a few minutes went to see Mirza Abul Fazl from which place he returned to rest.

Before the students left for Nozha Garden, Khosro brought a jar of American ice cream, prepared for them by Mrs. Getsinger. It was very good, and everybody enjoyed it.

5. The Student's Love for the Bahai Cause

All day there were different groups here and there, each speaking about the Cause and putting forth arguments to prove the Dawn of the Sun of Reality. It seems to me that these young men are very devoted to the Movement, and free, and ready to receive and assimilate all kinds of useful information. I have no doubt that from amongst them a number of most capable teachers will arise.

1. Who Is Abdul Baha and What Is He Doing?

Abdul Baha is eloquent in his silence and speaks with the tongue of the angels in the congregation of the elect. His heavenly songs, stream down from unknown heights. Like unto the bird of Paradise, he raises his voice and humanity hears it. His heart is a variegated rose-garden whose fragrant narcissuses of knowledge, gentle violets of wisdom, sweet anemones of love and graceful hyacinths of sympathy spread their perfume. The heaven of his mind is begemmed with orbs of reality, dispelling the darkness of doubt. The grandeur of his spirit, the sublimity of his ideals and the epic events of his life are the noblest examples set before the eyes of men. To the wanderer he is a refuge; to the thirsty he is a cooling spring, to the poor he is a treasury of wealth; to the dependent he is a source of inspiration; to the orphan he is a kind father; to the sick he is a physician; to the weak, he is a power-house of energy; to the hungry he is a divine table.

2. The Persian Students and Prayers

Every morning presents to my view a happy scene of worship, because all the students pray before sunrise. They attract to themselves a moral force, infusing into their lives that quality of Faith which changes hate into love, strangeness into friendship, and enmity into amity. Through prayer their minds are polished and their hearts purified with the fire of the Love of God. They attain to the station of confidence, realize the divinity of holiness, are drawn unto God, and become clear mirrors in which the ideal images of the Kingdom are reflected. They put forth green leaves of hope and blossoms of radiant acquiescence. With prayer, they learn their lessons; with prayer they take their examinations; with prayer they make intellectual progress and with prayer on their lips they rise in the early morning and go to sleep at night.

To-day I was speaking about the servants of the Cause and Mirza Jalal Sina told me the following story.

3. The Story of a Man Who Was Hired to Build a Wall Around a Garden

A man hired a mason to build a wall around his garden. The next morning the mason came to start his work. The foundations were already laid by other laborers, and an assistant was hired to pass him the bricks. At the moment when the first one was handed to him a friend of his passed by and was hailed to come near, and they engaged in a lively conversation. The mason forgot all about the building of the wall, and the time slipped by until noon. He had yet the first brick in his hand when the hour of twelve struck. At that time the owner of the garden arrived on the scene, and seeing the work not even started, dismissed him and brought another mason to do it in his place.

4. In the Cause of Brotherhood There Are No Titles

There are some souls who are similarly situated. When a work is entrusted to them by the Great Builder, they take it as a personal thing. They do as much of it as they think advisable according to their limited understanding or do not do it all. In such a case the Great Builder without telling them anything about it, takes the work out of their hands and entrusts it to those who will dispatch it with the utmost rapidity. Personalities do not court in this Cause; work, enduring work, patient impersonal work is called for. There are no titles in this Movement. Let all the workers banish such dreams from their minds. In God's estimation the laborers are all equal. We are all His servants. Abdul Baha has taken the title of the "Servant of God" and the servant of humanity. Every sincere soul, according to his ability, must strive day and night to walk in this path. The divine path is the path of servitude, humility, evanescence, — severance from aught else save God, and service.

5. Abdul Baha Inquires from the Persian Students about Their Teachers

At 8 o'clock Abdul Baha came and all the students were ready to receive him. He inquired about their health and if they were comfortable in their present quarters.

He asked them to tell him whether the teachers took pains to instruct the students, or if like some professors, they went through the lessons as machines without showing any feeling or interest in the progress of the pupils?

6. People Are Not Awake to the Danger of War

Holding in his hand several copies of his American addresses which had been published in the newspapers, he informed us that the people of Egypt were not interested in them and that any reference to them would bring only the answer, "very excellent," "very good." However, they were interested in the most unimportant news of the day. They are not thinking of those principles which will build up the future civilization of mankind; yet they acknowledge the fact that the world of humanity is in great danger, and is going through a most crucial period. Although war may cease temporarily, yet there is an invisible war constantly carried on which is a tremendous economic loss. These unseen drains are breaking the financial backs of the nations. They do not know by what means or instruments the comity of nations, or the peace of the world can be achieved.

7. Abdul Baha Dictates Tablets for the American Bahais

Then he told me to have the letters ready, and in a few moments I was following him toward the garden. He was glad to be away from the people, and for three hours he dictated Tablets for the friends beyond the seas. Some of those who were honored with Tablets were the following: Miss Jean Masson, Mrs. Gertrude Diffet, the Editor of the "Master Mind" in Los Angeles, Mrs. Harriet Cline, Mrs. Mary C. Bell, Miss General Jack, Mrs. Thornberg Cropper, Mrs. Anna Killius, Mr. Horace Holley, Mr. Fred Mortenson, Madame H. Maron, Mrs. Stansell, Miss Juliet Thompson, Consul General Topakeyan, Miss Edna MacKinny and Miss Maria Wilson.

Yesterday the Master's daughter left for Cairo with Basheer, for short stay. To-day Shoghi Effendi joined his mother with Haji Niaz. In the afternoon four Bahais arrived from Cairo.

8. Program for a National or Religious Feast

About 4 o'clock, Abdul Baha came again and gave us an interesting talk on how a religious, or national Fête should be celebrated.

The program for such fête days must be prepared as to yield a permanent result. As these are days of freedom from work, the leaders of the communities must discuss such problems as may be beneficial to the individuals and the outcome of which will be eternal;. They must be occupied with prayers and thanksgiving, and be grateful for the Favors and Bounties of God.

9. Driving Around with Abdul Baha

Then he called me to follow him. Outside a carriage was waiting. He beckoned me to sit beside him and told Khosro to sit next to the driver. We stopped at the Hotel Plaisance and took Mr. Atwood with us. The carriage drove for more than one hour on the shore of the Nile. We passed many large palm groves and the Arab hovels of Fellaheens. These Arabs live in real squalor. Pigs, hens, donkeys, goats sleep with them in the same mud room. Arriving at the Nozha, we drove through its shady avenues and our eyes were brightened by the wonderful flowers. The Master left the carriage and we passed into the place where the band was playing and where more than two hundred Englishmen were picnicing [sic] with their families. He walked through the Park and finally sat down on the side of a well. He was steeped in a world of thought. Then he went away from us and sat on the green grass. For nearly 15 minutes he remained there undisturbed. The sun was sinking behind the western sky when our carriage was driven homeward. The Master putting his arm around the shoulders of Mr. Atwood told him that he went driving to-day especially for him as he loved him very much. He was most pleased with him, because he had resigned his will to the Will of God.

Mr. Atwood thanked him for his kindness and said:

“Master, I think often of you and of your great work. I can never forget the time when you called at a mission school in Alexandria. The principal in greeting you, said: ‘You are the father of the poor and I am their servant!’ You answered: ‘I am the servant of the poor, but you are their father!’ ”

1. The American Bahais Must Make Great Efforts in Teaching the Cause of Universal Peace

When I stood in the Master's presence this morning, he asked me whether I had any news. Then in a talk he emphasized the fact that the American Bahais must, with one accord, and one voice unite in raising the pillars of Universal Peace in their regions. God will reinforce them with the Powers of the Kingdom if they arise wholeheartedly in the service of this Cause. They have every means at their disposal, and no lack of extraordinary desire to do the will of God. By example and by deeds they have seen the workings of the Glorious Lord. Now that Abdul Baha is in the Orient, he loves to hear that the seeds of Truth which he has sown in the West are beginning to sprout, that the ideals of Peace which he has diffused are taking root in the hearts. They must gird up the loins of endeavor, enter the arena of activity and let the reports of their fresh triumphs gladden the heart of Abdul Baha.

2. Prof. Armenius [sic] Vambery's Letter to Abdul Baha

Before I left his presence, he handed me a letter written to him by Prof. Vambery of Budapest, who met him during his sojourn in that city. On his arrival in Port Said, Abdul Baha revealed for him a Tablet and sent him a Persian rug as a present. I will translate the letter as a matter of historical interest. The Professor's letter is in Persian:

"I forward this humble petition to the sanctified and Holy Presence of Abdul Baha Abbas, who is famous throughout the world, the Center of Knowledge, and beloved by all mankind!

"O thou kind, noble friend, thou art conferring guidance upon humanity — may my life be a ransom to thee!

"The loving epistle which you have condescended to write to this servant and the rug which you have forwarded, came to hand safely. The meeting with your Excellency and being in your Presence, which is full of benediction, recurs to the memory of this servant and I am longing for the time when I shall meet you again. In reality, although I have traveled throughout many countries and cities of Islam, yet I have never met a lofty character and exalted personage to compare with your Excellency, and I bear witness that it is not possible to find one. On this account I am hoping that the Ideals and accomplishments of your Excellency may be crowned with success, and yield results under all circumstances; because, behind these Ideals and deeds, I easily observe the future welfare and prosperity of the world of humanity.

“This servant, in order to gain first hand information and experience, entered the ranks of various religions; that is, outwardly I became a Jew, a Christian, a Mohammedan and a Fire-worshipper. I discovered that the devotees of these different religions do nothing else but hate and anathematize each other; that all these religions have become the instruments of tyranny and oppression in the hands of rulers and governors, and that they are causes for the destruction of the world and of humanity. Considering these evil results, every person is forced by necessity to be enlisted on the side of your Excellency and embrace rejoicingly, the prospect of the Universal Religion which is being ushered in through your effort.

“I have seen the father of your Excellency from afar and have realized the self-sacrifice and noble courage of His Son, and my admiration has been increasing. For the principles and aims of your Excellency, I express the utmost respect and devotion and if God, the most High, confers a long life upon me, I will be able to serve you under all conditions. I pray and supplicate for this from the depth of my heart.

(Signed) “YOUR SERVANT, VAMBERY.”

3. The Persian Students Meet Mrs. Getsinger

In the reception room of the house of the Beloved the students met Mrs. Getsinger. She spoke to them most beautifully and they listened with rapt attention. None of them had yet seen or heard an American Bahai. She related for their benefit, the story of the Beloved’s lecture in Columbia University of New York, and in Stanford University of California and when she told about Mortenson, and how he traveled from Minneapolis to Green Acre — and under the trains — and of how he was received first by Mr. and Mrs. Kinney and later by Abdul Baha, all eyes were dim with tears. Then she spoke about spiritual knowledge, prayer, and the conformity of science and faith, and at the end chanted a prayer of Baha-Ullah.

4. Abdul Baha Speaks on the Power of Unity

Then Abdul Baha came in and said that God had brought us together in Ramleh. No other power could ever have accomplished this. We were meeting with the utmost joy and fragrance. Spiritual attraction had united us. The Divine outpourings and the Bestowals of the Blessed Perfection had called us to this heavenly banquet. Just as in this material world we were brought together at this meeting, similarly may we associate with one another in the kingdom of Abha.

In the afternoon the Beloved dictated several important Tablets, and later entertained the French Consul of Haifa who had come to meet him.

Many hours to-day were spent in writing and in listening to the delightful stories related by Mirza Jalal Sina.

1. The Story of the Mythical Republic and a Curious Way of Electing a President

Let me relate to you the story of a poor man and how he became the Ruler of one of the ancient Republics. Back of it you will detect the spiritual history of God and His relation with mankind.

Years and years ago the inhabitants of the country of... who enjoyed a sort of Republic, had a most curious way of annually electing their President. The people gathered once a year in the largest public square of the capital. Then they would bring out the golden cage of the bird, "Homai," and place it at the head of the procession of dignitaries, amidst universal rejoicing, while the music of the national band played. After many ceremonies, and the delivery of eloquent addresses, they would open the gate of the cage and release the bird Homai before the eyes of the citizens. The bird, gaining its freedom, would rise higher and higher toward the blue ether, and then descend on the head of an individual in the crowd, whom the people would hail as the next Ruler.

It was on such an important election day that a stranger entered the city. He observed decorations of flags and bunting, and the streets filled with seething humanity. Every avenue, like a tributary to the sea, emptied its rushing people into the great public square. All the seats, tier upon tier, were filled. After much pushing and pulling, the stranger found his way to the square, where a wonderful spectacle met his view. He was thunderstruck at the lavish splendor of this sight. While he was looking at it, he felt some one tapping on his shoulder. He was hot and pressed on all sides. "What do you want, man? Do you not see that I am nearly dying of suffocation?" "Wilt thou make me thy aide-de-camp if thou art elected President of the Republic?" "Pooh! Art thou gone insane man? I have just entered this city and know not a single soul. I would like to know who would elect an absolute stranger to the highest position in the Republic?" "I think thou dost not know the laws of this country, neither is there any time for their explanation. Just give me thy word now." "All right," the stranger laughed aloud. "If I ever become the President of the Republic, thou wilt be my aide-de-camp."

Hardly was this promise given, when he felt the sudden weight of something upon his head. Then he heard the deafening hurrah of the great multitude which filled the air and which rocked the very foundations of the buildings. The bird "Homai" had sat upon his head, and he was already, by the sovereign will of the people, the President. The notification committee, followed by the most prominent citizens, informed him of his election, and with much solemnity conducted him to the Palace. For one week there were great festivities in the capital. Fireworks and illuminations, athletic games and banquets, brilliant processions, and public receptions, attracted the attention of all the classes of citizens. The inaugural ball, which brought to a close these successive festivities, eclipsed all other events in points of brilliancy.

To the delight and satisfaction of Congress and the Cabinet members — the new President showed extraordinary knowledge on all public questions, and an intuitional grasp of necessary reforms. These reforms had been needed for a long time, but the nation had not been fortunate enough to have a man at the helm of the government who could make them possible for practical legislature.

Soon after his inauguration, the President received a letter from an unknown man, reminding him of his promise. He sent for him immediately, and found in him the requirements of an aide-de-camp. In the course of mutual association, they became great friends and one day, the aide-de-camp said to the President in an off-hand manner: "Do you know what is going to happen to you after the expiration of your Presidential term?" "No, I have never thought about it." "Well I will tell you, because you have been very kind to me. When your term expires, the citizens will come to the Palace, drive you out of your executive office, ask you to put on your old clothes, take you through the streets, make you ride backward on a donkey, and at the head of a sneering, ridiculing mob, parade you through the avenues and bazaars. In this ignominious manner the procession will leave the city. They will proceed for several miles until they reach a broad river on the other side of which is an island. Then they will place you in a boat, and a boatman will row you to the other side. There he will leave you and return. As the island is surrounded by the water, there can be no communication with the outside world."

The President was quite disturbed by this account. "Why did you not tell me of this before?" "Firstly, I did not know you; secondly, this knowledge could not prevent 'Homai' from alighting on your head; thirdly, even should you have known this, the people would not have accepted your refusal." "But, have I not given them an wise and efficient administration, and on that ground, am I not entitled to a second election?" "You must realize that the people are not electing you. It depends upon the caprice of a bird, and I am sure, that even if they let you stay in the public square on the election day, you would not have the remotest chance of being re-elected. On the other hand, no power on earth, except the will of the whole people of this Republic, can amend this provision of the constitution. It is simply impossible." "Then what must I do? Will you give me your advice?" "Well, you can do one thing. As long as you live in this Palace, you have a perfect right to expend your salary on any undertaking you deem most necessary and urgent. You are able to select a number of architects, masons, engineers and laborers, send them to the island, and give them the commission of building a commodious house, in which you may live during the remaining years of your life. I have been aide-de-camp to may former Presidents, and in every instance I have urged them to do this, but they were so occupied with the gratification of their own desires, that they did not heed my advice, and the time slipped by. Suddenly they saw that the year had expired, and they found themselves in manifest loss."

This President, however, was of a different disposition, and from that day on, he devoted his leisure hours to the construction of a house on the island. When the term of his service expired, he went through all the strange rites prescribed by the law with a cool head, a confident heart, and a serene mind, because he knew that on the other side, everything was prepared to receive him....

After a few days on the Island, he started to explore it, and here and there came across a number of emaciated and starved looking men who were clothed in tattered garments. He asked them, "Who are you?" They answered: "We are the former Presidents of the Republic of X. We were not as wise and as far-seeing as you have proven to be. While we filled our Presidential Offices, we thought only of our own importance, and pursued the pleasures and vanities of life, instead of thinking of enduring principles. We never troubled our minds about our future, neither did we heed the admonitions of our friend. Thus this present misery is the result of our own past heedlessness."

2. Abdul Baha Spends a Busy Day

This morning the students were summoned into the presence of Abdul Baha, and he gave them a stirring talk on the union of the East and the West, and of how the Cause of Harmony has set aglow the hearts of mankind and how its flame is getting stronger and stronger every day.

1. The Arab Bahais Give a Feast to the Persian Students

Five of the young Arabian Bahais acted as hosts to the students, and the friends. The feast was given in the garden of Nozha. The tablecloth was spread under the shade of the trees and forty of us sat around it. The dinner was delicious, and our Arabian friends dispensed true old-fashioned Oriental hospitality. During the day, Tablets were chanted, songs were sung, short speeches delivered and the spirit of Bahai friendship deeply felt. Although there existed no outward relation between the Arab and the Persian Bahais, yet they conversed together with great sympathy as though they belonged to the same family. After dinner we were divided into small groups and walked through the Park. On our return, we found the Samovar boiling and tea prepared.

2. How an Arab Became a Bahai

One of the hosts told us how he was first attracted to the Cause: “Two years ago, a similar picnic was held here on this very spot by the Bahais. I passed by, and looking at them, saw a divine happiness upon their faces. I became curious, and began to ask questions. Soon I obtained the privilege of entering the kingdom of Baha-Ullah. Now, of all these men who are passing by, looking at us with wondering eyes, who knows but there may be some who will become Bahais, two years from now?”

3. Importance of Agriculture

When we returned we found Abdul Baha dictating Tablets in the garden. Mirza Moneer was the secretary. Several new men were permitted to go into his presence. Later he sent for the students, because they had not seen him in the morning. He spoke with them on the subject of agriculture and the present need for it in Persia. He asked them whether such a course was given in the Beirut College. He laid great stress upon the study of scientific agriculture and encouraged them to become the teachers of this science and the spreaders of its principles. He concluded, saying that he expected the appearance of great things from them.

4. A Prayer for the Illumination of Mankind

One of the prayers chanted by the students to-day in the Nozha garden is the following:

“He is El !Abha

“O Thou pure God! Make thou this gathering the candle of the world and suffer this assembly to become a rose garden and a verdant meadow. Let its meeting become a delectable paradise and its horizon the dawning-place of the lights of the Merciful. Perfume Thou the nostrils of the dwellers of the Mount of the Friend with its Fragrance and rejoice the heart of the pilgrims of the Holy city of the Desired One with its amber-scented breeze. Protect thou these souls under the shadow of the wing of Thy Mercy and confer Thou to these hearts, an asylum of Protection in the fortress of Thy Majesty, the One, the Most High! Shower upon us the Confirmations of Thy Abha Horizon and bestow upon us the Graces of Thy Supreme Concourse. Although we are birds without feathers and wings, yet have we built our nests and homes in the gardens of Thy Cause. We have taken refuge at the Threshold of Thy Oneness, and we are begging of Thee Confirmation, help and aid. When we look upon ourselves, we are smaller than the atoms; when we behold the sea of Thy Generosity and Liberality, we see the atoms as brilliant suns, nay rather, more brilliant!

“O Thou Kind King! Cover the sins of these weak ones with the hem of the garment of Thy Mercy. Change the indifference of these heedless ones into the essence of fidelity, wisdom and understanding! Grant the souls a loftier effort and cast another tumult in the heads; so that they may sing the melody of the Supreme Realm, seek after the Everlasting Glory, long for the delicacies of the New World, soar toward the highest horizon, enter into the congregation of the Almighty and become the recipients of the Bestowals of the Kingdom of Abha! Thus the dark world will become luminous, the satanic field will be transformed into the Court of the Merciful, this mound of earth will become the celestial heaven, and this terrestrial globe the Eternal Rose-garden. Verily Thou art the Powerful, the Mighty, the Hearer and the Seer.

“ABDUL BAHÁ ABBAS.”

5. The Object of the Coming of Baha-Ullah

Abdul Baha writes in a Tablet: —

“O ye real friends! And ye who are drawn to the Beauty of God! This is the time of attraction and acclamation, and the period of rejoicing and merrymaking. This is the morn of Glad-tidings! Is it not suffused with splendors? The Candle of the world is bestowing light upon all the assemblages. Is it not luminous? The Manifest Orb is rising from the dawning-place of the Most High! Is it not Glorious? The Blessed Perfection and the Most Great Name — may my life be a ransom to His believers, arose in the city of self-sacrifice like unto the banner of Guidance. While he was under the chain, He was a helper to every oppressed! From the Manifest horizon, He shone forth glorified by trials! In the midst of the world, He withstood the attacks of infinite persecutions; so that these withered ones might become enkindled, and these extinguished souls might be set aglow with the Fire of the Love of God. May we close our eyes to both worlds, and be ignited and burn with the Fire of Longing! Now, O ye spiritual friends!

Is it just that we sit silent, become speechless, sorrowful and pessimistic! No by God! This is not the attribute of fairness and gratitude, but the essence of unfairness and negligence.”

1. A bird's Eye View of the General Conditions of the World

Would you like to hear the translation of a Tablet which was read this morning? It contains a wonderful spirit and a most significant exposition of the general conditions of the world at this time.

“He is God!

“O Thou who art holding fast to the Pure hem; thou who art the twig of the Blessed Tree!

“Look thou with deep insight at the world and the inhabitants thereof! It is an immense theatre upon the stage of which most spectacular plays are being enacted.

“Here, thou wilt see upon its plains the victorious and vanquished legions of profit and loss and there, thou wilt observe the waves of the sea of folly, rising and falling with great impetuosity. Cries are heard on every side, and the agonies of revolution, revolt and unrest reach to the ears of every progressive man.

“There is a tremendous clash and strife between capital and labor and the war between the aristocratic and the democratic adherents is carried on with relentless sword, javelin, bow and arrow. The phalanxes of the grand Army are drawn in battle array, each squadron taking its position. The world-raging armament and the heavy artillery are prepared in every part of the field. The dazzling splendor of the swords of enmity blind the eyes from the most remote distance; the lightning effect of breastplates, the brilliancy of the lances and the sparkle of the bucklers of hatred brighten the gloomy night and bewilder the eyes.

“In short the weapons for strife, battle and war are being prepared with the utmost celebration.

“Thou wilt observe that from every house, the strains and notes of music are raised, the confusing melodies of harp, lyre, cymbal and flute are heard, and the mad revelers dance while in a state of inebriation with the wines of these vanishing pleasures and joys.

“Here, thou wilt see wanton and soiled decorations, and there, flimsy shows of a gilded class of creatures. Here, embellishment and luxury is made possible through illicit wealth, and there are displayed the ravishingly beautiful appearances of this mortal and ephemeral existence. From one part of the world sighs of anguish, lamentations of poverty and agonies of misery are raised, and from another voices, acclamations and Jeremias calling for succor have reached the gates of heaven! Here, one sees the tears of the hopeless and listens to the appeals of the oppressed; there, the trembling murmurs of the helplessness and the harrowing wails of the shipwrecked in the sea of perfection. The heat of the conflagration of separation spreads on all sides: the flame of the fire of longing is raging with great intensity, and the tongue of an avalanche of calamities leaps forth. Here, one observes the absolutism and oppression of kings, and the utter thoughtlessness of the Cabinet ministers, and there, one sees conflicts and wars on the battlefields of thoughts and ideas by ambitious generals, statesmen and administrators of the nations and countries. They consult together, they scheme, they plot, they exchange their views, they organize fallacious enterprises, they float superfluous companies, they circulate false notes, they destroy and they lay the foundation of their political careers.

“In short when thou considerest the reality, the outcome, and the fruit of all these theatrical performances, thou wilt see with thy real eyes, that they are the results of an illusory mirage and their sweetness is as bitter poison. A few days shall roll on their axis, and all these conditions will become non-existent, evanescent and completely forgotten. But when thou shuttest thine eyes to this dark world, looking upward and heavenward, thou wilt behold light upon light, eternity onward to eternity, and from everlasting to everlasting. Then thou wilt see the realities of Mysteries.... Therefore, happy is the pure spirit who does not attach himself to the changing conditions of this transitory world; and who clings rather to the Purity, Nobility and Grandeur of the Never-ending world.

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHA ABBAS.”

2. The Spread of the Bahai Cause in Germany Makes Abdul Baha Happy

This morning I had the great pleasure of finding myself in the Presence of Abdul Baha. A cablegram from Marseilles announced the departure of Mrs. Fraser and her approaching arrival in Port Said. Abdul Baha sent a telegram to Ahmad Yazdi to receive and direct her to Ramleh. Another cablegram from America inquired about his health. Letters from Boston and Washington, as well as from Germany contributed to his happiness. The Bahai Cause in Germany is making splendid headway, and believers, enthused by the presence and example of the Master, have arisen to spread the Movement with a determination and strength never equaled before. As he walked back and forth, while I was reading the letter from Germany, he smiled and was much elated, saying: You see, you see! He wished the believers to spread the Cause Baha-Ullah. If they do this, divine Confirmations shall encircle them from all directions.

The Cause, he said, has thrown a universal reverberation through the pillars of the earth, and the divine Power of Baha-Ullah shall encircle the globe. Rest thou assured of this.

3. Photographs Received from America and Germany Distributed among the Persian Bahais

This week I received five packages of photographs of Abdul Baha from Mr. and Mrs. Killius of Spokane, Wash., which were to be divided between Mirza Mahmoud and myself. After making the division in equal parts I have distributed a number of them among the students and pilgrims. They are all made very happy by these presents. I also received some photographs from Consul Schwartz of Stuttgart which are already given away to many believers. In this way, the Western friends can impart the greatest joy to the hearts of their Eastern brothers.

4. The Silence of Abdul Baha Is Eloquent

In the evening the Master came in while the students were sitting on the veranda. As he entered they all arose. Before sitting he told us that this was a good gathering, a luminous gathering. He sat for ten minutes, but he did not speak one word. Silence, calm and eloquent, pervaded the whole atmosphere, and when he left we were quite as contented and happy as if he had given us an address.

1. Good news received from America and Europe. 2. A few Arabian proverbs. 3. A prayer by Abdul Baha for detachment.

1. Good News Received from America and Europe

I received a number of letters from the United States. Chicago, Spokane, New York, San Francisco and Washington were represented. I am sure that all the good news will make the heart of Abdul Baha very happy. I had also letters from Budapest and Stuttgart, London and Paris. In London the believers are already laying plans for the promotion of the Cause during the winter. The American friends, I have no doubt, will likewise carry away the wreath of triumph, and shall guide many souls into the green valley of Divine Faith.

2. A few Arabian Proverbs

Here I would like to quote a few proverbs which the Arabs use in their conversation. The Arabs are generally very lively and dramatic. Their talk is enriched with numberless epigrams, and is endowed with a wonderful power of expression and poetic fancy. They are simple, yet winsome, graceful and most chivalrous.

“Make neither your friendship a pretence, nor your hatred a menace.”

“A man is often an enemy of things concerning which he is ill-informed.”

“There is no honor like the possession of a good character.”

“Disdain not a kind action, be it but to give water to one who is not thirst.”

“Knowledge without practice is like a bow without a string.”

“The next best thing to belief in God, is sympathy with people.”

“If you censure your friends for every fault they commit, there will come a time when you will have no friend to censure.”

“Good tidings thine; off with the robes of sadness; for know, thou art accepted, and I myself will take upon me whatsoever grieves thee.”

3. A Prayer by Abdul Baha for Detachment

I will here translate a prayer from the pen of the Master.

“He is El Abha

“O Thou kind, Incomparable God!

drink from the cup of the Wine of the Morn of Eternity and intoxicate them with the Goblet of Everlasting Felicity. These servants long and yearn for Thee and these lovers are enamored and attached to Thee. They are dwellers in Thy Mount and attracted with the Beauty of Thy Face. They are the gazelles of Thy flock wandering in the wilderness of separation and scattered in the valley of regret. Send Thou to them the Messenger of Providence and cause to descend upon them the angel of guidance: — so that fragrance may waft from Thine Abode to their nostrils and an effulgence from Thy Face may illumine the hearts of these servants; the impenetrable darkness be changed into light and the thorny place transformed into a rose-garden. Verily Thou art the Powerful, the Seeing and the Hearing.”

In the evening Mirza Abul Fazl came and all the students gathered around him and he spoke to them about the early events of the Cause.

1. How the Persian students lived together and their departure. 2. An important Tablet revealed by Abdul Baha for China.

1. How the Persian Students Lived Together

To-morrow our band of earnest students will depart, and everything will again be quiet for a few days before the second party arrives. The past days my room was a busy center; here a number of them were speaking, there some were writing letters. From morning till late in the evening they were constantly coming and going. Many of them were anxious to possess the Master’s talks in America which I gave to them and of which in turn they made copies forwarding them to their homes. They were not only polite and courteous toward us, but also toward each other. They exercised the utmost kindness and consideration and did not lack the sense of true friendship and fellow-feeling. Like members of one family they inspired confidence and emulation. They were full of hope and each a true optimist. I can hardly remember a more united, a more congenial or a more devoted band of young men. Each one has set in his heart the accomplishment of a certain object, and is intent on carrying it out. The photographs of the Master sent by Mrs. A. B. Killius of Spokane, arrived in due time, and many of them were made happy by receiving this gift. In every one of his speeches, the Master has expressed to them his satisfaction and pleasure, because they are studying with zeal and their lives have been pure and uncontaminated. They are wonderful examples of the spirit of modern Persia.

To-day Abdul Baha came to see them both in the morning and evening and each time he delivered a very eloquent and effective address, which I will share with you soon.

2. An Important Tablet Revealed by Abdul Baha for China

I will now give the translation of a very significant Tablet revealed for a learned gentleman in China. It may be taken safely that this is the first important Tablet which has been sent to the Chinese Republic. I would like to see it translated into the Japanese language and also into Chinese. Once translated into these two languages it will be well if it were printed in a small pamphlet with a short historical sketch of the Bahai Cause, and distributed.

“He is God!”

“O THOU WOOER OF TRUTH WHO ART ATHIRST FOR REALITY!

“Your letter was received. Its contents was evidence to the fact that from the horizon of consciousness the refulgent light has become manifest. It is hoped that after the appearance of the dawn, the brilliant sun may rise so gloriously as to cast its splendors upon all regions.

“It is a fact well-known to your honor that the world of existence is in need of an educator and instructor. The educators are of two kinds. The educators of the world of nature, and educators of the world of reality. If you leave the earth in its natural condition, it will become a jungle and a thorny place; but once it is entrusted to the hands of a skilled and kind gardener, the jungle will be changed into an orchard, and the thorny patch transformed into a rose-garden. Consequently, it has become evident that the world of nature is in need of training. Moreover, reflect carefully, for should humankind be deprived of the graces of culture and instruction, it would become a poisonous body; because the savage tribes have not acquired any of the separative distinctions which differentiate man from beast. For example: what is the difference between the African negro and the American negro? The former has not yet adorned himself with the ideals of culture while the latter has become intelligent, sagacious and civilized. During my journey throughout America, at the time when I was in Washington and elsewhere, I delivered detailed addresses in the universities, churches, conventions and meetings of the negroes, and found their audiences composed of most intelligent persons who could grasp the subjects under discussion as well as any other audiences of civilized and intelligent Westerners. Thus a great chasm exists between these two communities of negroes; one in the lowest depth of ignorance; another rising toward the pinnacle of civilization and freedom. Then it is plain that education is the distinguishing mark. Undoubtedly, culture or instruction is the cause of the glory of the one, while the lack of education is the means of the degradation of the other.

“Hence it is proven that education is the concomitant necessity of the world of modern civilization.

“Furthermore: Civilization is of two kinds. The civilization of the world of nature and the Civilization of the world of reality which belongs to the realm of morality. As long as the influence of these two types of civilization does not appear fully in the body politic, complete success and prosperity will not be obtained. Consider that the tent of material civilization is pitched in the European world; yet notwithstanding this how dark it is! The thoughts of all men converge upon the law of the ‘Survival of the fittest’ and the ideals of all the inhabitants revolve around the doctrine of the ‘Struggle for existence.’ The extravagant expenditures on armaments are daily increasing at a terrible rate, and the staggering expenses of the financial budget to support the preparations of the military storehouses, have brought the nations to the brink of bankruptcy. Civilized mankind is in a state of civil insurrection and under a too heavy burden; they are struggling, with wonder and astonishment, to free themselves. All this is because the civilization of morality, spirituality and attraction with the Fragrances of God is entirely lost sight of.

“In short: Just as the Instructor and the Teacher are necessary in the material world; so in the Ideal realm, i.e.: the Kingdom of spirit and consciousness, ethics and morality, infinite virtues and the perfections of humankind and salvation in both worlds — there must needs be an Educator and Teacher. The founders of natural civilization are the philosophers of the earth, and the Teachers of the Ideal civilization are the Holy Divine Manifestations. Therefore if the human world is deprived of the training of the natural and ideal teacher, unquestionably it will fall headlong into the lowest stratum of the animal kingdom. Natural civilization is like unto a glass; divine civilization is like unto the light. Material civilization is similar to the body, Divine Civilization is the spirit. The lamp is in need of the light and the body is only quickened through the spirit. Read the work of Galen, the famous Greek Philosopher, which he has written on the progress of the civilization of the world of humanity. He says: ‘Religious beliefs are the greatest means of impelling upward the world of civilization and humanity. As an example to this: — We observe that a number of people contemporaneous with us are known as Christians. Inasmuch as they are firmly rooted and well-established in their beliefs, the common people of this sect are as true philosophers, are adorned with such ethics and manners that the greatest philosophers attain to them only after many years of study, troubles, hardships and discipline. The simple folk of this community are characterized with the infinite virtues and excellences of the world of humanity.’ Hence it is established that mankind is in need of an Ideal, Universal Instructor, in order to unify under the shade of one Word the various nationalities, causing antagonistic communities to drink from one fountain; changing enmity and hatred into amity and love, and transforming strife and war into peace and salvation. In this manner His Holiness Mohammed — upon him be peace and greeting — conciliated the various contending warlike, barbaric tribes and nomads of Arabia, and ushered them into the shade of the Tent of agreement, upraised a lofty banner in the world of physical and spiritual sciences, and caused them to attain to the highest station of Everlasting Glory. Likewise, His Holiness Christ — upon Him be peace — gathered around one spring of Unity, the inimical, the quarrelsome and the warring nations of Greeks, Romans, Syrians, Chaldeans, Assyrians and Egyptians who exercised toward each other the utmost rancor and contempt. He established amongst them the ideal band of communication.

“The above instances irrevocably demonstrate that the world of humanity is in need of Universal Teachers and Instructors, and that these are the holy, divine Manifestations. If certain souls pretend to be of the elect and in no need of education, it is similar to a pretension put forth by private soldiers that they are skilled and efficient, and do not require the instruction of the general. It is evident that such statements are baseless. All the individuals of the army, whether privates or officers, are in need of the supervision of the commander-in-chief, who is the general instructor.

“This is enough and sufficient for those who have hearing ears and to this God bears testimony!

1. Departure of the Persian students. 2. Russian Count meets Abdul Baha and talks on reincarnation. 3. Strive that love may increase day by day. 4. Tablet of Abdul Baha to the author of “Modern Social Religion.” 5. Pure intention is the magnet of heavenly assistance. 6. “Strive to quicken dead souls.”

1. Departure of the Persian Students

Separation from the friends of God is a difficult thing. Although by this time we are more or less used to it, having already traveled so much, seen so many countries and associated with so many Bahais — still we feel keenly when we meet and grow to love a number of the Bahais — then suddenly they depart and in all probability, never will we meet again. However, in this separation, there is one consolation and that is: — these friends go out into the world after attaining to the meeting of the Beloved, to teach the Cause of human brotherhood and to equip themselves to become more useful instruments. Thus in a spiritual sense there is no separation between those Bahais who are truly devoted to the Cause of God and are striving in the path of Reality. Consequently from an external standpoint, we were all sad, when we saw the body of students leave the house for the station. The Master received them in the afternoon and delivered to them his last word of advice and exhortation.

2. Russian Count Meets Abdul Baha and Talks on the Two Aspects of Reincarnation

The Master had sent for me to go to the hotel and translate. A prominent Russian Count who understands English and French was calling on him. In a moment I was there, and soon Abdul Baha plunged into a deep and most interesting discussion about the two aspects of reincarnation, the particular and universal, the return of generic and specific ideas, and a presentation of the logical proofs concerning the existence of a Divine, Supreme Power, animating and energizing all creation. The Count seemed greatly interested, and was going to ask more questions, when the Secretary of the brother of the Khedive was announced. Thus he postponed his questions for a later meeting and departed with satisfaction and pleasure.

I will quote here a few extracts from Abdu'l Baha's Tablets:

3. Strive That Love May Increase Day by Day

“Strive ye as much as you can; — so that love and amity may increase day by day amongst the believers of God; all of you can help each other and be ever ready to sacrifice your lives for one another. This is the quality of the people of Baha.”

4. Tablet of Abdul Baha to the Author of “Modern Social Religion.”

The following is a Tablet to Mr. Horace Holley, the author of the Bahai work called “Modern Social Religion.”

“He is God!

“O THOU SON OF THE KINGDOM!

“A copy of the book written by thee and forwarded to this spot was received. The friends are engaged in reading it. They praise and commend your book most highly and appreciatively. God willing, it will be translated and I likewise will read it. Thank God that thou art confirmed and assisted; thy aim is to render service to the Kingdom of Abha and thy object the promotion of the Teachings of Baha-Ullah. Although the glory and greatness of this service is not known at the present, it will in future ages, assume most great importance and attract the attention of scholars. Therefore strive more and more as far as thou canst in this service, so that it may become the Cause of thy everlasting glory; in the Kingdom of Abha thou mayst be enkindled like unto a candle and in the horizon of majesty thou mayst shine like unto a star. Upon thee be Baha-Ullah.

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHA ABBAS.”

5. Pure Intention Is the Magnet of Heavenly Assistance

In another Tablet He says to Mrs. Killius:

“O thou who art attracted by the Love of God! Thy letter was like a mirror in which were reflected the pictures of Divine Confirmations. Thou has a heart which is turned toward the Kingdom of Abha, a spirit rejoiced by the Glad-tidings of God and eyes illumined by beholding the Lights of God. Your aim is to render service to the world of Reality. Pure intention is the magnet of heavenly assistance and the only means whereby to attract a great power.”

To another person whose house had been burned down he reveals:

6. “Strive to Quicken Dead Souls”

“If thy earthly house is destroyed, be thou not sad! May the Palace of the Kingdom be upbuilt! O thou bird of reality! If thy terrestrial nest is ruined, be thou not unhappy, a heavenly nest is destined for thee. His Holiness Christ, the Holy Manifestations and the apostles possessed no nest whatsoever in this mortal world, but in the Universe of God a glorious Palace. It is hoped that through the Divine Bestowals, on a lofty station, in the Universe of God, a radiant palace may become prepared for thee. Consider that the palaces of former kings from the day of Adam to the present age are ravaged by the relentless hand of time, while the towering Palace of the believers of God are built throughout Eternity and are never subject to destruction. Reflect carefully and thou shalt observe that all the buildings are uptorn, but the foundation of the apostles of Christ is becoming firmer and loftier every day. It is my hope that thou shalt likewise lay the basis of such a lofty palace. The foundation of this Palace is the Call of the Kingdom of God; its galleries are the Teachings of Baha-Ullah; its decorations the virtues of the world of humanity and its radiant lamps the lights of the Divine Kingdom. Therefore strive as much as thou canst to quicken dead souls, to guide erring ones, to cause to drink those who are thirsty and to invite those who are hungry to sit around the heavenly Table and partake of the Divine Food.”

1. From Ramleh the mysterious power of God is silently quickening the world. 2. Story of the German Consul in Haifa and how he became the victim of Bravo. 3. Abdul Baha dictates Tablets for Russia.

1. From Ramleh a Mysterious Power Is Silently Quickenning the World

Ramleh is honored with the presence of Abdul Baha. From this quiet summer resort of Egypt the mysterious power of God is felt in the uttermost corners of the world. Men, women and children belonging to all nationalities and religions are turning their attention to this spot. Here lives and moves the God-man amongst the people, as lived and moved Jesus over 1900 years ago along the shore of Galilee. His munificence and generosity embrace the world of humanity. His love is all-inclusive and the fountain of his sympathy flows without any interruption. With their burdens, sorrows and sufferings, the children of men come to him. With willingness and pleasure he shoulders their burdens; he cheers the despondent heart; he inspires the downcast; he strengthens the weak; he helps the poor and sows the seeds of wisdom in the garden of their minds. With fortitude he stands before the world and proclaims the coming of the kingdom of God. Those who are endowed with divine perception can easily realize that the spirit of God is moving over the world, the doors of the kingdom are open, and the Graces and Bounties of the Lord of Hosts are manifest. Thus awakened they arise to glorify their Lord and to summon mankind to the Banquet of Eternal Life and Everlasting Felicity.

2. Story of the German Consul in Haifa and How He Became the Victim of Bravo

This morning Abdul Baha accompanied by Shoghi Effendi came to our house and sat for about half an hour. Throughout his talk he laughed, giving us much happiness. He told us the story of a German Consul in Haifa, illustrating how certain people come to a sad end because they enjoy and believe the flattery of sycophants.

In Haifa there was at one time a German Consul who became Abdul Baha's friend. He used to call on him often, and Abdul Baha returned his visits. At one time, he disappeared for a whole month. Suddenly, one day he entered Abdul Baha's room. He had a stick in his hand and was lame. "Oh, sir, how is it that you have not inquired about my health during the past month?" — "Why, friend, what has happened to thee?" "Yes," he pitifully answered, "I am the victim of 'Bravo.' Let me tell you how it happened. The German Colony had prepared a ball, to which I was bidden. The governor, the judges and the officials of Haifa were likewise invited. When the dancing was over, they had a jumping contest. One by one they started to jump, but in a clumsy manner. I saw that none of them had learned the secret of jumping a long distance, but I had learned it in boyhood, going to gymnasium in Germany. When the last one failed to reach the mark, I volunteered as a candidate. All eyes were on me now. My first attempt was so successful that it elicited the hearty 'Bravo' of the governor. In my heart I was pleased and thought I would try again, and go beyond the first limit. I went back and back, then jumped forward, and when I landed on the other side, a tumultuous applause was raised from the governor and the officials. 'Bravo, bravo,' rang in my ears. By this time, I was puffed up with pride and became blind to my own limitations. 'Now I will show them,' I said to myself, 'what real jumping is,' and with this determination I started the third time. I wanted to go further, much further than the first and second time, and so, when I came down upon the earth with a great crash, I felt a most excruciating pain in my right foot. My leg was broken. I became unconscious, and when I opened my eyes, I found myself in bed. For the last thirty days I have suffered much. Thus you see now, how I became the victim of the 'Bravos' of the governor." There are many people in this world who will go to the limit of doing anything, even in attacking the purity and the motives of their friends just to gain a temporary applause and Bravo without thinking of the ruinous effect of such a thing upon themselves in the future, and the loss of public confidence.

3. Abdul Baha Dictates Tablets for Russia

The Master had received many letters from the East and America. He wondered to which direction He should turn His attention.

Seeing a package of letters in my hand, he laughingly asked: Is this the work I had prepared for him? How many hours did I want? It seemed to him that there was no end to my requests.

In the afternoon he dictated Tablets in the Garden to Shoghi Effendi for a long list of believers in Baku, Russia. Tea was served while he revealed the heavenly words. He also entertained the Arabic professor of the American College in Beirut. He spoke with him about the unification of religions and the principles of the Bahai movement. The professor went away with a new light in his heart.

1. The law of Universal love and the Bahais. 2. Tablets for German Bahais.

1. The Law of Universal Love and the Bahais

In the garden of the heart plant only the flowers of Love. The fragrance of the hyacinths of Love, the influence of the divine Love, the efficacy of the spiritual Love must constitute the foundation of the life of every Bahai. You shall know the tree by its fruit. You shall recognize a real soul by the quality of Love he manifests. With Love in our hearts we are enabled to benefit humanity. Love being the magnet, its possessor is enabled to attract the hearts to the Kingdom of peace. True love never changes, and has no similitude or shadow of turning. Love is the basis of human sympathy, and sympathy prompts us to be kind and compassionate to all those who are in sad circumstances. With Love the enemy is changed into a friend, the cheerless is comforted, the weary traveler is lodged, the hungry fed, the naked clothed, the destitute made rich, the weak reinforced, the hopeless made hopeful, and the barren life made to blossom like unto a rose. Love is the great panacea for the healing of all social, political and economic evils. Love is the Holy Fire enkindled in the hearts by the hand of God. The only Love that is all-enduring is the Love of mankind. Let the power of this Love take possession of our beings. Let the sea of this Love flow toward the countries of our hearts. Let the rays of this Love illumine the dark recesses of our minds. Let the sun of this Love flood the regions of our souls. Those who have experienced this Love will never become despondent; with shining faces and smiling lips they shall march through the storm of difficulty, scale the impassable mountains of trials and reach the goal with added zeal, increased energy, supreme faith and unfaltering courage. This Love exalts one's Ideals, purifies one's motives and glorifies one's thought.

The Bahais are the servants at the Court of this Love; they adore and pay tribute to this king. Love, only Love, makes them invulnerable. With this weapon they gain victories over the cities of the hearts. With this torch they dispel the gloom. With this medicine they heal the sick and with this water they allay the thirsty ones. Out of this book they have learned the Mysteries of God; from this spring they have quaffed the wine of Knowledge, toward this exalted height they are soaring, and in this illimitable ocean they are submerged. They are the followers of the Lord of Truth, whose words, actions and ideals are spelled in letters of Love — Love for the world of humanity. Their watchword is Love. Their calling is Love and their avocation is Love. They eat Love, they drink Love, they are clothed in Love and have their existence through Love. They have known the source of Love, and Love has made them free. They love God and they love mankind. With this omnipotent power they have arisen to serve the world. In all their transactions and dealings Love is their Instructor. They love to live a life of simplicity, prayerfulness, helpfulness and service. For them there is no more sorrow or hate. Life is an Elysian garden of joy and happiness where men may live together lovingly. Love is peace, peace is contentment, contentment is light.

2. Tablets for German Bahais

This morning I was called into the presence of Abdul Baha. He has taught us what Love is, and how we should gain more capacity to become the custodians of Love. He called Khosro to bring him a small cup of coffee, and when it was served, with a twinkle in his eye, he said:

“Who says that Mirza Ahmad does not drink a cup of coffee? Khosro, bring him one!”

Then he dictated several wonderful Tablets for the German believers. He was especially pleased with the letter of Miss A. Knoblock [sic], and with her splendid work in several German cities. He ordered the translation of her letter to be sent to all parts of the Orient. He started to dictate a Tablet for her: “O thou herald of the Kingdom of Abha” — then He turned to me saying:

“Truly she is a Herald of the Cause of God. She has won this title by her noble work in guiding the souls.”

Then He continued. At this time Mirza Ali Akbar was announced and later on Haji Niaz.

RAMLEH, EGYPT, SEPTEMBER 15, 1913

1. A busy day for Abdul Baha. 2. The story of the king and the thorn-picker.

1. A Busy Day for Abdul Baha

We did not see the Master to-day. In the morning he was busy reading his letters; in the afternoon he dictated Tablets for the believers of Persia; in the evening he gave an interview to two correspondents of Arabic Dailies in Cairo. We were standing near the door of the Victoria Hotel, expecting him to come out when the interview was ended. About 10:30 P.M. we saw him descending the stairs. He was feeling well, but a little tired.

2. The Story of the King and the Thorn-picker

If you would like to hear the story of the king and the thorn-picker as related to me by Mirza Jalál Sina, I will be glad to share it with you:

Once upon a time the king of the country of the North went hunting. While he was chasing a deer, he forgot all about his retinue and royal tent, and charged his steed through glen and dale; the deer ever evading him by leading him on. Suddenly the king realized that he was far away from his servants, the midday sun poured its hot rays down upon his head. He looked around, and to his amazement found himself in a vast desert full of thorns and briars. Then in the far distance he spied, with his eyeglass, an old man gathering thorns. The old man startled, looked up. "Who art thou?" the king asked. "I am a thorn-picker and maintain my large family by selling thorns in the city." "How many times a week dost thou come here?" "Oh, I come every day. If I miss one day, my people will go hungry." "But surely thou art not equal to this hard work." "What else can I do?" "Come, my brother," the king said, as he extended his hand to him. "If thou dost listen to me and obey all my orders, I will make thee the richest man in the world. I will teach thee the secret of the Philosopher's Stone which transmutes the baser metals into gold." "Very well, I will follow and obey thee under all circumstances." "But thou must realize that the road is full of temptations. Thou must look neither to thy right nor to thy left, listen to me and renouncing all things, ever follow me." "Yea, yea, I will do anything thou dost command me." "Very well, then, come; I am willing to give thee a trial." The thorn-picker, throwing away his stiletto with which he used to cut the thorns. Started to follow the king.

For one hour they walked till they reached a desert which was shining under the rays of the sun. The old man asked the king: "Why is this soil so brilliant?" "The ground of the desert is of silver." "Oh, oh, can I not fill my pockets with it?" he asked, all excitement. "Did I not tell thee that thou wilt encounter temptations in the path?" The old man, being thus rebuked for his apparent forgetfulness, became silent and said nothing, but in his heart he coveted such free, abundant wealth. In order to keep his mind away from his secret thoughts, the king tried to entertain him with varied conversation until they had passed by this plain, and entered another which was a dazzling yellow color. "What is this?" the thorn-picker asked, while blinking his eyes. "The soil of this plain is of gold." "Gold, gold, my goodness! There is so much gold scattered here, and I am so utterly, so miserably poor; and my family always half-starved." Half bent, inclined by an uncontrollable desire, he was going to grab a nugget, when the king took him by the hand: "Come, come, my brother, I shall make thee so rich that thou wilt not deign to look at a mountain of gold." "Well, I don't know how! Here I see so much gold, a pocketful of which will make me rich beyond my fondest dreams." "Don't listen to the suggestions of thy heart. This desert of gold is not to be compared to the treasures which lie before thee.” “I will wait and see.”

At last they crossed the desert, but the old man was moody, his eyes wandering to the right and to the left, looking at the immense amount of gold dust scattered over the plain. Finally they entered another desert. Here their eyes were almost blinded by the dazzling brilliancy everywhere. “What is this plain made of? Please tell me at once,” the old man asked excitedly. “I have never seen anything like it in all my life.” “Oh,” the king answered calmly. “Nothing especially valuable. This is the diamond plain.” “Diamond!” His eyes were ready to fall from their sockets. “I have heard that it is the most precious gem in the world. Surely you will permit me to fill at least one of my pockets with these priceless stones. Just think how one of them will make me quite independent!” “No, brother, thou must not act like a child. On this pilgrimage thou canst not carry anything with thee. Like a bird thou must be free. Thou must not soil thy wings with water and clay, otherwise thou wilt not be able to soar and reach the height.” With much persuasion, the old man was at last prevented from loading himself with diamonds, and by and by they were out of this plain too. Now it was nearly sunset, when lo, on the Western horizon they saw a wonderful body of water shimmering under the last rays of the sun. The king pointed it out to the old man with an exultant cry: — “Look, dost thou see the ocean lying before us? This is the sea of the ‘Philosopher’s Stone’, one drop of which will transmute all the baser metals into the purest gold.” The old man was, however, extremely tired by this time, and as he was thinking in an absent-minded way how to answer the king, he saw another thorn-picker, who was a friend of his, appearing on the scene. “What dost thou do here?” he asked. “To-day,” he said, “several members of our guild went on a strike, so a load of thorns is fetching a high price in the city. Come along with me. We two, all our lives, have been non-union members, and for the next two or three days, before the strike is settled, we can make a nice profit by supplying the citizens with the necessary fuel.” The old thorn-picker got very much excited over this unexpected news, and forgetting the king, the ocean of the Philosopher’s Stone and the inexhaustible fortune awaiting him, turned back. The king, pitying their ignorance, cried out after them, promising that he would make both rich beyond their dreams. The younger man hesitated for a moment, but the old man would not listen. “He has fooled me all day, and now he is going to make another fool out of you. Let us run quickly before he persuades us again to obey and follow him.”

For two days they gathered several loads of thorns, hoping that they would sell them at their own price and become independent and rich. But when they entered the city, they learned to their utter dismay that the price was even lower than its current standard, because there was no strike at all amongst the thorn-pickers, and the information given to the younger man was based on hearsay. Then the old man remembered the king, the plains of silver, gold and diamonds, and the ocean of the Philosopher's Stone. Wildly he ran out of the city, searched and searched all the neighboring plains, but he could find no trace of the king. Everything had disappeared like magic. "Why did I listen to another man? Why did I not obey the king? Why did I deprive myself of such a heavenly treasury?" Thus he was rebuking himself as he continued his search, ever hoping to find the king.

1. Arrival of pilgrims and other incidents. 2. Unity to be established first amongst the Bahais, then they can teach it to the world. 3. Give hearing to the deaf, sight to the blind and speech to the dumb.

1. Arrival of Pilgrims and Other Incidents

This morning I could see the Master only for a few minutes and presented to him a number of letters just translated. We did not see him any more before sunset. At that hour he passed by our house going to Mirza Abul Fazl's apartment, where the Arab believers gather weekly to hear him speak. A number of Persians were also there. He sent for Mirza Mahmoud and told him that there were some pilgrims who would arrive at 7:30 P.M. from Port Said, and that we should go to the station to welcome them. We walked to Sidi Jaber and when the train rolled into the station, we were glad to receive two young Persians, one from Russia, another from Beirut, and Mrs. Stannard from Haifa. She has spent a pleasant summer on Mount Carmel and is going to stay in Ramleh, as long as the Master continues to live here. We conducted her to the Victoria Hotel. Miss Hiscock also has left her Hotel and is now at this one. I hear that Mrs. Getsinger will go to Acca and Haifa to visit the holy Tombs of Baha-Ullah and the Bab before starting on her journey to India.

2. Translation of a Tablet, Giving the Keynote of the Bahai Movement

“O YE FRIENDS OF ABDUL BAHA! In this Divine Dispensation and lordly Cycle the fundamental principle and the supreme object is the establishment of the oneness of the world of humanity; so that through this oneness and agreement all wars and contentions will be wiped away from amongst mankind and the Beloved of Union appear in the Assemblage of the world.

“The promulgators of this Union must be the believers of God, — so that through the merciful power they may dispel from the horizon of the world the darkness of strangeness and the Adored One of Unity may unveil her sweet and heart-captivating Countenance. If the least ill-feeling exists amongst the friends themselves, how, then, can this great matter be realized? Therefore, everyone of the believers must strive valiantly with heart and soul; so that not the smallest speck of dust may sit upon the mirror of fundamental Unity; Love should increase day unto day, and the qualities of good-fellowship, intimacy, friendship and mutual kindness be clothed with resplendent realities amongst the believers.

“O God, O God, I lay my forehead and place my face upon the dust of humility and submission — looking up toward the kingdom of Mystery and beg of Thee with a contrite, supplicating, entreating, humble, submissive, broken and pain-encircling heart, from the Threshold of Thy Holiness — in the world of Lights — to rend asunder the veils of Pluralities, and with manifest signs reveal the Beauty of Fundamental Unity in the hearts.

“O Lord! Make thy believers the waves of the sea of Thy Oneness, the Breezes of the rose-garden of Thy singleness, the stars of the heaven of amity and good-fellowship and the pearls of the ocean of Love and Guidance; — so that they may drink from one fountain, breathe in one air, be illumined by one light, turn entirely their faces toward the world of renunciation and the Center of inspiration.

“Verily Thou art the Mighty, the Beloved, the Glorious and the Most High!

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHA ABBAS.”

3. Give Hearing to the Deaf, Sight to the Blind and Speech to the Dumb

“O thou sign of Guidance! Thank God that thou hast advanced from the region of darkness toward the center of Lights and after crossing the desert of mirage, hast reached the sweet, cool and salubrious springs. The rays of Guidance thou has beheld in the horizon of Unity, and in the Valley of safety, thou didst hear the soul-refreshing Call of God from the Blessed Tree. The honey of the Love of God thou didst taste, and hast become intoxicated with the Wine of the Knowledge of God.

“Now is the time when thou mayst become the associate of the known and unknown and at every moment raise the cry of Ya-Baha-El Abha. Unloose thy tongue in the most great Guidance; give hearing to the deaf, sight to the blind and speech to the dumb. Bestow exhilaration and rejoicing upon the lukewarm, and happiness and joy upon the despondent. Confer intelligence upon the heedless, awake the sleepy ones, cause to drink those who are thirsty, guide the erring ones, make confident those who are deprived, and reinforce the weak. Verily Thy Lord will assist thee and help thee; will inspire thee with the breaths of the Holy Spirit and cause thee to utter His proofs and arguments with great penetration and conviction.”

1. The spiritual palace of International Brotherhood is being built by the peacemakers. 2. “Christian Commonwealth” and Bahai articles. 3. Tablet to the Editor of the “Christian Commonwealth.” 4. The sojourn in Ramleh has been fruitful.

1. The Spiritual Palace of International Brotherhood Is Being Built by the Peacemakers

All the palaces that are built are subject to destruction, save only the Palace of Love which is protected. So far as Love is the Ruler of hearts, there is no difficulty, but when it is replaced by indifference, the fire is extinguished. In order to remove the possibility of estrangement, we must look to the higher principles of the spiritual life. For life indeed is sterile, unless it produces the fruits of love, a Love which breaks through all the walls of national and racial prejudices, and enters upon the plane of universal brotherhood. The spiritual Palace, the foundation of which is the Love of God is never laid waste.

The Palace of the Bahai Cause is firm; because its architect is Baha-Ullah, its builder is Abdul Baha, its masons are the companions of God, its laborers are the friends of God, its foundation the Word of God; its cement the Law of God, its water the blood of the martyrs, its materials the principles of absolute Reality, its rooms the religions of God, its light the sun of righteousness, its decorations the virtues of the world of humanity, its imperishable flowers the glorious attributes of Divinity and its dwellers the people of Truth.

Men and women from East and West, North and South are daily working on the construction of this Palace. With noble self-sacrifice, with unparalleled enthusiasm, with confident self-reliance, they are continually adding new partitions to this heavenly Palace. They do not rest for one moment. For them spiritual treasures are destined and inestimable bounties are provided. Are they not joint-partners in the building of the Palace of International Peace and arbitration, the edifice of the equality of human rights and the structure of the economic adjustment of all the inescapable problems of this modern era? We are assured by the Divine Architect that the volcanic events of the times and the corroding effect of the coming ages, shall not leave their impression upon the spiritual Palace.

2. “Christian Commonwealth” and Bahai Articles

To-day Abdul Baha had a slight fever; notwithstanding this he wrote many Tablets for the believers of Acca with his own hand. He received the newly arrived believer, Mirza Sayad Hossein, a fine young man, a graduate from the college of Beirut, and the son of the sister of the Master. Of course, he lives in His house. The rest of the students are expected to arrive to-morrow. In the afternoon the Master passed by and went to the garden. He stayed there for more than an hour, telling several stories to Haji Niaz who was in his presence. On his return we caught just a glimpse of him.

The Christian Commonwealth is publishing weekly articles and these are regularly translated into Persian and circulated in the Orient for the benefit of our Eastern friends, especially the August number which contained an article on the Prison experiences of Abdul Baha. The Master has often expressed the wish that the friends should serve the Cause by subscribing to this paper. The other day a Tablet was revealed for the editor which I transcribe here; so that it may encourage the Bahais to increase their inscriptions. They can do so through Mr. Joseph H. Hannen; because he is its Bahai correspondent. One of the latest copies will contain the Master’s article on Universal Peace.

3. Tablet to the Editor of the “Christian Commonwealth”

“He is God!

“O THOU KIND, BELOVED FRIEND!

“The copies of your peerless paper which are in reality the proofs of your high ideals, the exaltation of your aims and the principles of the prosperity of the world paper of yours which is like unto a clear, transparent of humanity [sic] — were received. Truly I say, this unique mirror, reveal the images of Reality. It is the reflection of Truths which mirror forth through the pages of this paper. All the Bahais are grateful and thankful to you on account of your praiseworthy intentions. The significance of these articles is not realized at the present time, but in the future they will gain such importance that every copy containing an article on the Cause of Baha-Ullah will be framed, preserved and hung in the most honored place, and their contents quoted by people of culture. Therefore, rest thou assured that thou art sowing pure seeds in pure ground. Ere long they will grow and develop and many harvests will be gathered.

“Upon thee be greeting and praise,

4. The Sojourn in Ramleh Has Been Fruitful

So far as I can judge at the present, our stay in Ramleh is coming to a close, though the next place to be honored by the presence of the Beloved is not definitely known. I hear talk about going to Haifa. However, he will be here at least one month more. Our summer was altogether very delightful. Abdul Baha was a source of great joy and strength to the hearts of many believers who made the pilgrimage from all corners of the Orient to see him and to receive his spiritual instructions.

1. Abdul Baha Writes to the Believers in Russia

This morning the Master dressed in his beautiful soft cream-colored robe, entered our house. Mirza Ali Akbar handed him a few letters from Russia. He read them without delay and asked Mirza Moneer to bring paper, ink and pen. He dictated answers to each, and through them you can see how he adapts himself to the individual needs and the spiritual capacity of every person, and out of his abundant treasury, showers upon them the wealth of the Kingdom of Abha. Although these believers live in the remote Empires of Russia, Persia, Turkey, or Arabia, yet he knows them and they know him. How they hunger for and preserve every Tablet which he reveals for them!

2. In the Bahai Cause There Are No Salaried Teachers

One of the believers asked him what should he do, what course of action should he take up? He told him to go and teach the Cause, spread the coming of the Kingdom and herald the dawn of the Sun of Reality. To convey the message is a confirmed matter. Whosoever arises in this service will always be aided by the angels of the Supreme Concurrence. It is true that the friends will do everything in their power to help a person who devotes all his time to the service of the Cause, but let there be no doubt on this subject, that in this movement there are no regular salaried teachers. A paid teacher will not be able to accomplish as much work as if he were independent. In this Cause Abdul Baha desires to have teachers who sacrifice all their belongings, possessions, hearts, lives and spirits in the work of God. This would be very effective. The Cause must be promulgated with devotion and personal sacrifice, and not through financial operations.

3. Wit Is the Salt of Conversation

Then he told us that, although he did not feel well, he had written many letters to the believers of Acca with his own hand, because they were old and tried friends.

He mentioned their names, one by one, a long list, I assure you. Speaking about the Tablet written to Abul Gasem, the gardener, he said that Abul Gasem had sent some pomegranates to him from the garden, so that he might write back that the skin of the pomegranates were as rosy and pink as the cheeks of Jameleeh (the gardener's wife), but that the former is through the creation of God, while the latter through the power of devotion. He laughed a great deal, finally saying that it is necessary to joke now and then, for joking is the salt of conversation.

4. The Second Party of Bahai Students Arrive

About ten o'clock the second party of Bahai students arrived from Haifa. They are fine fellows, full of the spirit of the Cause, and devoted to their studies. Their names are as follows: Habibollah Khodabaksh, Badi Bashrouayeh, Mir Jalal, Mir Kamal, Abul Hassan Khan, Golam Hossein Khan, Hassan Khan, Abdul Ali and Tarazollah. The first two are very brilliant young men, and owing to their superior wisdom and intelligence exercise a most salutary influence over the student body. They are, in a way, leaders without the name of leadership. Badi Effendi is a versatile poet as well as Habibollah. The former sings beautifully, and on account of this advantage, both of them have taught all the students Bahai songs and poems. As soon as they entered the house, the atmosphere was changed, and we heard snatches of songs, now in solo and again in chorus. After a while the Master sent for them and they had a short interview with him. He fired their hearts with words of encouragement, and hoped that they would combine together literary knowledge with practical science. From now on they will stand daily in the presence of the Master and listen to his advice.

5. Mrs. Fraser Arrives from America

In the afternoon Abdul Baha passed by, followed by Shoghi Effendi. He called for me and I walked behind him to the rose-garden. A telegram sent to Port Said from the Master to Ahmad Yazdi: "Send Mrs. Fraser to Ramleh," brought back the answer that she had left at one o'clock. He told me to go with Shoghi Effendi to the station and bring her home. We were expecting her for the last few days. I was delighted to hear the news.

6. Mrs. Fraser is Welcomed at the Station by Shoghi Effendi

It was a hot day, but the rose-garden is always cool, the fresh breeze wafting. The Master asked Shoghi Effendi to bring him a bottle of Evian water. Meanwhile an Arab, who is a laborer, came in and saluted him. The Arab told a long story, illustrating it with poems, about the source of the Nile, that it is in Paradise and flows from under a throne — a pretty legend. Then a few men came in to see the Master. He spoke to them in detail on trustworthiness, and told them three stories about his own life. For three hours we sat in his presence listening with attention to every word he said. When he left the rose-garden, Shoghi Effendi and I went to Sidi Jaber station to welcome our dear sister, Mrs. Fraser. We greeted her on behalf of the Master. After ten minutes, she stood before him. She is going to live with the Holy Family, and I have no doubt that the Bahai world will receive a rich and valuable treasure when her Diary is given out.

1. The American Bahais Will Be Going to India

With the early departure of Mr. and Mrs. Getsinger and Mrs. Fraser to India, we will have three active teachers in that great field. May they work together unitedly, and hoist the banner of the Cause in that vast region! Each one of these three Bahais is gifted with a particular spiritual talent, and when they combine their forces they will be able to render a most brilliant service to the Cause. To India, — a region of sects and creeds, — this truth goes as a balm of reconciliation, a remedy for religious differences and a cooling water of knowledge for those who are thirsty. Their work will carry them through many cities and the assistance of God will be with them. A cable was received from Doctor Getsinger saying that he would be here in three or four days.

2. The Importance of the Art of Translation

This morning Abdul Baha sent for the students. They were all filled with hope and longing. When they stood in his presence, he welcomed them and tea was served. Having received the constitution of “a central London Bahai Committee” which is in the process of organization, he gave it to Badi Effendi to translate, and then delivered a short talk on the art of translation, advising them to write at least one page every day, either from English into Persian, or from Persian into English, thus they might acquire efficiency in this line of work. He recommended for the future that when the means are provided, a committee of translators be organized from both nationalities, who would know the two languages well, in addition to Arabic. Then the Tablets would be properly translated. Again he spoke about Persia and the part which they must play in her reconstruction.

3. The Past Glory of Persia and Her Future Opportunity

He said to the students that there was a time when Persia was like a fragrant Bouquet, perfuming all nostrils. She was the center of the glory and honor of the world of humanity. The inhabitants of Persia from a social, industrial, political and moral standpoint were superior to the rest of mankind. Now conditions are reversed, and the same high standard is not kept waving aloft. Like a great giant, she is prostrated on the ground, groaning with a pitiful voice. If the Persians could clearly see the sad and gloomy state of their own country, they would weep bitter tears of remorse, but they are all self-occupied. It is a natural and divine law that when a nation or country sinks to the lowest degree of degradation, then God, in His Bounty, comes to help her, uplifting and raising her to the highest zenith of glory. As Persia has experienced these sad events, the Lord in His Mercy has willed that that country be illumine, so that her future condition may become even more glorious than her past, and that she may advance greatly along the path of science, industry and art. Now God has purposed that they may become a means of this reformation, and strive day and night that Persia may be enlightened. They must equip themselves with practical education; — so that Persia may be benefited through them. The Confirmations of Abha will always be theirs. If a person studies all the sciences and arts, without receiving heavenly Confirmations, he will not be able to accomplish very much. Now he hopes that they will become the Cause of the moral and scientific advancement of all the Persians.

4. The Bahai students Meet Mrs. Getsinger and Mrs. Fraser in the Home of Abdul Baha

Afterwards he sent for Haji Niaz, Mirza Ali Akbar, Mirza Mahmoud and me. I was carrying a package of Tablets just translated, which I gave to him. He took it out of my hands and gave me a hard blow on my right cheek. "Bravo," he said. Then for a few minutes he spoke about the events of Persia, and the attitude of the governors toward the Cause, and the believers. A package of petitions had just been received. He opened it and read a few. They all contained good news about the progress of the Cause in Persia. Then he went into his own room and sent Mrs. Getsinger and Mrs. Fraser to see us. When they entered the sight of them brought me the significance of the Bahai Cause. Here we were, four Persians and two American ladies meeting on the ground of perfect spiritual friendship! Who has brought to us this divine edifice in which we abide? Those who have lived in the West all their lives, are not quite able to realize this wonderful transformation; this alchemic change of hearts. When we left them, I was yet under the spell of the realization of it, and was more than ever thankful to Baha-Ullah for thus uniting the hearts of the East and the West by breaking away the barriers of nationalities, and causing the appearance of the light of Reality.

5. Bahai Meeting for the Americans

In the afternoon the students were taken to the garden of Nozha by Mirza Ali Akbar and Haji Niaz after which they attended a meeting in Khorassani's house, where Mrs. Fraser, Mrs. Stannard and Miss Hiscock were present. Mrs. Fraser had her first experience of a Persian-Arabic Bahai meeting, and for her honor the students sang Mrs. Waite's poem of "Allaho Abha" and other pieces. This gathering composed only of men, must have appeared very picturesque and strange to her. The Master attended the meeting for a few minutes. In the evening several people visited him and he spoke with them on the theological questions of the East, and of their futility. While the students were in the Park, he passed and asked for Mirza Moneer.

6. Abdul Baha Amid a Profusion of Thousands of Roses

After a few minutes Mirza Moneer returned, saying that the Master wanted us to go to the rose-garden. Mirza Jalal Sina, Mirza Mahmoud and I joined him. He was sitting under the shade on a tree, while the breezes played about him. This is a rose-garden divided into two parts, the first section overlooking the other and joined together by steps. Daily twelve thousand roses, pink, white, red, yellow, are sent to Alexandria and Cairo florists. The fragrance of these roses is exhilarating. The gardener is a simple Arab and most devoted to the Master. He always jokes with him.

7. Description of the Garden of Baha-Ullah in Teheran

After speaking and reciting several stories of the life in Acca, Abdul Baha reverted to the rose-garden, expressing his love and admiration for roses. He said that outside of Teheran his family had a great park planted by the father of Baha-Ullah. This was a wonderful garden. It contained four gates, Eastern, Western, Northern and Southern. As you entered the Eastern gate, the Western gate was visible, and similarly from the Northern you could see the Southern gate. In the center of the garden, a throne was built, the four great avenues branching off toward the gates, so that you could see all four gates as you sat on that throne. On both sides of these avenues popular trees were planted to the number of ten thousand. These trees rose erect and majestic toward the sky. Under them thousands of rose bushes were growing, the fragrance of which filled the air. Often Abdul Baha used to sleep on this throne at night. The moon, clear, full, silvery, shone upon him. The galaxy of stars shedding their rays, now faintly, and again with a lustrous twinkle over the calm and mystic scene of the garden. Long before sunrise he would open his eyes and look with wonder at this infinite universe of God. Then the nightingales would break into a glorious concert of divine music; the gentle murmur of the rills flowing on all sides reached the ears, and the zephyrs wafting through the leaves made soft music, the branches hand-clapping and applauding. In the early morning the Blessed Perfection would rise and prepare tea for the family, and while the sun was dawning from the Eastern horizon, they would gather about him, drinking tea and enjoying the heavenly scene.

Then he started to walk through the rose-garden, now and then standing before a rose on a bush, contemplating its structure and petals.

8. A Single Rose in the Garden of Constantinople

Looking at a rose which was very like an American beauty, he said that it was just about this season he had arrived in Constantinople. The garden of the house wherein he lived contained one bush, on a branch of which a single rose bloomed forth after sunset. The believers, never having seen roses at this season were overjoyed, and until late at night were gathered around it.

1. Thoughts on the Mediterranean shore. 2. Abdul Baha talks to Mrs. Fraser and Mrs. Getsinger about their trip to India. 3. Mr. Hooper Harris and Harlan Ober's journey to India.

1. Thoughts on the Mediterranean Shore

It is ten o'clock P.M. I have just returned home, after lying quietly on the shore of the Mediterranean for more than an hour. While my body was stretched on the soft sand, my eyes gazing at the infinite orbs of lights, my spirit was holding communion with the friends beyond the seas. The night was dark and still, and my ears enjoyed the music of the waves, murmuring along the shore. Here I am, I thought, and where will I be in the future? Did I ever dream last year that I would be returning to the East in the service of Abdul Baha? Truly, how our own plans seem futile when compared with the glorious plan mapped for us by the Designer of the Universe! How often in a foolish fit of pride we prefer our own pigmy scheme to that of the Almighty! The Cause is great and our destiny is very high! I praise God for thus taking me out of the noise and clamor of the West into the calm and beautiful serenity of the East! As Mirza Abul Fazl said the other day:

“You are now in the school. Daily you are learning your lessons but the time may come when Abdul Baha will send you away into the world to carry out his will and to serve the cause of humanity.”

2. Abdul Baha Talks to Mrs. Fraser and Mrs. Getsinger About Their Trip to India

This morning after the students had visited the Master, we were sent for, and he dwelt on the same subject on which he had spoken with them. It was on the internal condition of the Cause in Teheran and the history of one of the believers. Then he told me that I might come at any time to see Mrs. Getsinger and Mrs. Fraser to talk with them about the details of the plan of their voyage to India and prepare for them a list of addresses. For an hour in the afternoon we discussed their approaching visit. The former gave me a copy of her diary of yesterday, and I will quote here a part of it: —

“Suddenly turning to me, Abdul Baha asked, ‘Can you think of an excuse to secretly take me to India with you? What plans have you made for India?’ ‘I have no plans,’ I answered, ‘except to obey the will of Abdul Baha!’ Then turning to both of us, he said: ‘What will you do if they dispute these teachings?’ Mrs. Getsinger answered, ‘I shall turn to Abdul Baha and call upon him for spiritual confirmation. After repeating the Greatest Name, I shall open my mouth and say what is given me to say.’ ‘What will you do if they beat you?’ ‘What will you do if they put you in prison?’ ‘I shall thank God that I have walked in His path, and have been permitted to share what Abdul Baha suffered for years.’

“Abdul Baha was silent for a moment. Then he raised his voice, giving it a dramatic emphasis: — ‘And what will you do if they kill you?’ ‘I shall realize that the first favor that I ever asked of Abdul Baha had been granted. And the minute my soul is freed from my body, I will fly to God from whom I hope it will never be separated through all eternity.’

“There was a silence. The Master’s eyes were closed. Then he told us: when one goes forth to teach, he should think of all these things. He must be prepared at all times, for whatever comes in the path of God. During the many years that he was in prison, each moment he lived under the sword. He felt that perhaps to-morrow, or to-night, or in an hour, or on the very hour, an order might come from the Sultan to kill all of them. He never went to bed a single night all that time, thinking to see the morrow!”

3. Mr. Hooper Harris and Harlan Ober’s Trip to India

In this connection let me bring to your attention the good and excellent Bahai work done in India, by our two American brothers, Mr. Hooper Harris of New York and Mr. Harlan Ober of Boston. Both these brothers scattered far and wide the seeds of the Bahai Cause, and their memories are always kept fresh in the hearts of those who have seen or heard them. Their services will never be forgotten. Like true, staunch pioneers, they worked nobly and faithfully, and when they returned, they laid many laurels of victory at the feet of Abdul Baha. With the lamps of guidance in their hands, these other teachers will soon hasten toward India, and will summon all to the kingdom of Abha, and impart the Glad-tidings of peace and Brotherhood.

1. The Story of the King and His Search for the Fountain of Life

“Please tell me a story,” I asked Sayad Jalal Sina as I sat down in front of my writing table.

“Once upon a time,” he started without hesitation, “a king of antiquity who had conquered many countries, and had raised the Flag of his authority over many climes, became restless and discontented with his lot. On the occasion of a New Year’s Day, when all the Cabinet Ministers, Dignitaries of the States, Colonial Governors and officials of remote countries had gathered in the capital to pay homage and tribute to their emperor, and while he was sitting on his diamond-studded throne, with all these men standing before him, he raised his voice addressing the concourse of officials, clothed in their dazzling robes of ceremony:

“ ‘My friends! From my earliest youth, I have obtained everything for which my heart has wished. I have had the good fortune of receiving wise instructions from excellent teachers and statesmen. Then having attained the age of maturity, I ascended the throne after the death of my father. I have ever striven to keep Peace within the vast heterogeneous elements of my empire, and have extended the boundaries of my possessions beyond the seas. The mighty arms of my generals have carried the authority of my government, and the influence of my laws to the confines of the earth. Notwithstanding these things, I am not contented. My heart longs for the attainment of an object which seems to my mortal eyes unattainable. I do not know what it is, but I feel that there is something for the possession of which I am ready to give up my whole empire. The idea has occurred to me that I may ask each of you to relate the story and the experiences of your lives, perchance through your narration I may be able to learn the secret of this longing which is knocking at the door of my heart.'

"For several minutes the great throng of people in the audience-chamber fell into a deep silence, so deep that if a pin had been dropped, one could have heard its fall. They looked furtively at each other, and each wondered in his heart, 'What is this Something for whose possession the king is willing to forfeit his whole Empire?' At last, the prime Minister arose from his seat, and related a long story about his experiences. He sat down, and others followed in the order of succession. All the while the king shook his head, showing that the problem had not been solved. Finally an old man, who had been the wise mentor and guide of the king from his early childhood, rose from his seat and, with a penetrating and convincing voice, spoke as follows:

" 'Sire! I know the object of your Majesty's search. You are longing for the water of Life, the fountain of which is situated in the Kingdom of Darkness. I have been there. I have seen it with my own eyes, and have drunk it deeply. Now having attained to Eternal Youth, I am bound for the Kingdom of Light.' 'Oh! Oh!' the king exclaimed, rising from his throne, and shaking off his lethargy, 'that is the thing that I have wished for, all my life, but did not know what it was. From this very moment I will make preparations to start the search and will close my eyes to all rest and comfort till I have found it.' Then he ordered his generals to summon the army, and issued an edict for the Imperial Guards to prepare to start on a long journey. After a week of feverish work, everything was ready and the king appointed his successor.

"On the last day, the inhabitants of the capital arranged a mammoth open air reception, and when the king had delivered a farewell speech, amid flying colors, and to the singing of the national anthem, he started at the head of his great army for the Kingdom of Darkness. After many months of journey through desolate deserts and over impassable mountains, the exhausted army reached the desired destination. But the king, to his great disappointment, remembered that the old man had told him in a private meeting, that there were about 2000 fountains in the Kingdom of Darkness, and as regard to color, taste and property, they were exactly alike.

"Therefore it would be a matter of impossibility to distinguish one from the other. Thinking that all the hardships of this arduous journey would be crowned with no success, and filled with apprehension and terror at the gloomy darkness enveloping his innumerable legions, with no possibility of escape, he resigned himself to the hand of Fate, and began to think how he and his army could manage to extricate themselves from the impenetrable gloom. At this juncture, the same old man appeared on the scene, and the king's hope immediately revived. He confided to him his great perplexity at not being able to find the real Fountain of Life, inasmuch as there were so many of them.

“ ‘This is very easy,’ the wise one said, ‘I have come here especially to relieve your mind from further anxiety on this point. Here is a dead fish. Take it along with you. When you reach a fountain, drop it in. If it is revived, you will know, without a doubt, that you have the Fountain of Life before your eyes.’ ”

“The old man disappeared in the same mysterious way. The king thus heartened by the advice of his mentor, ordered his army to decamp and to continue the journey. After several days, they reached a large fountain, and as soon as the king dropped the fish into the water, it became a living, moving creature. He prostrated himself on the ground, and thanked God for thus guiding him at last to the Fountain of Life. And so he camped there for a few days, and drank deeply of the water, gaining new life, new hope and new courage.

“Realizing that he had attained to the supreme object of his existence, he decided to return. Just before their departure, a great, invisible voice filled the air. ‘Whosoever takes away the stones from the bottom of the Fountain of Life, will regret it afterwards, and whosoever does not take the stones will also regret.’ The people were puzzled, and did not know what to do. Should they take, or should they not take? Finally a number of them filled their pockets, under the pretext that even if they did not take any, they would regret, so that it was just as well to take them; others argued, why should they burden themselves with any of these stones, and then regret it afterwards. So it happened that half of the army possessed themselves of the stones, and the other half returned empty-handed. When they came out of the kingdom of darkness, they observed to their great astonishment, that these stones were precious gems. Those who had taken them, regretted that they had not taken more, and those who were empty-handed, regretted that they had not taken any. Thus both sides were afflicted with remorse and regret.

“Now, instead of giving the full significance of this story, I will give you the key. The king, every man; Old man, reason; Fountain of Life, religion; Fish, the heart; Invisible voice, Intuition; Stones, good deeds; Kingdom of Darkness, material world; Kingdom of Light, spiritual world; Eternal youth, Everlasting life; Two thousand fountains, Creeds and sects.”

2. The Simplicity of Life, and How the Arabs Live on the Desert

In the morning the Master came to our house and as a preliminary to his talk, spoke about the renewal of the rent, which, of course, meant a longer stay in Ramleh. Then as naturally he fell into a description of the complexity of the means of modern life.

How complex are the means of life in the present age, and how much more complex are we making them daily! The people's needs seem never to come to an end. The more they accumulate, the more they want. There is only one way of freedom, and that is by shutting one's eyes and heart to all these things that distract the mind. The Arab of the desert teaches us a great lesson in the simple life. Living as he does, in the vast Sahara, he lacks all means except a tent, a rug or mat, a caldron, a sword hanging to the inside pole of the tent, and a javelin tied to the outside pole. This is all his furniture. Thus if he is wealthy, he has a mare, or a horse, a few camels, and maybe, adjoining his tent, a palm grove. It never occurs to his mind, that there is anything else in this world. He is happy and he has no worry. His food consists of a bowl of milk and a few dates, and he may well wonder how the city man can digest all the different kinds of dishes with their flavors and spices. He enjoys perfect health. His thought is peaceful and serene, contrary to the city people, who are always haunted by the nightmare of making a bare livelihood.

3. Abdul Baha Talks with Mrs. Fraser

Afterwards I went to see the Master. He was surrounded by many people and was talking and writing at the same time. In the afternoon, I visited Mrs. Fraser and Mrs. Getsinger and for quite a while we talked together about their forthcoming trip to India. Both are full of enthusiasm and are looking forward with great pleasure to their approaching experiences. In the evening, the Master sent for me and in speaking with Mrs. Fraser, told her that he was very pleased with her, because as soon as she received his cablegram, although there were difficulties in the path, she pushed them aside and came. The Confirmations of the Kingdom of Abha shall descend upon her. She was going to India in the service of the Kingdom of God and the Angels of the Supreme Concourse shall assist her. Let her attract to herself the heavenly Bestowals.

1. Abdul Baha's Spiritual Moods

Last night, when Mrs. Fraser left the room, Abdul Baha continued to walk. He was fatigued. He sat down and closed his eyes, saying how glad he would be when he leaves this world; this world of darkness and sorrow, pain and suffering. He sighed. It seemed to me that he was too exhausted to speak another word, and I was going to retire. Then somehow, Mrs. Haney's letter came to my mind, so I said:

"I had a letter from Mrs. Haney the other day, in which she expressed great joy at reading the story of the Self-sacrifice of Mullah Mehdy Kandy."

Immediately he opened his eyes, and looked like a different person, as though supplied by a tremendous force from an invisible source. As soon as the name of this martyr was mentioned he was energized, got up from his seat, and began to speak with inspiration and eloquent fervor, throwing additional sidelights upon the life of that divine martyr, and then just as unconsciously, a clear stream of words flowed from his tongue in praise of Mary Magdalene, and how she became the cause of the constancy and steadfastness of the disciples of Christ!

2. Dr. Getsinger's Arrival in Alexandria

This morning Shoghi Effendi entered my room with a wireless message, just arrived from Dr. Getsinger, advising us of his arrival Monday morning, and as this was Monday, the Master sent word for me to go to the wharf to welcome him. I was on my way without delay, and had to wait until noon. Then "Prince Heinrich" of the German Line appeared, and after a few minutes, I spied Doctor Getsinger on the deck. We had to wait two hours in the Custom House before we were freed, and then taking a carriage, and putting his trunks and valise in front, we drove to Ramleh.

At four o'clock the Master greeted him in his house, and about six we called on Mirza Abul Fazl. He was very glad to welcome Dr. Getsinger back to the Orient and inquired about many believers in Washington, Chicago and New York. Then a historical discussion about the Bible and the exact date in which Zoroaster lived waxed hot until the Master came in. We all sat on the balcony and for a few minutes, Abdul Baha joked with Doctor Getsinger, reminding him of the days when he was traveling with him in America.

He dictated a long Tablet to the believers in Mazan-daran in the garden. Returning from his walk he came to our house and spoke with the students. Thus he attends to his flock with care and solicitude. Doctor Getsinger is going to have a room in the New Victoria Hotel as the guest of the Master.

3. Tablet from Abdul Baha to the Bahais in Leipzig, Germany

“He is God!

“O YE SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF THE KINGDOM!

“The heavenly daughter, Miss Knoblock [sic], has given the utmost praise about your Faith and Love; that Glory be to God, you heard the call of the Kingdom, that your spirits gained the capacity of flight, your hearts were illumined with the Light of Guidance, you drank the Elixir of Bestowal from the Cup of Divine Knowledge and became intoxicated with the Wine of the Kingdom. Thank God that He has chosen you from amongst all the people of the world and has granted you such an eminent Gift: — so that each one may enter into the Kingdom of God, and like unto the stars may shine and gleam. This Bestowal of the Most great Guidance is not so apparent now, but in future ages, it will illumine the East and the West.

“Consider that during the days of His Holiness Christ — Upon Him be Glory — no one gave any importance to the guidance of the Apostles. The populace pretended that a number of insignificant souls, who were catchers of fishes, had gathered around a poor man and were talking foolishly. They laughed even at the Blessed Perfection of Christ and spat upon that radiant, luminous and wonderful Countenance. But reflect that afterward, the guidance of those catchers of fish became famous throughout all regions, and up to this time mankind is glorifying and praising them.

“Upon ye be Baha El Abha!

(Signed) “ABDUL BAHA ABBAS.”

4. Another Tablet to a German Bahai Asking Him to Teach

“He is God!

“O THOU RESPECTED YOUTH!

“How many holy souls in past ages have longed most intensely to hear the name of the Divine Kingdom and live during the day of the promised one of all the nations of the world; but they passed away and left this world with utter regret, because they did not attain to their wish. In this radiant Century God has so confirmed thee that thou mayst step into the Universe of Life, be trained in the Cradle of God’s Protection and Preservation, suck the milk of tenderness from the breast of Providence and take a share and a portion from the Light of Guidance. Consider what a great Favor is this! What a wonderful bounty! Therefore loosen thy tongue in the glorification of this most Great Bestowal and summon the people to the Kingdom of God, so that others may receive a goodly portion from this Holy Cause.

“Upon ye be Baha El Abha!

1. Speeches to be Delivered at Public Meetings

As now and then the question of public speaking in the Bahai meetings has more or less agitated the minds of the believers, I desire to quote herein an extract from a recent Tablet which will show clearly the attitude of Abdul Baha on this rather important matter:

“Rest ye assured that the Breaths of the Holy Spirit shall inspire you with the power of speech. Consequently, loosen your tongues and speak in every meeting with undaunted courage. First, before beginning, turn your face toward Baha-Ullah, beg for the Confirmation of the Holy Spirit, and then open your tongues and speak out whatever is dictated to your hearts. Speak with the utmost serenity, conviction and dignity. I hope that day by day the circle of your meetings may be enlarged and that the investigators of Reality may listen to the proofs and arguments. With heart and soul, I am with you in every meeting. Be ye confident.”

2. History of the Life of Arminius Vambery

This morning, with Doctor Getsinger, I called on Mrs. Getsinger and Mrs. Fraser and had a long talk with both of them. Then Mrs. Stannard came and the conversation turned upon the death of Prof. Vambery in Budapest, and his most significant letter written to Abdul Baha just a few days before he died. This letter will be published in the Egyptian Gazette and copies of the same will be sent to the European Press. He was well-known all over Europe on account of his travels in the interior of Asia, and on account of his writings. Mrs. Stannard thinks that this letter is one of the most wonderful documents of the Cause on account of the importance of the man, for he wrote with thorough understanding, and sympathy. The

Arminius Vambery was born in Hungary at the Village of Duna-Szerdahely, in March, 1832. His father was a Jew in humble circumstances. He was apprenticed at the age of twelve, to a dressmaker, but having acquired some book learning, he presently became tutor to a publican's son. After enduring much privation, he had mastered, by the time he was sixteen, several other languages besides Latin. Four years later, he went to Constantinople, where he was engaged as tutor by Hossein Dein Pasha. In 1853, he brought out a German-Turkish Dictionary. He had now lived so long in the East, that he could pass for an Osmanli, and in 1862 he started on his long and arduous journey to Central Asia. He disguised himself as a Dervish which disguise he assumed at Teheran because of a knowledge of Persian and Turkish and of a careful practice, not only of the customs of Orientals generally, but also of the ways of the Dervishes — the mendicant friars of Islam. He made his way to Khive, where he was granted two audiences by the Khan. The Amir of Bokhara heard suspicious stories of the traveler, but having seen that Rashid Effendi, as Vambery called himself, was a good Moslem and all that he professed to be, dismissed him with handsome presents. On his return to Europe, Vambery paid a visit to England, where he met with a reception both from the geographers and the public. His first account of his "Travels and Adventures in Central Asia" was published in London in 1864, and had a large circulation. He wrote also a "History of Bokhara," based chiefly on the works of Persian and Arabic historians.

In recognition of his linguistic attainments, Vambery was appointed Professor of Oriental languages at Budapest. He frequently visited England, and seldom missed an opportunity to give his opinions in European periodicals on any new developments of Eastern and Middle Eastern politics.

During the visit of Abdul Baha to Budapest, Vambery met him twice. His knowledge of Oriental languages, especially Persian, Arabic and Turkish, was amazing. He was a pleasant looking old man of rather short stature and wrinkled face. In the course of conversation with the Master, he said:

“For many years have I followed your teachings and ever longed to meet you. I admire more than anything else your supreme courage in that at this advanced age you have left everything and are traveling all over the west [sic] to spread your humane principles. You are doing a great work. It will be crowned with success, because your sincerity, unwavering faith and high ideals have stamped themselves upon the minds of the World’s thinkers.”

His last words as Abdul Baha bade him farewell in his long drawing-room and library, were these: —

“I hope to hear from you. Please when you return to the East, send me the writings and Treatises of your Father and I will do everything to spread them in Europe. The more these principles are disseminated, the nearer will be the age of peace and brotherhood.”

The story of how Vambery, physically afflicted, for he was lame, fought for existence against hunger, and persecution, and gradually mounted the ladder of fame, furnishes one of the most remarkable pages of the history of the Jewish race. At school Vambery once said:

“Hunger, mockery and insult — I experienced them all in turn; but the greatest misery was not capable of darkening the serene sky of youthful mirth for more than a few minutes, and even my healthy color returned after a short interval of bodily collapse.”

He was well received at the English Court both in the reign of Queen Victoria and in that of King Edward. On the occasion of his seventieth birthday, in 1902, his Majesty conferred upon him the title of Commander of the Victoria Order. The present King of England, when the Prince of Wales, proved equally amiable when the distinguished Hungarian Professor stayed at Sandringham. One day, while the latter was occupied with his correspondence, he received a message from Queen Alexandra, inviting him to join her in the garden. Vambery wished to wash his hands before going, but there was no one in sight. At length the Prince appeared, and asked him what he wanted. Vambery told him, and the Prince disappeared, returning in a few minutes with a large jug in his hand, which he placed, smiling, on the washstand. Thus was a poor Jewish beggar-student of former days, waited upon by a Royal Prince, whom, moreover, he had the temerity to name “The Royal Jug-bearer.”

In the afternoon and evening many people of various nationalities called on Abdul Baha, and the demands of several “gentlemen beggars” were satisfied. When I was walking in the evening with two others, we passed by a house, the windows of which were open; we looked in and saw the Master sitting on the Divan talking with the Pasha.

“God has created us that we may love each other” — were the words that came to our ears as we passed by.

1. A Persian Bahai student Delivers a Lecture in English

Since the arrival of the students from Haifa, table-talks have become the fashion. These talks are delivered in English. Now and then one hears a good speech, short and to the point. It seems to me very interesting how these young men are eager to learn everything from everywhere and thus increase their fund of information, so that in the future they may become able to teach the Cause with eloquent tongues and fluent speeches. Why then, do they practice in English rather than in Persian one might ask? This in itself, of course, is another sign of that drawing together of nations and peoples, that commingling of interests and ideals. The one all-absorbing thought of these young men is to equip themselves with the mental instruments whereby they may go out to war against ignorance, selfishness and greed. I may therefore quote one or two short addresses given by these budding orators. The following is an example:

“Gentlemen! Bahai Brothers! About seven thousand years ago, according to the religious history, God the Maker of all things through His Mercy and Providence created the world and made man after his own image and likeness. Since that time up to the present day, His Manifestations have successively appeared upon the earth and thus the dark world has been quickened and vivified through the spiritual vibrations of their divine Teachings. By this education mankind has attained to a higher degree of knowledge. It has passed over the arc of ascent, until now it has obtained the capacity for the recognition of the Manifestation of God. When His Holiness Moses appeared, thousands believed in him, and having received and lived according to his divine teachings, became leaders of other nations. God showed them

His Love and showered upon them His blessings like unto a torrent. He freed them from the tyrannical yoke of Pharaoh [sic], brought them out of Egypt, and established them in the Promised Land. He sent down for them manna from heaven, He cleft asunder the sea and made a safe passage for them to pass through. He called them His children and they became worthy of every praise and embodied every virtue. Later, they forgot the heavenly laws, followed their own inclinations and worshiped idols instead of the Almighty Jehovah. As a result they stopped progressing. Their civilization waned and their moral virtues retrograded. For many ages they were scattered, humiliated and scorned. But now, praise be to God, they are stirred with a new life, resuscitated with a new spirit, and many of them are quickened by the call of the Kingdom. The Lord of Hosts hath come, the King of Kings hath appeared. The rays of the Sun of His Mercy have enlightened them and the Breeze of His Benevolence has wafted over them. Thus are they endowed with a seeing eye, a hearing ear and an understanding heart.

heavenly witness and a celestial blessing. The name of this young man is Doctor Habbibollah [sic] Khodabaksh. He is sitting now at this table, and is one of the promising Bahais of this century of light and knowledge. We heartily congratulate him and offer him our best wishes, hoping that he will be assisted by God to cure the ills of humanity, both physical and spiritual; bestow eternal life upon every dead one, and cause mankind to obtain immortality by leading it to the fountainhead of light and bounty.”

2. Abdul Baha Wishes the Bahai Students to Take Post-graduate Courses

This morning the Master received the students. His talk to them was about his lecture in Leland Stanford University, praising meanwhile, the President, Doctor Jordan, and his labors, in the field of International Peace. He encouraged the students to take post-graduate courses in that University, because he had spoken about this matter with Doctor Jordan. Already many are considering going there, and they mean to write to the President and ask for particulars.

3. The Mission of the Bahai Cause Is Universal and Not Local

Yesterday the new Persian Consul General arrived from Constantinople and the Master sent all the students to welcome him at the steamer and to-day, with Mirza Ali Akbar, he went to Alexandria to pay him a visit, in the hotel where he is staying for a few days before his departure for Jadda. In the course of conversation Abdul Baha pointed out to the Consul General the impartial attitude of the Bahais in recent developments in Persia and how they are the lovers of Peace and progress. The mission of the Bahai Cause is universal and not local; its principles are for all humanity; its objects are worldwide. The Bahais are the army of spiritual and intellectual advancement. Then he spoke a few words about the promotion of the Cause in America and Europe. The Consul General became very attracted, and made an engagement to come next day and call on the Master. On his way back in the street car, the Master showed love and kindness to a little child with his mother. The child was so attracted, that he came and sat next to him. Abdul Baha gave him a present and kissed him, and the mother thankfully and happily carried him away, reluctant.

1. An Analysis of the Letters of UNITY by a Persian student. 2. Story of the stork, fish and prawn. 3. Letters received from and tablets written to different parts of the world.

1. An Analysis of the Letters of UNITY by a Persian Student

The other day I was speaking with one of the students as we were walking along a broad avenue. The subject was “Unity,” a word much used in the Bahai Movement. “Unity,” he said, “is the foundation of all successful undertakings. With unity of purpose, a harmonious action is produced. When various elements are brought together, and basic unity is established, an organism is the result. In the political world, Union is the watchword of all the statesmen and in the Bahai world it has a deep significance. The aim of this Cause is, as we all know, a confederation of the world’s religious systems, a consolidation of the political interests of the nations, and a truly grand realization of the brotherhood of man. To my mind, every letter in the word ‘Unity’ stands for a great principle or quality. For example, ‘U’ stands for ‘understanding,’ we must at all times try to understand truth impartially and improve our minds; ‘N’ stands for ‘nourishment’; once we have acquired understanding, we must ‘nourish’ it with wisdom and knowledge and cleanse it with the water of intelligence; ‘I’ stands for ‘investment’; if we have a capital we should ‘invest’ it, in order to increase it. The Bahais must teach the Cause and spread the Glad-tidings of the kingdom of Abha and awaken those who are asleep. ‘T’ is for ‘thoughtfulness’; before teaching we must think, or in other words, before teaching others we must teach ourselves. ‘Y’ means ‘yield’ to the truth. If you investigate an object and realize that it is reality, yield to it. Don’t shut your eyes to the truth, once you have seen the glory of its beauty. Let us cling to the truth, as a shipwrecked sailor clings to the cliff. In short, our aim is to ‘understand’ everything in a comprehensive manner, to ‘nourish’ our understanding with the truths from every clime, to ‘invest’ our acquired knowledge in the best possible channel pleasing to our Lord; practice ‘thoughtfulness’ under all circumstances and ‘yield’ to Reality no matter from what horizon it dawns — thus may we become the cause of UNITY in the world of humanity.”

2. Story of the Stork, Fish and Prawn

At this juncture Mirza Ali Akbar joined us and asked what we were talking about. We told him.

“Let me tell you a story,” he said, “which illustrates this very point. Once upon a time there was a stork, a fish and a prawn. They became friends and planned to travel together. They said to each other that they would do everything in 'Unity'; but the stork wanted to start on the journey by way of the air, the fish through the watery path of the river, and the prawn by the track of a pond. The three formed a board of consultation to see which mode was the best for traveling together. They had several sessions, lasting for hours, but they could not determine upon any plan, each one insisting that his opinion was correct, and not willing to yield to the other. Finally they saw a little baby carriage not far away and decided to use it as a common vehicle for traveling. They came and hitched themselves to the carriage, confident that their differences were now brought to an end; but no sooner did they start than they began to assert their varied natures. The stork flew 'upward,' the fish went 'forward' and the prawn was pushing 'backward.' "

1. Ishkabad, Russia, an important center of the Bahai Movement.
2. Two Tablets for the Bahais of Ishkabad.

1. Ishkabad, Russia, an Important Center of the Bahais [sic] Movement

The city of Ishkabad is an important Bahai center wherein the first Mashrekul-Azkar is built. The Bahais are free to teach and pursue their religious principles without any molestation on the part of the Russian authorities. In that city the Bahais are quite numerous and are represented by all classes. During the last few days the Master has been entertaining a believer from that city by the name of Ahmad Aga and now he is going away, his life perfumed with Fragrances of the Love of God. Abdul Baha has revealed three Tablets for the believers in that city. He came this morning and after reading them aloud, handed them to Ahmad Aga to be taken to Ishkabad. Here are the translations of two of these Tablets:

2. Tablets to the Bahais of Ishkabad

“O YE BELIEVERS IN THE HEART AND SPIRIT OF ABDUL BAHÁ!

“It has been well-nigh three years since this Servant at the Threshold of Baha has been a wanderer over mountain and desert and a traveler upon plain and sea. One morning I was in this province and one night I spent in another. As the express train speeded over vast stretches of land and traversed long distances, — thus joining together the remotest parts, — I became associated with and the confident participator of every meeting and sang the praises of the Lord in each assembly. Day and night I was teaching and explaining and in public gatherings and important Congresses I upraised my voice. I imparted the Glad-tidings of the Sun of Reality and made an exposition of Divine Proofs and Arguments. I laid the foundation of the Teachings of God and elucidated the truth of the Merciful Effulgence.

“After enduring infinite hardships, traveling through and visiting many countries, diffusing the Fragrances of God and promoting His lordly instructions, I returned to the East. But the difficulties of this long voyage were so numerous, that toward the end, my body was attacked by a severe illness and I was at the point of breaking down. This is the reason why correspondence has been suspended for such a long time.

“Now, praise be to God, my constitution is, to a certain extent, reinforced and the illness removed, and therefore day and night I am engaged in answering letters. Not for a moment do I rest or seek comfort. Continually do I remember the friends and as far as possible, I am writing to them. Truly I say, Ishkabad is the city of Love. Each one of the friends of God is occupied with service and engaged in adoration. They are the friends and the companions of Abdul Baha.

“As regards the members of school committees, in reality they are serving with heart and soul and perform their duties with rejoicing. They put forward extraordinary exertions in organizing and systematizing the school and in the instruction of the pupils while all the other believers are assisting and cooperating with them. On this account, I am greatly pleased with the friends of that region. Day and night do I supplicate God in their behalf, beg lordly confirmations for them, and ask heavenly assistance: — so that that city may become the envy of all the cities of the world.

“O God! O God! This is a city wherein the Fragrances of Thy Holiness are spread, the delightful odors of the garden of Thy Mercifulness are diffused and from which the voices of glorification and thanksgiving, praises and commendations to the Lord of the Kingdom, are raised. For he [sic] has revealed Himself on Mount Sinai with a light of radiant effulgence wherefrom the regions are illumined. Glory be unto Him who hath caused the appearances of the Morn! Glory be unto Him who sendeth the winds! Glory be unto Him who resuscitates the spirits! Glory be unto Him who breathes into the bodies of the world the inspiration of Existence!

The next Tablet is the following:

“He is God!

“O YE BLESSED SOULS!

“The beloved pilgrim like unto an overflowing cup has a heart full of your praises. Continually this Servant expects that all the believers unloose their tongues in the commendation of the friends; nay rather, they may adore each other and sacrifice their wealth, comfort, life and spirit for the sake of one another.

“O ye friends! This Cycle is the Cycle of Bestowal and this period is the period of Mercy. All the seasons are the seasons of spring and all the periods are the periods of the Grace of the Almighty. The Breeze of Providence is wafting, the Fragrances of the rose-garden of the realities and significances are perfuming the nostrils and the melody of the Kingdom of Mercifulness has stirred into joy and happiness the heart and the soul! What a delightful age is this! What a heart-attracting century! But a thousand times alas! that the spiritually dead are not awakened by the blowing of the trumpet of Revelation, that the blind are deprived of the sight of the world-illuminating Orb while those afflicted with colds cannot inhale the odor of sanctity. Praise be to God that ye have opened your eyes, have won the ball from the arena of self-sacrifice, prostrated yourself before the Threshold of His Highness the Merciful, become the manifestors of the Favors of the Incomparable Beloved and at all times are advancing and progressing!

“Upon ye be Baha el Abha!

This morning the Master passed by our house, went into the garden and dictated many Tablets for the Eastern and Western believers. About eleven o'clock he returned and stayed a few minutes. The students were speaking together in English when he suddenly entered and laughed heartily over their speaking in a foreign tongue. Then he went to the Mosque, followed by Mirza Ali Akbar. Again in the afternoon he was in the garden revealing Tablets. Toward five o'clock we went to the meeting. Doctor Getsinger talked about the Master's address in the Jewish Synagogue of Washington.

RAMLEH, EGYPT, SEPTEMBER 27, 1913

1. Tablet in handwriting of Baha-Ullah. 2. Prayer for spiritual strength by Baha-Ullah. 3. Someone must arise to write the life history of Baha-Ullah. 4. Pilgrims arrive from India, Persia and Russia. 5. Abdul Baha urges the students to practice public speaking on all subjects.

1. Tablet in the Handwriting of Baha-Ullah

Have you ever seen the original writings of Baha-Ullah? Tablets written with His own blessed Hand? I had the privilege of seeing such a Tablet to-day. Just think to hold and read with your own eyes a Tablet written by Baha-Ullah's own hand! For many minutes I looked at the writing. The Tablet belongs to Haji Niaz. He went to Cairo yesterday morning and returned in the evening bringing it with him.

When years ago he was in the presence of Baha-Ullah, he requested Him to reveal for him something. The Blessed Perfection took pen and paper and wrote the following prayer.

2. Prayer for Spiritual Strength by Baha-Ullah

“He is the Knowing, the Wise!

“O God! O God! I beg of Thee by Thy Radiant, Collective Name, to change the humiliation of Thy Chosen Ones into Thy Glory; their weakness into Thy Strength; their impotence into Thy Omnipotence; their poverty into Thy Wealth and their fear into Thy Assurance.

“O Lord! Illumine their hearts by the Light of Thy Knowledge!

“O Lord! Behold Thou these thirsty ones journeying toward the River of Thy Bestowal and the Ocean of Thy Generosity. Verily Thou art the Powerful, the Mighty, the Benevolent.”

3. Someone Must Arise to Write the Life History of Baha-Ullah

What would one not give to receive such a prayer from the Hand of Baha-Ullah. Truly this was a great bestowal. These old men who have seen Baha-Ullah many times are to my eyes very wonderful. I always look upon them with a peculiar reverence and respect. If someone had the time just to write down their stories, they would make, I am sure, most interesting reading. One of the most dramatic events connected with this Movement is the ascension of Baha-Ullah. Haji Niaz was living in Acca that time and for six months after the ascension. He has witnessed everything, and having once heard his story, I will some day reduce it to writing; I am now waiting to hear of it from other eye-witnesses, and once I have all my material together, I hope to begin the story in a consecutive manner. Up to this time no adequate history of the life of Baha-Ullah has been compiled.

All that we have are fragments, or a mere outline. How I long for a man endowed with spiritual insight, divine faith, historical imagination and intellectual perspicacity to arise, and with patience and perseverance, to travel through the East, collecting the proper material, and then writing a connected history of the life of Baha-Ullah! Such a man will confer an eternal benefit upon mankind. It is a hundred times easier to undertake a work like this at the present time, than in the coming ages! Not only are there many people living who have seen Baha-Ullah and whose stories must be preserved, but we have amongst us Abdul Baha, who has lived and traveled with His Father in all His sufferings and wanderings and exile and imprisonment.

4. Pilgrims Arrive from India, Persia and Russia

Yesterday and to-day many pilgrims have arrived; four men, two women and three children, all Zoroastrian Bahais; from the Persian Gulf, a prominent ex-governor; from Russia, an ardent believer and from Persia an enthusiastic youth. Those who desire to see a religious Congress must come and stay with Abdul Baha, and observe how these men and women of various types and faiths appear from all parts of the world to receive heavenly knowledge from his Bounteous Table, and to then return to their respective homes, inspired with the celestial Spirit. A number of us went last night to the station to welcome our Zoroastrian brothers and sisters. Their faces were aglow with the fire of the Love of God. They were great, big-hearted men, with that stamp of nobility and dignity in their faces that does not wear off. How glad were they when they heard that the American Bahais would go to India to spread the Glorious Message!

“We long to see them,” they said in a chorus, “we are ready to receive them and to sacrifice our lives for them. How wonderful! How wonderful! that God has given us the mighty privilege of witnessing His miraculous works. Are they not our real brothers and sisters? All the believers in India are expecting their arrival and will cooperate with them to the extent of their capacity to spread the message of light and truth.”

5. Abdul Baha Urges the Students to Practice Public Speaking on All Subjects

In the morning Abdul Baha spoke in detail with the students about public speaking, and emphasized the fact that they must practice at all times, for, as the future teachers of the Cause, it is essential to develop this God-given faculty. They must choose various topics, physical and spiritual, and then speak amongst themselves and thus employ their imaginations.

RAMLEH, EGYPT, SEPTEMBER 28, 1913

1. Farewell words to the students. 2. “I desire that thou mayst be filled with Baha-Ullah.” 3. Mrs. Stannard an earnest Bahai. 4. An address delivered to the students.

1. Farewell Words to the Students

The Master received the students this morning. They are going to leave to-morrow for Beirut to be there before the opening of the College on October 5th. He reminded them of the former Glory of Persia and of her present decadence, and encouraged them to continue with their studies; so that the confirmations of God might ever be with them, and wished for them to be as radiant stars on the horizon of Baha. Afterward the Zoroastrian believers were ushered into His presence. They were so happy and glad because they have reached the destination of their long journey.

2. I Desire that Thou Mayst be Filled with Baha-Ullah.

In the course of His conversation with Mrs. Fraser, the Master told her that he desired that she might be filled with Baha-Ullah. She must concentrate all her ideas and thoughts around the promotion of the Word of God. Just as the cup is filled with wine, so her heart must be overflowing with the Love of the Blessed Perfection. Let her look at him. How from early morning till late in the evening he is engaged in the service of the Cause. He devotes all his time to Baha-Ullah. As she is going to India, let her one thought be Baha-Ullah. He will help her. Whenever he sends someone to serve the Cause, he prays in his behalf and God will assist him. Let her rest assured that he will be with her and she will be enabled to render great services. Let her heart be at ease and have no fear.

3. Mrs. Stannard an Earnest Bahai

In the afternoon the Master was again in the garden dictating Tablets to Mirza Moneer. Mrs. Stannard was also permitted to be present. The Master is turning His attention to the believers of the Orient, and the Secretaries are kept busy copying His innumerable Tablets. Now and then a number of Tablets are revealed for the West, but the East is getting the lion's share. Before sunset, as I was walking outside of the house, I saw the Master coming out of the rose-garden followed by a number of believers, Mrs. Stannard and a newspaper correspondent. With the latter, the Master walked away, and I joined Mrs. Stannard and walked toward the beach. For nearly an hour we sat on the sand, watching the sea, and speaking about the Cause, and its future progress. She is a wonderful Bahai and the Master always praises her sincerity, her broad vision and her unflinching energy in many directions.

This being the last night, the students and resident Bahais had a farewell meeting, and addresses were delivered both in Persian and English. Each one was followed by a Bahai song. We were singing and talking until late in the evening.

4. An Address Delivered to the Students

“My dear Bahai Brothers! During the last few days, through the kindness of Abdul Baha we have been brought together. We have lived under one roof, sat around one table and associated together in the spirit of love and unity. I cannot express to you adequately how much I was impressed by your earnestness and true friendship. The memory of these days as well as of the days spent with your companions who constituted the first party, will ever live in my mind. We cannot gainsay one thing and that is, that the Fire of the Love of Baha-Ullah is burning in the heart of each one of you. God through His Grace has chosen you from amongst the people of Persia and has crowned your heads with the diadem of Faith! This is the highest privilege in the kingdom of Abha! Undoubtedly you must have been worth of the reception of this spiritual Gift. In this day only those who are pure in heart are enrolled in the invincible ranks of the army of God. By this you can easily see that each one of you is a soldier and must be a courageous one, ready at any instant to give up his life for the sake of the Cause. Baha-Ullah is your Commander-in-chief, and from the invisible world he is continually reinforcing you with the powers of the Holy Spirit. Your artillery is the principles of the Cause, your cannon the love of God, your rifles the divine teachings and your defenders the angels of the Supreme Concourse. In your hearts is the love of humanity, on your lips is the word of "Ya Baha-El-Abha," in your hands is the sword of light. Before you there is no defeat, behind you there are glorious victories, and upon all sides you are surrounded by the Confirmations of God. Abdul Baha has instructed you and has inspired your hearts with the mysteries of self-sacrifice. He is looking toward you with wistful tenderness, expecting that each one will become a great teacher in the Cause. From a physical standpoint you are the citizens of Persia, but from a spiritual standpoint, you are the citizens of the kingdom of Abha which means the citizens of the world. Consequently, although Persia has a claim on you, the world has a greater claim.

"You are all aware of the fact that through the Revelation of His Holiness Baha-Ullah a new spirit of brotherhood is abroad, leavening all the degrees of society and enlarging the horizon of the human intellect. Naturally, then, every Bahai is called upon to contribute his share to this general awakening and once you are out of the campus of your Alma Mater, you will be called upon to gird up the loins of endeavor and to spread among the present day religions and nations, that spirit of tolerance and freedom from prejudices which is so much needed.

"I can never forget the day in Washington when Abdul Baha called on the Ambassador of Turkey. He was sitting near the window watching the men and women in the street. At the time a young negro as black as coal, passed by. 'Did you see that young negro?' He asked. 'Yes' I answered. 'I declare by Baha-Ullah that I wish him to become as radiant as the shining sun.’ This example will show you how Abdul Baha is anxious, and how he is working day and night — so that all mankind may advance daily along the degrees of spiritual and intellectual activities, ever marching upward.

“We must polish the mirrors of our hearts, we must make ourselves more receptive for the appearance of the hidden virtues of the world of humanity, otherwise, we will not be confirmed in the accomplishment of universal services.

“In his recent addresses and Tablets, Abdul Baha has repeatedly emphasized the principle of teaching the Cause, of awakening those who are asleep, of bestowing sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf and life to the dead! To-day, this is the greatest Service in the Cause of God. This is of paramount importance and must not be overlooked. In other parts of the world, East and West, North and South, the friends of God are doing their best to spread the Glad-tidings of the Kingdom. I know full well that for the present teaching in Syria, Turkey and Egypt is not allowed, but you can do one thing, and that is to prepare yourselves for the time to come. When a nation determines to go to war, the commissary department will make definite plans, fill the arsenals with powder and cartridges and keep the magazines well supplied with food. Therefore you must be always ready for war, the kind of war that destroys ignorance, wipes away spiritual prejudices and shatters the forces of darkness. Let us acquire knowledge, more knowledge and yet more knowledge; for that which decreases ignorance and increases wisdom is acceptable in the sight of the Lord!

“Personally I have done little in the Cause, but during my stay in America I have learned one thing and that is, that the more one learns the greater is his ignorance. However, in this Supreme Dispensation, Baha-Ullah has promised us that, as we arise to serve the Cause, spiritual Confirmations will come to our assistance and from all sides the doors of God’s Graces will be opened before our eyes. Consequently, our trust is in the Lord of Hosts. We must at all times turn our hearts toward the Kingdom of Abha and rest assured that all our ideals will be realized as long as our aim is to promulgate the Cause and to scatter the teachings abroad.

“After the lapse of a few hours, you will return to college scenes and life which no doubt you cherish and love, but a few of us will yet stay here, near Abdul Baha to learn more of the lessons of selflessness, renunciation, holy enthusiasm, firmness and severance from all else save God.

“You are laden not only with the jewels of His words but your memory will be refreshed by the wafting of the Breeze of his presence. We all enjoyed your association, were stirred into cheerfulness by your ringing Bahai songs and will ever remember these happy days. May the stars of your highest hopes dawn from the Eastern horizon! May you become true servants of the world of humanity! May you ever strive to serve the Cause of Universal Peace! May you be the founders of the palace of spiritual brotherhood! May you with one accord raise the melodious anthem of the kingdom of peace! May you unfurl the banner of human solidarity and invite all mankind to enter into the shade of the Tabernacle of eternal conciliation, Union and fraternity!"

1. The Persian Bahais are Anxious to Know All About the Western Bahais

Our ten students, after hearing a few farewell words from Abdul Baha, departed for Syria, and two Kurdish theological students of the University of Al-Azhar who were visiting him returned to Cairo. Tomorrow our ex-governor from the Persian Gulf will depart for Teheran with another Bahai via Russia. It has been a source of great joy to come in contact with these men of various countries and climes, who bring to us the good news of the progress of the Cause. They are all eager to hear of the promotion of the Bahai Movement in America. What are the believers doing? Are they happy now that the Master has been in their midst? Are they carrying on the great work he has started? Are they teaching new souls? Are the Western people susceptible to spiritual emotions? Are the friends enkindled with the fire of the Love of God? Are they going to assist us in bringing about the Cause of Human brotherhood? Is the light of reality shining in their hearts? Do they really think and believe that we are their spiritual brothers and sisters? These are the questions they ask me one after another, so tender in their feelings, so true in the expression of their innermost thoughts, so beautiful in their attitude, so wonderful in their faith!

“Yes,” one of them told me, “I have heard that the American Bahais are spreading the Cause very strenuously, and every night, before going to bed I pray for them from the depth of my heart. I beg of God to reinforce them with the angels of the kingdom and to surround them with universal Confirmations.”

2. “Mahmal” or the Holy Carpet

To-day “Mahmal” or the Holy Carpet was taken from Alexandria to be carried to Mecca. It arrived from Cairo and was paraded through the streets in a long procession, before it reached the steamer. As the story of “Mahmal” and its significance in the Mohammedan world is very important, I will later devote a few pages to its narration, so that our Western brothers and sisters may have a clear conception in regard to it.

3. Abdul Baha Speaks to the Bahai Students before Their Departure for College

In his farewell talk to the students, this morning at his own house, the Master praised God that they had come. For many days they have been here and with perfect joy and fragrance they associated together. These days passed in complete happiness. It is the hope that through the favors of the Blessed Perfection, they may finish their studies in the college of Beirut. Let them rest assured that they are confirmed. Many people are like unto sheep without a shepherd. They have no protector and no defender. But the students are the sheep and the Blessed Perfection is their Shepherd. He is kind to His flock. The majority of men are in great loss, but theirs is the spiritual profit. There are many who are retrograding, but they are progressing. Many trees are withered, but they are the young plants of the orchard of Abha and daily they are growing in freshness and delicacy. Others are like unto the fallen stars, but they are rising with great brilliancy from the horizon of Reality.

Then he spoke about the Mahmal, and told them to go and see it before they departed for Beirut. Their steamer sailed at 4 o'clock P.M.

4. Mirza Jalal and Wife Arrive from London

The Master and his family were surprised and delighted to welcome, unexpectedly, Mirza Jalal and his wife. I have just heard this news. To-morrow I will see him, and no doubt he will tell us of his experiences after our departure from Paris. Sometime ago I had a letter from London telling me that they were visiting some believers there.

5. All the Pilgrims Gone and the House Seems Deserted

It is now late and I am writing these few words. I look all around the room and there is no trace of last night's party of students. I do not hear their songs. They are all gone. I may meet them again or I may not. Everything is in the hands of a higher Power. He brings us together and then separates us, but an indelible impression is left on the page of memory which will last during a lifetime. After all, we are travelers in this world. We stay a few days in this Caravanseraï, but the home of our spirits is the world of light.

1. The Procession of Mahmal in Alexandria

Yesterday the Beloved ordered a number of us to go to Alexandria and see the gorgeous procession, carrying the Mahmal to Mecca. When we arrived, the main avenues through which the Mahmal was going to pass were thronged with thousands of Arabs — men and women and children, dressed in all the picturesque colors of the East. Egyptian soldiers and mounted guards kept the crowd in order. Although we could rent chairs in the front row by paying the royal sum of “two cents and a half,” we preferred to mix with the holiday makers.... We had to wait two hours in the sun before the head of the procession appeared. It is popularly believed that whosoever touches the Mahmal, God's blessings will descend upon him and his family. For this reason, there is always the fear that the crowd, in a burst of religious zeal, will gather around the Mahmal and in the confusion, trample many people under their feet.

Therefore the Government had ordered several regiments of soldiers to stand long the sidewalks, their rifles pointed at the crown, who, enthused at the sight of the Mahmal, were singing Pilgrims' songs. The other day I was reading a book on the customs and manners of modern Egyptians. In one chapter the author gives an interesting account of this historic event and here I will quote a few extracts bearing on the subject.

2. Mahmal a Great Annual Event

“One of the greatest events of the year in Egypt is the starting of the Holy Carpet for Mecca. As regularly as the month of fasting comes to a joyful end in the Bairam Feast, the populace begin to look forward to the festival of the Mahmal, as not only marking the time of the setting off of the pilgrims to the Holy City, but as an event of great moment to all men religiously inclined, especially to the poor who have few hopes of making the journey themselves.

“A surprising fact, if one did not know the East, when one learns that the cost of the Pilgrimage Caravan of the Egyptian Mahmal is no less than £250,000 a year, mostly born by the State, including the gifts sent to Arabia with it. My first interest was whetted by the permission given to visit the place where the Holy Carpet is woven every year and where the Mahmal and the beautiful door coverings and other sacred decorations are embroidered. ‘This is a government place,’ the boy told me at the gate with courteous welcome, ‘but it is kept under separate rule, and is not accessible as other government offices are.’ I turned to listen to the melodious voice of a Sheik reading the Koran in a balcony overlooking the courtyard. ‘Ours is the only place where under the government’s supervision the Holy Koran is read. This place is as sacred as a Mosque during all the time of the year.’ We were taken at once to a long room to see the spinning looms, where the raw yellow silk is prepared before being dyed. Next we saw the actual weaving of the Carpet — how it ever came by such a name cannot be imagined when one has seen it. In reality, of course, it is the outer cover of the Kaaba, and the name ‘Carpet’ is never applied to it by any but the Europeans, who persist in so naming it; and what is curious, who think at the same time, that the Mahmal, which is a camel palanquin, really goes to Mecca with a carpet inside it, and brings it back to Cairo. Tourists who think they are seeing the Holy Carpet’s return see only the Mahmal, coming back, as it went, quite empty.

3. Koran Verses Woven in Mahmal

“It would be better to speak of holy ‘Curtains’ of which there are eight used in the complete covering of the Kaaba... The curtains are black, and the art of making them consists of weaving the Koran texts into the material, also in black, with an effect like that of damask, the lettering, which is large, being in the decorative Arabic. The watered-silk effect of the lettering is most striking, and in certain lights, when the cover is hung upon the Kaaba, it can be read at a considerable distance....

“It was extremely interesting to be able to see and handle the famous band which encircles the Kaaba. This magnificent belt is about two and a half feet deep. The following from the Koran, called the throne verse is heavily embroidered on it in gold: “God! There is no God but He; the Living, the Eternal; nor slumber seizeth Him nor sleep; His whatsoever is in the heavens, and whatsoever is upon the earth.... His Throne reacheth over the Heavens and the Earth, and the upholding of both burdeneth Him not and He is the High, the Great.’

“That the carrying of all these sacred objects connected with the Carpet to Arabia is in itself a considerable undertaking, was brought home to us by seeing the tents and the waterskins and other requirements for the long journey.... We now went into the courtyard, and the two very fine camels — in a way held sacred too — which are kept here solely for the purpose of conveying the

Mahmal to Mecca, were brought out for us. They are of great size and of the cream color which distinguishes the finer breeds. These animals live a secluded but luxurious life within these precincts. By the credulous populace all sorts of miraculous signs mark them out in the first instance for selection of their sacred task.... A celebration took in the building under the citadel on the night before the Kaaba hangings and the Mahmal start for Mecca. There the Mahmal was shown and, more interesting still, there was set up an exact model of the Kaaba, with all the curtains hung as they appear in the Holy City.

4. Mahmal or Carpet Is a Sacred Object

“There is no religious celebration in Cairo more impressive and beautiful than the festival, held on the eve of the setting of the Mahmal’s Pilgrimage to Mecca. There are other great public occasions, when the Oriental splendor of illumination breaks out, to the thrill of the thronging populace and the out-of-door excitement of the fair are linked with the claims of pious significance; but this official fête in the Pavilions at the foot of the citadel combines in equal proportions a sense of sacred office with that of subdued entertainment, a feeling of religious awe being curiously mingled with that of rejoicing....

“The real center which drew every Moslem man and child was the Mahmal, now to be seen in public for the first time since its return from last year’s pilgrimage. Round the Mahmal men crowded; they stroked a fringe of it, always with the right hand and then to imbibe the blessing immediately stroked their faces while they muttered a prayer. Little children were held up that they might repeat the parents’ act. As we stood near the

Mahmal we could see seated on the floor at a short distance, in a double row, about twenty-four men facing each other, chanting praise of the prophet and reciting traditions about him. At a certain point they came to an end of chanting; all hands went up to the breast, upraised, as a sign of silent petition.... Occasionally there came a man who prayed with more than usual intentness and seemed as if he could not tear himself away from the Mahmal and others less devout would take his place, content perhaps with a touch.

5. People from All Over Egypt Come to Visit and Touch the Mahmal

“And why is this Mahmal, which in its material aspect is just a camel palanquin, so intensely revered? To begin its history at the end, there is no doubt that the reason for this deep reverence is that the Mahmal goes to Mecca every year exactly as a pilgrim goes, visits every spot that the devout pilgrim visits....

“I can never forget a scene near the Mahmal at Abbassieh, where the Pilgrimage is eventually organized for its actual start to Mecca. A number of poor women, whose accent betrayed that their origin was that of Upper Egypt, were sitting in a close group on the ground as near to the Mahmal as possible, singing very sweetly a song of the Pilgrimage. The Lord had denied them the privilege of praying in Mecca, but they were not left altogether desolate, for their eyes were rejoiced by seeing the blessed Mahmal.

6. How Mahmal Was Originated

El-Dorr, to serve for the pilgrimage which she intended to make. The Queen’s name signifies ‘a tree hung with jewels’ and the Mahmal is sometimes called by this name. In the following year she sent the empty palanquin, as a symbol of Egypt, and in memory of her own pilgrimage, and from this the annual custom grew up, to be followed by other countries, who take the occasion, as Egypt does, to send with their Mahmal the national tribute of money and food to the Holy City. The Court historian told me that he thought that the custom of sending a state symbol was older than the Queen's Mahmal, a special Camel termed the Mahmal, being sent with presents to Holy Kaaba, in pre-Islamic days. The prophet himself sent such a Mahmal from Medina to Mecca with presents.

7. Many Mahmals Mentioned in History

“Many Mahmals are mentioned in history — from Mesopotamia, from Yaman, from India.... The old rulers so exaggerated the importance and sacredness of the Mahmal, that they ordered every functionary through whose locality it passed, to kiss the foot of the Camel bearing it until Sultan Kakmak prohibited what had become a custom in the 15th century....

“When the Carpet arrives at Mecca it is handed to Sheik Sheiby in the presence of the chief Ulemas and notables, and kept by him till the day of sacrifice, when it is hung upon the Kaaba. None of these holy drapings come back to Egypt, but when they have fulfilled their purpose they become the property of the Sherif of Mecca, being in turn sold to pilgrims in special shops near the Kaaba. Rich people buy the beautiful door covers and portions of the Kaaba band. The poor are contented with a shred of the black coverings. ...

“The making of a cover for the Kaaba goes back to the time of ignorance before Mohammad — the first being made of skin, and later ones of cloth, and all the tribes of Arabia took a share in paying for it.”

8. The Hardships of Baha-Ullah to Become the Cause of the Awakening of the People

For the last few days Abdul Baha often spoke about Mahmal and how people forget the spirit and cling to the letter; that while the fountain of the salubrious water was flowing, they were running after brakish [sic] water. This morning when the Zoroastrian believers stood in his presence, he asked them, what did they see yesterday? And then gave a detailed talk on the Mahmal and its significance.

In the afternoon before sunset, he called at Mirza Abul Fadl, and a number of friends, both Arabs and Persians were present. He talked on the severe trials and vicissitudes of Baha-Ullah, when He was exiled from Teheran to Bagdad and the hardships the party accompanying Him, had to go through. He hoped the results of those hardships would be the illumination of the world of humanity and the emancipation of men from the defects of the animal nature.

1. What It Means to be with Abdul Baha

To be with Abdul Baha, to taste the sweetness of his love, to drink the elixir of his affection, and to be intoxicated with the wine of his tenderness — is to be immersed in an ocean of spiritual lights; for is he not the essence of sweetness, the rose-garden of love, the source of affection, and the dawning-place of truth?

From the unattainable attitude and the unsearchable height of the heart, hidden beyond the mountains of his spiritual world, flow rivers of divine grace, broad and noble. And with majestic beauty and mystic light — these rivers ran through the arid land of the souls of humanity, causing miraculous transformations. Where formerly were thorns and briars, now there are hyacinths and violets; where before were wild jungles, now there are cultivated orchards; where in times gone by there was sterility, now there is fertility.

Like unto the rain, the Words fall from the heaven of his mind, creating thousands of rills and streamlets, and these in turn, converging toward one center and impelled by a common interest, make a mighty river, on the banks of which a heavenly civilization is developing. This celestial river flows through many deserts, always with the same effect of changing them into fragrant gardens, wherein the flowers of friendship and mutual helpfulness blossom, perfuming the nostrils of all those who are far and near.

These days in Ramleh and with Abdul Baha! Ah, me! How divinely spiritual! These are days touched with Promethean fire; — days taken out of the calendar of heaven; days flooded with the rays of the Sun of Reality; days blessed by the tender and loving presence of our Beloved and made significant and ever memorable by the revelation of holy tablets for the friends of the East and the West!

Daily he breathes into the half conscious body of the world the Breath of the Holy Spirits: — reinforcing the visitors with heavenly Confirmation, vivifying them with the principles of righteousness. He receives the devotees of all religions; shoulders the burdens of all his people and welcomes the adherents of every sect with a beatific smile. In his presence all are welcome. The sun of his Love pours upon all humanity, illumines the chambers of every heart and ennobles the ambition of every soul. He is not the respecter of persons but the lover of quality. If a man is a beggar but has a pure heart, he loves him more than a king in royal robes, surrounded by courtiers.

2. The Students Consist of a Large Delegation

As there is quite a large delegation of students and as they are to be the honored guests of the Master, he decided to divide them into two parties. The first party have come and gone. They stayed about ten days, received the benedictions of the Beloved, listened to his daily words and illumined their eyes by beholding his countenance. Then with songs of praise on their lips and paeans of thanksgiving in their hearts, they left for Haifa, that they might be ready to enter the College.

The second party has just arrived and will no doubt stay as many days as the Master wishes them to be here. The boys are from 12 to 25 years old. They live together, and the bond of Bahai love and good fellowship is strong and unbreakable between them. Unquestionably, they will not only form an invulnerable force for liberalism in Persia, but they will become the invincible army of the kingdom of Abha, and with the sword of love put to rout the forces of darkness and banish the ghosts of ignorance. They have consecrated their lives to the service of the Cause and once their zeal and enthusiasm shake hand with knowledge and experience, they will carry the flag of “Ya Baha-El-Abha” to the furthest corners of the earth. They have set their ambition very high and have made up their minds to attain to it. What would be the effect of the accumulated result of science and experience, if they were not devoted to the propagation of the Cause of Abha, which is the Cause of universal Peace, international brotherhood, and spiritual civilization?

3. The Students Sing Mrs. Shahnaz Waite's Anthems

Every one of the students studies and speaks English; they sing Bahai songs and the anthems of Mrs. Waite, which are translated into Persian verses by two of the great Bahai poets resident in Teheran. These anthems they sing with great feeling; and all over the East, the poems of our “American nightingale,” as the believers affectionately call Mrs. Waite in their poetic language, are sung by young men and women. She is loved and honored, because she is the poetic voice of the far West, crying in the wilderness of cold skepticism and summoning the people to the banquet of Bahai Peace and Love. How happy she would be — how grateful she would become, how her eyes would be filled with tears of joy if she could listen for one moment to the melodious voices of these Eastern brothers, singing her songs with true understanding and sympathy!

4. Happiness and Tranquility of Heart

In order to bring my remarks to an end, I will share with you the outline of two talks of Abdul Baha given to these students.

On one occasion, he stated that they are welcome to Ramleh. Are they happy? If they are not happy, then, in this wide world, who could claim happiness? Happiness is the most natural possession and immanent attribute of every Bahai. Praise be to God that they are free from every tie, are engaged in the study of spiritual and physical sciences and are beneath the protection of Baha-Ullah. God is with them, for they are not holding any thought which leads to intemperance and temptation.

The heavy-burdened people are afflicted with a hundred thousand sorrows and griefs and are at all times influenced and made unhappy by the changing conditions of life. In this world the greatest gift of God is the tranquility of the heart, especially when such a heart becomes the abiding place of the Love of God. This is the highest attainment in the world of creation!

But if, on the other hand, a man has all the wealth, comfort and luxuries of life, and does not possess tranquility of heart, all these things will become conducive of anxiety and nervous breakdown. When the tree is firmly rooted in the ground and the trunk well established in the earth, no matter how much the hurricane rages, the furious winds blow and the rushing rains fall, this will only add to the firmness and verdancy of the tree, and it will loom up toward the heavens with greater confidence and assurance. But if its root is not firm, even though the sun pours down, the winds blow, the rains descend and the breezes waft — there will be no foliage, no branch, no blossom and no fruit.

Now praise be to God, that the hearts of the believers are tranquil and assured in the Favors and bounties of the Blessed Perfection. What bestowal is greater than this? No matter what affliction may befall upon us, the heart is in the utmost tranquility, serene and full of rejoicing. We can withstand all kinds of afflictions and resist all manner of persecutions with imperturbable courage and faith. Those souls who are under the shade of the Cause of God, if they are not shaken and agitated, will advance through the infinite degrees of perfection. There is a vast difference between the bird which is already imprisoned in the cage, and the bird which after being set at liberty, is caught again in the net through its own negligence.

5. Lasting Enjoyment Is for the Moral Man

In speaking to the students on another occasion, He stated, that, when the heart is confident, man knows that all is well. At one time in Acca, thirteen Bahais lived in one room, but they radiated peace, joy and love.

Praise be to God, that they have come to Ramleh and stayed with him for nine days. They associated with one another and became His intimates. Their presence gave him much happiness. Likewise, they have spent many memorable days on Mount Carmel and in the vicinity of the Tombs of Baha-Ullah and the Blessed Bab. Now they are going to return, but let them rest assured that these experiences have been permeated with ideal results and the invisible Confirmation shall ever descend upon them.

It is his hope that they will study with persistence and perseverance. He is well satisfied with their conduct in the College of Beirut. Truly they have borne themselves with urbanity and dignity. May they ever become better, sweeter, more perfect and more accomplished! In this path lies life's enjoyment. The success and pleasure of this physical life lies in uprightness! What a difference exists between those souls who live in accord with the good-pleasure of the Lord and those who are guided by their own thoughts and self-interests! The former are always attracted, always enkindled, always immersed in the sea of God's Favors, always thinking of the well-being of humanity, always joyful and humble!

When you reflect carefully, you will observe that real and lasting contentment is in the possession of the moral man. Some may imagine that because they frequent theatres, accumulate wealth, or attend balls, they are always enjoying life; whereas, in reality, these things often scatter thoughts, confuse the minds and dissipate the faculties. The effect of these amusements is like the effect of the wine upon the body — it exhilarates at first, but its after effect leaves one weak and the mental faculties exhausted. But the man who is chaste and moral receives his strength from the hidden spring of the universe; he is stirred continually by the Divine Glad-tidings; he is spiritual and godlike.

Praise be to God that their life is directed by ethical laws and molded by moral principles. He hopes that day by day their dignity and composure may increase; that they may strive with greater exertion in their studies; that the spring of their beatitude and happiness may gush forth unfaillingly. The assistance of Baha-Ullah is with them and they shall precede all other students in their works.

6. The Meaning of Faith

Faith does not mean acknowledgement and mere confession. Faith means that one's conduct and behavior, one's character and life be in accord with the divine teachings. This is the quintessence of Faith. The greatest bestowal of the world of existence is a tranquil heart, and it is impossible to obtain a tranquil heart save through the good-pleasure of the Lord: i.e., man should so adorn the temple of his being with lofty attributes and philanthropic deeds as to be pleasing at the Threshold of the Almighty. There is no other path! Consider the condition of kings, ministers, captains of industry and the leaders of mankind! Looking at them from a superficial standpoint, you would think their hearts to be in the utmost composure, joy and peace, but if you reflect carefully, you will observe, that they live in great agitation, surrounded with haunting fears and griefs. They do not enjoy one moment of ease and rest!

7. The Basic Principle of the Good-Pleasure of God

The point is this: let all their thoughts, their ideals, and aims revolve day and night around one common object, and that is: — to live in accord with the good-pleasure of the Lord. Then all the doors of felicity will be opened before their faces, they will be successful in all their undertakings and will become confirmed in all their accomplishments. The basic principle is the good-pleasure of God and the good-pleasure of God is obtained through the tranquility of the heart and the tranquility of the heart is obtained by living in accord with the divine teachings and exhortations.

When a person attains to this station, he is contented and peaceful. Then he will become prosperous in all affairs. This station is joy succeeded by joy, confidence after confidence, paradise after paradise. Thus we read in the blessed Koran: — O thou assured soul! Turn to thy Lord, confident and well-satisfied. If thou dost associate with my true servants, it is as though thou hast entered paradise. Having attained to this exalted station, man lives in paradise, although walking upon the earth; he lives in paradise when he departs from this world; his heart is ever in paradise; his spirit is in paradise; and he is encircled by the joys of paradise!

8. The Successful Student

Consider the condition of a student who attends school for five years and applies himself to a life of study. If at the time of examination he is not successful, he will become extremely despondent. He is living in a hell of despondency. But if, on the other hand, he passes examination with success, he is honored and beloved on all sides; receives his degree with pride and achieves great distinction in the world of humanity. In other words, he is living in a Paradise of fulfillment.

The students must, therefore, strive so that they may become thoroughly grounded in science and arts. Let them ever be thoughtful, supplicating and entreating before God. Then when they are attending their classes, heavenly confirmations will uninterruptedly descend upon them.

The foundation of life is morality. They must exert themselves to improve continually the moral side of their nature. If the morals of man are merciful, although he may not be a great scholar, yet will his character be loving; but if his morals are corrupt, even though he be a master of sciences, he will be a harmful agency in the body politic. Instead of becoming the cause of illumination of the world of humanity, he will become conducive to its darkness. Instead of helping the Cause of general construction, he will materially further the ends of destruction. Instead of adding to his energy for the cause of progress, he will enlist himself on the side of the cause of decline. On the other hand, if his character is merciful and he is also well grounded in sciences and arts — then, he will be light upon light.

9. Light and Knowledge

Here the Beloved paused for a few moments, and then gave a wonderfully illuminative interpretation of a verse in the Koran, which is known as the “verse of Light.” In phrase after phrase, He elucidated the Koranic words in the most comprehensive manner under the significance of knowledge. He closed his remarks with the statement that, it is evident that light is knowledge. If the light is shining in a black and sooty lamp, it will not shed any radiance; but if the light abides in a transparent glass — in other words, if knowledge abides in a clear heart, imbued with merciful morality, characterized with faith, assurance and holiness, enkindled with the fire of the love of God and attracted by the Fragrances of God, such a heart will become a center for the outpouring of divine Bestowals and this will be light upon light!

10. Letter to the Students from the President of College

I may quote herein a letter written to the Persian students by President Howard S. Bliss of the Beirut College. The letter is written on Board S.S. Royal Mail Steamship Pannonia and mailed from New York, dated April 14, 1913: —

“TO THE PERSIAN STUDENTS:

“DEAR FRIENDS:

“Before landing in New York, which we hope to do to-morrow, I wish to send you a special word of greeting and thanks for your very kind letter of farewell. I appreciate your thoughtful kindness very deeply and it has been a great pleasure to re-read your letter. We have had, a long but pleasant journey. We are now eager to see land and to receive word from loved ones in Syria. Of course this includes the College and all the students. I hope that the Persian students will have a prosperous ending to their years and all may be planning to return. I hope also that you may have addition to your numbers and that the good record that you have had during the past may be continued. I always look forward to returning to the campus which we love so ardently. My love goes to each one of you.

Your president

(Signed) "Howard S. Bliss."

Thus the East and the West join hands of communion! And these students, because they are acquiring material and spiritual sciences will be the greatest links of unity between America and Persia.

May they succeed as they have already succeeded in all their undertakings!

11. The Bahai Cause as Interpreted by Abdul Baha

The Bahai Cause as lived and interpreted by Abdul Baha is a clarion call for the unification of the people of the Orient and the Occident. It is a light to lead the storm-tossed travelers to the haven of peace and brotherhood. Millions of people all over the world are praying for the coming of the day when truth will reign and the clouds of prejudices will be dispelled from men's consciousness.

We as the followers of Abdul Baha are able to inspire these men and women with words of encouragement and examples of unselfish service. Let us unfurl the flag of the religion of God and gather in its shade all those who desire to enlist their names in the invincible army of the kingdom of Abha. Our supreme Commander is Baha-Ullah; our General is Abdul Baha; our rule is the Word of God; our guide is the power of the Holy Spirit; our aim is to establish upon the earth the dominion of heaven; our hope is to defeat the soldiers of ignorance and fanaticism; our resolution is to make this world the paradise of the Almighty and our purpose is to gain victory for the forces of Justice, Truth and Liberty.

We as Bahais have no other ambition, no other desire and no other plan. Let us fill the hearts with gladness; illumine the souls with the light of the Sun of Reality; refresh the minds with the breezes of the garden of universal Ideals and sing the thrilling anthem of the Union of the inhabitants of the East and of the West, of the North and of the South!

Place—The Earth

Time—Eternity

THE curtain of Night is hung over the Earth. Impenetrable darkness has taken possession of every object, animate and inanimate. Now and then streaks of lightning bring the scene and the actors into the visible—streaks of lightning in the timeless realm of Eternity.

A far-flung flash and we behold the river Nile, stretched between banks of glossy verdure, moving slowly toward the sea. There is the Sphinx crouched in contemplation; there is the awesome Valley of the Kings, prepared to receive the bodies of the Pharoës and to secrete them during countless ages. Cities well populated; men and women pursuing their varied occupations; pleasure boats darting hither and there; music, movement, color. It is more than five thousand years ago.

Presently our attention is attracted to the court of a temple. A youth, strong and straight is standing in a group of priests. His name is Amon Ra. It is the problem of immortality that is under discussion, and the arguments are heated and conflicting. The youth listens perplexed, uncertain, and then withdraws into the temple, where he sinks upon his knees at the foot of a great column. He lifts his arms, he lifts his face, his whole being transmuted into the Supreme Question; and then, sharp as a sword, a Ray strikes him and he falls upon the ground. Then in that radiant light, Naseem, broad winged Messenger of the Most High descends—whispering in his ear the Mystic Word; and Amon Ra springs to his feet radiant, issues from the temple, and goes forth teaching, that which he knows. Then do the people arise against him jeering and throwing stones, but he continues to speak with insistent solicitude, and his words are heard by a few. And from among these few, a tiny band gathers, following him, and he proceeds to the base of a very high Mountain, named Geyamat, and he begins to climb the Mountain.

As he advances slowly and with difficulty, Amon Ra time and again looks back. He sees the armies of the Pharoës marching through the sun-kissed land, carrying to every side their gifts of destruction and misery. He sees the Pyramids appearing one by one—monuments, not to the mummies laid within, but rather to the agony and despair of those who built them. He sees the sensuous flower of civilization springing from the mud of blood and tears, and he passes his hand before his eyes and weeps.

Amon Ra has grown old, his back is bent, his steps are painful. Could he have borne it all if he had known the end? The end! He looks again upon the valley and lo, Isis and Osiris are approaching on a path of light. Amon Ra straightens himself, and turning again to the pass he repeats in his heart the Mystic Word, and the curtain of Night falls upon the Valley of the Nile.

* * * * *

The lightning reveals another country watered by two giant rivers—flowing from the North and West. Here is the achievement of that day, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, and Babylon itself, and Babel's Tower arising in the distance. A thousand colors meet our eyes; a thousand perfumes steal upon our senses, and music like an opiate envelops us, charming, intoxicating, captivating us.

Now, on the broad Euphrates, we see a bark approaching, bearing the figure of Morduk. Morduk's far-visioned eyes are fixed on the mad luxurious cities, and he is lifting his heart heaven-ward, asking for the light of guidance. Then does the Light descend upon him, revealing the Secret, and Morduk the Teacher, directs his bark toward the flowering banks, and choosing Enlil and Ea as his companions, assails the forts of Mammon with resounding voice. Then are these three driven forth into the wilderness, followed by a little group and so, whispering among themselves the Mystic Secret, they place their feet upon the Mountain of Geyamat.

The city of Ninevah in the land of Assyria. Here is the oldest library in the world; its countless books, consisting of bricks inscribed with thoughts and deeds of ages past, are piled on myriad shelves. It is the famed collection of the monarch Ashur—Bonapal.

In this treasure store, we see the youthful Bel pouring, as he has poured for years, over the weighty volumes. He has been informed of noble lives, of glorious teachings revealed in Egypt and in Babylonia, and he seeks the Key. Presently, exhausted by his concentrated research, he falls asleep, and in his dream, Naseem descends from the blue ether, and touches him with the scintillating Torch of Knowledge.

In the period that follows, Bel wanders through the length and breadth of the land, offering his Message of Mercy. He crosses the paths of Shelmanesar, Sennachrib and Sargon, and waits in the rear of their armies to comfort the victims of battle. Throughout a long life he continues, among the fiercest warriors of history, until Ashur and Ishtur arise to his assistance and take up the Message of Mercy.

* * * * *

Islands rising like jewels in a blue sea, and a sweet throbbing melody. Yielding to irresistible impulse, we are drawn into a grove, and come upon Orpheus who stands, sweeping his fingers across the strings of a lyre. His face, raised skyward, is stamped with assurance and joy, for his children, the lovers of Beauty, have found it easy to learn.

We shift our gaze to the hill of the Acropolis, set with its snowy temples—types of a majestic and serene religion, and on all sides, in every attitude, behold the purity of the human form at play, by its pure replica, immortalized in marble.

But now the picture has changed; the Gods are driven from their cities while their statues are worshipped in the market place. Here is Socrates, drinking the cup of hemlock as the price of truth; there is truth meted out at a price in the sanctuary of its own temples. Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle have caught the echo of the Divine Voice; but the echo passes, and recedes, and is heard no more.

Now upon the Mountain, Orpheus veils his troubled eyes before the besmirched robe of Beauty, and wearily continues on his way, leaving behind him the Isles of Hellas glittering like diamonds in the sun.

* * * * *

High mountains—fjords and firths—stretches of sea. Three men of giant stature, Odin, Baldur and Thor stand in a little boat, dashed by the waves. And to them, perilously suspended between earth and heaven, comes simultaneous Awakening, and they steer to shore, disembark and separate, each going his own way.

So do the Lessons of Love come to the warriors of the Northlands, while the tribes rise in anger driving the Teachers away. And when that day is spent, and the Message has become a memory, the people erect bloody altars to the honor of Odin, Baldur and Thor.

Now our attention is centered on the Kingdom of Loo, in the mountainous land of China. Confucius, the wanderer, has returned to his native city, and as Minister of State is reforming the Laws of the Nation. To him comes Laotzu; and Nascem speaks through the mouth of Laotzu, indicating the Rule given by Heaven. Then says Confucius "Heretofore I have traveled to learn, now will I travel to teach," and moving from village to village, from court to court, he expounds his doctrines with unflagging energy and determination. Along the road he instructs Hwuy, his favorite disciple, telling him: "A good man regards the root; he fixes the root, and all else flows out of it. The root is filial piety; the fruit is brotherly love."

The Message of Confucius does not fall upon deaf ears. He leads a multitude along the path of life, and finally overtaking Laotzu, begins to scale the Mountain in his company.

Indra, Varuna, Agni are leading an army of men and women across the vast plane of Central Asia. They have heard the whisper of Nascem and, following the directions given, are leaving their native land. After long journeying and many hardships they reach their destination, and we see them separating, forging ahead in many directions, and finally settling in forests and along great rivers. And always do they carry their Message—the watchword of their pilgrimage, and so do they spread about them the knowledge of a new Cause, and a method for a new way of living.

The act changes. We are on the banks of the Ganges. Here are devotees swinging on hooks in honor of Siva; there are worshippers hanging by the feet over fire, so tendering homage to Brahma; a Guru is jumping on a couch filled with sharp knives; a woman, young and lovely is burning on her husband's funeral pyre. The pure teachings of the ancient Rishis have been distorted and vitiated, and man seeks God along hideous ways of self-torture and mortification. The picture has become contradictory in every sense. On the one hand we see a Brahmin unwilling to tread upon the grass lest by chance he hurt an insect; on the other, priests sacrificing countless animals to appease the wrath of their grisly idols.

Sickened by the sight we turn away and the scene is replaced by a flowing river, a green bank, upon which a youth, divine in appearance, sits under a Bodhi-tree. He is praying for enlightenment as, on the self same spot he has prayed for six long years. Now his intense questioning has evoked the answer, and he is, of a sudden, flooded by the clear light of Nirvana.

Buddha and his disciples pass through the length and breadth of the land, teaching the "Four Noble Truths" and the "Eightfold Path." Adherents accumulate and grow in number, following to the base of the Mountain of Geyamat. As the Divine Youth sets his foot upon the perilous slope, he hears voices, coming to him through the upper mist—the voices of Indra, of Varuna, of Agni, of Brahma, of Vishnu, of Siva—he knows them all, and his heart is uplifted and his spirit rejoices, and eagerly he presses forward along the side of the Mountain.

White-ruffed craters standing at attention above flowering gardens—a boy Jimmu Tenno—leagued to her people by their guardian Goddess, Amatharasu, seeks the Way of Life.

Knocking at the portals of Heaven, he gains admittance, through the mediation of Amatharasu, and possessed of the knowledge of Shinto returns, to scatter it among the islands of Nippon.

Sinai rearing its head above the battling clouds with, at its heart, a Burning Bush. A shepherd on the mountain side—slow of speech among men, he stands, erect and unperturbed, conversing with the Lord of Hosts.

The verdant land of Isaiah and of Amos rolling past Jordan. A young man kneeling in the wilderness praying to the God of his fathers. Through days and nights he calls incessantly until, upon the fortieth day, he breaks the barriers of limitation and passes into the Heaven of Certainty. Then he returns into his own country, and gathers the Twelve about him, teaching them the Way, which is through Him, the shortest way to God. He heals the blind and the distressed, comforts the lonely, consorts with the outcast; he never rests, he never falters but, toward the end of his last journey, we see him weeping among the hills of Judea. "Oh Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the Prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen dost gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!"

Jesus, bruised and wounded, is nearing the Mountain of Geyamat. Those who loved him most of all, John and the three Marys are keeping close; while behind them a little company march singing—Jews, women and a Roman soldier. Now is the veil of the Temple of Solomon rent from top to bottom; the graves are opened, and the bodies of the saints which slept, arise and follow after—into the darkness.

* * * * *

The desert of the Sahara—caravans moving toward the Holy City, sprung up around the Kaaba, which descended from Heaven and was placed on this spot by Abraham. Gateways choked with arriving pilgrims, congested streets, crowded caravanserais, and here the great bazaars, arenas for the trafficking of wares brought by those who come to worship.

Within the temple, ranged round the Holy Spot, three hundred idols stand, while jostling throngs, profiting by the rare occasion, conclude bargains at their ungainly feet. Greed and license running riot—we turn from Mecca and our gaze, drifting across the breast of the desert, is caught by a rocky and forbidding pass. We choose to overlook it, and to explore the restful hills of sand undulating toward the horizon, but our eyes are drawn again to the craggy steeps and, yielding to the current of attraction, we pass under shelving rocks, into a cave.

Blinded by the sudden dark we wait, and presently discern the outline of a man writhing upon the ground. We hear his sobs and smothered cry "The way! The way! Allah show me the way!" And now the figure rises, staggering in circles to the open. It is a youth with burning eyes and streaming hair. We see him reeling on the perilous ledge, clutching the air with wide-spread arms and then, out of the golden midday sky, a White Light strikes, rolling him backward into safety.

Now the youth descends into the valley seeking the wife of his heart. "Khadijeh! Is it madness to believe that which I have heard?" and Khadijeh answers "Thou art the Chosen of Allah! La Elahah Ellah Allah. Thou art the Prophet of Allah!" So Mohammed goes forth among the wild tribes of the desert, delivering the Message of the Compassionate.

We see him ever moving, ever illumined; gathering the Faithful about him by the magic of his assurance; driven, pursued, triumphant—a hero-figure never to be dimmed by time. We see his Cause in the hands of successive Kaliphs; his Faith carried to every corner of the Orient; his Name imposed at the point of the sword. And then a civilization rising on the field of carnage; Bagdad the Golden City and far in the distance the silhouetted Alhambra—indelible, everlasting.

Amid the din of battle, the Prophet of Arabia reaches the Mountainside. Aged and worn he leans upon the shoulder of Ali, the Faithful pressing after, continually repeating "Islam, Islam." He advances, ever gallantly, while the thunder of horses' hoofs rolls back and forth upon the valley, fainter and fainter; while the mist cloaking the little band loosens its hold. Now, on the pass ahead a garment flutters into view and Mohammed straightens himself, crying with ringing voice, "Jesus, Spirit of God! Behold I am coming!"

* * * * *

The plateau of Iran, where long ago, Zarathrustra, the excellent singer of Gathas, brought light to the court of the King.

Since then a civilization has waxed and waned, and now by the city of Shiraz, on the plane of Allaho-Akbar, we see a little mount whereon stands a beautiful youth clothed in green. He is teaching a multitude gathered at his feet. "I am as a ring upon the hand of Him whom God shall manifest." His words are striking deep into the hearts of the people; we observe their faces—attentive, looking up, swept with adoration.

A dungeon in Teheran—dark, damp, suffocating. The floor is carpeted with sleeping bodies lying cramped and intermingled. One figure, weighted with a heavy chain, sits against the wall in an attitude of superb patience. IT IS THE NIGHT OF NIGHTS.

Now the Prisoner stirs. Something has touched him; it is passing over his breast; it is flowing upon him as a mighty torrent, turning his body into flame. He raises his head, listening with all his being, while from all sides these words salute him. "Sorrow not for that which has befallen thee, and have no fear. Ere long shall the Lord send forth and reveal the treasures of the earth—men who will render thee victorious through Thyself and through thy Name, by which God will call to life the hearts of those that know."

The slope of Mount Carmel—a patriarch clad in white robe and turban, has issued from the cave of Elijah. He stands looking, long and sorrowfully, upon the Mediterranean, and we follow the path of his vision, until we come upon the field of Armageddon stretching from pole to pole. Arrayed in full armor, the followers of the Prince of Peace are ranged upon the face of the world, and above the world, and below the world, while a Voice coming from the Temple of Heaven, says "It is done."

Then there are cries, and a great earthquake, and the cities and the nations collapse.

Babylon the Great is fallen, is fallen!

Abdul Baha withdraws his gaze from the surface of the globe, and turning to the Mountain, which looms before him, higher and higher, beyond the limits of the Carmel which he has known, he begins to climb. Sheets of rain are falling, lightning strikes, thunder shakes the ground, but the Leaders of the Sons of Men are yet advancing over the spaceless steeps of Time. Calling to each other through the dark, holding fast the Mystic Word they draw in, closing round the summit—and lo, the East is streaked with grey.

Then the Prophets of the Earth stretch out their arms and touch each others' fingers, and so they reach the crest and stand, outlined sharp against the sky—while with one voice they cry:

The Dawn!

The Dawn!

The Dawn!

APPROACH TO THE CITY OF SHIRAZ OVER THE PLAIN OF "ALLAH-O-AKBAR"

CHAPTER I

THE MESSENGER OF THE DAWN

October 20th, 1819—July 9th, 1850

"O Mehdi, Lord of the Age, hasten thy coming."

—Islamic Invocation

America—the city of Boston—a student pouring over the Bible. After two years of minute study, he deducts that the "two thousand three hundred days" spoken of by Daniel VIII 14, mean 2,300 years, and that these years began in 457 B.C. when Ezra went up into Jerusalem, and therefore ended in 1843 A.D. Again, after more study, he concludes that, taking Hebrew chronology, instead of Roman, the appointed time is to be one year later, namely 1844. According to Daniel "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

Miller, such is the student's name, travels extensively through the United States, announcing to the people that the Promised Hour has come—when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together and the nations shall learn war no more. He gathers a following who take his name, calling themselves Millerites, and these strip themselves of all their possessions, and, on the Day of their expectation, await the descent of the Lord.

SHEIKH AHMAD

In the early part of the nineteenth century, Sheikh Ahmad, far famed student of Persian and Arabic Holy Writ, leaves his home south of the Persian Gulf, and travels toward Shiraz, as though drawn by a magnet.

Here he settles down, while students, from all sides, gather to sit at his feet, and draw enlightenment from his unlimited stores of wisdom. Repeatedly does he designate to these the city where they live, extolling it with passionate fervor, while at all times he comports himself as though within the precincts of a shrine. "Wonder not at my words," he announces to the learned who press him with questions, "among you shall be a number who shall live to see a Day which the Prophets of old have yearned to witness."

After the death of Sheikh Ahmad, Seyyed Kazim, the most forceful among his followers, repairs to Iraq, and in the city of Karbala—the very fortress of Islamic learning—gathers about him a group of pupils, and prepares them for the approaching hour. He even goes into detail regarding the qualities of Mehdi—the Promised One. “He is a descendant of the Prophet. He is young in age and is possessed of innate wisdom. My knowledge is as a drop compared with the immensity of his knowledge; my attainments a speck of dust in the face of the wonders of his grace and power.”

WHAT IS TRUTH?

A hall in Karbala—under windows which open to the sky. Seyyed Kazim is presiding at the head of the room; his pupils, some young, some of advanced age are ranged before him. The teacher is leading the eager minds among the intricacies of the Hadiths of Mohammed—scrutinizing the phrases one by one; offering interpretations, both old and new. Among his listeners, by far the most attracted and absorbed is a youth who sits by the door. This youth, a stranger in the city, has been attending the sessions regularly—coming in quietly when the class is assembled, and leaving as quietly when the work is done.

Now the discussion has centered on the ever elusive subject—Truth, and one of the students enquires point blank “What is Truth?” Seyyed Kazim lifts his eyes to the glass-covered roof, through which a ray of evening light enters, slanting across the room. Raising his hand he points: “Where the Light strikes, there is Truth!” All eyes are fixed on his finger, as he lowers it, following the ray, down to the shoulder of the youth who sits by the door.

Then the teacher recalls the minds of his pupils to the verses of the Hadiths.

THE SHEPHERD'S DREAM

On one occasion as, with his companions, he journeys from Karbala to visit the nearby shrines of the Imams, Seyyed Kazim, stopping on the high-road to offer up his noonday prayer, is approached by a shepherd who recounts a dream. Mohammed has appeared to him, has told him that, in three days, a traveler, followed by his friends, will stop, at the hour of noon, to pray in the shade of a palm tree; that he was to seek the presence of this traveler and deliver the following message: “Rejoice for the moment of your departure is at hand. On your return to Karbala, there, three days after your arrival you will wing your flight to me. Then shortly, shall, He who is the Truth, be made manifest.”

Seyyed Kazim completes his pilgrimage and goes back to Karbala where, on the third day, even as it had been announced by the shepherd, he passes from this earthly life.

THE QUEST

The interior of a mosque—men of various ages, seated on the floor in a large semi-circle, are engaged in a many sided discussion. It seems that they are reaching a conclusion, and Mullah Hussein, one of the pupils of Seyyed Kazim, rises to his feet, quoting from the Koran: "Whoso maketh efforts for Us, in our ways will We guide him" then he departs, followed by fifteen, and together these set forth on a journey.

As the little company proceeds along the road they converse among themselves saying: "He who first discovers the whereabouts of the Promised One, he will notify the others," and they agree, "This is a covenant made between us, in the sight of God."

Mullah Hussein is leading the little band toward Shiraz. He has, since the departure of his teacher, drawn certain recollections from the recesses of his mind. He has evoked the scene in the classroom at Karbala, when the shaft of light descended from the window and rested on the stranger, seated at the door. He remembers that this stranger had once addressed him, and mentioned the city of his birth, and he is possessed with desire to look again upon those features and contemplate that elusive personality.

Before the gateway of Shiraz—the travelers have reached their destination and have entered the city. Mullah Hussein waits behind, enjoying the peace of the late afternoon as he strolls to and fro. Suddenly he looks up—a youth of radiant countenance, wearing a *green turban and sash, has approached, and is greeting him with intimacy and affection. "Oh," Mullah Hussein gasps, "I have come to visit you." "And I am here to receive you," the youth responds "and to take you with me."

So together, they pass through the city gates, and along the narrow streets, until they reach a house of modest appearance, and the host stops and knocks. An Ethiopian servant admits them, ushering them into an upper room where tea is prepared—and they converse in this room.

Now Mullah Hussein is presenting a certain treatise, the mysterious allusions of which have baffled him all his life—allusions which even Sheikh Ahmad and Seyyed Kazim had been unable to fathom. The youth glances at the book and immediately, with vigor and assurance, begins to speak—expounding truths, profound and simple, bringing light, where light was not. Mullah Hussein listens with rapt attention, while a strange excitement begins to take possession of him. Thereafter every day, for forty days, he visits the little house and he, who had been the first pupil of the first scholar in the land, sits before his new found friend learning like a little child.

A MEMORABLE DAY—MAY 23rd, 1844

America—on a high hill in New England, the assembled Millerites, dressed in white, await the appearance of the Lord.

Persia—in Teheran, Abbas (later known as Abdul Baha) first sees the light of day.

An upper chamber of a house in Shiraz, flooded with soft golden light—it is one hour before sunset, on the fortieth day of Mullah Hussein's visit to the city. An outward silence has fallen over teacher and pupil, but their spirits are in contact on the plane of the super-conscious.

The awaited moment has arrived!

Mullah Hussein breaks the stillness, "Speak, and say who you are," and the answer comes:

"O Hussein, the first to believe in me! Verily I declare that I am the Bab—the Gate of God!"

Then he says: "This night, this very hour will, in future times, be celebrated as one of the greatest and most significant of all festivals."

On the following day, May 24th, the first telegraph message is flashed from Baltimore to Washington: "What God hath wrought."

THE EIGHTEEN LETTERS OF THE LIVING

Mullah Hussein, the first to whom the station of the Bab was revealed, receives the title of Babu'l-Bab—the Gate that leads to the Gate. He is the first disciple, and the First Letter of the Living.

Now, he, according to his promise, seeks out his companions, and these, beholding him, are struck by his changed expression, and realize without any spoken word, that some great event is upon them. Then, each in turn, either during sleep or while engaged in meditation, receives the light of guidance and, by his own unaided effort, comes into the desired Presence.

So, gradually, are sixteen accepted as apostles and enrolled as Letters of the Living, and here, Babu'l-Bab receives word from Kurratu'l-Ayne, foremost woman of Persia, enquiring, "Have you, in your journeyings, found any trace of the Promised One?" This communication is shown to the Bab, and he says, "Write to Kurratu'l-Ayne; she shall be the Seventeenth Letter."

Again he says, "The Letters must be eighteen. There remains one to complete the number. Tomorrow night, that Letter will arrive."

The next evening, as Babu'l-Bab walks along the street, a stranger, wild-eyed and dishevelled, throws himself upon him. "Where is he? You can tell me, for you have been in his company!" Babu'l-Bab promises that time will bring enlightenment, but the stranger will not be suppressed. "Why do you seek to hide him from me? I have seen him; I recognized him by his gait."

Babu'l-Bab reports this incident, and his Master observes, "We have, in the world of spirit, been communing with this youth. We, indeed, await his coming. Go to him and summon him forthwith."

This is Janabe Quddus—the Eighteenth Letter of the Living.

The Bab, himself becomes the Nineteenth Letter.

Now, the Bab interviews his disciples individually and collectively, and bids them go forth and scatter in every direction, carrying the glad tidings of a New Day, and of a New Revelation. "Your faith," he says, "must be immovable as the rock; it must weather every storm and survive every calamity. You are the first to leave the House of God and to suffer for His sake. If you are slain in His path, great will be your reward."

He then bids them farewell and in the company of Janabe Quddus sets out on a pilgrimage to Mecca.

THE PILGRIMAGE

Arabia—the Holy City of Mecca, shrine of three hundred million Moham-medans. The Bab stands on a plain, teeming with pilgrims—pilgrims from India, from Persia, from Turkey, from Afganistan,—all devotees of the orthodox faith of Islam.

The Bab speaks: "This is the Dawn of a New Era—an era in which all traditions must be annihilated. Verily, I claim to be the Gate that leads men to the knowledge of God."

The same plain at evening—the Bab is seated in his tent, by a small oil lamp. Men of many races are gathered about him on the ground, and are crowding the entrance; now and then one leaves his place, and it is immediately filled; groups outside move to and fro; there is an atmosphere of tense excitement.

Two figures are approaching from the direction of the city, conversing in low tones. One is saying "Enough my brother, of conflicting reports! We will judge for ourselves," and the other, "We will hear him together, and so carry back the same impression to our people."

They have reached the tent and are standing on the outskirts of the crowd at the entrance. The Bab is in the middle of a discourse; his accents come to them clearly, and they listen to his every word, weighing each tone of his voice. When the talk is over they move away and retrace their steps.

MECCA IN THE MONTH OF PILGRIMAGE.
COURT OF THE KAABA (HOLY OF HOLIES ENCLOSING THE BLACK STONE)

The one says, "I have heard him with my own ears, and he is a fakir," and the other, *"I have heard him with my own ears and he is Mehdi."

THE MESSAGE

The news of the Bab's declaration at Mecca is spreading like wildfire throughout Persia. Men of every class are responding to the call—whispering the story, carrying the news, gathering in groups without fear and without restraint. All the while the Disciples are circulating throughout every province—freeing the minds from the chains of superstition; giving confidence by the magic of their confidence, teaching love by the magic of their love. It is the most sudden and astounding campaign of missionary work that the world has ever known.

Now the Shah becomes uneasy; the Mullahs violent in their denunciation, and the Government rises in alarm.

THE JOURNEY

The Messenger of the Dawn is being conducted, by a body of guardsmen through the northern provinces. All along the way, the people, gather, coming out from the towns and villages to see him pass. They observe his demeanor, they hear his words of winsome charm, and something in them changes—they follow him down the road. On this journey hundreds and hundreds accept the Message.

THE BAYAN

A prison cell in the fortress of Maku—the Bab is engaged in compiling his writings, his legacy to his followers, and to those who shall come after them—the Bayan is shaping itself. In this book the Bab asserts, ever and again, that he is the Gate through which men shall be led to "Him whom God shall manifest."

He fears that his people may be blinded by the love they bear him, and so fail to recognize that yet greater One, who shall be the Morning to his Dawn. He rejoices in his connection with him, who is yet to come; and in his faith in him. "Verily," he writes, "This is more honor to me than anything in the kingdom of heaven or earth."

Again he writes, "He is as a sun. If you place an infinity of mirrors before the sun, each one will reflect according to its capacity; and if you place no mirrors, the sun will rise and set just the same, and the loss will be for the mirrors," and again, "If you read but a single verse of 'Him whom God shall

The citadel at Tabriz. The streets are packed with a dense throng; the roofs of the houses are laden with human beings; ten thousand people are gathered together; it is early morning.

Above a row of cells, on the wall of the barracks, two figures are suspended by ropes, fixed to the parapet above—the Messenger of the Dawn—and hung so close that his head rests on his Master's breast, the devoted Mirza Mohammed Ali.

On the square, a regiment of Mussulman stands with raised muskets; its colonel at the side. A long moment of suspense, then the signal—a volley of shot, and the scene is obscured by smoke.

At this very instant, a whirlwind which has been collecting its forces, suddenly bursts, driving the dust through the streets in clouds—enveloping the city in darkness. The people cling together, blinded, unnerved; then as quickly as it came, the gale passes on, and the atmosphere, by degrees, clears.

And now a clamor is breaking out on all sides; voices are raised. "They have disappeared!" "He has gone to heaven." The multitude is panic-stricken.

The soldiers set out in a frenzied search, and presently discover the Bab seated in his cell, writing verses on the wall. The shower of bullets had simply severed the ropes which bound him. His body is unscathed.

A guard, seeking to prove if he is indeed man, pierces his arm with a sword and the blood flows forth.

Then the victims are once more raised upon the wall, and again the word of command is given; but this time the soldiers break ranks, throw down their arms and run away, and a Christian regiment replaces them.

Now the Bab raises his eyes to the East from which a roseate light is fast spreading over the heavens. His task is accomplished; his word is spoken; his thirty-one years of life have reached their destined end. He waits. Already the rhythm of a new state is pressing in on him and his spirit yearns to catch hold. A sharp report—the bonds snap—his body falls riddled with bullets—and the sun of a new day breaks upon the face of the world.

A CITY GATE, TEHERAN

CHAPTER II

THE GREAT CAPTIVE

November 12th, 1817—May 28th, 1892

Verily, Akka is a city of Syria which God in His mercy has distinguished.

I announce unto you a white city upon the borders of the sea; its whiteness is its beauty, given by God. Know that the voice which there, calls the Azan, will reach unto Paradise.

Happy is he who makes pilgrimage to Akka.

Happy is he who makes pilgrimage to the Pilgrim of Akka.

—From the Hadiths of Mohammed.

In the middle of the nineteenth century, a group of men, women and children leave their native province of Wuerttemberg, in the south of Germany, and migrate to Palestine. They settle at the base of Mount Carmel in the town of Haifa, forming a colony which spreads, as time goes on, to other parts of that land. Above the doorways of their houses they carve in bold letters, the words: "Der Herr ist nach." (The Lord is at hand.)

THE CONFERENCE OF BADASHT

By the little hamlet of Badasht, a stretch of gardens leading into one another, has been rented by a noble of the court, Mirza Hussein Ali, for use as a camping ground. The space has been prepared so as to give as much simple comfort as possible, and the guests, to the number of eighty-one, have arrived and been shown to their quarters.

Evening falls. The travellers assemble in the central garden before the tent of their host; gathering in groups—comrades, old acquaintances, some strangers, brought together for a little while, and soon to be dispersed. A bond exists between them all, deep and vibrant—closer than is the bond of kinship, for these men are holding the fate of the New Cause in their eager inexperienced hands.

Now Mirza Hussein Ali is speaking: news has been received from their beloved Master, who sends his greetings to them all with assurance of his constant solicitude. Although distance separates them, his thoughts always attend his followers and once more he designates the rocky road that lies at their feet, promising to meet them at the journeys' end.

A silence falls upon the disciples of the Bab, as their minds reach out to him who wrote the letter in his far off prison cell; then their host gently gathers the straying thoughts and lays before them a definite plan of action.

So, night and morning they live in this garden and here, one by one, receive new names, so that each may be divested of past associations. As time passes, their vision steadies and clears; their purpose simplifies; their problems become solved. It seems as though a powerful Presence dominates them all—a presence giving assurance, certainty—creating a whole out of the many complex elements; and yet they are alone—disciples merely, with the Master far away.

During the proceedings Mirza Hussein Ali has announced that, hereafter he will be known as Baha-U-Llah.

A THUNDER BOLT

The gentle Prisoner has suffered the supreme penalty; his body, shot to pieces, has lain on the barracks-square of Tabriz. In all parts of Persia a cloud of gloom rises and settles upon the Babis, now leaderless in the face of their tremendous obligation. Where shall they turn for guidance and support? How can they, so scattered, so limited in number, continue to assail the fortified structure of Islam? At this dark hour two unfortunate men, grief stricken to the point of folly, make a crude attempt on the life of the Shah.

The city of Teheran is shaken to its foundation, and all suspected of adhering to the New Cause are thrown into prison. Especially is his Majesty's mother convulsed with fear and anger, and openly, she denounces Baha-U-Llah, as being chief instigator of the crime.

In a retired village to the north of the capitol, Baha-U-Llah receives news of the disaster, together with a warning that he remain concealed until the storm is over; then he, in spite of the entreaties of his friends, sets out at once for the seat of government, temporarily situated at some distance from the city.

Arriving at his destination he presents himself before the Grand Vizir and inquires if it is indeed true that criminal charges have been preferred against him. If such is the case, he is prepared to hear these accusations and to discuss them.

THE ARREST

The Minister is confused by this intrepid move and hesitates in so imposing a presence; but, at his very gates, the army is in a state of disorder and the people, of all classes, are clamoring for revenge. After all, whatever his rank, a Babi is no more than a Babi. Baha-U-Llah is, therefore, turned over to the authorities.

The prisoner is being conducted to the capitol. Bare headed, bare footed, heavy chains about his neck, he passes through the furious crowd, amid a pelting shower of stones and abuse. An old woman, her eyes glowing with fanaticism, stumbles after him "Give me a chance" she cries with panting breath "To throw a stone in his face." Baha-U-Llah stops in the middle of the road, and waits "Suffer not this woman to be disappointed," he says to the guards "nor deny her, what she regards as a meritorious act in the sight of God."

THE DUNGEON

Arriving at the prison in Teheran, Baha-U-Llah is led through a dismal corridor, and escorted three flights below the level of the ground to a dungeon, already occupied by nearly one hundred and fifty men. Here a chain, of weight so appalling that it is known throughout the land under a special name, being that of Quarakakar (Black Horses) is brought and fastened upon his neck; then the door, the only outlet to the place, is closed.

It is very cold; the living bodies are crowded close, so giving one another a little warmth. It is damp; no one among them has a coat. It is dark and there is no air.

Silence, broken by groans, and gasping breaths, and then a voice raised—praising Allah the Clement, the Compassionate. Baha-U-Llah is praying.

And so days and nights of unspeakable deprivation pass in this infected pit, and here, during long hours when the torment of the chain and the stifling atmosphere allow him little sleep, it occasionally befalls that, upon raising his head, something flows over the breast of Baha-U-Llah, even as a mighty torrent which, descending from the summit of a lofty mountain, distributes itself over the earth. Then all his body is aflame. At such moments he hears words which mortal ears cannot hear.

The imprisonment in this dungeon lasts four months after which time, owing to the insistent demands of the Ambassador of Russia, Baha-U-Llah is released. He is then, in the company of his family and a few friends, exiled to Turkey.

THE LONELY FAMILY

A little house in the city of Bagdad where the wife and children of Baha-U-Llah are passing their days. This has become the center to which the Babis turn and believers, from every part of Persia have, either openly or in secret, travelled here to receive directions as to the carrying on of their work. Now the visitors continue to arrive, although the one whom they desire to see has been absent for some time. They come to the door, again and again inquiring if there are any tidings of him, but the young son, Abbas shakes his head wearily—it is long since Baha-U-Llah has left them, and since his departure they have had no news.

THE HERMIT

The rocky mountains of Kurdistan shelving upward to forbidding heights; valleys rolling one into another toward ancient horizons. On those horizons Babylon rose, flourished and decayed. On those horizons Abraham gathered the tribes about him and taught them the way of God. On those horizons Adam ate of the tree of knowledge and was driven forthwith out of the Garden of Eden because of that which he knew.

Half way up the side of one of the tallest mountains, is a group of shepherds—seated, looking upward. The earth is yielding up her perfumes which rise and cling; the trees are whispering to each other, the sun is sinking into the violet distance.

Now a sound breaks upon the ardent twilight, coming from the ledge above; it is a voice of melodious power. The shepherds dwell upon every tone, following each cadence as it mounts upward, carrying its message to God. Then, when the chant ceases they rise, separating without a word, and go their separate ways into the valley.

So each nightfall, they come and quietly listen to the evening prayer, but at morning they are bolder. Then they climb eagerly to the very entrance of the cave, which gives upon the upper ledge and lay, at its threshold, bowls of milk and baskets of fresh dates. Often the hermit comes out and speaks to them—their Dervish—their Saint—their Holy Man—and he gathers them about him and teaches them to read, to write, and to memorize verses of the Koran.

On occasions, at long intervals, the shepherds bring some travelling Sufi leader to visit their beloved friend, and listen with pride and wonder as the two converse on the evolution of the soul. The Sufis ask searching questions, and learn many mystic truths, and the hermit promises to, some day, write an explanation concerning these things.

So pass two years, and now the shepherds sit disconsolate before a vacant cave; the hermit has disappeared from the mountain—and Baha-U-Llah is again with his family in Bagdad.

DAYS IN BAGDAD

News of the return has spread abroad and a steady stream of guests is flowing past the door of the little house—not Babis only, but visitors coming from distant climes to seek enlightenment and inspiration. The Turkish authorities observe this commotion with cold disfavor and the Persian Consul General sends repeated complaints to his Majesty in Teheran.

It is customary for Baha-U-Llah to retire, at the end of the day, from the busy community, and during these solitary hours, as he strolls beside the winding Tigris, verses of great mystical significance come crowding into his mind. He writes them down and later, the Babis collect the bits of paper and study the verses in secret. They call them the "Hidden Words."

At this period also, Baha-U-Llah writes an account of the soul's journey to the Celestial City, addressing it to one of the Sufi leaders who had reflected on this problem in the mountains of Kurdistan. This writing becomes known as the "Seven Valleys."

EXILE TO CONSTANTINOPLE

And now, after a few years of relative tranquility, the Babis are again on the march. The Sultan of Turkey has not yielded to a recommendation, coming from the Shah, that Baha-U-Llah be returned to Persia, but has decided to, instead, send him into further exile. A caravan is being prepared for the journey to Constantinople, and the adherents of the Cause, having wound up the various activities by means of which they had been supporting themselves, have said farewell to the pleasant city which they have come to regard as home. They are facing new perils, new fatigues, new hardships, yet their chief thought is, fear of being left behind. They wish to follow their leader at whatever cost to themselves, and to take part in the uncertainties of his lot.

THE GARDEN OF THE RIZWAN

The travellers are assembled on an estate known as the "Garden of the Rizwan." This, the first stage of the journey, has been chosen at a short distance from Bagdad, so as to make it possible for late-comers to catch up and join the caravan. Everything is in order, the last arrival has finally made his appearance and the group waits, crowded together, hesitant before the future—bewildered, apprehensive. It is the hour of sunset on April 21st, 1863.

Now Baha-U-Llah rises to his feet and stands among his people. This is no time for regret, he says, this is no time for fear. The destiny which beckons them is more radiant than their most vivid dreams; the Cause, which they have accepted, more imposing than their most ardent conception. Did the Bab, indeed, appear to liberate the Islamic mind alone? No, God worked through him toward a greater end. The limitations attached to all religions are to be swept away, and the Pearls of Truth concealed in each of them disclosed; and these Pearls, gathered together, and strung on a silken strand, shall make the glorious adornment of a mature—of an awakened race. This is their task; this is their mission; this is to be their supreme attainment.

The people are transfixed by the vastness of the plan and tremble before the panorama unveiled, so suddenly to their eyes; then before they have time to regain their balance, Baha-U-Llah continues asserting that, from now on the Babis exist no longer; they, the Bahais, are in the presence of Him whom the Bab announced; that a New Power has been released, a New Rhythm set in motion—that Dawn has deepened into Morning.

Following this declaration a few, a very few, separate themselves from the caravan and retrace their steps to Bagdad and the Bahais, seventy-five in number, men, women and children, continue with their Master Baha-U-Llah toward Constantinople.

Past three great moats, behind gigantic walls, twenty feet in thickness, Baha-U-Llah sits in his cell. He has reached his final exile and on this spot, from which he can catch glimpses of the dazzling sea, the Great Prisoner writes to the Kings and Rulers of the earth, commanding each in turn, and designating the calamities which will befall them unless they arise for the renovation of the world.

"Before God, a handful of dust is greater than your kingdom; than your sovereignty, glory and dominion, and should He so desire, He would scatter these as the sands of the desert. Ere long His wrath shall overtake you; revolutions shall appear in your midst and your countries will be divided. Then will you weep and lament and nowhere shall you find protection."

EXTRACT FROM THE TABLET TO NAPOLEON III

"Had the old religion been your choice, then why did you set aside that which was prescribed in the Bible and the Gospels? . . .

"In punishment for that which you have done, matters shall be changed in your kingdom; the spirit of revolt will possess your people and, unless you arise to assist this Cause, following the spirit along the straight path, your power will fall from your grasp. . . . Your glory has made you proud. By my life, it shall not endure. . . . We have seen humiliation hastening after you while you remained asleep."

"When I was in chains and fetters in the prison of Teheran, your ambassador befriended me, therefore God has reserved for you a station which none but Himself can comprehend."

THE GERMAN COLONY

Toward the close of his life, the attitude of the Government relaxes and Baha-U-Llah is allowed to retire to a beautiful estate in the country. From here, he comes and goes as he pleases, and sometimes, walking along the road, which sweeps into the town of Haifa, and on to the base of Mount Carmel, he passes the houses of the German colonists who, long since, had settled in these regions with supreme anticipation. Under the stone archways of their doors, carved with the words "Der Herr ist nach," the villagers glance casually at the majestic figure before their very gates. At intervals, the dream, which brought them here, flashes back to their minds and they wonder when, if ever, will be the time of fulfillment.

AN INTERVIEW

The only European, on record as having met Baha-U-Llah, is the distinguished Orientalist, Professor Edward G. Browne of the University of Cambridge. Of this interview he writes:

"My conductor paused for a moment while I removed my shoes. Then with a quick movement of the hand he withdrew, and as I passed, replaced the curtain; and I found myself in a large apartment, along the upper end of which ran a low divan, while on the side opposite to the door were placed two or three chairs. Though I dimly suspected whither I was going, and whom I was to behold (for no distinct intimation had been given to me), a second or two elapsed ere, with a throb of wonder and awe, I became definitely conscious that the room was not untenanted. In the corner where the divan met the wall sat a wondrous and venerable figure, crowned with a felt headress of the kind called taj by dervishes (but of unusual height and make), round the base of which was wound a small white turban. The face of him on whom I gazed I can never forget, though I cannot describe it. Those piercing eyes seemed to read one's very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow; while the deep lines on the forehead and face implied an age which the jet-black hair and beard, flowing down in indistinguishable luxuriance almost to the waist, seemed to belie. No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before One who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain!

"A mild, dignified voice bade me to be seated, and then continued: . . . 'We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer-up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment. . . . That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? . . . Yet so it shall be. These fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the 'Most Great Peace' shall come. . . . Do not you in Europe need this also? Is not this that which Christ foretold? . . . Yet do we see your kings and rulers lavishing their treasures more freely on means for the destruction of the human race than on that which would conduce to the happiness of mankind. . . . These strifes, this bloodshed and discord must cease, and all men be as one kindred and one family. . . . Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind. . . .'

"Such, so far as I can recall them, were the words which, beside many others, I heard from Baha. Let those who read them consider well with themselves whether such doctrines merit death and bonds, and whether the world is more likely to gain or lose by their diffusion."

ABBAS EFFENDI, LATER KNOWN AS ABDUL BAHÁ

CHAPTER III

THE SERVANT OF BAHA

May 23rd, 1844—November 28th, 1921

"Servitude is an essence the core of which is divinity."
—Islamic Tradition.

A mountain in the province of the Mazandaran, topped with a vast table-land on which thousands of sheep and goats are grazing. Huge bonfires burn in several places, and peasants crowd about them as they prepare the evening meal. There is music, wild and primitive, and rustic dancing and much merriment; it is a unique occasion, for the owner of these broad lands has sent his little son to visit his tenants and inspect his flocks.

Ere long evening approaches; it is time to say farewell. The shepherds gather about the child as he stands in his long white gown and Persian lamb cap, laughing happily and praising everybody. Now the chief of the shepherds is whispering to him "It is customary on these occasions for the master to offer a gift." The child is startled, "I have none. I did not bring anything with me," and then, "Oh yes, I know what I can do. Give each man a little flock of sheep."

When the child reaches home his alarming generosity is reported to his father. What shall be done about the gifts that the Little Master has made! Mirza Hussein Ali laughs, "The gifts are already given" and then more seriously, "Some day he will give himself!"

* * * * *

THE DESERTED FAMILY

A devastated mansion in Teheran. The walls have been stripped, the furnishings removed, the servants have fled. One room, destitute of all but the barest necessities, is occupied by a little family. A mother, a boy of eight years, a tiny girl and a baby are huddled, clasping each other, praying, trembling, weeping. From the street the cries of a ferocious mob reach their ears; a new victim is being tortured or executed—it may be the beloved father—there is no way of getting news. And now the children are hungry and there is no money. The mother cuts the gold buttons from their garments and, at nightfall, slipping out, sells the buttons and buys something to eat. Sometimes she goes to the prison and gives a few coins to the jailors; perhaps they will give food to Baha-U-Llah if he is still there.

A WINTER'S JOURNEY

A mountain route. The father has been released and, with his family and a number of Babis, is being conducted, under military escort, to Bagdad. He is very ill and his neck is raw and bears marks of chains. The mother also is ill and much worried for only two of her children are with her; she has been forced to leave her baby behind. It is bitterly cold and all are insufficiently clad. The boy Abbas rides on a horse; his hands and feet are frost bitten and he suffers. The journey lasts a month.

"MOVE ON"

Bagdad. Baha-U-Llah is the center of a community of Babis, all of whom turn to him for illumination and guidance. It is eleven years since his arrival in this city.

Now the Sultan of Turkey issues an order to the effect that the family must move on, and preparations are made for another journey. Four days before the caravan is to set out Baha-U-Llah has revealed to his son the fact that he, himself, is the one whose coming had been foretold by the Bab. After this Abbas Effendi watches over his father at all times.

The march to Constantinople extends over a period of four months. The weather is inclement; food is very scarce. Abbas Effendi has constituted himself his father's bodyguard. He sits at the entrance of his tent by night, and rides beside his wagon during the day. Sometimes, in order to get a little rest, he gallops ahead of the caravan to a considerable distance, where dismounting, and causing his horse to lie down, he stretches himself on the ground, laying his head on the animal's neck. So he sleeps till the cavalcade catches up with him.

Two months in Constantinople, then another order—another journey, this time to Adrianople. It is winter, heavy snow is falling, all are ill; the feet of Abbas Effendi are again frozen.

FINAL EXILE

Five years in Adrianople, then a voyage by sea and Baha-U-Llah, his family and followers have reached the end of their long journey—Akka on seashore of Palestine. Now the sentence is read; these men are murderers; they have corrupted the people; they have leagued to overthrow the Ottoman empire; they must be treated with utmost severity.

The barracks. Seventy men, women and children packed together—little food—bad water—no water in which to wash—almost all have fallen ill—it is midsummer. Abbas Effendi waits on everyone. He nurses the sick, watches over them, cheers them; he takes no rest; then some of the patients die and he himself succumbs.

Visitors are not admitted within the walls of the fortress, but sometimes these gather on the plain outside the third moat. Pilgrims from Persia—they have traveled on foot to see their beloved Master, and here they can catch glimpses of him through his window. Then they return home to carry on his work with new vigor. The confinement in this barrack covers a period of two years.

Now the restrictions are mitigated. The family is confined for seven years in a house in the city of Akka, and finally is allowed to take possession of a lovely country place named Bahjee, where Baha-U-Llah spends his last days.

AN OFFICE IN AKKA

A large room in the house of Abbas Effendi. A courier from Cairo has brought in bags of letters—letters from Asia, from Africa, from Europe, from America, all enquiring about the New Cause which is to unify the world. Four secretaries are sorting the letters, translating their contents and writing answers. Abbas Effendi, with his inclusive mind, is directing all of them—dictating to this one, listening to that one, and to the next; then going back to the first—taking up the thread where he had left off. Now the replies are packed into the bags and the courier returns to Cairo. So are the seeds of fresh ideals scattered to the four corners of the earth.

In years, Abbas Effendi is old; his hair is white, his beard lies silver on his breast; yet his movements are the movements of a youth and his back is straight as an arrow.

Baha-U-Llah had written of his son, "Verily he is Myself—the Shining Place of my Identity, the East of my Cause," but Abbas Effendi said, "My name is Abdul Baha. My reality is Abdul Baha. No title, no commendation, no mention will I ever have, except Abdul Baha—the servant of Baha."

THE INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE

Akka is under surveillance. A commission sent by the Sultan is presenting charges against Abdul Baha. The city is in turmoil; ominous rumors of exile to Feysan and even of a death sentence are spreading; there is an atmosphere of impending doom.

The interior of the courtroom—the committee, consisting of four officers in uniform, is placed at a table. The suspect unattended, stands before them in long brown robe and white turban. The accusations, which have come from Turkey, are being read.

Abbas of Persia is charged, firstly, of cherishing ideas of sovereignty.

ABDUL BAHÁ'S HOUSE AT AKKA

Secondly of having prepared and distributed a new flag. Thirdly of constructing a fortress on Mount Carmel.

As he has no lawyer, Abdul Baha answers for himself. He begins by thanking his Majesty Sultan Abdul Hamid for having divested him of all titles. In referring to him simply as Abbas of Persia he has included him in the company of those, whose servant he is—the Prophet of Arabia, who was known as Mohammed and Jesus, who was called the Nazarene.

As to the first charge, it is alleged that he harbors privately the thought of kingship. Now, in this, the Ottoman Empire overestimates the ambitions of an exile—one who is encircled day and night by spies. As it happens this prisoner has, all his life, and before the world, striven to attain the station of servitude, and has looked for no higher honor.

Secondly, it is said that he has circulated, in all parts, a white flag inscribed with the words, "Ya-Baha-El-Abha" which at a given time, is to be raised as signal of rebellion. But, as none of the officials of Turkey or of Arabia have seen this emblem, could it not be that it is an unmanifest flag, flying between earth and heaven, and that the hosts of the Almighty are themselves, taking part in its unfurling?

Thirdly, he is accused of supervising the erection of a fortress on Mount Carmel. If he, who has neither acquaintance with engineers, nor knowledge of military strategy has done this thing, it surely is an achievement; but is it not more likely that this is a spiritual tower, designed to diffuse the light of God?

Now the accused is notified that the Government is aware of the existence of certain revolutionary documents transmitted to his safekeeping by European agents. Should he make denial, there are witnesses in readiness to swear, on the Koran, to this effect.

Abdul Baha answers that he has no knowledge of any such papers, and that he wishes the fact to be well established that he has harbored no earthly ambition, has broken no law, and committed no sin. Only, he is a Bahai. To this he pleads guilty, and if they order out their regiments and make of him a target, as they did of the Bab, that will but fulfill his highest aspiration; that will be his greatest glory.

The investigating committee has adjourned. With its findings well in order, it has left Palestine, and is on its way back to Turkey.

AN UNEXPECTED FRIEND

The house in Akka—a group of Bahais are excitedly discussing a message which has been brought to them, coming from an Italian battleship recently arrived in the harbor. The captain, in view of the imminent danger which threatens, has anchored, under pretext of loading with wheat, and places himself and his ship at the disposal of Abbas Effendi. He is prepared to start at any time, and to make for any port on the Mediterranean Sea.

VIEW TAKEN FROM THE SLOPE OF MOUNT CARMEL, LOOKING OVER HAIFA IN THE DIRECTION OF AKKA

Abdul Baha sits in silence looking over the bay. Presently he asks his followers if they have arrived at a decision. They answer: yes, that he is the Center of the Cause; he is all that they have; he must be sent to a place of safety.

The Master, then, says that he will tell them the conclusion which he has reached. The Bab did not run away. Baha-U-Llah did not run away. God will deal with His own according to His intention. Abdul Baha will remain!

THE GAME OF FATE

It is the year 1908. The Ottoman Government has been overturned by the Young Turks, and the Committee of Union and Progress has declared a new Constitution, which constitution confers full and unconditional liberty upon all political prisoners throughout the Empire. So Abdul Hamid, following a long and tyrannical reign, is thrown into prison; as Abdul Baha, after forty years of serene service in captivity, walks out a free man.

The Investigating Commission arrives in Constantinople, and its members, being part of the old regime, are immediately forced to flee for their lives. One of them is killed by a sentry, another is exiled, a third, having been stripped of all his possessions, dies in abject poverty, while the fourth, escaping to Egypt, arrives in Cairo with nothing in his pockets. He is cared for by a Bahai and finally disappears and is heard of no more.

FIRST WORDS TO THE WEST

London—the City Temple filled to capacity. A majestic figure in white turban and gown stands in the pulpit. Abdul Baha is giving a public address for the first time in his life.

"This is a new cycle of human power. All the horizons are luminous, and the world will, indeed, become as a garden and a paradise. It is the hour of the unity of the sons of men, and of the drawing together of all races and all classes. . . . The gift of God to this enlightened age is the knowledge of the oneness of mankind and of the fundamental oneness of religion."

THE POOR ARE MINE

New York—the Bowery Mission. Abdul Baha is speaking to the poor of the city.

"Jesus Christ said 'Blessed are the poor.' . . . When he appeared it was the poor who first accepted him, not the rich. Consequently you are his disciples, his comrades. One night, when Jesus was in the fields, it began to rain, and there being no place where he could seek shelter, he lifted up his eyes toward heaven, saying: Oh Father! my bed is the cold ground, my lamps are the stars and my food the grass of the fields, yet am I not destitute; for to me Thou hast granted this blessing—Thou hast given me the poor; they are mine. Therefore am I the richest man on earth! ”

When Abdul Baha leaves the meeting he places a twenty-five cent piece in the palm of each of the four hundred men present. The Bahais, following after him, try to buy some of these coins for fifty cents; but not one exchange is made.

THE FARMER OF GALILEE

War is passing over Palestine: the doors are again closed—no news can come in or out. A plague of locusts, added to Turkey's unprecedented extortions, and to Germany's extensive buying of foodstuffs to be shipped to the "Fatherland," has brought about a state of awful famine. In the cities men, women and children walk about like skeletons; forgetting all standards, all ties, striving only to preserve life a little longer. Bodies lie along the road unnoticed. In Lebanon alone one hundred thousand die of starvation.

On the plains of Tiberias and of Adassieh, Abdul Baha is supervising extensive works of agriculture. At the outset of hostilities he had procured and planted a vast acreage of land, and now the harvests are periodically, and continuously being reaped, and the wheat and corn distributed among the poor.

Abdul Baha by his resourcefulness and energy has saved the communities of Akka and Haifa.

SUNSET ON MOUNT CARMEL

A cluster of cypress trees, on the slope of Mount Carmel; very slim, very green, they lift their arms high toward the heavens. In their fragrant shade sits the Servant of Baha surrounded by his disciples, and wistfully he speaks to them, at the close of his long day.

"I am straining my ears toward the East and toward the West, toward the North and toward the South, that haply I may hear the songs of harmony and fellowship. Oh how I yearn to see men united, even as pearls on a shining strand; as the brilliant Pleiades; as the rays of the sun; as the gazelles on the meadow.

"The Mystic Nightingale is singing for them, will they not listen? The Bird of Paradise is warbling, will they not hear? The Angel of the Kingdom is hailing them; will they not waken? The Messenger of the Covenant is pleading; will they not heed?

"Ah, I am waiting, waiting for the glad news that my friends are the embodiment of truth and candor; the incarnation of love and benevolence and the manifestation of unity and concord! Will they not rejoice my heart? Will they not fulfill my hopes? Will they not answer my call?

"I am waiting, I am patiently waiting!"

CHAPTER IV

THE MARTYRS

"If thy hair be dyed in thine own blood, this is greater to me than the creation of two worlds."

Hidden Words—Baha-U-Llah

The Bab is in prison. His followers, persecuted and pursued, are seeking asylum in many directions. A company of about three hundred and twenty men, under the leadership of Jenabe Quddus have possessed themselves of the castle of Tabarsi, and are taking measures for its defense. A wall is being constructed around the castle, while within, armorers are unceasingly occupied in the making of swords. Through it all, and constantly, those who are conversant with the ethics of the New Cause are teaching all who lack learning, so that the faith of every one may be based on understanding, rather than on blind devotion.

THE CASTLE OF TABARSI

Presently news of the intrenched Babís has spread abroad, and the fortress is surrounded by a host, of from two to three thousand skilled soldiers and experienced marksmen, under the command of Prince Mehdi Kuli Mirza. Jenabe Quddus, being aware of the fact that the besiegers expect yet greater enforcements, prepares for a sortie. At nightfall, riding with Babu'l-Bab at his side, he issues forth followed by three hundred men, and sets fire to the magazine of the enemy. In the confusion that follows, he falls upon the royal troops pressing hard his advantage, and these, taken utterly by surprise, are put to flight.

The Babís have retired, leaving only three of their number on the field, but they carry with them their beloved chief, grievously wounded. Quddus still commands, although his teeth have been knocked out and half his face is shattered. For three months he tastes nothing except a little tea and broth, yet he shows, at no time, the least trace of pain or uneasiness.

The royalists continue to attack unremittingly, and seek by every device to capture the fort, but all their efforts fail. The little garrison, completely resigned, yet animated by superhuman heroism, has so far proved unconquerable.

THE SORTIE

Now Babu'l-Bab seeks the presence of Quddus, saying "I can no longer bear to look upon the wound which mars your glorious visage. Suffer me, I pray you, to lay down my life this night," and Quddus gives permission.

Babu'l-Bab has made it a practice to ride out at nightfall, followed by nineteen companions, to attack the splendidly accoutred enemy with simple handmade weapons. On each occasion he has wrought considerable havoc and has returned to the castle without loss. This time, in the same fashion, he calmly advances toward the very center of the hostile army, now seven thousand strong.

The night is dark; rain is falling heavily; the Babis are wearing white shawls across their shoulders so that they may not harm one another by mistake. At the last moment Babu'l-Bab turns to the one who walks beside him, "Mount behind me on my horse, and when I say, 'Bear me to the castle' turn back with all speed." Then he gives command to charge.

In the conflict that ensues, he forges ahead like a streak of lightning, every obstacle going down before him, and he has passed to a point beyond the seventh entrenchment of the enemy, when a bullet strikes him in the breast. Faintly he whispers, 'Bear me to the Castle,' and his companion, turning his horse's head, gallops back.

THE FAREWELL

On reaching the fort Babu'l-Bab is borne, unconscious, into the presence of Quddus who, at the sight of him, neither moves from his place nor makes the least demonstration of grief. He only says "Leave me with him," and motions that the door be closed. An hour elapses and the Babis, watching in the hallway, hear the sound of two voices. This continues until finally, losing restraint, they peer through a fissure in the wall, into the room.

Babu'l-Bab on bended knees is seated by his chief, listening attentively as though to instructions. He is heard to ask "Are you well pleased with me?"

Another hour passes, then Quddus opens the door saying, "Things which previously I deemed it unallowable to utter, I have shared with him. Now I have said my farewells—take the body away."

In this manner passes the First Disciple—the First Letter of the Living.

THE TREATY

Now the provisions in the castle are exhausted and the garrison, which for long has been subsisting on grass and leather, drawing its strength, only, from the words and example of Quddus, is impatient for the bliss of martyrdom. Presently word is brought from the Prince, "For nine months have both sides been engaged in hostilities without any truce or respite. Now we consent, for the sake of peace, to agree to the terms you may propose."

Quddus reads the letter and says: "Although he meditates treachery, yet, because his designs conform with destiny, will we suffer his schemes to prevail." He therefore writes, "If you will guarantee our safety we will depart out of your land," and the Prince swears on the Koran to respect these terms, adding in a letter, "None shall let or hinder you in any way."

THE FEAST

The siege is over. Quddus, with a handful of his officers, is being entertained in the Prince's headquarters. Outside, on the plain before the royal tent, a feast is spread, and the Babis having been relieved of their arms, are invited to sit and appease their hunger. They draw near hesitant, but attracted, looking with famished eyes upon the steaming meats—they who for long have tasted not even of grass.

They have taken their places when, suddenly, the soldiers lift their rifles aiming at the banquet board and, at a word of command, fire.

So does the garrison of Tabarsi feast at the table of martyrdom.

THE LEADER OF THE BABIS

Now the victory is celebrated. Three hundred and twenty men have, after nine months, been vanquished by an army of seven thousand. The relief and delight of the royal troops of Persia know no bounds.

The Prince is entering Barfursh, native city of Quddus, which is filled with a rejoicing multitude, and decorated as though for a great holiday. A handful of captives, so weakened by starvation that they can hardly stand, are driven in his train. Barefooted, laden with chains, they pass through the howling mob.

The Chief of the Ulemas has Quddus brought before him and asks by whose authority he dares wear the green turban. Quddus answers that his mother was a lineal descendant of the Prophet, and that, in adopting this emblem, he is within his rights. The priest, grasps the turban, throws it to the ground and stamps upon it. "Soon he will claim to be the mouthpiece of God, the revealer of His will," and drawing his sword, cuts off his ears. Then he delivers him to the people who, with shrieks of fanatical fury, fall upon their prey and cut him to pieces.

Amid the din, the voice of Quddus is heard crying "Would that my mother could see the splendor of my nuptials!"

So dies, the Great Warrior, the Great Teacher, the Great Mystic—the Eighteenth Letter of the Living.

On hearing of the tragedy of Tabarsi, the Bab in his prison, is overwhelmed with grief. Tears rain from his eyes and for days he is unwilling to taste of food. He sends one of the believers, who is attending him, on a pilgrimage to the places which enshrine the bodies of these heroes who had sealed their faith with their blood. "Bring back to me," he says, "a handful of that holy earth which covers my beloved ones—Quddus and Babu'l-Bab."

THE SIEGE OF ZANJAN

The scene which was enacted in Tabarsi is repeated in the cities of Neyriz and Zanzan. For months, tiny garrisons hold their own against overwhelming odds, and the armies of Persia stand baffled in the face of adversaries whose power they cannot measure.

In Zanzan, Zeynab, whose heart has been inflamed with love of the New Cause, having adopted boy's attire, insinuates herself behind the barricade and, in the encounter that follows, shows such audacity and resourcefulness, that the commander of the fortress, watching from one of the turrets, picks her out for special commendation. When she is brought before him, he recognizes her as a maiden from one of the nearby villages, and asks the reason for her joining their forces. "Do not deny me," she begs, "The privilege of throwing in my lot with you, or withhold from me the crown of martyrdom!"

So for nine months Zeynab continues among the defenders, being given no especial post, but serving wherever she pleases. Hardly eating or sleeping, her sword ever at her side, she inspires her companions by her flaming ardor, and becomes known and feared by her enemies.

One morning she seeks the commander of the fort and throws herself at his feet. "My life," she says, "is nearing its end. Intercede for me with my Master."

During the course of that day she falls on the field riddled with bullets.

THE CAUSE SPREADS

The Babis persist in their teaching, though nowhere are they safe from spies; citizens denounce their oldest friends and brother betrays brother. Persecution has become the order of the day and adherence to the New Faith is almost tantamount to a death warrant.

In spite of these conditions students meet, study and discuss the doctrine of the Bab, willing to follow the truth at whatever price; then once convinced, they issue forth and themselves carry on the work. So does the influence of the Cause increase, as the blood spilled on the marketplace adds its compelling voice to the whispered fervor of the Babis.

DEATH HAS NO TERRORS

Now the Grand Vizir addresses the uncle of the Bab surnamed Khal-i-Azam. "We are loath to inflict the slightest injury upon you. A word of recantation is sufficient to set you free," and the answer comes, "Your Excellency! To refuse to acknowledge the Mission of the Bab would be to deny the divine character of the Message which Mohammed, Jesus, Moses and all the Prophets have revealed. God knows that whatever I have heard and read concerning the sayings and doings of those Messengers, I have been privileged to witness in this Youth—this beloved kinsman of mine, from his earliest boyhood."

As he is being conducted to his death Khal-i-Azam cries to the multitude: "For a thousand years you have prayed that the Promised One be made manifest, and now that he is come, you have driven him into hopeless exile, and have arisen to exterminate his companions. With my last breath I pray that the Almighty may wipe away the stain of your guilt and enable you to awaken from the sleep of heedlessness."

At these words the headsman hesitates and pressure has to be brought upon him to fulfill his task. After the execution, he leaves the city and seeks another form of employment, to the end of his life recalling this incident with repentance and tears.

Mirza Qurban Ali, an outstanding figure in the community, is arrested in Teheran. "I am unwilling," remarks his judge, "to pronounce a sentence of death against the possessor of so exalted a station." "Why do you hesitate," the prisoner exclaims. "He in whose path I am laying down my life has, from time immemorial, inscribed my name on the scroll of his chosen martyrs. This indeed is the day in which I shall seal my faith with my life-blood."

Suleyman Khan, his body studded with lighted candles, walks singing along the streets.

*"Happy he, whom love's intoxication
Has so possessed, that he scarce knows,
Whether, at the feet of the Beloved,
Be head or turban that he throws."*

ROYAL PAVILLION ON THE OUTSKIRTS OF TEHERAN

"Why do you not dance," the people cry mockingly, "since you find death so pleasant?"

So Suleyman Khan complies and dances, a living torch, towards the market-place.

Years pass. According to the inclination of the priests in the different cities, persecution now waxes, now wanes. One province is the scene of the most horrible atrocities, while the serenity of a neighboring one continues undisturbed. The believers, rearing their families in the shadow of death, meet that death when it comes, according to their own various temperaments—some with complete submission, others by heroic defense of themselves and of their families.

So turns the last page in Babi history.

THE WAY OF NON-RESISTANCE

Baha-U-Llah is guiding the affairs of the Cause. He, who had been indicated by his great Forerunner, has assumed leadership of the Babis (hereafter to be known as Bahais) and from his exile in Turkey, there issues a new teaching. "It is better that you be killed than that you kill one another," and the ringing announcement, "We have taken from you the law of murder."

These words being spoken, the days of self-protection are over.

Now in the land of Persia a strange scene is being enacted. Men and women behold the unspeakable agony of their associates, making the while, not the least remonstrance; only standing by to reinforce the courage of the beloved victims, with their own exalted courage.

At this period, the number of martyrdoms approaches the appalling figure of thirty thousand—a total in which many children are included.

THE MESSENGER

From the window of the Royal Pavillion, on the outskirts of Teheran, the Shah, examining the countryside through a telescope, discerns in the distance, the figure of a man outlined on a rock. The next morning he notices him again, and the next, and on the fourth day, seeing that the strange sentinel is still at attention, orders him to be brought into his presence.

The man is escorted to the audience chamber, and it is seen that he is a youth of remarkable nobility of bearing. On receiving permission to approach, he walks boldly to the dais and offers a letter to the Shah. "I have come to your Majesty," he says, in an assured but respectful tone, "with a firman from my Lord Baha-U-Llah."

BADI IN CHAINS

The attitude of the messenger, his terms and especially his reference to the redoubtable Captive throws the court into confusion. The Ministers are appalled; the Shah is incensed with anger. How does this country boy dare to mention one who has caused so much disturbance! He is asked to give his reasons for using the word firman. Does he not know that a firman is issued only by a king?

The youth answers simply that the letter did come from a king. It came from Baha-U-Llah.

The attendants drag him to an outer tent and place his feet in the bastinado. What is his name? Badi. Who are his friends? He has no friends; he has come from Akka; he has spoken to no one. He has desired, only, to fulfill his mission; now that it is accomplished he has nothing more to fear. The Shah sends word that the names of his associates must be revealed and the ferrashes apply themselves to their task; but although his feet become fountains of blood, the victim continues firm, and the executioners are the first to tire.

"Say then, that you have brought a petition," they exclaimed breathlessly, "and we will give you respite!" But Badi replies with utmost serenity, "I have carried a firman from my Lord Baha-U-Llah."

Now iron rods and bricks are piled in a brazier and these, when they have become red-hot, are applied to his breast, his arms, his feet. Badi does not flinch, he shows no sign of pain, he even helps his tormentors, himself placing the burning bricks upon his body, and sometimes he cries out, "Oh my God! I thank Thee for so eminent a favor!" This continues at intervals for eight days.

One morning the Shah passes the tent and calls out, "Has the young man confessed?"

"Your Majesty, we have tried everything. We cannot make him suffer."

"Then," says the Shah, "let him die."

A block of wood is brought, and one of the ferrashes raises a heavy bludgeon.

"Young man, you will be freed if you say that you have brought a petition to his Majesty."

"Do not speak of freedom to one who is completely free, so now, for the last time, I tell you," and he raises his voice triumphantly, "that I have carried a firman from my Lord Baha-U-Llah."

With this the mace crashes down, and the great soul of Badi passes from the confines of the earth.

THE TABLET

The Shah sits in his study, turning over the pages of the letter. His face is congested with anger, and his body trembles; nevertheless he reads:

"Oh Shah, I was, in truth, an ordinary man asleep upon my couch, when the breezes of the Most Glorious passed over me, giving understanding of that which has been. This thing is not from me, but from One mighty and all-knowing. He it was who ordered me to sound the proclamation between earth and heaven, and for this has there befallen that, whereat the eyes of those who know, overflow with tears. I did not enter school or college. Inquire of the city wherein I lived, that you may be assured that I am not of those who speak falsely. This is a leaf which the breezes of the will of your God, the mighty, the extolled, had stirred. Could it be still when the rushing winds blew? No, by my Lord of Names and Attributes, for it was moved according to His will; in the presence of the Eternal, non-entity has no resistance. His imperial command it was, which obliged me to speak for His celebration among the nations. In truth I was as dead when I became animated by the hand of your Lord. . . .

"Oh Shah! Consider this Oppressed One with equity, and judge fairly concerning that which has befallen him. Verily, God has appointed you His shadow among His servants, and the symbol of His power before the dwellers in the land. Judge between ourselves, and those who have persecuted us without proof. Truly, they who surround you, love you for themselves, whereas I love you for yourself, and desire but that which will assist you unto the station of grace, and turn you toward the right hand of justice. Your Lord is witness unto this. Oh Shah! If you could hear the cooing of the Dove of Eternity, upon the branches of the Sadratu'l Montaha, verily it would cause you to attain unto a station from which you would behold upon the earth, naught but the splendor of the Adored One. Then would you regard dominion as a thing of small account, and resigning it to the first comer, turn toward the Horizon aglow with the lights of His Countenance; enduring no more the burden of Empire except as a means to assist in the Cause of your Lord. . . .

HAJI MIRZA AQASI

CHAPTER V

THE ENEMIES

"The enemies plot and God plots but God is best plotter."
—Mohammed.

The summer palace of Mirza Buzurg, Minister of the Court. A colorful group of nobles and officials of State are gathered on the terrace around a great table, which is laden with delicacies from various climes. There is music from a stringed orchestra, and chanting and much merriment. It is the wedding feast of the youthful son of the house.

As evening approaches a platform is raised in the garden. It is set with a city square, fronting a royal pavillion—all in miniature form—and illumined by lanterns hung at angles on the nearby trees.

When all is in readiness, the guests leave the banquet board and approach the improvised theater, grouping themselves among the flower beds, while a child appears on an upper gallery of the house. This is Mirza Hussein Ali, young kinsman of the bridegroom who, from a distance, is taking part in the festivities.

The play begins. Little figures are sweeping the ground and sprinkling it with water; courtiers, in velvets and silks are emerging from the wings and taking their places about the dais; a trumpet is heard, a voice cries "Prepare the way. Prepare the way" and the Shah, with golden crown upon his head, with ermine robe trailing behind him, enters and seats himself upon the throne.

Now the Grand Vizir presents a document; his Majesty signs with a flourish, and immediately the army passes, marching to the front. Then booming of cannon, cries of triumph, songs of victory, and amid clouds of smoke and dust the conqueror returns, dragging behind him a captive in chains.

The Shah watches the effective entry, and with proud gesture commands "Off with his head!" So the executioner hurries in with a minute block and axe, and sets to work on the spot.

The last scene is a stirring one. A review, the national anthem, waving of flags; finally a herald advancing to the center of the stage, blows a fanfare on his trumpet and proclaims that the war is over.

The guests have said their farewells, and are leaving on horseback and in their carriages; the servants are stripping the table of its goblets and golden dishes; the host is engaged with his son, and the ladies of the household with the bride, and a child with pink cheeks and starry eyes, runs about the garden searching under the trees.

"Little Master, what can I do for you?" the showman calls out as he passes down the road, with his properties well packed away.

"Where is the Shah?" the child is trembling with excitement. "Where is the Grand Vizir? Where is the Executioner?"

The showman smiles, then pointing to his baggage he answers "They are all in the box."

A PROPOSED INTERVIEW

The Bab's public declaration at Mecca, and the whirlwind activities of his disciples are discomfiting to the government; for not only do the people respond to the New Message, with restless eagerness, but the most eminent scholars also, are giving it undue attention. Therefore when the Bab forwards a letter to the Royal presence, begging that an audience be accorded him, the learned divines of the capital express their willingness to hear and consider his claim.

Even Mohammed Shah is stirred to interest. He has heard that the young Reformer is possessed of strange powers, and that already he has performed several miraculous cures, and being in a state of gout, which causes him continued discomfort, the royal sufferer is willing to listen to these expositions on the bare chance of deriving physical benefit.

A PRECAUTIONARY MEASURE

So circumstances are inclining toward an interview, when the Grand Vizir, who for thirteen years has enjoyed unrivalled ascendancy over the mind of his sovereign, becomes apprehensive. Utterly ignorant and vain, extravagant and lazy, he has lowered the prestige of the nation and carried it to the verge of bankruptcy. Now, should the Shah be allowed within the radius of this young man's influence, he might be affected by his apparently irresistible charm; he might even be cured, and then become involved with new ideas, and awake to consider the interests of the people!

Haji Mirza Aqasi decides that the proposed meeting shall not take place.

As a natural sequence, therefore, the Shah, writes to the Bab, in his own hand: "Since the royal train is on the verge of departure from Teheran; to meet in a befitting manner is impossible. Do you go to Maku, and there abide and rest for a while, engaged in praying for our victorious state."

So the Bab is escorted to the Fortress of Maku, situated in the native province of the Grand Vizir.

One day, following these events, as Haji Mirza Aqasi walks through the park, accompanying one of the royal princes, the boy says to him "Haji, why did you send the Bab to Maku?" and the Minister makes answer, "You are still young, and there are certain things which you cannot understand, but know that if he had come to Teheran, you and I would not be here, as we are, strolling care-free in the cool shade of the trees."

In spite of his precautions, the hour arrives when Haji Mirza Aqasi, after a long life spent in acquiring wealth at the expense of his country, is forced into an ignominious exile, where he spends his last days.

THE CROWN PRINCE

An assembly room at Tabriz. The Bab is being examined by Haji Mullah Mahmud in the presence of the priests and of the Crown Prince.

Question. "Did you compose these books?"

The Bab. "They are from God."

Question. "If they are yours, say so."

The Bab. "They are mine."

Question. "Then your tongue is like the Tree on Sinai! Now who gave you the name of Bab?"

The Bab. "God gave it to me."

Question. "What is its meaning?"

The Bab. "The same as the word bab."

Question. "Then you are the Gate to the City of Knowledge."

The Bab. "Yes."

Question. "Show me a miracle suitable to your claim."

The Bab. "What miracle do you desire?"

Question. "His Majesty Mohammed Shah is sick. Restore him to health."

The Crown Prince hastily, "Why go so far? Rather let him restore you to youthfulness."

The Bab. "It is not in my power."

MIRZA TAKI KHAN

Here the conference breaks up, and the following day the Bab is subjected to the bastinado.

The Crown Prince seemed to be somewhat apprehensive concerning the supernatural powers attributed to the Bab, and did not propose that miracles be attempted in the case of his dying father. And now the illness of the Shah has completed its term and Nasiru'd Din, at the age of eighteen, succeeds him.

THE GRAND VIZIR

With the accession of the new monarch, Mirza Taki Khan seizes the reins of government and, as a first step toward the absolutism which he demands, turns with awful concentration upon the Babi Movement. Under his direction, the church and state join forces for the extermination of the unwelcome sect, pursuing their object with relentless energy; and the pages of Persian history become clotted with blood, while unsavory rumors penetrate to foreign lands.

Now the Grand Vizir assembles his councillors about him and points out the inconsistency of dealing with the followers, while the Leader is left unmolested. "Behold the storm which this man has provoked in the hearts of my fellow countrymen! Nothing short of his public execution will enable this distracted land to recover its tranquility." With this he signs the death warrant of the Bab and settles back with the pleasant assurance, that the Light which shines, with such devastating brightness, from behind prison walls, will shortly be extinguished.

This order having been carried out, the fortunate star of Mirza Taki Khan, little by little, begins to wane. The arrogance of his manner, the overbearing authority which he exercises at all times, becomes increasingly irksome to the youthful sovereign, and the time arrives when the Grand Vizir deems it advisable to absent himself from court. In the company of his wife, a Princess of royal birth whose position has so far safeguarded him, he retreats to his Palace of Fin, situated south of Kashan, and here receives the startling news that choice, in the mode of his death, will be given him.

Mirza Taki Khan retires to the bath and allows his veins to be opened.

A RED LETTER DAY

Time passes bringing with it an event, the consequences of which cannot be measured.

Nasiru'd Din Shah is riding in the country, followed by the Royal Cavalcade when, two young men, standing by the roadside, suddenly press close crying out "We offer a petition! We offer a petition!" The Shah reins in his horse exclaiming irritably, "Fools, what do you want?" At that minute the men open fire.

THE PALACE OF FIN

It is an awkward and desperate act, perpetrated by two simple-minded Babis, completely unbalanced by the fate of their Master. The pistols were charged with bird-shot and could not have inflicted serious injury upon anyone; nevertheless the Royal Person is severely shaken, and the insolence of the attempt gives the already exasperated government excuse to, still further, accentuate its program of severity.

A CARNIVAL OF BLOOD

Now dawns, in Teheran, a day of such horror, that history itself can present none to make parallel. The Babis, who are unwilling to deny their faith, are allotted, individually, to the officials of the crown, and divided among the priest and merchant classes—these to put their victims to death, each and every one, according to his own personal fancy. The Shah disposes of his Babi by proxy, but his Ministers show themselves less delicate, while the tradesmen are eager and competent to perform their task. So as these amateur executioners vie with one another to devise hitherto undreamed of tortures, the streets and bazaars of the capitol run deep with innocent blood.

A strange incident is afforded by a citizen who stands by, prepared to enjoy the unusual spectacle. This man is so struck by the fortitude of the martyrs, that he rushes forward crying out "Kill me too! I also am a Babi" and so shares the fate of those he had come to condemn.

And now silence falls upon the city of Teheran. The Shah retires to his chamber; the attendants softly draw the curtains of his bed, and wish his Majesty good night.

THE AGE OF STEEL

The chief characteristics of Nasiru'd Din Shah is fear of the new—fear of new ideas, of new manners, of new methods. Consistently he lays a heavy hand on the reins of progress, and keeps his people far in the rear guard of civilization. He is, on one occasion, heard to remark, "I want Ministers who do not know whether Brussels is a capitol or a cabbage."

The New Faith, taking root and flourishing at the footstool of his throne, therefore, fills him with abhorrance. Aiming, as it does, at the very heart of Islamic theology it appears, in his eyes, both a blasphemy and a menace, and becomes the obsession of his life.

The reign of Nasiru'd Din Shah is an ordeal through which the Champions of Freedom have to pass, and the memory of him is to remain the reverse side of a glorious picture which time will serve, only to intensify.

In 1896, on the eve of his Golden Jubilee, Nasiru'd Din Shah is killed by the bullet of a revolutionary.

CHAPTER VI

THE WOMAN

"The Striking!

"What is the Striking?

"And what shall make you to understand how the Striking will be?

"On that day men shall be as moths scattered abroad, and the mountains shall become like carded wool of various colors driven by the wind."

—Koran.

In the province of Kazvin a child has been growing into girlhood. Possessed of rare beauty, of quick wit, of striking originality of thought and manner, she has become an idol to her family and a joy to the community at large.

For these reasons her father, yielding to her in all things, has given her opportunities of learning never before afforded, in the land of Persia, to one of the female sex; even he has gone so far as to permit her to attend, from behind drawn curtains, the discussions of the divines who habitually frequent his house. "Would that she had been born a boy," he often exclaims, deploring the prospect of this vital personality forever immured behind the walls of a harem.

It is at this time that Seyyed Kazim is holding his classes in Karbala, and from there, rumors of his startling interpretations of the holy books of Islam begin to circulate in many parts. The girl's interest is stirred by these reports and she initiates a correspondence with the great scholar, who evidently considers her worthy of receiving, at his hands, personal consideration and guidance. He even addresses her by a name of his own giving, being that of Kurratu'l-Ayne (Consolation of the Eyes) and the girl accepts this name and uses it as her own.

THE PILGRIMAGE

Time passes. The girl has become a poetess of repute, and her name is respected throughout the land. She has been given in marriage to her uncle's son to whom she has borne three children, but the restrictions of domestic life lie heavy upon her and the time arrives when, to the horror of her friends, she bids farewell to those who are dear to her and sets out to seek Seyyed Kazim.

As she nears Karbala her heart is aglow with excitement. Her past associations, severed temporarily but probably never to be renewed, do not concern her. She is thinking of the Teacher who has so fired her imagination. When she meets him he will tell her what to expect of the future; he will explain the steps that have led him to his conclusions; he will lead her, support her, and indicate the approach of the initiate. Position, comfort, security, even good name—these do not matter.

On arriving in the city Kurratu'l-Ayne learns that Seyyed Kazim is dead.

THE DREAM

An upper chamber of a house in Karbala—two candles are burning on a table which is covered with the writings of Seyyed Kazim. The young woman, broken by disappointment and exhausted by long reflection, has fallen asleep, her head resting on the scattered pages in the circle of light.

And as she sleeps in that silent room her spirit, wandering in the land of dreams, comes upon a radiant Personage who appears, standing just a little above the earth. She clearly sees his long coat, his green turban, and she hears his voice of a sweetness that is painful, and she understands his words. Then, in the dream, she says to herself that she must remember something of this that she is hearing, and she catches a phrase and holds it and repeats it, and waking still repeating it, writes it down.

STAR PUPIL

Kurratu'l-Ayne has joined the pupils of Seyyed Kazim and is learning from them the lessons given by their master. Her years of preparation have so developed her mind that, in a short time, she is able to grasp this system of education and presently, herself, becomes instructress of the others. By degrees her fame spreads abroad and doctors and sages travel from afar to discover the basis of her theories. From behind drawn curtains she meets these most experienced minds, reveals the sources of her deductions, and leading the way into unexpected depths, baffles them by her skill and eloquence.

It is at this time that she receives a letter from Mullah Hussein, which informs her that the expected One has been found.

THE PATH OF DESTINY

Kurratu'l-Ayne has embraced the faith of the Bab. Spontaneously, definitely and with utmost vigor she has grasped the banner of the Cause, and holds it high for the world to see. Moving from group to group, her features hid by the customary veil, she announces the approach of an era of freedom, and teaches new standards to be conferred upon a new generation.

She has written to the Bab declaring her belief in him, and has been enrolled among his disciples as the Seventeenth Letter of the Living. Being in constant communication she has received a copy of one of his commentaries, and as she studies it verse by verse, she comes upon a phrase which is startlingly familiar. Hurriedly, eagerly she searches among her papers till she discovers the page upon which she had written that first night in Karbala, on awaking from a dream. Comparing the two phrases she sees that they are identical, and realizes that she has indeed stepped upon the path of her destiny.

THE YOUNG MISSIONARY

Kurratu'l-Ayne, followed by a group of her ardent admirers, has carried the Message to Bagdad, in the land of Iraq. Openly deprecating the restrictions imposed on her sex by church and state, boldly setting forth a new plan by means of which woman shall be freed from hereditary bondage, she has stirred the imagination of the Islamic, Jewish and Christian communities and provoked, at the same time, the opposition of their leaders. Nevertheless, wherever she goes she is received with esteem and high consideration, and men of every rank gather about her to praise her virtues and perfections. In the neighboring villages, which she visits untiringly, people by the hundreds arise, begging to be allowed to follow her, but she consistently recommends that they remain at home, to carry on the work of the Cause in their own environment.

Presently, breaking upon these activities an order arrives, coming from the Central Government, and the lovely Missionary is forced to leave the dominion of Turkey.

THE RETURN

Now, in her native province, Kurratu'l-Ayne organizes a powerful party while her father looks on with disapproval. "If you," he says to her, "with your scholarship and intelligence were yourself, to claim to be the Bab, I would readily agree; but what can I do when you choose to follow this simple lad from Shiraz." And his daughter answers:

"With the knowledge that I possess it is impossible that I should be mistaken in the acceptance of Him whom all peoples anxiously expect. I have duly recognized him by the proofs of reason."

THE MURDER

At this time an ardent disciple of Seyyed Kazim passes through the city, on his way to the fortress of Maku. This scholar's curiosity concerning the New Cause has been aroused, and he hopes to have opportunity of meeting the Bab in his prison, and of discussing his claims.

BAGDAD, IRAQ

As he strolls in the market-place of Kazvin, he comes upon a crowd of ruffians engaged in tormenting a citizen. The man's turban has been twisted around his neck, and by it he is being dragged through the streets—a helpless target for blows and abuse. "What has been his crime?" the stranger asks and the answer is given "Haji Mullah Taki has declared this man a heretic because he has dared extoll in public the attainments of Seyyed Kazim." On hearing this, the stranger is carried away by a fanatical desire to avenge the memory of his beloved Master, so he seeks the presence of Haji Mullah Taki and drives a dagger into his breast.

The murdered man is the uncle of Kurratu'l-Ayne.

CONSEQUENCES

The city is in a state of tumultuous excitement and many Babis are mentioned as having participated in the crime. The stranger realizing the danger which threatens the innocent, therefore appears before the governor and offers to deliver the murderer into his hands, on condition that those suspected will be exonerated. The agreement is made and the stranger then proclaims himself to be the one whom they seek.

Now the heirs of Mullah Taki are not willing to satisfy themselves with a single victim and a campaign of barbarity is initiated in the town of Kazvin. Among those to suffer death is Sheykh Salih. He is the first Babi martyr—the first of a great company soon to follow after.

THE ESCAPE

Kurratu'l-Ayne is accused of having instigated the murder of her uncle and the authorities have her under surveillance. One day, as she sits in her room lost in meditation, she is aroused by a gentle knock, and a woman in the garments of a beggar enters, hastily closing the door behind her. The prisoner inquires the reason for this unexpected visit and the woman explains: Mirza Hussein Ali, a rich and influential Babi, living in Teheran, has arranged for an escape; at nightfall three horses will be in readiness at the garden gate and the woman herself with her husband will take charge of the journey and deliver her into the keeping of their master.

That night Kurratu'l-Ayne flees from her father's house and sets out to join Mirza Hussein Ali.

"THE STRIKING"

By the banks of a little stream which flows near the hamlet of Badasht the followers of the Bab are congregated in a series of gardens. They have come from many parts for the purpose of studying the New Cause and of discussing means whereby its principles may be put into action. These men, dazzled by the personality of their leader, are ready to adhere to him at whatever cost, yet hampered by the traditions of the past, do not yet realize that theirs is the privilege of applying these teachings and of making the first example.

On the outskirts of the farthest garden, a tent has been erected for the accommodation of the one woman in the assemblage. Hidden by the customary veil, and separated by convention from her fellow disciples, this woman has taken but small part in the proceedings and, with the approval of all, has remained aloof in her sequestered quarters. Her presence nevertheless has been felt for she is looked upon with infinite love, and her comrades have conferred upon her a new name expressing their veneration. Hereafter Kurratu'l-Ayne is to be called Tahireh (the Pure).

The Babis are grouped about the tent of Mirza Hussein Ali, now known as Baha-U-Llah, while he being indisposed, presides over the discussions from his bed. It is evening. The sun, like a golden globe, is sinking past the horizon and a breeze, enriched by the flowers to overwhelming sweetness, plays back and forth over the water which whispers as it rushes by. The charm of the hour is, little by little, taking possession of the disciples, and the peace of spiritual ease descends upon them bringing with it—silence.

A moment—then from out the shadows a figure comes into view. It is a woman tall, majestic, with radiant face exposed to the eyes of all. The Babis, startled from reveries, spring to their feet in amazement, in consternation—turning their heads away, murmuring their disapproval. Then someone curses beneath his breath, another cries aloud and a third, having drawn his sword, presses its blade to his throat, and gasping, covered with blood, falls convulsed upon the ground. Quddus, the beloved of the Bab, sits in his place his face dark with disapproval and the woman with utmost assurance, advances to his side and standing there begins to speak:—

Wherefore do they fear to put into practice that which they are ready to endorse with their life-blood? Did not the Bab proclaim a day when woman, the deprived, the repressed, shall open the lattice of the harem and step forth to take her place beside man? That day has dawned, and she has seen its dawning; that sun has risen and she has dared to look it in the face. With this she turns, flashing a look straight at Baha-U-Llah and continues:—

“The Striking! What is the Striking? And what shall make you to understand how the Striking will be?”

“Oh men, the time is fixed and the hour is present. The trumpet that you expected—verily it is I! The bell that you awaited—it is I—it is I! The old is finished, the old is dead; a new life is breathed into all existing things.

* “‘Amid gardens and rivers shall the pious dwell in the presence of the potent King.’ Behold, I announce the Day of Resurrection!”

The Babis are listening confused—perplexed; some are weeping quietly; Quddus has risen, and stands as if turned to stone.

Baha-U-Llah watches Tahireh with infinite satisfaction.

AN AUDIENCE

In the early days of her acceptance of the New Faith, before the mists of opposition had thickened on the horizon, Kurratu'l-Ayne greatly desired an interview with Mohammed Shah. This experience had been denied her, and now that the clouds of calamity are hanging low on every side, an order is issued for her appearance before his successor.

The audience chamber of Nasiru'd Din Shah crowded with nobles and state officials—his Majesty reclines among his cushions, his mother heavily veiled at his side. The golden midday sun streams through the latticed casements, forming tortuous patterns on the rich carpet and over the moving figures of the guests. There is sound of whispering voices broken into by smothered laughter; the Shah irritably taps his fingers on the jeweled arms of his throne.

Now, at the far end of the hall, a curtain has been lifted and replaced, and a veiled figure is advancing through the crowd which separates before her. The room has become absolutely still. At a distance of a few feet from the Royal Presence, the woman stops—every eye is trained on that spot—then with utmost deliberation, she throws back her veil and looking straight into the eyes of the Shah, begins to speak.

His Majesty has sent for her, she says, and she has eagerly responded to his summons. How happy is she to look upon the face of her king, and tell him of that which so insistently clamors at her heart. It is the consciousness of a time when the distinctions between the sexes will be abolished and the male and female set side by side; it is the vision of a day of service and steadfast action for the women of Persia, and of freedom to learn and to live.

The melody of her voice has ceased, but the eyes of Tahireh still hold the Shah's eyes while a smile, slowly dawning on her lips, begins to reflect itself on his. A nation's history wavers on its path, then with imperious gesture the Queen Mother rises, “Remove this woman or, in another instant, my son himself will fall into her net!”

THE HIGHEST FELICITY

Shortly after this event Tahireh is apprehended and confined in the house of the Mayor of Teheran. Here the noble ladies of the court come to visit the notorious prisoner, and their curiosity is immediately converted into complete subjection. Like many colored butterflies they hover about her, staring at her, timidly touching her, serving her with wistful solicitude. And Tahireh opens her heart to these children of her own sex, and tells them of the Hero who has come to set them free. And she composes a poem, addressing that hero as a tyrant who lays claim to her life, and she repeats the poem:—

The thralls of yearning love constrain, in the bonds of pain and calamity, These broken-hearted lovers of Thine to yield their lives in their zeal for Thee.

Since with sword in hand my Darling stand, with intent to slay, though I sinless be,

If it pleases Him—a tyrant's whim—I am well content with His tyranny.

*As in sleep I lay at the break of day, that cruel Charmer came to me,
And in the grace of His form and face, the dawn of the morn I seemed to see.*

The musk of Cathay might perfume gain from the scent those silken tresses rain,

While His eyes demolish a faith in vain attacked by the pagans of Tartary.

With those who turn from both love and wine, to the hermit's cell and the zealot's shrine,

What can I do? For our faith divine they hold as a thing of infamy.

The tangled curls of thy sweetheart's hair, and thy saddle and steed are thine only care,

In thy heart the infinite hath no share, nor the thought of the poor man's poverty.

Alexander's pomp and display be thine, the Kalandar's habit and way be mine,

That, if it pleases thee, I resign, this, though hard is enough for me.

The country of "I" and "We" forsake; thy home in annihilation make,

And fearing not this step to take, thou shalt gain the highest felicity.

THE DAY OF FULFILLMENT

Evening is falling on the city of Teheran and the Mayor's wife seeks the distinguished guest to wish her good-night. Crossing the threshold she comes into an atmosphere heavy with perfume, and in the flickering candlelight beholds her friend, clothed in white silk and adorned as a bride. Answering her startled look, Tahireh embraces her with warm affection urging her to be brave and to withhold her tears. "The hour of my martyrdom is fast approaching," she explains, "therefore permit no one to enter my room. From now on I intend to fast—a fast which I shall not break until I am brought face to face with my Beloved."

In accordance with these instructions the hostess, leaving Tahireh alone, sits on guard in the hall through the night and during the next day. And in that lonely watch, the voice which has enchanted thousands comes to her, through the panels of the door, intoning praises of the Beloved, and in her despair the woman cries "Lord, Lord! Turn from her this cup which her lips so desire to drink!"

It is on the second night that a strident knocking is heard at the garden gate and a man presents himself demanding admittance to the prisoner. Trembling so that she can hardly move, the Mayor's wife leads the way into the presence of her guest, whom she finds waiting expectantly, veiled from head to foot.

Tahireh is conducted, by a troop of ferrashes, to a park on the outskirts of the capitol, where a company of officers is engaged in riotous feasting. On her approach, a young lieutenant, completely under the influence of wine, rises to meet her. He leads her to a little distance from the banquet table and, as she stands in serene acquiescence, winds her own silken kerchief round and round her neck—tightening it till the breath leaves her body.

So is silenced that passionate voice which, rising from the curtained harem, proclaimed the dawn of a New Day—when Woman shall be the equal of Man.

SEYYED ASSADULLAH

CHAPTER VII

THE TEACHERS

"And he said unto them 'Follow me and I will make you fishers of men.'" —Mark 4:19,

It is during the infancy of Baha-U-Llah that Mirza Buzurg dreams a dream. He sees his child swimming in a vast illumined sea and the child's black hair floats behind him, spreading itself far and wide upon the waves. And fish of many colors arise to the surface and attach themselves, each to a separate hair; and they increase in number and keep increasing till they fill the waters back to the very horizon. And all the while the child continues to swim with great ease, and the fish of the sea follow after him—holding to his streaming locks.

* * * * *

THE UNIVERSITY OF AKKA

A Universal University in the town of Akka. Its dome is the sky; its columns are flowering trees; its books are the precepts of all the Prophets of the past; its president is Baha-U-Llah—and later his great son. And through the gates of this university pass Turks, Arabs, Persians, Hindus, Europeans, Americans—students from all the countries of the world, clothed in their native dress; and these seated on the ground, absorb according to their various capacities, the teachings which are to renovate the world.

INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION OF TRUTH

In following the faith of their ancestors, men are groping in mazes of tradition and dogma; the original Truth having been obscured and oftentimes entirely lost. The individual is consequently in a position where he must content himself with the husk, and he functions blindly, actuated chiefly by vague hopes and fears. However, if he seeks Truth with sincerity and courage, he will find that Reality is one; that it does not admit of multiplicity and is not divisible.

THE ONENESS OF HUMANITY

In the beginning, the earth was a particle shot out into space—coming from the sun. Everything that thereafter developed upon it was of identical substance—Sun-substance. The races have therefore the one origin and do not differ in essentials. They have equal rights on this planet, which is their mutual home.

RELIGION MUST CONFORM WITH SCIENCE AND REASON

Science and religion are balanced wings upon which man may ascend. Science brings the invisible into the realm of understanding; religion is aware of the invisible which has not yet been discovered. Science and religion both aspire to the same end—that of illumination. If man counts upon science alone, he will land in the bog of materialism; if he depends upon religion alone, he will fall into the slough of superstition. The true scientist and the true religionist do not deny each other.

THE FOUNDATION OF ALL RELIGIONS IS ONE

Truth is the foundation of all religions. It has operated through different Individuals in various epochs. These Individuals, conscious of their connection with the Divine Source, have proclaimed themselves to be the way by means of which men may progress to a higher state of spiritual development. They are sign-posts indicating the same trail of ascent; partners in the same task; voices proclaiming the same Message. No wonder that the Great Religions have remained practically intact. The followers of each know that they have the Truth, and their faith remains unshaken in the face of efforts made by the officious who would convert them. Yet the thing that they do not know is that all have the Truth. There are no heathen among those who seek God.

REVELATION

Each Divine Revelation is in two parts. The first is the exposition of divine truths and principles; this is essential and belongs to the eternal world. The second deals with practical life according to the evolution of man and the exigencies of the times; this, as society develops and outgrows it, is unimportant. The first part is identical in all revelations; it is the foundation of the One Religion—the Religion of God.

PREJUDICE OF ALL KINDS MUST BE FORGOTTEN

Prejudice is not the result of common sense. It is a quality developed through inheritance, ignorance and bad association. Prejudice is the greatest obstacle on the path toward Unity. It is a triviality that will melt away under the light of Knowledge—which brings understanding. It is the essence of self. When the chalice is full of self, there is no room for the water of life.

EQUALITY OF THE SEXES

Men and women must enjoy equal rights, equal privileges and equal opportunities. According to the spirit of this age, woman must advance and fulfill her mission in all departments of life. The world, in the past, has been ruled by strength, and man has dominated woman by reason of his more forceful and aggressive qualities, both of body and mind. But the balance is already shifting; force is losing its dominance, and mental alertness, intuition and the spiritual qualities of love and service are gaining ascendancy. A better civilization will be brought about by a balancing of the masculine and feminine elements.

UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE

In this day, when the peoples of the world have free access to one another, a universal language is essential. By this means men will be enabled to form acquaintance and initiate works in common, and a new comradeship will be established upon the face of the entire globe. This new language is to be auxiliary, and will be used side by side with the native tongue; the study of it will be obligatory in all schools. The universal language will be chosen from among those already existing, or else will be formed from the component parts of many.

THE ECONOMIC QUESTION

The plan of society must be one that will eliminate poverty so that everyone, according to his capacity and position, may share in comfort and well-being. Some men are overburdened with riches while others starve in the streets. This condition is wrong and has to be remedied.

Now the remedy must be carefully undertaken. Absolute equality would be impracticable; even if it could be brought about, it would not continue. Humanity, like a great army, requires generals, captains, officers and soldiers—all with their appointed duties. Degrees are required so that a stable organization may be ensured; and an organization is necessary to control and improve the state. There must be a limit to riches and also to poverty; but this condition will not come into being through an array of capital against labor, and of labor against capital; but rather by a voluntary attitude which will, in time, develop. A proper balancing will not be accomplished by means of war and bloodshed.

Employees shall not be paid merely by wages; rather shall they be partners in every work. All the governments of the world must unite and organize an Assembly which will act with wisdom and power to protect the rights of all.

PATRIOTISM

In former ages it has been said: "To love one's native land is faith" but today the instructions are: "Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind." Therefore, loyalty is to be given to man, for land rightly belongs, not to individual nations but to humanity as a whole.

WORLD UNION

The people are to aspire to, and work for a unified commonwealth, governed by representatives of all the nations; which representatives shall in no wise consider their fellow-countrymen as their constituents, but rather the inhabitants of the entire globe. These federated states, having disposed of their armies and navies, and retaining such force only, as will act as international police, will be free to devote their attention and resources to the upbuilding of conditions in all parts.

This is the plan of a new democracy; the organism of a new society:

THE UNITED STATES OF THE WORLD

When the students have learned the lessons they bid farewell to the beloved Master and scatter, each in a state of utmost dedication, going his way.

THE WAY OF RELIGION

Haji Ameen returns to Persia and here, providing himself with a stock of small accessories such as women use, he travels from city to city, from house to house, supporting himself as he goes along by the proceeds of his sales; at the same time diffusing information concerning the Cause. When he meets with response, he tarries a while in that region, to indicate the first approaches to a Universal Faith and then, taking up his bundle, continues on his way. Proceeding in this manner, he makes circuit of his native land, leaving behind him a trail of friends; and always he operates in secret and recommends that like discretion be used after his departure.

At certain seasons of the year his pupils begin to think of his return. They have, during his absence, been carrying on the work, and ever larger groups await the advent of their peddler-teacher. He does not fail them; as quietly as he had left he reappears and, resuming the lessons where they had been left off, conducts his class toward wider vistas of understanding.

Presently the scholars themselves develop into teachers, and these, following the example of their master, issue forth and spread over the land of Persia, a shimmering network composed of the universal ideals of Baha-U-Llah.

THE WAY OF MYSTICISM

Jamal-Ed-Din journeys to India and settles down in the town of Rangoon, near Calcutta. Gathering different groups about him, he lectures on the principles of the Cause, yet finds that social ethics do not attract the mystical Hindu temperament. He therefore publishes an edition of the Seven Valleys written by Baha-U-Llah, and with this book in hand, addresses his audiences on the stages of the soul's journey from the earthly home to the divine dwelling; which stages are seven.

The first is

THE VALLEY OF SEARCH

In which the traveller mounts the steed of Patience. Without the service of this steed he will make no headway and can not attain the goal.

Here he will be encompassed by beings in a state of frenzied search. How many a Jacob he meets, wandering in quest of Joseph! What crowds journeying toward the Adored One! What enamored hosts following the Desired One! His heart, detached from this world and the next, each moment discerns a new mystery, each hour a new law, and so guided by the Invisible, who, at every step fans his ardor, he continues on his way toward the Horizon of the Beloved. . . .

The second stage is

where his heart will be wholly melted.

Here, under the canopy of attraction, the gorgeous Sun of Desire blazes-- shooting off rays that consume all reason. . . .

Pain waits in this valley, no other steed knows the way. . . .

Here the traveller has no thought but of his love, and no longing but for his goal. Each moment he flings away his life, and at every step he lays his head at the feet of the Beloved. . . .

The third stage is

THE VALLEY OF WISDOM

Here he applies the eye of intelligence, and opening the door of utter devotion as he closes those of superficiality, begins to converse in secret with the Beloved. In this state he will yield his will to the Divine Will and thus will see Peace in War and Immortality in Death. With a purified heart, using both the eye of the flesh and the eye of the spirit, he will recognize Divine Intention operating in God's infinite manifestations. In an ocean he will discern a drop, in a drop the mysteries of an ocean. . . .

The fourth stage is

THE VALLEY OF ONENESS

Then the veils, making boundary between one state and another, shall be rent and he will pass from the material world into the Heaven of Unity.

MIRZA ABUL FAZL

He will hear with the hearing of God; behold, with Divine Vision, the secrets of Eternal Art and penetrate to the retreat of the Friend. He will be a favorite in and about His tents and will draw the Hand of God from the pocket of the Absolute—so exemplifying the mystery of Power. . . .

The fifth stage is

THE VALLEY OF AFFLUENCE

Here the breezes of divine Contentment, blowing from the Sahara of the Spirit, inflame and consume the veils of want. In the visible and in the invisible, in the without and in the within, he will behold that Day in which "God will make all things self-sufficing." He shall have passed from sorrow unto joy; from agony unto beatitude; from languor unto exaltation.

In this valley, although apparently dwelling on the earth, the traveller in truth shall recline on the lofty terrace of Significances, tasting of the eternal Favors, drinking of the exquisite Wine. . . .

The sixth stage is

where he plunges into seas of grandeur.

In this valley the traveller is disconcerted (this condition being one of merit to the eyes of those who have attained) and so, amazement giving way to amazement, he proceeds, marvelling at a marvellous world, until he is submerged and completely lost in the New Creation of the King of Oneness.

The seventh stage is

THE VALLEY OF ANNIHILATION

Now, when the true lover comes in contact with the Beloved, the light of the Divine Beauty catches fire in the warmth of his own breast, and in the conflagration that ensues all veils are consumed and all differences whatsoever—and God alone is left. . . .

By teaching the spiritual lessons of the Seven Valleys and through the wide circulation of the book, Jamal-Ed-Din is enabled to enkindle countless hearts in the land of India.

THE WAY OF KNOWLEDGE

Mirza Abul Fazl, of the College of Teheran, is known in the scientific world as being possessed of one of the keenest intellects of the day, and when he falls under the influence of the Bahai teachings, the consternation among his colleagues is great. Every means is used to induce him to conceal his growing belief, but Mirza Abul Fazl is accustomed to teach openly the best that he knows. As a consequence he is forced to endure severe hardship and repeated imprisonment but, with the passing years, his conviction fortifies, until his faith is established on such firm foundation, that no scholar is able to combat his claims or refute his proofs. He writes many treatises and books and spreads the knowledge of the Cause, through his own findings and interpretations, in the highest circles of learning.

THE WAY OF BEAUTY AND ROMANCE

An enclosed garden in the city of Esphahan. Great lilac trees, sturdily bearing their massed burdens of flowers, flank its walls. Rose bushes, budding into varied colors, blend their perfume with the little straight hyacinths that grow in their shade. A rivulet flows clear and cool among the iris, past a fountain that tosses its waters into mist. Nightingales sing in the pomegranate trees. It is eventide.

On the terrace which fronts a long, low dwelling, sixty men and a boy are gathered in a semi-circle—seated on their bended knees. They are listening to their host, Zein-El-Abedeen, as he teaches them, through the medium of poetry and romance, the ethics of a New Religion of Beauty. His is a wise philosophy where Art is God, and God is infallible Art; and the Bahais hang on every word—losing themselves in mazes of spiritual satisfaction.

The talk has ended, and the voices in unison are rising, chanting Baha-U-Llah's Tablet of Visitation, when an aggressive knock is heard at the entrance. It is followed by a command that the gate be unbarred. The men spring to their feet—they need no further warning—and scatter to the far end of the garden, disappearing over the wall.

Now impatient shouting—coming from the street; murmuring of voices, sound of moving, jostling bodies, and the sharp, regular blows of axes. Then splintering of wood, tearing of hinges, and the door falls inward under the tramping feet of the mob.

All the while the boy has stood on the terrace, ignoring the entreaties of the women of the household, whispered from the upper windows, and the crowd surges past him to every corner of the house, stables and garden. Their prey has escaped, and the assailants have to satisfy themselves by stripping the rooms of their furnishings and the stalls of their live-stock: then, rushing the boy—their only captive—before them, they leave the garden of Zein-El-Abedeen.

The boy has been placed in the bastinado, his feet suspended high above his head. The ferrashes stand at the side, with young branches in their hands: Who are the Bahais in Esphahan? Who are the friends of his uncle Zein-El-Abedeen? The boy answers that he does not remember, and the lithe whips are applied to the soles of his feet, with regular intensity, interrupted only by repetition of the demand.

The boy's feet are now streaming with blood and he faints away—the questions remaining unanswered.

Then his inert body is carried back and left before the shattered entrance of his home.

A little donkey stands saddled by the gate. Hidden in the hay at the farthest corner of the stable, he had been unnoticed by the raiders. Zein-El-Abedeem, with broken leg—result of his jump over the wall—is carried in the arms of the women and hoisted onto the back of the animal. The boy, his feet bound in cloths, is mounted behind and then, after hurried kisses, blessings, and a prayer for protection, the little party of three—the uncle, the boy and the donkey—start out, down the road.

The women watch them till they are out of sight and, weeping, turn back to the dismantled house—it is the hour of dawn.

In this wise, the refugees travel among the hills, making for the south; and often the villagers receive and care for them, offering food and homely remedies. Zein-El-Abedeem makes return for such hospitality by recounting his inimitable stories; and never does he fail to make allusion to the Cause—so leaving behind him a code of simple standards for a new and more lovely way of living.

At the end of four months they reach the city of Shiraz, where they come in contact with the aged Seyyed Assadullah. Then the boy bids farewell to his uncle and, under the protection of the Seyyed, sets out for Akka—the home of Abdul Baha.

THE WAY OF EXAMPLE

Seyyed Assadullah has taught extensively in Persia, Turkey and India, and later has travelled in Europe and America, attending Abdul Baha. Through it all, no danger is to his mind, a risk; no work an effort; no service, however humble, a menial one. His eyes are fixed on the Eternal Glory, and his every faculty is dedicated and given long ago.

One day he seeks the presence of Abdul Baha and begs permission to carry the Message to the Caucasus. My Lord, I am an old man, I question if I can accomplish anything for the Cause, yet I supplicate you to let me try. I do not wish to be a pensioner—to flicker out on the bed of rest; but rather I long to end on the battlefield—fighting the good fight to the last moment of my life.

So the veteran of many engagements enlists again in the ranks of service, and enters on a new campaign.

Seyyed Assadullah, at the age of seventy-six, turns his face toward Russia.

ABDUL BAHÁ

April 17, 1929.

. . . In my service this winter, I have made use of an instrument prepared for this work by the Master himself. In view of the fact that when this instrument was in their hands, the Local Assembly did not find it in their hearts to allow the Cause to profit by it, and being convinced that it should be used, at this time when instruments are few, I, with the help of God only, brought the Bahai Cause before the public of New York with an effectiveness unequalled since the days of Abdul Baha.

Now, since these services have, in the estimation of the Local Board, made me undesirable as a voter, I will, in conformance with their suggestion, absent myself for the present from the Bahai Center.

April 19, 1929.

Every member of this Spiritual Assembly hopes, desires and prays that you may continue as a voting member of this Cause, but the principles of Bahai Administration are clear as to the qualifications of a voter. . . .

The question already submitted to you in our previous letter is whether or not, according to the qualifications quoted above, you consider yourself a member of this Assembly and are willing to comply with these requirements. This is a choice you alone can make, you cannot shift the responsibility of making this choice to the local Spiritual Assembly.

are upon them; the invisible cohorts are about them. And now you are to witness the birth of a great Plan. Bring pen and paper; I will dictate a tablet to America."

Then fluently he continues, without an instant's intermission, addressing:
The Friends and Maid servants of God in

THE NORTHEASTERN STATES

The Cause of Baha-U-Llah must be given to the world. This is no time for the silent treasuring of these seeds; they must be offered freely, abundantly, lavishly—scattered far and wide in the variegated soil of the hearts. God has said in the Koran: "One seed will bring forth seven sheaves, and each sheaf shall count one hundred grains." In other words, one grain will become seven hundred, and if God so wills He will double these also. The people must not dwell upon their own limitations, nay rather they must consider the capacity of the Creator, who has made the drop to find the expression of the sea, and the atom the quality of the sun. Abdul Baha is calling upon the Bahais of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York to raise the cry of the Oneness of the World of Humanity and to establish the Cause in these States and throughout the world.

* * * * *

THE SOUTHERN STATES

In Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, the Bahais are few; yet it is indicated that the Cause shall flourish in these regions—situated as they are in the temperate zone.

Here the powers of man function in perfect order, for moderation of climate, and beauty of scenery have great effect on mind and temperament. In these sixteen States the light of the Sun of Reality shall shine with great intensity and the clouds of ignorance and prejudice will be dispelled from their horizons.

Nearly two thousand years ago, Armenia was enveloped in impenetrable darkness; yet one soul, from among the disciples of Christ hastening to that land, was enabled to illumine the entire country.

The past century has been one of wondrous achievement. Discoveries have been made; inventions have been perfected; extensive fields of activity have been opened. Consequently, as counterpart of these changes in the outer world, Divine Wisdom has created a new spiritual plan in the inner world, so that the era of justice and true democracy may be inaugurated.

Glad-tidings! Glad-tidings! The sleepy ones are awakened and the negligent ones are made mindful!

Glad-tidings! Glad-tidings! The light of brotherhood has encircled the East and the West!

Glad-tidings! Glad-tidings! The period of bloodshed and carnage has passed away and the century of Universal Peace and of the gathering together of the nations has dawned!

* * * * *

While he walks to and fro in the courtyard of his house at Akka, Abdul Baha considers

THE CENTRAL STATES

The Bahai Cause was first offered to America at the World Exposition of 1893 in Chicago; and as the Central States may be likened unto the heart, which reinforces the organs of the body and fortifies the physical structure, it was appropriate that the Call of Oneness should be raised in that section. Abdul Baha is now addressing Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and summons the people of these States to walk in the New Way.

He has prepared this high road for their feet and has drawn a chart for their guidance during the coming years. He has given them the standards of baha-U-Llah; nevertheless the promulgation of these great principles depends upon them, and upon their efforts.

To sit, to talk, to listen, there is no virtue in that. To rise, to act, to help, that is the Bahai life.

* * * * *

In Baha-U-Llah's room at Akka, Abdul Baha reveals the Tablet to

THE WESTERN STATES

He recalls his talks, given in America, in which he had compared the continent of Europe to an arsenal, the conflagration of which was dependent upon one spark. He then had said that, within two years, that which was recorded, in the Book of Daniel and in the Revelation of John, would come to pass. Now these things have indeed been accomplished, and the time for superhuman service toward world reconstruction is here.

The Western shore of the continent, in many places resembles that of the Holy Land, and even the flowers of Palestine appear in this region. Therefore let California, New Mexico, Colorado, Arizona, Nevada, Wyoming, Montana,

BAHJEE IN THE VICINITY OF AKKA
HOUSE AND ENCLOSED GARDEN OF BAHU-U-LLAH

Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Utah, acquire also a spiritual resemblance to the land which, through the years, has rung with the voices of the Prophets.

Now, in the Bahai Cause, there must appear geniuses, peerless souls, wonders of the Kingdom of God—beings who in knowledge, sociability, tenderness, brilliancy are unique. These lordly radiant teachers must be embodied spirit, remaining in a state of constant and perfect attraction. Let them say:

"Oh, Lord! I am single and alone. For me there is no support save Thee, no helper except Thee, no sustainer beside Thee. Confirm me in Thy service, assist me with Thine Angels, make me victorious in the promotion of Thy Word. Verily Thou art the Custodian of the poor and the defender of the little ones, and verily Thou art the Powerful, the Mighty, the Unconstrained."

* * * * *

The garden of Bahjee. On the one hand a few steps lead into a carpeted court, breeze-swept, sun-kissed, vibrant with bird-songs, perfumed by orange blossoms—the Shrine of Baha-U-Llah; on the other hand glossy, silver-leaved olive groves spread themselves, undulating toward the sea. Abdul Baha stands by a bush holding three roses in his hand, one white, one pink and one red. For long he looks upon them, realizing to the full their loveliness, then raising his head he speaks in measured tones of

THE DOMINION OF CANADA

From a material and from a spiritual standpoint, the future of Canada is very great. Continuously it shall develop in civilization and in independence.

The Bahais must forge ahead in the way of Progress—taking part in the solution of the intricate problems of the age. To advance always; to achieve some new service every day; to hourly widen the horizon of intellect—these three rules must become the program of their lives. With steadfast resolution, they must face each difficulty and make stepping-stones of their every trial. Undoubtedly such souls will at last be crowned with the diadem of eternal success.

The field of the Cause is limitless; every sincere soul is welcome to enter therein. The bounties of God are not monopolized, nor are His favors localized. In the Cause of Baha-U-Llah there are no Brahmins and no Pariahs; its doors are open to all.

In the world of divine knowledge, there must be tempestuous seas and pearl-bringing waves.

In the Paradise of the Merciful there must be laughing flowers.

ABDUL BAHÁ IN HIS GARDEN AT HAIFA
WITH MOUNT CARMEL IN THE BACKGROUND

Presently, from Haifa, Abdul Baba turns his attention to

THE COUNTRIES OF CENTRAL AMERICA AND SOUTH AMERICA AND THE ISLANDS OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Christ said: "Travel to the East and to the West and summon the people to the Kingdom of God."

It is time that the Bahais divest themselves of the garment of attachment to this phenomenal realm, and become angels of heaven—travelling and teaching throughout the regions. The vast country of Alaska awaits the Message of Unity. The Republic of Mexico is a field for great accomplishment. Here the majority is totally unaware of the reality of the Old Testament, of the Gospels, and of the New Divine Teachings. The people do not know that the basis of the religions of God is one; and that the Manifestations are like unto the sun which rises from different dawning-places. They are submerged in seas of dogma; yet if one breath of Life be blown over them, great will be the result.

Fluent speakers, familiar with the Spanish tongue, must travel to the six Central American Republics—Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama. This latter must receive especial attention, for the Occident and the Orient are here united by means of the Canal; and once the Cause is established at this point, it will effect the East and the West. The British Honduras must be considered, and the Indians in all districts—the aborigines of America—a race which will become so enlightened, that it in turn, will carry understanding to many parts.

Likewise the Islands of the West Indies such as Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico, Jamaica, the Islands of the lesser Antilles, the Bahama Islands and even the small Watling Islands must be scenes of noble effort; also the Republics of Haiti and Santo Domingo, situated in the cluster of the Greater Antilles, and the Island of Bermuda in the Atlantic Ocean.

In a similar way the Cause must reach the Republics of the Continent of South America—Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Brazil, British Guiana, Dutch Guiana, French Guiana, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Venezuela; also the Islands in the north, east and west of South America, such as the Faulkland Islands, Galapago, Juan Fernandez, Tobago, Trinidad; and notably the city of Bahia, situated on the eastern shore of Brazil.

May God be the supporter of the teachers who travel to these countries, and their helper.

Formerly they were as moths, but they shall become as royal falcons. Formerly they were as bubbles, but they shall become the sea.

* * * * *

Looking over the plane of Akka, and beyond the glittering Mediterranean to EUROPE, ASIA, AFRICA, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND AND THE ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC OCEAN

Abdul Baha affirms that the invincible cohorts of the Kingdom shall attend his army of Love.

The Bahais are to journey across the seven seas and along the five continents, carrying the Glad-tidings of a New Day to all the races of the world.

Abdul Baha has travelled. Although in a state of utmost bodily feebleness, he has lifted his voice in churches, meetings, and conventions throughout Europe and America. He wishes that he might yet continue to serve God in this manner. In poverty, even on foot he would pass through cities, villages, mountains, deserts and oceans to promote the Teachings of Baha-U-Llah. Yet for him this cannot be. He therefore calls upon the Bahais to carry on the work. Never should they think of comfort nor of rest; for the teaching of the Cause is more important than the founding of empires.

Let them advance toward the Continent of Africa, to the Canary Islands, Cape Verde Islands, Madeira Islands, Reunion Islands, St. Helena, Zanzibar, Mauritius and other Islands. It would be advisable to form a commission of men and women to visit Japan and China and there to establish the work. Books and pamphlets must be published in the various languages — either translations or new writings — and circulated to all parts.

May the Bahais expend the greatest effort in spreading the synopsis of the teachings in the British Isles, France, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Russia, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Roumania, Serbia, Poland, Finland, Ukrainia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, Greece, Andora, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Monaco, San Marino and the Balearic Isles.

Parties of men and women, speaking the necessary languages, must travel throughout the three great Island Groups of the Pacific Ocean—Polynesia, Micronesia, Mylanesia and the Islands attached to them, such as New Guinea, Borneo, Java, Sumatra, Philippine Islands, Solomon Islands, Fiji Islands, New Hebrides, Loyalty Islands, New Caledonia, Bismark Archipelago, Ceram, Celebes, Friendly Islands, Samoa Islands, Society Islands, Caroline Islands, Low Archipelago, Marquesas, Hawaiian Islands, Gilbert Islands, Moluccas, Marshall Islands, Timor and yet others.

Of a certainty wherever these teachers shall enter a meeting, Divine Fragrances shall encircle them, and the Favors of Baha-U-Llah shall descend upon them.

Teachers must voyage to the continent of Australia and to New Zealand, Tasmania, Asiatic Russia, Korea, Indo-China, Siam, Straits Settlements, India and Ceylon, as well as to Greenland, Iceland, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, Crete, Malta, Falkland, Faroe Islands, Shetland Islands, Hebrides and Orkney Islands.

The apostles of Christ did not, in their day, command much respect, yet their station became evident in later times. May the severance, energy and fortitude of the early followers of Baha-U-Llah, loose a like reverberation through the pillars of the earth!

Today there are individuals so possessed with love that the body is completely mastered. They are the conquerors of the East and the West.

Should one of these beings turn his face in a certain direction, all the ideal forces and lordly confirmations will rush to his support. He will behold open doors and fallen barriers. Singly and alone he will attack the established armies, shatter their regiments at the right and at the left and, breaking through the lines of the nations, carry the assault to the very center of the earth.

Such souls will be the Apostles of Baha-U-Llah!

Now the Master turns his far-seeing eyes upon his secretary and speaks to him:

Day and night for nearly eight years you have lived with me. At home and abroad, on land and at sea you have been my companion. Ever have I planned your travel to America, so that you might spend your days in the service of the Cause. Now the time has come. From this Divine College you shall go into the world; therefore gird up the loins of endeavor and magnify your aim. I am sending you to that vast continent with these Tablets—the Glad-tidings of the Lord. They will constitute your capital; they will be the foundation of your life.

And now I have given my Teachings; I have indicated my hopes, and revealed my aspirations.

What, therefore, will the Bahais show forth in degrees of devotion and severance?

Baha'i Haircut Law: Why Create a Law if you're going to break it yourself?

According to Baha'i law, shaving one's head and allowing hair to grow longer than the lobe of the ear is forbidden:

Of course the second law only applies to men (what happened to equality of men and women?!):

However, Baha'u'llah, Abdu'l-Baha, and even Baha'u'llah's scribe (Mishkin Qalam) completely ignored this law:

What's the use of a law that the Prophet, His successor, and his closest companions aren't willing to implement themselves, then expect their followers to implement them?! If you can't abide by your own rules then why do expect others to do so?

Bahaism and its claims

<https://www.gutenberg.org/files/36585/36585-h/36585-h.htm>

Rigid hierarchy has taken over Baha'i religion, dissidents say

...but conservative leaders maintain that orthodoxy has not been altered.

Juan Cole, a professor at the University of Michigan, is a former Baha'i who thinks the faith has been taken over by its conservative leaders.

By IRA RIFKIN Religion News Service

The first 19 days of March are a special time for Baha'is, members of a worldwide religion with a liberal reputation based on its vision of the underlying unity of all faiths, the oneness of humanity and the harmony of science and religion.

The Baha'i faith grew out of Islam, and like the Muslim month of Ramadan, Baha'is set aside the 10 days the month of 'Ala according to the Baha'i calendar – as a period of dawn-to-sunset fasting and spiritual reflection. The month ends with the Feast of Nawruz, the Baha'i new year. It's a festive time of community gatherings featuring prayers, spiritual readings, socializing and lots of food.

For former Baha'i Juan Cole, however, this year's feast will be anything but festive.

Cole, a professor of Middle East History at the University of Michigan is among the nation's leading experts on the faith. Until last May, when he formally resigned from the movement, he had been a Baha'i for 25 years.

Now he counts himself among a small but influential group of past and present liberal Baha'is who are angry over what they say is the hijacking of the faith by a cadre of conservative leaders who are more interested in preserving their authority than the Baha'i principle of "independent investigation of reality."

That principle is among the core tenets of the Baha'i faith first articulated by its founder, the 19th-century Persian prophet known as Baha'u'llah (the Glory of God) and who is revered by the faithful as an incarnation of God akin to Jesus.

According to the critics, the National Spiritual Assembly, which oversees the American Baha'i movement is dominated by a tight-knit group of authoritarian officials who keep the lid on free expression by threatening dissidents with excommunication and by manipulating the process by which NSA members are elected.

In the Baha'i faith, excommunication can include total shunning by family members and friends.

Spreading their message via the internet, the dissidents – many of whom, like Cole once were members of the faith's intellectual elite – say the nine-member National Spiritual Assembly also hides the truth about the faith's shrinking American following.

"Baha'is are not open – repeat, not open – about how controlling this organization is" Cole said. "Virtually no one who comes into this faith realizes that by becoming a Baha'i you are making your individual conscience hostage to the dictates of the leadership.

"The Baha'is started out Unitarian and ended up Calvinist."

Emphasis on order

For their part, American Baha'i leaders with headquarters in the Chicago suburb of Wilmette, Ill., dismiss the critics as an inconsequential group of disgruntled elitists who blinded by their attraction to the faith's more liberal aspects overlooked its deeply conservative side.

This includes an emphasis on "administrative order" as a prime religious goal. Baha'u'llah taught that religions fail in large part because of the disunity that tears them apart following their initial burst of spiritual energy.

As a result, tight controls are placed on all public statements made by Baha'is including the work of scholars, who are required to submit their writings for pre-publication review.

"We always seek consensus. But if there is no unanimity, then the majority must prevail," said Firuz Kazemzadeh, a National Spiritual Assembly member and its secretary for external affairs.

Not all Baha'i scholars find fault with this.

"I personally don't buy the totalitarian argument," said Canadian Baha'i B. Todd Lawson, an assistant professor of Islamic studies at McGill University in Montreal.

Michael McMullen, an assistant professor of sociology at the University of Houston at Clear Lake, said prior review "makes sense" because much of the writings of Baha'u'llah and his successors remain untranslated from their original Persian and Arabic, and therefore are inaccessible to the majority of American Baha'is.

"My experience has been that what is corrected are factual errors, not interpretation," said McMullen, who is a local Baha'i leader in League City, Texas.

The dissidents also claim the Baha'i prohibition against public campaigning or nominating candidates for spots on the National Spiritual Assembly serves to keep it a closed body controlled by the American Baha'i establishment.

Baha'i leaders say they are only following an orthodoxy established by Baha'u'llah and his successors — his son, Abdu'l-Baha, and his great-grandson, Shoghi Effendi, who died in 1957.

Assembly members are elected annually by a fixed number of 171 delegates who represent local Baha'i assemblies across the continental United States.

Robert C. Henderson, a former Atlanta businessman who is the assembly's secretary-general, making him the highest ranking American Baha'i (the faith has no ordained clergy), said there had been 12 changes in the assembly's membership the last 15 years.

"That's not indicative of a closed group," he said.

Robert C. Henderson is secretary-general of the National Spiritual Assembly and the highest-ranking American Baha'i.

Free local debate

However, Cole said each change resulted from retirement, death or a member moving out of the country. No incumbent who has sought re-election has been defeated since 1961, he said.

Cole also noted that family and other close associations are common among American Baha'i leaders. Six of the nine current assembly members have family or professional connections.

McMullen, the University of Houston sociologist, acknowledged that the prohibition against nominations and campaigning made it hard for those outside the Baha'i establishment to win election to the National Spiritual Assembly.

But on the local level, he added, there is a much higher leadership turnover. Moreover, on this level of authority, he said, even controversial issues are freely debated without fear of official disapproval.

Henderson also said that "Baha'is are specifically asked to air their grievances" at local and national conventions "There are specific channels for such expression, but it must remain within these established channels.

"The Baha'i faith is outwardly liberal but inwardly conservative," he continued. "It's a matter of scripture."

Baha'is claim a worldwide membership of more than 5 million people living in more than 200 nations and territories about half in India.

In Iran — where the faith first emerged in the 1840s when Baha'u'llah proclaimed himself to be the divine manifestation for the modern era — there are 300,000 Baha'is. Considered heretics by the Muslim authorities they live as a persecuted minority.

The heresy charge stems from Baha'u'llah's claim to prophet status some 1,200 years after Muhammad, the founder of Islam, proclaimed himself God's final prophet.

How many in America?

In the United States Baha'is claim about 130,000 members a third of whom are African-Americans. About 21,000 live in California, and the largest concentration more than 6,000 is in greater Los Angeles.

Baha'is are also relatively strong in South Carolina, Texas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Illinois, Arizona and Washington state.

However, Baha'i critics say the religion's membership numbers are wildly inflated. Citing friendly but unnamed sources at Baha'i headquarters in Wilmette, the dissidents say no more than 30,000 names represent active Baha'is with verifiable addresses.

A 1993 book on Americans' religious affiliations One Nation Under God by demographers Barry Kosmin and Seymour Lachman, estimated the number of adult Baha'is in the United States at 28,000.

"Every new religious movement that is in a missionary phase tends to overestimate its members," Kosmin, currently at the Institute for Jewish Policy Research in London, said in an interview. "They count people coming in, but never count those who leave."

Kazemzadeh, the Baha'i official, insisted that the 130,000 figure was "essentially accurate." But he also said that "if active means contributing funds and serving locally, it's probably about half the names on the list.

Sizable Baha'i communities in the South are traceable to the influx of mostly rural African-Americans who joined the faith in the 1960s and '70s, drawn by its strong rejection of racial prejudice.

During those same years, relatively large numbers of white liberals, attracted by the faith's emphasis on a society free of social injustice, also joined. It is mostly members of this group — many of them scholars of Baha'i texts, the Middle East and its languages — that today lead the dissident movement.

Linda Walbridge, an anthropologist at the University of Indiana — specializing in the growth of Islam in America, became a Baha'i in 1966 when she was a 19-year-old VISTA volunteer on the Navajo Reservation. Despite her anger at the hierarchy, she remains a Baha'i.

Raised Roman Catholic, Walbridge said she was attracted to the Baha'i faith by its "promise of a universalist vision... It was far more open than anything I had experienced."

Walbridge's public dissent has prompted Baha'i officials to threaten to label her a "covenant breaker" – a form of Excommunication that would require her Baha'i husband to divorce her or risk his own excommunication.

"It was supposed to be the most liberal, broad-based religion on the face of the earth," Said Walbridge "Instead, it turned out to be a straitjacket."

Soli Sorabjee, former Attorney General of India dies due to COVID-19 at the age of 91 in Delhi, India

Courtesy : <http://singaporebahai.blogspot.com/>

Born into a Zoroastrian family, he married Zena Sorabjee, a Baha'i by faith. He did not accept the Baha'i faith for his whole life. The Apex organisation of the Baha'i Faith, the Universal House of Justice was aware of the influence and power which Soli Sorabjee yielded with the Government of India. The House of Justice was aware that a non-Baha'i – Soli Sorabjee, is more helpful to them than a Baha'i one. So, they never insisted on his being converted to the Baha'i Faith. Once he became old, sick and useless, the UHJ asked his wife Zena Sorabjee to resign from the National Spiritual Assembly of India, on which she was duly elected that year.

Soli Sorabjee assisted the Baha'is with major projects like the construction of the Baha'i Lotus Temple in Delhi.

He was also a major point of contact for the Baha'is to get their works done with the Indian government.

His influence was used by the Baha'is to get the huge piece of land from Delhi authorities.

He also helped Lotus temple trustees when they were accused of “document forgery” and “embezzling funds”. They have used him in all possible ways for the overall benefit of the Baha'i faith in India.

Soli used to make fun of the Baha'is when he used to hear that there are 3 to 4 million Baha'is in the world! He used to say, “either you say 3 million, or 4 million, or better you say, you don't know the number! You cannot fool the intelligent people.”

Today, the UHJ is playing the same game with his daughter Zia Mody. Zia an imminent lawyer is handling all legal matters of the Baha'i organisation, free of cost! She also donates huge amounts to the Baha'i administration, in return she receives a letter from the Universal House of Justice that they will pray at the threshold of the Shrines! All missionary activities of the Baha'is in India is carried out with Zia's contributions to various Baha'i funds.

What Soli Sorabjee received from the Baha'is?

There will be memorial meetings at the Baha'i Centres in various cities. Soli Sorabjee will be remembered as a friend of the faith, but he will be listed among the influential persons who have converted to the Baha'i Faith!

These kinds of personalities are always regarded as Baha'is after their death! Don't forget the Queen of Romania who remained a devout Christian until her death but is counted among the “influential Baha'is” due to her connection with the Baha'is.

The Baha'i organization is nothing but a group of full-time hypocrites.

Persecution of Persian Baha'is in Baha'i Administration

Courtesy : <https://bahaism.blogspot.com>

Received by Email, identity of the author is kept hidden on their request.

Since the advent of different Sects of Baha'is, The Baha'i Administration is trying very hard to purge the Persian Baha'is from Baha'i Administration. The Baha'is especially those from Jewish background are of the opinion that Persian Baha'is are behind the development of sects. Recently with the appointment of Nosratullah Bahramand, a Persian by origin, as the fourth guardian, the Persian Baha'is are having soft corner for him. The Persian Baha'is are feeling that their due right is not being given by the Baha'i administration although they have sacrificed and served a lot and faced of persecution in most of the countries. Very recently A prominent Heterodox Baha'i, Omid Seioshansian, who was born in Qatar, is blacklisted in Qatar. Government authorities in the country have leveled criminal and national security charges against him. Mr. Omid now will have to face severe penalties in Qatar's judicial system. And will be denied entry. Although Bani Duggal, the BIC's Principal Representative to the United Nations. Said that The Baha'i International Community is saddened that the State of Qatar has chosen to expel members of a community that has peacefully coexisted in and contributed to the progress of the country but many prominent Baha'is are of the opinion that Universal House of Justice is behind the expelling of Omid as they are in cleansing process of Persian Baha'is and Omid a high ranking Persian Baha'i in the Baha'i Administration, with an eye on getting selected to the UHJ has a lot of cloud in country like India. Recently another high ranking Persian Baha'i, a counselor, Dr. Jabbar Eidelkhani who has served for many years in Bangladesh was also removed from his post and a very insignificant Indian Baha'i was asked to wear his shoes. Another Persian Lady, a former counselor, Mrs. Zena Sorabjee and member of the NSA of India was asked to resign/retire from NSA after being elected on NSA. In Heterodox organisation a thought is prevailing that Persian Baha'is are working in groups and are having soft corner for the Persian fourth Guardian Nosratullah Bahramand of the Orthodox Baha'i Faith who is calling his shots from Australia. We have to wait and watch who is next in their list of persecution.

What caused you to leave the Baha'i Faith?

I hope this doesn't get to be too long, but I was a Bahai for more than 40 years before I withdrew from the Baha'i faith in March 2019.

I was a seeker of religion from the time I was 12 years old when upon taking communion for the first time at a Methodist church. While I was kneeling I gazed at a stained-glass figure of Christ. As I took the wafer and juice, I heard a voice that said "I am not in the Church." Although after this incident I didn't search actively for an alternative to Christianity, I was aware that there were many issues within what I had witnessed within that small Southern church. I began to visit different services and even wanted to attend a Jewish synagogue! Later, as a teenager within a household that had long been headed toward divorce, I retreated to the local library and read books on religion, witchcraft, astrology and metaphysical subjects. Then in the summer of 1973, I heard the soaringly beautiful music of Seals and Crofts. After buying a couple of albums, I discovered that their music included lyrics and concepts taken from the Baha'i writings. I rushed back to the library to search for Baha'i. It wasn't long before I found some old copies of Baha'i books including This Earth One Country by JB Esslemont, and another one titled the Baha'i World Faith, both of which helped to satisfy an 18-year-old's curiosity about the basis of Baha'i teachings.

Within a few months of my investigation, I called the local Baha'i Center and attended my first meeting. I was very nervous because I thought perhaps it was a cult, and that I might see people smoking water pipes or other strange things. However, everything I heard and experienced that first time seemed to fit my every need at that time in my young life. Two weeks later, I signed a declaration card on August 26, 1973. Since my parents were in the middle of a divorce, they simply didn't have time or the emotional energy to try to talk to me about my decision, and I began hanging out almost exclusively with other young Baha'is, teaching the Baha'i faith, and spending almost my every waking moment either reading, studying, praying or listening to the music of Seals and Crofts. Not long after, I began to date a talented Baha'i musician who was also the nephew of the producer of Seals and Crofts. We married two years later, almost immediately had a child, and moved to another town. In the ensuing years, although the local community where I started my life as a Baha'i had been a warm cocoon to help me heal after my parents divorce, subsequent years with Baha'is and the larger Baha'i community became more and more disillusioning. My disappointment was especially strong when in 1982, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States disbanded the local assembly where I had declared. I felt strongly that the individuals within that Assembly had been unjustly wronged and their families practically destroyed.

This began a couple of decades of trying to right the wrongs that I had seen done to that previous community, as well as for me to become the "best Baha'i" I could be, serving on local assemblies, coordinating teaching efforts, co-sponsoring a performing arts youth workshop, and other activities. Yet in my heart I knew that something was rotten at the core of the Baha'i faith. I saw it becoming more and more political, more emphasis being placed on wealth and power, as well as a vast difference in the approach of the national administration in the years leading up to 2000, as compared to the 1970s. I began to withdraw from active life more and more and finally in 2011 was accosted by a couple of individuals who suddenly visited my home from the community where I had declared. I was in total shock at the revelation from these people from that Assembly. They had never asked to meet with me in over 20 years time, and yet declared that there had been "problems" with me for years – that individual Baha'is and even other institutions had asked that Assembly to place sanctions on my behaviors. There were so many parts of this final blow to my belief that were wrong on so many levels, but the biggest flaw was the fact that a Baha'i governing body had decided to hold onto my many so-called wrongs for decades before ever contacting me either in writing, by a phone call or in person.

There was no ability to discuss, to present the facts or even to know who my accusers were- just to be read a laundry list of restrictions to my personal and religious life! After that fateful weekend, it took almost a decade for me to decide to officially withdraw my belief in the Baha'i faith, but I finally did, and I now feel so much better! I am now a student of metaphysical teachings and pagan beliefs, and host a monthly women's Moon Circle. I feel much more my true self, and do not miss any of the restrictions, the judgments and imperious behaviors of many within the Bahai Faith and _ especially_ its tragically flawed so-called administration. I'm very thankful for the opportunity to be able to share a portion of my experience on this forum.

Thank you!!

Baha'u'llah's great grand-daughter

Nigar Bahai Ansalem of Haifa talks to an interviewer.

Whatever is happening in this World is for New World Order of Baha'u'llah – Baha'i Scholar

Mr. Afshin says that the Baha'is are supposed to stand and see the destruction of the Old World Order excitingly and as the pillars of old World Order collapses, the Baha'is should build a new pillar by teaching their cause to the suffering humanity. This is the Baha'i plan and all this is happening due to Baha'i Faith. Do you agree with this ?

April 2 :On this date in 2000, Ben Dlamini, a leading Bahá'í, wrote for the Times of Swaziland that Pope John Paul II on his recent visit to Israel “made no effort to meet the Bahá'ís.

What a spiritual loss for the Pope's pilgrimage to Israel! By Dr. Ben Dlamini The pilgrimage of the Pope to Israel has been very significant in that though Christianity originated in Israel but the Headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church has been established outside Israel. The Popes were responsible for the crusades which devastated Israel through many years of wars conducted by the Western powers against the Moslems who had occupied Israel. There are four major religions in Israel. It is Judaism, Christianity, Islam and the Bahá'í Faith. It is very surprising that the Pope made an effort to meet Jews and Moslems, but made no effort to meet the Bahá'ís. This was a serious omission on his part which will cause a great spiritual deprivation which he will regret in this life and in the life to come. The Emperor of Austria did visit Israel in the 1870's and omitted to go to Akka where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned and received a rebuke from God. Bahá'u'lláh wrote to him and said: "O Emperor of Austria! He who is the Dayspring of God's light dwelt in Prison of Akka at the time when thou didst set forth to visit the Aqsa Mosque. Thou passed Him by, and enquired not about Him by whom every house is exalted and every lofty gate unlocked." The failure of the Emperor to enquire about Baha'u'llah was followed by retribution which cost the Emperor his throne. Today Baha'u'llah is no longer in Akka. His shrine and the Headquarters of His religion is still in Akka and Haifa, hence there is no excuse for the Pope to omit to visit them when he undertook the pilgrimage to Israel. He cannot say that he did not know about these places, because the Israeli government has prepared the most beautiful brochures about the Baha'i holy places for all tourists to Israel. The Bahá'í buildings and gardens can [not] be found in Jerusalem, Nazareth or the sea of Galilee. In the 1870's Bahá'u'lláh wrote to Pope Pius IX a long tablet declaring that He has come to fulfill the promises made by Jesus the Christ that he would come again in the Glory of the Father. Many Christians expect that Christ will come sitting on a cloud. This is fiction. The cloud Jesus Christ referred to is that which we see today. Christ has come in flesh and in a new name Bahá'u'lláh, and the learned priests including the Popes fail to recognise Him that it is the person they have been waiting for the last 2000 years. When the Pope undertook a pilgrimage to Israel I watched carefully whether he would be able to correct the great error of Pope Pius IX. It was to Pius IX and the priests of his generation that Bahá'u'lláh made the most astounding claim of being the return of Christ. Since Pius IX failed to heed this challenge and to test its validity, it was a great chance for the present Pope, when he made his pilgrimage to Israel to investigate the great claims made to his predecessor. In the following quote Bahá'u'lláh is asking all Christians whether they fail to recognise Him as the returned Christ because of His new name. When He came 2000 years ago it was Jesus Christ, but now it is Bahá'u'lláh, the Glory of God: "Say, O followers of the Son! Have ye shut out yourselves from Me by reason of My Name?" Bahá'u'lláh, though a Prisoner of the Ottoman Empire, incarcerated in the Prison of Akka, gave direct instructions to Kings, the Pope and to all the priests as a King would command his vassals: "O concourse of Priests! Leave the bells, and come forth, then, from your churches, It behoveth you, in this day, to proclaim aloud the Most Great Name among the Nations. Prefer ye to be silent, whilst every stone and every tree shouteth aloud: "The Lord is come in His great glory." It was God's promise to Israel from time immemorial that the throne of God would be established on Mt Carmel. Bahá'u'lláh came to confirm that that time has now come. Today the throne of God has been established on Mt Cannel. The establishment of the throne of God on Mt Carmel has turned Mt Carmel from a desolate place into a blossoming valley with the most beautiful gardens which confirm the vision of Isaiah: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." The name Bahá'u'lláh is Arabic, which in English means the Glory of God, and there is no question that the coming of Bahá'u'lláh to Akka as Prisoner was no mistake. Those who opposed Bahá'u'lláh's claim that He was a Messenger of God did not know that exiling Him to Akka was only a plan of God to fulfill the ancient prophecies of all the prophets even those of Muhammad. When Bahá'u'lláh promised Mt Carmel that the throne of God would be established on it He further assured Mt Carmel that: "Ere long will God sail His Ark upon thee, and will manifest the people of Bahá who have been mentioned in the Book of Names". Bahá'u'lláh told Mt Carmel that in a short while it will receive the body of the Bab, the forerunner of Bahá'u'lláh, and his body would be buried on Mt Carmel and also the world embracing administrative structure of the Bahá'í Faith would be established on Mt Carmel, led by the Universal House of Justice whose seat would be built on Mt Carmel. Today the seat of the Universal House of Justice is established on Mt Carmel. People from all the nations of the world come to it. It issues laws which rebuke all the nations of the world to follow the laws of God. "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the Mountain of the Lord, to the House of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the Law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore."

Islamic Fatwa on Baha’i Faith

Is the Baha'i Faith Compatible with Christianity?

The literature and promotional websites for the Baha'i Faith claim that one can accept the Baha'i Faith and remain a committed Christian. But is this the case?

To be a Christian, you must acknowledge that you are a sinner, in need of a Savior. You must then "repent", and be willing to be changed into a new creature in accordance with God's will for your life. You must then confess with your mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in your heart that God has raised Him from the dead, in order to be saved. You must believe not only with your mind, but also with your heart – receiving Him into your heart. For it says "as many as received Him, to the gave He the power to become the sons of God" (John 1).

What else is it that you are called to believe and to do as a Christian, according to the bible, and the words of the Lord Jesus?

- Believe the essential doctrines of Christianity (encapsulated in the Nicene Creed) that there is one God, the Father of all, Creator of Heaven and earth. That God is Father, Son and Holy Spirit – one God in three persons.
- Believe that Jesus is the "one and only" Son of God that Jesus alone is the "image of the invisible God", and that He is the alone is "the Way, the Truth, and the Life". Reject the notion the Jesus is just one of many "divine manifestations". The bible says "there is no other name under heaven by which we can be saved". That Jesus was "God come in the flesh" – that He was God who came down for our sakes, took on a human body, lived a sinless, sacrificial life, then willingly died on a cross and paid the penalty for your sins and the sins of all humanity – past, present and future.
- Believe that He rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, and will come again to judge the living and the dead at the last day.
- Repent, believe with your mind, and ask Jesus Christ to come into your heart by His Spirit– so that He may put His Holy Spirit within you, to regenerate your spirit, and make you a new creation in Christ. He will begin to change you from the inside out, and day be day, you will experience new joy in Jesus! Your living faith in Jesus will then produce "good works" – giving of your time, resources and talents to others, helping, serving, and doing what Christ did as He gave us example. Day be day your life will begin to look a little more like the life of Jesus – which is what being a Christian is all about!

The Baha'i Faith religious material, web sites, and publications claim that you can accept and believe in the teaching of the Bahai, and still believe and accept the teaching of the bible – and remain a Christian. But is that really true? NO! As the bible says, "there is a way that seems right to a man, but the end thereof is the way of death". As the saying goes, "looks can be deceiving", and this is one of those cases where many are being deceived by this pleasant sounding false religion.

Indeed there are some admirable qualities of the Baha'i religion. They promote peace, love, positive virtues, and even aspects of the Christian faith. But there are striking contradictions to Christianity, and what the bible teaches. You cannot in truth "become a Baha'i" and remain a Christian. If you accept the Baha'i teachings, you are rejecting many of the teaching of the bible, and of Jesus Christ.

Do not be deceived! The evil one has been and is a deceiver from the beginning, and this religion, although it sounds and looks good at first glance, is in direct contradiction with what the bible teaches, and with the core tenets of Christianity.

What is the Baha'i Faith?

The Baha'i Faith is one of the newer world religions, promoting the oneness of God, the unity of humanity, and the essential harmony of all religions. According to the messaging on their web site, Baha'is believe in "peace, justice, love, altruism, and unity". Their web site also proclaims that their teachings "promote the agreement of science and religion, the equality of the sexes, and the elimination of all prejudice and racism".

Sounds like a religion "tailor made" for today, especially when one considers the issues we struggle with in the

and that they are “working to unite it” (the world). Interesting – could this be the seed of a new “one world religion?”. This is in stark contrast to what Jesus said, when asked by Pilate “where is your kingdom?” What did Jesus say? “My kingdom is not of this world”. The world was turned over to the evil one when humankind fell and rebelled against their Creator. But take care – Jesus is coming back, to bring His reign as King of kings again upon the earth. He will take possession of the earth once again.

According to their teachings :’ The millions of Baha’is in the world come from every ethnicity, nationality, tribe, age, racial group, religious background and economic and social class. Gentle, peaceful, warm and welcoming, diverse Baha’i communities exist just about everywhere. Baha’is accept the validity of each of the founders and prophets of the major world religions, and believe in progressive revelation, the unique Baha’i principle that views every great Faith as a link in a single spiritual system progressively revealed by God to humanity.” (Source: <http://bahaiteachings.org/bahai-faith>). The problem is, one cannot logically “accept” the validity of all of the major world regions? Why? Because each make conflicting claims that cannot be reconciled logically (see below for more on this topic).

Where Did the Baha’i Faith Come From?

The Bahá’í Faith was founded by Bahá’u’lláh in 19th-century Persia. Bahá’u’lláh was exiled for his teachings from Persia to the Ottoman Empire and died while officially still a prisoner. After Bahá’u’lláh’s death, under the leadership of his son, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the religion spread from its Persian and Ottoman roots, and gained a footing in Europe and America, and was consolidated in Iran, where it suffers intense persecution. After the death of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the leadership of the Bahá’í community entered a new phase, evolving from a single individual to an administrative order with both elected bodies and appointed individuals. There are probably more than 5 million Bahá’is around the world in more than 200 countries and territories. Source: Wikipedia)

An open letter to a follower of the Baha'i faith

My experience as a member of the Baha'i Faith

By Dennis James Rogers

I became a member of the Baha'i Faith in the early seventies while an undergraduate at a small private midwestern university. The initial attraction was to the social teachings of the Faith particularly the tenets about gender and racial equality. I had been raised as a Roman Catholic and had attended parochial and public schools, but was not very well versed in Biblical Christianity. Since the sixties and seventies were a time of social upheaval and turmoil, the Baha'i Faith seemed like a rational alternative to traditional religious dogma. My connection to the group was minimal during my college years but picked up after I graduated in 1973. I had "accepted" the Faith based on a conversation with a Baha'i teacher who asked me if I agreed with the basic nine tenets of the Faith, I told him I did and he said I was a Baha'i. This was quite ironic considering that one of the basic tenets is "independent investigation of the truth". I had not taken the time to investigate nor done a thorough examination of its history or doctrine, something that I would not do until many years later while pursuing a role as a Baha'i apologetic.

In 1974 there was an International Convention held in St. Louis to initiate one of the plans that the Baha'i Administrative Order imposes on the rank and file. The plans originated with Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Baha'i Faith, they are ten-year plans, five-year plans, four-year plans, and seven-year plans or as little as one year plans. The plans have goals for teaching (expansion and consolidation) and "pioneers" which are similar to missionaries with the exception that pioneers are not subsidized by the organization, pioneers are expected to finance their own travel expenses, find employment and establish themselves as part of the city, village or community in which they are pioneering. The pioneer is to teach the faith, find new converts, establish a local spiritual assembly, (a local governing body consisting of nine adults) and then move on to a new pioneering post after the task has been completed. The Universal House of Justice, the international governing body for the Bahá'ís, generally established what the goal areas were with input from the National Spiritual Assemblies, the national governing bodies. I must comment that many pioneers I met, rarely if ever established Local Spiritual Assemblies and generally left their "posts" to return home. Pioneering is considered a glorious spiritual station and a certain degree of social pressure is put upon the members to become pioneers. The pioneers I met in the United States who came from the Middle East, primarily from Iran, were people of means, educated and wealthy. The early pioneers of the Baha'i Faith (from the West) were also people of means. This can be verified by the early written Baha'i history of the United States and Canada.

Being a new member of the group, I was not aware of the Baha'i culture, I was first asked to answer telephone calls from people interested in the Faith, there was considerable publicity on television, bill boards and newspapers about the convention with a phone number to call for people interested in finding out more information concerning the Faith. I was to answer questions, secure addresses and phone numbers to send literature for follow up by Baha'i teachers. The older members, not wanting to answer phones, attended the conference, which was presented by the ruling Baha'i elite. The nine members of the Universal House of Justice and the remaining living "Hands of the Cause". The Hands were individuals who had been appointed by Bahá-u-lláh, Abdul Bahá or Shoghi Effendi. The rank and file members, due to their high spiritual station of "servitude", regarded them as spiritual giants. Their main function was to protect and propagate the Faith. They were to protect the Faith from schism, but were apparently unsuccessful after the death of Shoghi Effendi in 1957, the only appointed Guardian of the Baha'i Faith. There have been, since his death, two main splinter groups, the Orthodox Bahá'ís and the Bahá'ís Under the Provision of the Covenant (BUPC) that I am aware of. I do not know what the other group's membership numbers are or their exact doctrines since contact with them is forbidden. They are to be shunned as "covenant breakers" and are considered "spiritually diseased" by the Baha'i Administrative Order. To be quite honest, I really was not that interested in them.

I attended a general session where several of the "Hands" spoke. Most of the talks were anecdotal in nature, encouraging the members to bring in more converts and step up the "teaching efforts". Though Bahá'ís claim they do not proselytize, semantics, all their efforts are aimed at bringing in more new members to establish the "New World Order"; this is to occur when there are mass conversions or "entry by troops". A term I discovered taken from Sura 110 in the Qu'ran entitled. "Help". (Rodwell's edition pg.429).

One of the elements that I found disturbing during the conference was an underlying anti-Christian sentiment, which is what eventually contributed to my leaving the Bahá'ís later, it was and is something not so overt as much as an arrogant attitude that many Bahá'ís feel. There were Christians offering literature outside of the convention center, which were not allowed in, and heavily criticized by the Baha'i attendee's. They consider themselves to be spiritually superior to Christians because Bahá'ís believe they have all the answers to humanity's problems for this day. One of the "Hands" stated that most Christians "were dead from the neck up." I purchased this speech on audiocassette tape and had also heard the comment live. This individual was upset that the Christians had more heart and moral fiber than the Bahá'ís. Christians were getting into Africa, South/Central America and Asia with missionaries before the Baha'i pioneers could "open" those areas. This "Hand" also felt that Americans were really not worth trying to teach the Faith to, since they were so entrenched in the culture and their churches. They were basically doomed, not worth saving. The Bahá'ís should therefore concentrate their efforts on native peoples who did not have so many "veils". A term frequently used by the membership to denote someone who could not accept the station of Bahá-u-lláh as God's savior for the world. After the conference was over, I was introduced to a Baha'i couple that lived in the municipality where I resided. This introduction and my experience with this couple would have lasting implications for me for the rest of my life.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith, as I will call them, were a very charismatic and charming couple, they took me into their home and became my "spiritual parents". Though I did not live with them I spent much time there. They were in their mid forties and had an adult daughter, whom I never met. Mr. Smith was about six foot four and had a very intimidating presence if he chose to and Mrs. Smith was about five foot seven and on the full figured side. She was very soft spoken with a mild southern drawl.

The couple immediately took me under their wing, seeing I was a new young and impressionable recruit gave them license to teach me as they saw fit. We began having "firesides", weekly teaching meetings in their home, for "seekers" as they are referred to (potential Bahá'ís). We held public meetings at the local library and community center, picnics at parks, anywhere we could attract attention to the Faith to bring in new members or seekers to invite to firesides. During this time I became a very persuasive teacher under Mr. Smith's tutelage and as a result many young people "declared" their belief in Bahá'u-lláh, including one of my older brothers, his wife and several of my friends. So many people were enrolling in the Baha'i Faith, coming to firesides and meetings that it attracted the attention of the National Spiritual Assembly and they began to send people to investigate our activities. I found out decades later that the more conservative Baha'i administration at that time were alarmed at the number of "long hair hippie types" and African-Americans who were enrolling into the Baha'i Faith. Professor Juan R.I. Cole, a historian and former member of the Bahá'is has gone into this in some detail in a published paper entitled "The Baha'i Faith as Panopticon". The website address is: <https://www-personal.umich.edu/~jrcole/bahai/1999/jssr/bhjsr.htm>

The Smiths had me under their control and completely indoctrinated into the Baha'i Faith. I was their "spiritual son" and anything Mr. Smith said I took as truth. He began handing out "fez's", hats like the early Middle Eastern Bahá'is wore, to the younger male Bahá'is in the community. A symbol of his discipleship I suppose. This was alarming to the members of the National Spiritual Assembly who really took offense at this action, but did not confront Mr. Smith about it directly. I on the other hand and the other new young believers thought this was normal, wearing the fez, since none of the other older Bahá'is in the area said anything to him or us about it. At this time I was alienated from my family and former non-Baha'i friends. Everything I did was Baha'i, I felt I had all the answers and refused to listen to anyone else outside of the Baha'i Faith. Mr. Smith began to get verbally abusive and authoritarian with me if I disagreed with him on any issue. He never struck me, but he did on one occasion force me to prostrate myself before him and beg for forgiveness because I had disappointed him. I had wanted to get married and start a family and he wanted me to move away to another state with him. I need to add without going into too much detail that Mr. Smith sometimes would slip drugs into glasses of punch that he would give me and others to drink while we were guests in his home. On several occasions after giving me the "punch", he proceeded to lock me in a small room on the second floor of his house, a prayer closet he called it, and tell me to pray and meditate. Several times I hallucinated while in the "prayer closet" and he would grill me as to what I had experienced. It was some years later that I realized what he had done to me and how sick an individual Mr. Smith really was. To this day I do not know what the nature of the drugs were he had given to me.

The Smiths moved away out of state, as there were enough adult members in the community to form a Local Spiritual Assembly. (LSA). I was elected Chairman of the LSA and had been in that position for less than a year when the Assembly was summoned to a meeting at a local hotel with members of the Baha'i Administration. I must add that when Mr. and Mrs. Smith left the area I was greatly relieved and thought to myself "good riddance". I did occasionally speak to him on the telephone, when he called to see how I was doing.

What happened next when the LSA met with the Administrative representatives was something that I had kept to myself for over twenty years. We, the Local Spiritual Assembly members, thought we were going to be praised for all the teaching activity that had occurred and tripling the number of new believers. On the contrary, we were seated in a large hotel suite and then I was read a list of charges against me which included "conspiring" with Mr. Smith to run the Local Spiritual Assembly from out of state and for "claiming a station", whatever that meant. When I protested and attempted to defend myself, I was told to "sit down and shut up, we know all about you and anything you say will be just lies." I said I was leaving and they locked and blocked the door leading out of the room, there were about seven of them and they forced me and the other members of the Local Spiritual Assembly to listen to them for two hours. This is what the Bahá'is call "loving and frank consultation". I was humiliated, demeaned and my character assassinated in this meeting. Two of the members of the Local Spiritual Assembly came to my defense and stated that the charges were not true and that the picture that was being presented of me by them was inaccurate. My accusers never confronted me; I came to find out later that the National Spiritual Assembly and other Administrative bodies had used members of the Local Spiritual Assembly and the community as "informants". The concept of due process is foreign in the Baha'i Faith.

The result of this "consultation" had me removed from the assembly and ostracized from the community at large. Several of the Local Spiritual Assembly members left the Faith after this incident; as did several people that I had taught the Faith to. I seriously considered it, but decided not to because I was isolated and felt I deserved to be punished because of my association with the Smiths. I was instructed not to ever speak to them or have contact with the Smiths again, but not told why. If they contacted me I was to report it immediately to the Baha'i Administration.

The next step that the Baha'i Administration did was to "reeducate" me in the Baha'i teachings. They arranged for me to attend "deepening classes" (a Baha'i term used to denote in-depth study) with an older Baha'i teacher who had very little regard for me, almost to the point of open hostility. If I questioned him about certain doctrines that did not make sense to me he would become extremely defensive and caustic in speech. One time he hung up on me during the course of a telephone conversation after calling me an arrogant punk when questioning him about a prophetic statement in the Baha'i writings. He stated there was no such passage and when I read it to him over the phone he became very upset and hung up. I did not study with him much after that. Many of the Bahá'is and the Baha'i Administration considered him one of the best teachers in the United States and would rave about him. I found him to be offensive, sarcastic, demeaning to his students and to be without any formal training as an educator. He published a book through the Baha'i Publishing Trust, which I thought was confusing and incoherent, he was in his mid sixties when I met him.

Since many of the new Bahá'is we had taught had left the faith, the numbers in the community went down, so I was reinstated to the Local Spiritual Assembly by default. Much of my time was spent planning firesides, public meetings, picnics and fundraising. In the fifteen years that followed there was very little growth in the community in terms of the numbers of new believers, there was a revolving door so to speak, and people would come into the Faith and then either become inactive or just resign. This was particularly true of the African-American Bahá'is coming from a church background. There was very little structure or community life that resembles a church community. Most, if not all of Baha'i activity centers on meetings, teaching activities and fundraising. There was very little time left to develop interpersonal relationships or socialization.

One last painful episode, which further alienated me from the faith, was the fact that my wife at the time, we are now divorced, developed a close friendship with a "home front pioneer". These are Bahá'is that move to an area for a short time to fulfill some arbitrary local goal of the Baha'i Administration to establish a group or Local Spiritual Assembly. This individual, unbeknownst to me, tried to coerce my wife to divorce me and marry him during his tenure in the community. She told me about the relationship after he left the country to pioneer to South America. She is still on the rolls of the Baha'i Faith to my knowledge.

During the divorce process the community abandoned me, since divorce is frowned upon. An incident that occurred while going through the divorce, (a year of patience is required by Baha'i law), was when I attended a Baha'i Sunday class where I was confronted by several members of the community and chastised in the class for going through the divorce, I did not defend myself, but I must add that a Persian Baha'i man stood up for me and said in my defense that no one knows what goes on between two people and that it was not for anyone to judge. Despite that I did not attend any meetings for the next two years, nor was I contacted by any of the "friends" during that time. The community has a history of abandoning its members when they no longer can attend the meetings or participate in teaching activities.

I cannot truly characterize the Baha'i Faith as a "cult", though in my opinion there are strong social controls in place by the Baha'i Administration. Those controls filter down to the individuals who are afraid of openly questioning the decisions of that administration for fear of being labeled a "covenant breaker". Which is tantamount to being excommunicated from the community. The leadership has used this effectively since the beginnings of the religion to "purge the ranks of the believers". Once a person has been declared a covenant breaker, the Baha'i community shuns that person and contact with such an individual could cause "spiritual contamination" of the "Cause" as it is referred to. There are parallels in the Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormon groups, as I understand it. The discussion of "unquestioning loyalty and obedience" to the Baha'i covenant and administration is paramount to maintaining order within the community. Though membership in the Baha'i Faith is completely voluntary, individuals such as myself who based their entire lifestyle around the faith find it difficult to separate themselves from family and friends who are Baha'i even if they know there are contradictions within Baha'i doctrine. One risks those relationships and being isolated from the community. It took me three painful years to extricate myself and resign as an enrolled member. Since leaving the Baha'i Faith in the fall of 2000, I have had little or no contact with people I had been friends with for many years, friends whose children grew up with my children. Most of them believe I lost my faith in God. Those that I have spoken to are surprised that I am doing fine, that I attend church and perform in a gospel band.

Some of the contradictions that began to surface for me were a result of a radio broadcast I heard by Rev. Robert Pardon of the New England Institute of Religious Research (NEIRR) on a Lutheran radio station in St. Louis. He was giving an overview of the Baha'i Faith and I called to challenge him and his sources. I felt he was misrepresenting the Faith and had gotten his source material from "covenant breakers" or enemies of the Faith. I thought about what he had said and contacted him through his web site, I was finally beginning to investigate the Baha'i Faith after twenty-seven years. He sent me facsimiles of his source material and I began to meticulously go over it. Checking it against what had been presented to me by the Bahá'is. I also began writing letters and asking questions of Baha'i administrators and academics. I discovered that several contemporary Baha'i historians and academics had been forced out of the Faith because of their research and publications. Baha'i academics have to go through a review process before publishing anything about the Faith. If an author does not pass the review process one is not published. Their work essentially is censored. This is why almost all Baha'i literature and historical works are redundant. All the books and pamphlets are rewritten from the same "approved" source material. As a result of this, most Bahá'is are unaware of the early history of the Faith, the power struggles that ensued from the founders family members and instead are directed to the Baha'i approved materials. Other sources are considered suspect, labeled as unauthorized or from enemies of the faith.

Though the Faith teaches tolerance for other religions, the truth is taught that the Baha'i Faith is the "Ultimate Truth" for this day. All the previous "Manifestations of God" and revealed religions are essentially null and void. Humanity must follow the Baha'i Faith or suffer severe punishment. Jesus Christ, the Messiah and Savior for the entire human race is reduced to the station of a "Divine Educator". His revelation is no longer considered relevant for this day, in fact Christ's dispensation ended with the coming of Muhammad in the sixth century C.E. The clergy and a misunderstanding of scriptural interpretation have led all Christians astray. Personal salvation is no longer important; the salvation of the human race is the priority now. An intimate personal relationship with God is not possible, "the door leading unto the Ancient of Days is forever closed to man", (paraphrase from the Baha'i Writings). As I began to study the Bible in depth and outside of a Baha'i context, I began to understand the perspective of the Christian objection to the Baha'i Faith. A great deal of the social teachings and all of the spiritual teachings, which the faith presented as new, I discovered in Old and New Testament scripture. Some of the phrases from the Bible I found transcribed into Baha'i prayers. However the main source of contention for me was the arrogance of many Baha'i who became incensed at Christian authors trying to give accurate accounts regarding the Baha'i Faith and it's history. Yet they thought nothing of explaining away two thousands years of historical Christianity and exegetical study, while engaging in the worst form of eisegesis.

On a more personal level, I was concerned about my soul and salvation, I never really felt forgiven or saved as a Baha'i or that Bahá-u-lláh was a personal savior. When reading how Jesus taught us to forgive our enemies and to pray for them in the Gospels, I compared that to how the Baha'i Faith historically condemned and shunned its enemies. (Many who were the disciples, spouses and relatives of the central figures of the Faith, even Shoghi Effendi, the Baha'i Guardian, excommunicated his own parents!). I began to ask God to open my eyes and guide me to the truth.

With the help of Rev. Bob Pardon, (NEIRR) Pastor Todd Wilken and Jeff Schwartz of radio station KFUE in St. Louis, I began the task of "testing the spirits" to determine what was true. I tested the Bahá'is by raising questions at Baha'i meetings about historical and doctrinal contradictions as well as prophetic statements in the Baha'i Faith that had not come to pass. Dates had been given where certain events were to have transpired and did not occur. Many Bahá'is were desperately trying to rationalize these unfulfilled prophecies. This line of questioning was making me very unpopular to say the least, particularly when I began to post those questions on the local Baha'i chat list. I started to receive calls from the local Baha'i authorities as well as from some of the "friends". (A term Bahá'is use to refer to each other). I finally officially withdrew my membership and posted it on the chat list. I received numerous calls and e-mails from the "friends" wanting to counsel me, I then posted and requested that I not be contacted, which of course did not occur, finally I posted my reasons for leaving the Baha'i Faith and that I no longer could follow the doctrines or obey the Administrative Order. An Administrative Representative who wished to meet with me concerning my statements contacted me. His real intent was to declare me a "covenant breaker" and therefore have me shunned so as not to "infect" any other Bahá'is with doubt. I agreed to meet with him. He had books with him and was prepared to contend with me. I chose not to engage him on doctrinal issues, I instead stated that I did not believe that Bahá-u-lláh was the return of Christ and relayed to him the incidents I had suffered at the hands of Bahá'is and the Administration. He repeatedly apologized and stated he would ask the Bahá'is to respect my wishes that I not be contacted and harassed about my decision.

I have since accepted Jesus Christ as my personal Savior and have found a peaceful assurance that I had never experienced as a Baha'i. I bear no malice towards the Baha'i Faith or individual Bahá'is. Some of them are very kind, gentle and loving souls. This testimony is intended to help those members of the Baha'i community, who may have experienced similar situations and come to a personal realization regarding doctrinal contradictions. There is hope, peace and life outside of the Baha'i Faith for those who choose to seek it.

Is the Baha'i Faith a Persecuted Religion ?

Written by an Ex-Baha'i Member

I am a former Baha'i and a student (admirer) of Shia Islam. I don't see any intolerance towards Baha'is in any Islamic country, except Iran.

In Iran also, Baha'is are tolerated and entitled to all basic human rights that other Iranians are entitled to. They are only forbidden to teach their 'religion' to others and they are also not allowed to form any 'administration.' AFAIK, if religion is your personal affair then no one in Iran cares about what you believe.

Baha'i Faith has a very strong administration and tight control over its members. They have political connections with the so called 'world powers' and they have 'Office of External Affairs' in every country that maintains relations with government offices and influence their foreign policies. They have extremely good relations with Iran hostile countries.

Baha'i Faith is not a 'simple' religion like any other religion! This is a religion with strong administration. There is surveillance by Baha'i Police (the ABMs for protection), that monitors individual Baha'i activities, in case of suspicion, problematic Baha'is are warned / punished with sanctions / shunned / ex-communicated. Baha'i faith is considered a dangerous NWO cult in Iran.

Baha'i faith has a long history of violence in Iran, its predecessor, the Babi faith was responsible for at least 3 civil wars that killed 1000s of Iranians.

So, all Baha'i activities are minutely monitored by Iranian government and those Baha'is are prosecuted who violate Iranian laws. Iran hostile countries term this "prosecution" as "persecution" because this serves their agenda. Today there are more than 300000 Baha'is in Iran but only ~70 of them are in prisons for several crimes.

In all other Islamic countries, Baha'is enjoy full freedom. In Pakistan they are a recognized minority, they are represented very well, their holidays are respected and they enjoy all benefits that other minorities enjoy.

In Pakistan Shia community is a more persecuted community. They have lost 1000s of lives in past 3–4 decades.

Look at the positions of the Baha'i community in relation to the Palestinian Human Rights

These days the tragic dimensions of Gaza, has shown its inhuman face, Every condemnation of the crimes of the various groups around the world face (such as the recent rally Mothers for Peace). Every time news of the crime spread and the number of victims in Gaza is increasing. Not only the quality or quantity of victims of crime are surprised observers have earned. Israel's use of strange and unusual weapons in an attack on residential areas of Gaza and killing innocents, anger, surprise and sorrow of human society followed. See mortars, each 3 cm over 5000 small metal darts thrown at a radius of 300 meters, has not escaped any moving object. Combine ugly, strange, symbolic of primitivism and civilization. When the World Cup reaches its climax, Palestinian children went to the beach to play, and hours later, the little victims play dirty and deadly Israeli politicians. These days it is not easy to watch the news conference. Not in front of the TV lounge with tea Astkany the "Change the World" followed. The speakers these days, when the news reached Palestine have to repeat the phrase that "some of the images and reports for children and heart patients ..." is not appropriate. Not only for the patients whose mutilated corpse watch the children drown in blood is not suitable for any survivors and freedoms. But that's not all scenes. Behind the scenes pictures of the wall and over the hills overlooking the Gaza released. Mobile cafe where they had set up a group of Israeli bombing in Gaza beer "from above" and safely enjoy watching crime watch, it is also close to lose.

When tragedy at Auschwitz, male and female, young and old for the "Final Solution" was sent to the chambers of death, savagery and violence that was always the big question is how far it can go? And now what is happening in Gaza shows that the descendants of the victims of yesterday, the criminals easily have filled yesterday. Crime and murder have gone on more and more horrible than the Nazi antisemites saw the Jews of Europe, the leaders of Israel and the people of Gaza are abandoned. This is not a tale of crime and savagery and turned that tramples the rights outright, approach the history of Israel.

Now the day of Israel's crimes face becomes clearer and louder voices condemning the crimes of Israel from around the world. People from anywhere and from any race, color, religion, nationality, against the crimes of Israel and Israel's disregard for human rights protest. The groups and NGOs that work on human rights, above all and before all the objections have been raised. In Gaza, the clearest and most natural way, because a human right, not as hard as the property can be easily and conveniently. No other explanation was not accepted. Whoever knocks on the door of human rights, the tragedy of Gaza can only be watched.

The collective behavior of my fellow citizens who, due to the historical injustice to them and their rights have been abused, has always been said and written of human rights, it is strange to me. I mean of course the price of your fellow citizens. Baha'is are always and everywhere the perspective of human rights in Iran, especially after the revolution they contend gone. Groups and human rights organizations from this perspective, has always protested human rights violations in Iran. I also have with him the hearts and the word and the fundamental rights of the Baha'is of protesters. What irrespective of religion or belief of his being, people know because being human, I believe that they are entitled to the same rights as others. But the behavior of the Baha'is in dealing with Israel during the time of blood on the night of the disaster intercourse. Human rights were not just protesting the violation of their rights. Human rights, human rights violations against the rights of all human beings and knows it, wherever and to whatever that is objected to. I do not know why the Baha'is of the world's smallest objection to his crimes in Gaza show? They are protesting against the violation of human rights of Iranian Baha'is their duty, did, in fact, the "human rights" believe? Or that the Baha'i Declaration of Human Rights as an excuse for temporary use? If you believe in human rights for all human beings, and those who protested against the violations, because all these years, not in distant lands right ear Universal House of Justice, the latest of oppression and the protest of the Baha'i community and there is no disaster struck did not hear? Off the coast of Gaza, all flowers blossom Palestinian children shot in chest and throat to fission, but Mosaffa Acre Gardens, Bang Brnkhas any bird. Why? Except the Baha'i claim that they are following the oneness of humanity? How can seek the oneness of humanity and all human beings "once one of the branches and leaves of a" brutal killings and massacres against the Israelis knew that all of protest against the respecting the right of the silence of forced the fellow Take advantage of the media and raised his voice? Bhyyan not in the eyes of the people of the Baha'i fresh leaves, green leaves and useless branches of Palestinian women and children "humanity" are? The House of Justice does not like the attention and support of the Israeli government, to manage the affairs of the Baha'i world and promote the development of the Baha'i Faith is busy, can not protest against the cruelty of long-standing Israel does Not to draw guests in host recognition can be cruel irritability? What then should be asked how the Universal House of justice and injustice and tyrants who cast her in a skirt? How to be proactive seekers of justice was cruel? What kind of justice is that all people are free to contend against injustice, silence is? New evidence of the excuse is worse than a sin. The question of souls is free of cost. Universal House of unacceptable excuses aside, it's all Baha'i organizations and various groups around the world have, because none of these are permanent protest human rights violations in Iran, in the face of this latest tragedy nothing Do? When it all visionaries, artists and cultural activists and intellectuals, either collectively or individually, in various forms, statement or in the form of art or of street protests and in the Gaza atrocities condemn. Why no price band so far in the history of Israel's crimes did not show any reaction? Despite the claim that they are not Baha'is, Baha'is because of his special servants of God know? Baha'is do not believe they are God's chosen people and the other peoples of the protest is going on?

I think this disaster is going on in Gaza, bombs and missiles, and a variety of modern weapons over the Hawar Palestinian people and Palestinian children's blood that stained the dirt playing fields, examination of human rights for everyone who knocks on the door. I remember some of the defendants' lawyers Bahai in Iran, Ms. Ebadi. He also defended the court finds that the rights of his famous sermons in the Nobel award ceremony, lost no opportunity to protest the violation of Palestinian rights. Baha'is But unlike his famous lawyer in this field are silent. His silence may indicate disbelief of Human Rights. Silence can be alarming. Let us not forget that the criminal slaughter in Gaza are children of Holocaust victims

Baha'i Faith and Polygamy

Baha'u'llah contrary to his own laws that permits two wives, and contrary to the laws of his predecessor the Bab who only permitted a single wife, practiced polygamy and was married to three wives (officially). He also had another wife that Baha'is usually don't speak about who was a young maid in his house.

Form the 3 official wives, two WERE LABELLED as covenant breakers. You see they didn't break the covenant, they were labelled as covenant breakers due to their opposition to Abdu'l-Baha hogging power and usurping the right of his half-brother Muhammad Ali. The only wife that was not kicked out of the faith was guess who: Yes Abdu'l-Baha's mother.

Unfortunately, people labelled as covenant breakers are treated very inhumanely in Baha'ism and are severely persecuted. No one is allowed to speak or socialize with them even their own children and spouses and if they do so they will be given the same treatment.

Further more in the words of Baha'i leaders they are referred to using very hateful words like contamination, haters of the light, and sufferers from spiritual leprosy:

"Announce to Hands and all National Assemblies that following the loss of the appeal to the Supreme Court, the Government expropriation order has been implemented, resulting in the complete evacuation of the remnant of Covenant-breakers and the transfer of all their belongings from the precincts of the Most Holy Shrine, and the purification, after six long decades, of the Haram-i-Aqdas from every trace of their contamination. Measures under way to effect transfer of title deeds of the evacuated property to the triumphant Bahá'í community." (Shoghi Effendi, Messages to the Bahá'í World: 1950–1957, p. 124) Messages to the Bahá'í World: 1950–1957

"It is better not to read books by Covenant-breakers because they are haters of the Light, sufferers from a spiritual leprosy, so to speak." (Helen Bassett Hornby, Lights of Guidance: A Baha'i Reference File (New Delhi: Baha'i Publishing Trust, 1983), chap. XII, no. 628)

Unfortunately this is the true face of the Baha'i cult that is usually kept hidden from outsiders.

What is the aim of bicentennial celebrations of the Birth of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb?

Who is the promised one of Babi Faith? Subh-i-Azal, Baha'u'llah or someone yet to come?

Let us examine each of these three possibilities from Bayani point of view:

- Many Bayanis did believe that Subh-i-Azal was the Promised One of Bayan, such as Mirza Jani and August J. Stenstrand; however, nowhere in the writings of Subh-i-Azal do we see that he ever made these claims. In practice, Subh-i-Azal denied that the Promised One of Bayan could appear so quickly, rebuking all people who claimed to be him. And once again, he never claimed to be him. It is clear he was not Azal.
- The Primal Point states in the Persian Bayan: “If He [whom God shall manifest] shall appear in the number of Ghiyath and all shall enter in, not one shall remain in the Fire. If He tarry until [the number of] Mustaghath, all shall enter in, not one shall remain in the Fire, but all shall be transformed into His light” (2:17). The numerical value of the word Ghiyath is 1511, and the numerical value of the word Mustaghath is 2001. These numbers refer to years on the Bayanic calendar, meaning that He can only appear after 1511 Bayanic years have elapsed. This is also confirmed by the fact that the Bayan presupposes that at least Persia will adopt Bayan as the state religion (see Persian Bayan 5:18; 5:19; 6:12; 7:3; 7:16. Arabic Bayan 9:3; 11:2); it is predicted Bayani sheikhs, imams, and judges, etc. will appear (see Persian Bayan 5:8). It is clear Bayan was meant to last a time similar to other dispensations such as that of Jesus, Moses, and Muhammad. It is clear he was not Baha.
- It is clear from this evidence that, since Baha is not him, nor are the 14 other people who claimed to be him, and neither was he Subh-i-Azal, the Promised One of Bayan has yet to come, and the verses of the Bayan testify to this fact.

What do Bayanis think of Baha'u'llah?

The Bayánis view Bahá as a usurper who pretended to be He Whom God shall make manifest in order to undermine his brother, Subh-i-Azal who he was jealous of, as he was granted leadership of the Bayání community by the Primal Point.

“After a while, Baha thought of making his own claim. He would often write what he called verses and then would have them washed out in the sea and would say that ‘they were the share of the fish!’ Elders of the Babi [Bayani] community went to Baghdad and admonished Baha for his improper behavior. As a result, he took to the Suleymaniyya where he stayed for two years. There, he also made fresh claims as a result of which he received death threats and saw no option but writing to Subh-i-Azal asking for permission to return which was granted” (Atiyya Ruhi, “A Brief Biography of His Holiness Subh-i-Azal”).

Even during the years before the Bayani-Baha'i schism, Baha in private created his own circle of friends constantly trying to undermine Subh-i-Azal. He was constantly flip flopping because he was at instances caught red handed making claims forcing him to retreat and recant.

Bahá says:

“I swear by God that if any one of the People of the Bayan were to mention that the Book [the Bayan] is abrogated, may God smash the mouth of the speaker and the calumniator, and by him who holds my soul and myself in his hands one letter from the Bayan is the most loved with me than all that are in the heavens and on the earth” (1862 Letter of Bahá during the Baghdad Period).

And he also says:

“Consider bygone ages and reflect upon what god had inflicted on their peoples for having contended amongst themselves, for having turned aside from His Countenance, for having strayed away from His path, for having done wrong to His Cause, and for having associated any creature with the Sovereign of His Unity, for which they were of the perished. Have you ever heard religion of god to exist before it is confirmed, or commandment of god to be abrogated before it becomes manifest? ... Nay, by my lord, the lord of heavens, no one can abrogate one letter from that which has been revealed in the Bayan” (Letter of Bahá to Sayyid Ibrahim, a Follower of Dayyán).

The Baha'i leadership have tried with all their might to slander and destroy the reputation of His Holiness Subh-i-Azal and have resorted to the most deceitful methods to discredit him, and the allegations they have made against His Eminence found in unsourced, unscholarly books of propaganda such as God Passes By authored by Shoghi Effendi are at times nothing short of foul language.

Bahá's work, the Kitab-i-Badi, which the Baha'i administration has not yet translated contains the most severe of insults and foul language against His Holiness Subh-i-Azal and his followers:

“When the one who turned away from God halted (in accepting me) and fell off the path, in that moment his body left the garb of humanness and appeared and became visible in the skin of animals. Sanctified is He who changes the beings how he likes” (Kitab-i-Badi, p. 110).

“From this day, any individual that mentions as human [or humanness] a single person from those who deny me — whether that [denier] has a high or low stature — they will be excluded from all of (God's) Merciful Graces, let alone trying to prove [those deniers] have dignity or stature” (Kitab-i-Badi, p. 140).

“Say, Oh you donkeys! Whatever God says is the truth and will not become void by the words of the polytheists (deniers of Baha’ism)” (Kitab-i-Badi, p. 174).

The Hasht Bihsht records an incident where Bahá himself attempted to murder Subh-i-Azal:

“The first juggle and trick of sorcery which he [i.e. Baha] outlined was this, that he brought to Hazrat-i Azal [i.e. Subh-i Azal] a dish of plain food, with one side of which he had mixed with some poison, intending to poison His Holiness. For hitherto the apportioned breakfast and supper of His Holiness the Fruit [Hazrat-i Thamara, one of the titles conferred on Subh-i Azal by the Point] had been from the house of Mirza Husayn Ali [i.e. Baha]. When that poisoned dish was placed before His Holiness, Mirza Husayn Ali pressed him to partake of it. By a fortunate chance the smell of onions was perceptible in the food, and His Holiness, being averse to taste it. Mirza Husayn Ali continued to press him urgently to eat. He replied, “it smells of onions, I will not eat it; if it is so good, eat it yourself. From this answer Mirza Husayn Ali supposed that His Holiness had divined his evil design, and, simply put the view of disguising the truth and putting a better appearance on the matter, ate a little from the other side [i.e. the unpoisoned side] of the dish, in order that the suspicion of His Holiness might perhaps be dispelled and he might eat the poisoned side. But His Holiness, because of the smell of onion would not eat.”

However, some of the poison had diffused into that side of the dish, and Bahá as a result was poisoned. Following this, he resorted to telling people that Subh-i-Azal had poisoned him.

Bayánis do not believe that Bahá is He Whom God shall make manifest.

All those who claimed this office based their pretensions on a misinterpreted passage in the Arabic Bayán (6:15) where it says:

فلنقو من انتم كلکم لجمعون اذا تسمعن ذکر من تظهره باسم القائم و لتراقبن فوق القائم والقيوم ثم فی سنة التسع کل خير تتركون

“...in the year nine ye will attain unto all good.”

But there is nothing in this passage to invalidate the limit of time fixed by the Primal Point in the Persian Bayán for the appearance of He Whom God shall make manifest, a minimum period of 1511 years, and a maximum period of 2001 years in the Bayánic calendar.

It is clear from Bahá's actions that his flimsy divine claims were put forward for the sole reason that he wanted to undermine his brother.

Subh-i-Azal, in his letter to Bahá, as quoted by the renowned Bayání scribe, Mirza Mustafá Katib, says the following:

“...O faithless brother, what has happened that in vain you joined hands to violate my honour, and to stain your own hand with my blood. You gathered round yourself a band of persons addicted to vice ... you excited this gang of villains to hate me ... I appointed you to act for me. I ordered my friends to obey you ... you are now out to destroy me. I was your guest, you abused me. You swore at me in my face. That which you yourself deserved you ascribed to me. You inspired your servants with rancorous hatred of me. Even you taught your own barber your own falsehoods. He gave false evidence against the truth. You set in motion this great sedition ... Outwardly you pretended to be my friend. You attended my feast. You ate my meal of trust. Inwardly you manifested your falsehood until Shawal 23 [Presumably March 11, 1866] when I was keeping a fast you withheld bread and water from me. ... By deceit you intercepted my epistles. Some of them which were to your advantage you paraded before the inhabitants of the city [i.e. Edirne]. At present I am in straitened circumstances and you are in affluence. And yet you pretend the contrary...” (In Response to Zayn-al-Muqarrabin).

Baha'i Guidance on Teaching the Muslims

Bahá'is are not permitted to single out Muslims from the Middle-East and North Africa, especially Iranian Muslims, to teach them the Faith. Should such a person become spontaneously attracted to the Faith he or she may, with caution, be taught. Enrolment in the Faith is, however, a different issue which must be considered on a case by case basis:- The instructions of the beloved Guardian regarding teaching orientals from the Middle East are to be upheld, even more so at this time because of the present situation in Iran. Iranian Muslims in particular should not be sought out in order to teach them the Faith. (letter written on behalf of the Universal House of Justice to a National Spiritual Assembly, dated February 6, 1986)

There are certain principles governing association with persons from Middle Eastern Muslim countries. Bahá'is in the West are not to initiate any attempts to teach the Faith to Muslims from Middle Eastern countries. This includes Muslims from Iran, North Africa and Arab countries. Muslims from these countries who have become citizens of the United States or have acquired permanent resident status and who show a genuine interest in learning about the Faith may be taught the Faith but it is they who must take the initiative. If a Muslim should ask for information on the Faith, the information he seeks may be given according to the dictates of wisdom, but Baha'is should not exceed the request that has been made by attempting to convert the person, interest him further or invite him to Baha'i meetings. In short, Baha'is are not to make a project of teaching Muslims. Although there are certain restrictions about teaching Muslims from some countries and accepting them into the Faith, it is a different situation with Muslims from India or Pakistan as compared with those from Iran or the Near East.

David Bowie The following is an extract from an 8 October 2004 letter from the Canadian National Spiritual Assembly to all Local Spiritual Assemblies and Regional Bahá'í Councils. The emphasis is in the original.

"The National Spiritual Assembly has received through regular mail a letter dated 1 August 2004 from the Universal House of Justice to selected National Assemblies regarding teaching the Faith to Muslims. The House of Justice has advised that, owing to the sensitive nature of this communication, the following guidance should not be distributed electronically, posted on Web sites, or published in newsletters. You should also advise the believers that they may not share the following content in email communications and should not raise the subject in Internet discussion groups (emphasis added). We will rely on your institutions to do everything possible to see that these instructions are scrupulously upheld by all the friends."

So obviously at that time there was still reason for concern and wisdom. So much so that the House of Justice did not send its letter electronically. Because of the restriction in the above extract I can't share the text with you.

I also don't know if the subject is still as sensitive today.

I honestly think individuals should be asking their own administration if the guidance troubles them.

Why Abdu'l Baha was awarded Knighthood by British Government ?!

Ex-Lover of Baha'u'llah writes about the murders committed by the “New Manifestation!”

This article is the first in a series which has been compiled from the book “Kashful Heel” written by Abdul Husain Aayati. He lived amongst the Bahais for 20 years and served them through these years. He was popularly known as “Awareh” which means the one who wandered about in love (of Bahaullah). After these years, he saw the corruptions of the Bahais first hand, renounced the Bahai Faith and finally reverted back to Islam. Thereafter he wrote the book “Kashful Heel” to reveal the true face and hypocrisy of the Bahais. The life history of Awareh is full of interesting events and episodes which outline the true face of the Bahais as revealed by an insider.

Professor E. G. Browne wrote a book about the Bahais known as “Materials for the Study of Babi Religion.” On page 7 of this book, he writes, “Bahauallah migrated from Baghdad to Sulaymania Kurdistan with his servant Abul Qasim in the year 1271 AH. His servant died on the way. He said that I have heard from Abbas Afandi that Abul Qasim was Hamdani and he went from Sulaymania to Hamdan as per the wish of Bahauallah. After having sold all his property in Hamdan, he was returning to Sulaymania and since Bahauallah knew that Abul Qasim had cash with him, he killed him”.

He said at another instance that the news of the murder of Abul Qasim was published in the newspaper. It was written in the paper that “Abul Qasim Hamdani is killed near Sulaymani and his head is cut off and his belongings have been taken away but his killer is not known.”

Abbas Afandi said at another place that, “We understood from the killing of Abul Qasim that Bahauallah was in Kurdistan.”

One of the Bahais said: “We can derive from all these saying of Abbas Afandi that the killer of Abul Qasim is the same person who betrayed Abul Qasim and convinced him that he should encash his property and should go to Sulaymanai but as soon as he reached there, he took him to desert of Sulaymania and put him to death and usurped his belongings and his cash.”

At another place he said, “Before Abul Qasim could meet Bahauallah, he was killed and his cash was stolen and his murder was portrayed as a normal death to Professor Browne who made many changes in the history under the influence of Bahais. Since many such huge murders were committed by Bahauallah and his sons, most of the Bahais have asserted that the killer of Abul Qasim is no one other than Bahauallah and it is not surprising at all!

Professor Browne has recorded another incident at page 10 of his book as follows, “Aqa Sayyed Ismael Zawareha left Baghdad and went to Kazmain in the year 1284 AH and committed suicide.”

The details of this story are given below. It is well known among Bahais that Sayyed Ismael pleaded with Bahauallah that he should show him his holiness. Bahauallah refused by saying that he did not have the capacity to bear it but since he insisted, Bahauallah showed him his holiness as a result of which Sayyed Ismael committed suicide as it was unbearable for him. Some people believe that Syed Ismael was also killed by Bahauallah. They said that Syed Ismael wanted to cut off his relationship with them since he became aware of the wickedness of Bahauallah and his sons and hence he wanted to move to Kazmain so as to make atonement for his sins.

The Consul General of Britain who was residing in Baghdad gave protection to Bahauallah and suggested to him that he should go to India where he would easily find people who would follow his whims and ideas.

At another place he quoted an incident of Syed Mohammed and Mirza Reza at page no 52 of his book as follows, “Syed Mohammed Isfahani and Mirza Reza Qali Tafrishi and his sister opposed Bahauallah strongly. They collected many tablets and saying of Bahauallah and published many different articles in the form of copies among the people against him. After a lot of meetings and consultation, Bahais of Akka arrived at the conclusion of getting rid of them. Hence they called their helper Naseer Baghdadi known as Haji Abbas from Beirut to kill Syed Mohammed Isfahani but left their plan later on.

Haji Abbas whose real name was Naseer was well known for his wickedness in Baghdad and was loyal to Bahauallah and Abdul Baha. Abdul Baha, during his stay in Bagdad, preached to Naseer Baghdadi who was a man of 40 years at that time and Bahais themselves have asserted that Naseer or Haji Abbas was a staunch lover of Bahauallah and had brutally murdered several times on behalf of them. The first murder which was committed by Naseer was of Mulla Rajab Ali Qaheer who was the brother of the wife of Syed Bab in Karbala. Mulla Rajab Ali did not support Mirza Husain Ali (Bahauallah) and said that his uprising is against the laws of Babi, Naseer was therefore called to kill him in Karbala.

The detailed explanation of this incident is mentioned at page 220 of Prof Browne's book. Bahais did not shun the plot of killing Syed Mohammed in Akka completely but rather they realised that since many of his companions were killed, therefore killing of Syed Mohammed could be a problem for Naseer. Hence they shunned the idea of killing him. Another reason of leaving the idea of killing Syed Mohammed is that since the calling of Naseer from Beirut was widely publicized, they realised that the situation was not appropriate for the same and hence they assigned the task of killing Syed Mohammed to somebody else.

The description of killing Syed Mohammed and his companion have been recorded at page number 55 as follows. Seven persons were selected to kill Syed Mohammed. These 7 persons killed Syed Mohammed and Mirza Qali on 12th Zilqad 1288 AH. The government of Akka caught hold of all Bahais along with Bahauallah and his sons and Aqa Jaan Kashani who was known as Khademullah. They imprisoned Bahauallah and Mohammed Ali Afandi in Shahwardi and Abbas Afandi in Bandar Abbas and Mohammed Ali Qali in some other place but they chained severely Khademullah and other Bahais in prison. After 6 days of imprisonment they sent 7 killers of Syed Mohammed to Bandar Abbas and the other 26 Bahais to Shahwardi. They were imprisoned for 6 months and 6 days. It was decreed that some of the 7 killers should be imprisoned for a period of 7 years where as others should be imprisoned for 15 years.

It should be noted that this history was narrated by Mirza Jawad Qazwini who was one of the supporters of Bahaullah to Professor Browne. Though he turned away from Abbas Afandi after the death of Bahaullah, but when he narrated this history to Professor Browne, he was enumerated as one of the obedient lovers of Bahaullah at that time. Hence he was aware of most of the realities which he has written and this was frequently the cause of the displeasure of Bahais since they wanted that such history should not be written. Rather, it should be overlooked. Bahais even removed most of the realities from my book "Kawkabud Durrih" inspite of my disapproval. They brought about many changes in my book due to which it is now not reliable in front of me. This was the cause of annoyance between me and their chief as I wanted my book to remain untouched whereas they wanted to make changes in it. In spite of so many changes which they have made in my books there are still such famous murders and killings that none of the Bahai is reject it. Bahais and their sons were very ahead in crime. Abbas Afandi was himself involved in such types of killing and used to give orders on behalf of his father.

Abbas Afandi was involved in killing of Syed Mohammed and due to this reason he was called by Bahais as Maseeh and Syed Mohammed as Dajjal since Dajjal would be killed by the sword of Hazrat Esa. The motive behind this was that they wanted to designate the title of Esa to Abbas Afandi. After few days they realized that such type of narration is funny therefore they left it. Two more people, Mahmud Khan and his friend were secretly killed in Akka by them. Mohammed's body was hidden in the foundation of the wall and their bones were discovered some distance away. They did not take an old friend of Bahaullah, who was a doctor along with them and she had signed on the board which was lying there and had borne witness that these two people died of cholera and due to the epidemic of cholera nobody reached to bury these body. Therefore these people hid these two bodies at this place.

Aawarah said that he himself heard that she had taken 1,000 tuman to give this witness and after few years when she was no longer young to enjoy her youth, she revealed the reality to her near and dear ones. It can be seen as to what extent Bahaullah and his supporters can stoop to achieve their purpose. How many people he has killed and how many thefts he has committed. He sent money to Akka for committing other such types of corruptions and all such money was sent from Iran to Akka since the beginning. Such money was used in committing different corruptions or it was used as a bribe to so and so judge to so and so witness and some money was used on American and Jewish girls. Some money was kept in a bank as a provision for the future and some money was used in purchasing and making buildings.

There were many such people who were fond of Abbas Afandi, his brother and their chief earlier but later on when the reality was revealed to them and they wanted to show it to the world or wanted to disclose their real faces, they used to bear the same consequences (difficulty) as was met by Syed Mohammed and his companions. Such people were either killed by the sword of Mirza Abbas Afandi or his statements against them were made ineffective by them. Fortunately if person, like Awarah was saved from their conspiracy he used to disclose all their realities to the other follower of Bahais.

Abbas Afandi followed the same way for a long time. If any of his followers wanted to say anything against him, he was scared of him and therefore refrained from saying anything against him and Abbas Afandi never allowed him to sit in the circle of his friends and used to make fun of him in the presence of others. In this way Abbas Afandi humiliated that person and also discouraged others from saying anything against him. But if, anyway, any of his tricks did not work, he did not desist from exaggerating himself. For example, if any of his followers turned away from him and may be living peacefully in any other city but Abbas Afandi used to say as follows regarding him, "What a humiliation he is facing!."

Sometimes he used to take the support of the Ayat of Surah Taha: 124, "Whosoever keep away from my remembrance, his sustenance would be cut off" to prove his point and his followers who were not aware of that person used to think that this is the revelation of Almighty and used to think about that person he might be begging alongside road or that his head and body may be afflicted by leprosy. And if coincidentally anybody see that person in a good state other Bahais would reject it by saying as to who knows better whether he or Sarkare Akaa (Abdul Baha)? They said that Aaka had informed them in the Tablet revealed to him by Allah that such person was humiliated and that he was afflicted by disease. Then how it was possible that other could see that person in a good position and in a honourable state? Ultimately that person had to revert back from what he had seen and he had to curse himself thousand times that what he had seen was mistaken.

How the Baha'is benefitted from the 1917-19 British engineered holocaust in Iran

July 04, 2018 How the Baha'is benefitted from the 1917-19 British engineered holocaust in Iran

What follows is the account of an eminent Persian Bahá'í, Mírzá Áqá Khán Qá'im-Maqámí—the great-grandson of Mírzá Abu'l-Qásim Qá'im-Maqám Faráhání, the prime minister under Muhammad Shah and the man lauded by Bahá'u'lláh Himself as “the Prince of the City of Statesmanship and Literary Accomplishment” (Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh, p. 65)—who used his immense wealth to keep all the Bahá'is of Persia well-fed as a devastating famine ravaged the country. The anecdote is derived from a larger biographical sketch of Mírzá Áqá Khán Qá'im-Maqámí by the late Hasan Nushabadi, who wrote up his remembrances and published them as an article entitled Rajul-i-Rashid (“The Man of Courage”) in the Persian-language Áhang-i-Badí (“New Melody”) magazine, which I have been working to translate for some time. I hope you enjoy this inspiring story.

It was towards the beginning of autumn in 1916 when I [Hasan Nushabadi] myself left Arák for Tíhrán. Qá'im-Maqámí said to me:

“The coming winter will bring dire scarcity and famine. The Bahá'is must be made aware of this fact, and urged to prepare, to the greatest extent possible, wintertime provisions and victuals for themselves and their families. In assemblies and gatherings, advise the Bahá'is openly and privately even to sell their furniture, and to buy and hold on to wheat, barley, sangak bread, lima beans, and maize.” He also said:

“Abdu'l-Bahá appeared to me in a dream and stated, ‘Scarcity and famine are in store this year. Woe betide the wealthy among the Bahá'is if even one of their impoverished brethren should starve to death!’”

Owing to Qá'im-Maqámí's persistence and insistence—as well as this poor servant's efforts to share the aforementioned anecdote with others and urgently exhort them to act accordingly, believing as I did in the significance of Qá'im-Maqámí's dreams and remarks—the Bahá'is were eventually persuaded to prepare their wintertime provisions by whatever means necessary, even if it meant selling their rugs and other furnishings. In addition, those who had been charged with spiritual affairs began to gather resources that would aid the poor during the winter. To that end, these individuals solicited funds from every one of the most eminently wealthy Bahá'is, and successfully secured written commitments from them to donate large sums of money. Ultimately, a record of all these commitments was given to Qá'im-Maqámí; he calculated the total sum of these donations, and committed to match that amount from his own funds. With all this money, Qá'im-Maqámí purchased an ample supply of food in the name of the poor, and kept it in storage. Furthermore, he appointed a special committee that would visit the homes of every Bahá'í in Tíhrán, determine the number of people in each family, and make a note of their income and expenses. Those who could not make ends meet, or did not have a cent to their name, did not escape the vigilant attention of Qá'im-Maqámí; every one of those needy souls received rations. Indeed, from the first sign of privation and paucity until the following spring, Qá'im-Maqámí saw to it that provisions were regularly given to every family that needed them. Even on the eve of the Persian New Year, he prepared rice cooked with shortening—so much so that there was plenty to go around—and he offered it to everyone so they could have a proper meal and remain in high spirits.

In brief, Qá'im-Maqámí did not allow even one Bahá'í to go hungry or live in dire straits—and this at a time when so many other people starved to death. Those poor souls would go to the slaughterhouse, drink whatever blood they could find, and ultimately die. Others would repair to the wilderness and eat grass—and there, too, would they perish. It was even heard that some of these people would kill and eat their own children, and also those of others. And yet, as far as the impoverished Bahá'is were concerned, not one of them starved to death.

It can truly be said that all these blessings allotted to the Bahá'is, poor and rich alike—inasmuch as the poor were rescued from hunger, and the rich were made the recipients of God's grace and guidance—stemmed from the prudence, the purity of heart, the effectual measures, and the generosity of this noble man.

Introducing the Baha'i Jewish Lobby

The anti-Iranian nature of the missionary affair continues to reverberate within the Iranian Baha'i community. Iran has been the cradle of this British manufactured, Zionist supported cult from the very beginning. Most of its adherents have come from Iran. In fact, for all their posturing that they have managed to convert large populations in the Third World – and who for some reason can't actually be found anywhere –, no other country in the world has been so receptive to the Baha'i idea than Iranians and particularly Iranian Jews.

These days, predominantly of former Jewish and sometimes Zoroastrian backgrounds, the current make up of Baha'is in Iran is vastly different to what it was in the late nineteenth century. The Baha'i faith lost its appeal to the mainstream Iranian community in the early 1900s during the Constitutional Revolution when Abbas Effendi not only failed to support the constitutional movement, but tacitly even supported the Russian involvement in Iranian internal politics and its sponsoring of Muhammad Ali Shah's coup d'état against the Parliament and people of Iran. Later in the mid 1950s Shoghi Effendi directly instructed Iranian Baha'is to work closely with the Pahlavi regime, ergo Habib Sabet. The exodus of Baha'is from Muslim backgrounds resulted in the reduction in the intellectual output of the community. Coupled with that came the influx of new believers from these Iranian Jewish and Zoroastrian minorities. The new believers had been under persecution in their respective religions and saw the new faith as an opportunity to exert control over others.

Brought together by their dislike of Muslim influences on Iranian culture, the Jewish Baha'is began to gradually purge the Iranian Baha'i community from its Islamic roots and origins. This can be witnessed in their whitewashings of the militant Shi'ite and Babi past. This agenda fitted well with Shoghi Effendi's vision of abandoning Iran in favour of exporting the cult to other parts of the world. With the death of Shoghi Effendi in 1957 and the rise of the new UHJ oligarchy, the new Jewish (and sometimes Zoroastrian) adherents were quickly promoted through the ranks to high places within the Iranian and International Baha'i communities.

Key members of the Iranian NSA and continental Board of Counselors came from this new ethnic grouping in the Baha'i cult. Following the 1979 revolution, most of the Jewish Baha'i elite migrated to Western Europe and California, USA, where their monies helped buy properties for the AO. The completion of the ARC project is owed to a large part to donations given from these two groups. Several confidential trips by UHJ members Fatheazam and Nakhjavani to LA and Australia in 1989 ensured that all the monies required for the ARC were secured from these groups. In fact the whole of these monies had been raised long before the advertising campaign for fundraising ever begun, much of through their own investments, with smatterings of large grants and subsidies given them by the Israeli government.

During the late 80s and early 90s many of the donors and their relatives were rewarded by the BWC by being nominated to key positions on the Continental Board and the ITC. In fact a quick scan of existing Counsellors in Europe, Australia and North America since 1985 suggests that former Zoroastrians and Jews have done quite well in this regard, but not their Muslim background counterparts.

The UHJs decision to adopt a more rabid form of fundamentalism and hardline position in 1996 bode well for the Baha'i Jews especially. They were the ones that successfully lobbied the UHJ to:

1) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to attend Naw-Ruz celebrations by Iranian exile communities; 2) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to associate with the general Iranian community in exile, thereby attempting to foist a Baha'i-only – rather than a universally Iranian – Naw-Ruz culture.

Counsellor Manijeh Reyhani, for example, who was instrumental in getting Hamid Taheri excommunicated comes from a dual Zoroastrian and Jewish background. These people control the Payam-i Bahai magazine (run by '60s-'70s Pahlavi insider Shapour Rasekh a.k.a. Delaram Mashhuri), the Andalib magazine, and, until its demise Landegg in Switzerland, as well as Radio Bahai (broadcasting in Persian), not to mention composition of the Ruhi modules.

Iran has always been rich in supplying and exporting Baha'i travel teachers around the world. The Baha'i Jewish lobby now wants to dominate and silence the mainstream Iranian Baha'i community by exporting their hyper-fundamentalist reading of the cult into Iran. They have funded companies and businesses through the missionaries in order to "teach the youth" and set up Ruhi Institutes. The Baha'i community in Iran has suffered enormously at the hands of the Islamic regime. It has lost some of its most charismatic Baha'i intellectuals like the Bakhtavars or Davudis. The present elite leadership is exclusively made up of former Jews. There are deep divisions in the community and some of the truly learned ones have boycotted the current crop of leaders and their activities.

So this latest effort to export missionaries is aimed at demonstrating "the correct version of the faith" to the rank and file at the same time isolating (and hopefully driving out) the voices of dissent. It is also a means, among others, by the Israelis to gain further footholds inside Iran itself. Both policies, it would appear, have now failed.

The Iranian Baha'i community is racked with dissension and schism, and the IR finally blew its top (and reasonably so given all the freedoms they had given the Baha'is since the mid '90s) with this ridiculous allegation of genocide by the Jewish Baha'i leadership. One wonders if maybe deep down these Jewish Baha'is actually pray for a holocaust to occur in Iran so that they can politically capitalize on it for their future designs, just as their European Jewish counterparts vis-a-vis Palestine.

On May 14, 1948, the Arab village of al-Nuqayb, where 'Abdu'l-Bahá had owned land and grown grain, was depopulated in the fighting which broke out after the U.N. General Assembly's adoption on November 29, 1947 of the Partition Plan for Palestine.

Al-Nuqayb (transliterated as Nughayb in the Bahá'í orthography) is mentioned in Lady Blomfield's The Chosen Highway, in the section titled Bahá'í Villages.

Land was also acquired in the villages of Samrih, Nughayb, and 'Adasiyyih, situated near the Jordan.

In his book All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948 the historian Walid Khalidi details the history of many of these Palestinian villages and how they were depopulated. For example, he notes that in the 1880s most of the village land of al-Nuqayb was purchased by Bahá'u'lláh, with the villagers continuing to farm as tenant farmers. In the 1920s, this land was sold by Shoghi Effendi to the Jewish National Fund.

Bahá'í Villages in The Chosen Highway chronicles in some detail how 'Abdu'l-Bahá used the grain he had grown in these villages to supply the British Army during World War I.

According to Harry Charles Luke, an official in the British Colonial Office who served as assistant Governor of Jerusalem,

On April 27, 1920, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was ceremonially knighted, an event which was prominently reported in the Bahá'í periodical Star of the West.

On February 23, 1914, at the eve of World War I, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had hosted Baron Edmond James de Rothschild a member of the Rothschild banking family who was a leading advocate and financier of the Zionist movement, during one of his early trips to Palestine.

On September 8, 1919, subsequent to the British occupation of Palestine, at a time when tens of thousands of Jewish settlers were arriving under the auspices of the Palestine Jewish Colonization Association an article in the "Star of the West" quoted 'Abdu'l-Bahá praising the Zionist movement, proclaiming that "There is too much talk today of what the Zionists are going to do here. There is no need of it. Let them come and do more and say less" and that "A Jewish government might come later."

At the time of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's death, Shoghi Effendi was matriculated at Balliol College. In a letter to Marzieh Gail Shoghi Effendi outlined his educational ambitions at Balliol College, specifically to study with eminent professors and Orientalists, noting alumni who were all Imperialists.

After 'Abdu'l-Bahá's death, Shoghi Effendi would continue to have close relations with the leading political administrators and prominent Zionist leaders. For example, on January 24, 1922, Shoghi Effendi received a letter from Herbert Samuel, the British High Commissioner for Palestine. The receipt of the letter is mentioned in Amatu'l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánum's The Priceless Pearl. As High Commissioner, Herbert Samuel was the first Jew to govern the historic land of Israel in 2,000 years, and his appointment was regarded by the Muslim-Christian Associations as the "first step in formation of Zionist national home in the midst of Arab people." Herbert Samuel welcomed the arrival of Jewish settlers under the auspices of the Palestine Jewish Colonization Association and recognised Hebrew as one of the three official languages of the Mandate territory.

Mirza Husayn Ali Commonly called “Baha” or “Baha’u’llah” was the founder and prophet of the Bahá’í Faith. He was born in 1817 to Khadíjih Khánum and MirzáBuzurg of Nur (in the province of Mazandaran), a Persian man, and went on to be a follower of Islam then follower in the Bábi movement/Faith, and then established the Bahá’í Faith in 1863.

He married:

Asiya is stated to have been surnamed the mother of the Universe. This is denied by the followers of Mirza Muhammad Ali and dismissed as devoid of historical foundation. To his first wife (Asiya) he gave the title Nawwaba, because she was the daughter of Nawwab of Tehran (Al-Kawakib-al-Durriyya by Awara, vol. II., p. 4; Materials, p. 62).

Ásiyih was “Bahá’u’lláh”’s first and best-known wife. She was a daughter of a nobleman, Mirza Isma’il-i-Vazir. Her date of birth is not known. They married some time between 24 September and 22 October, 1835 in Tehran and she had seven of “Bahá’u’lláh”’s children, of whom only three made to adulthood. She was given the title Navváb by which she is best known within Bahá’í circles. She died in 1886 in ‘Akká.

She bore him Navváb bore at least three other children, but due to their early deaths little is known about them • Sádiq who died aged 3-4 • Alí Muhammad who died in Mázarán at the age of 7 • Alí Muhammad who was born and died in Baghdad at the age of 2

Born in 1844 and died 1921 He was the oldest child of Ásiyih and “Bahá’u’lláh”. He was variously referred to by “Bahá’u’lláh” as “Mystery of God”, “The Master”, “Perfect Exemplar” and “the Most Great Branch”. “Abdu’l-Bahá” went on to be the Centre of the Covenant of the Bahá’í Faith after the death of His father.

During this time, he bore attacks from his half-brother Muhammad ‘Alí, who was not given a leadership role or authority by “Bahá’u’lláh”. Muhammad ‘Alí claimed that “Abdu’l-Bahá” was taking on too much authority; Bahá’ís refute this claim by citing “Bahá’u’lláh”’s Lawh-i-Ghusn (Tablet of the Branch) (National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States (ed.) [1943] (1976). Bahá’í World Faith: Selected Writings of Bahá’u’lláh and Abdu’l-Bahá, pp. 204-207), Kitáb-i-Ahd (The Book of the Covenant) (Bahá’u’lláh [1873-92] (1994). Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh Revealed After the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, pp. 219-223), and the Kitáb-i-Aqdas (The Most Holy Book) (Bahá’u’lláh [1873] (1992). The Kitáb-i-Aqdas: The Most Holy Book, para. 121) as clear appointments of “Abdu’l-Bahá” as his sole successor and interpreter of his writings. The struggle led to increasingly deteriorating prison conditions until “Abdu’l-Bahá” was released after the Turkish Revolution. During Bahá’u’lláh’s lifetime, he referred to his eldest son, Abbás, by terms such as “Sirru’lláh” (Mystery of God), or “Sarkár-i-Áqá” (the Master). After the passing of “Bahá’u’lláh”, he chose the title “Abdu’l-Bahá” (Servant of Bahá’).

She died a spinster.

Born in 1846 she was called Bahíyyih Khánum and entitled the Greatest holy Leaf. She was particularly dear to her father and is seen within the Bahá’í Faith as one of the greatest women to have lived: “Verily, We have elevated thee to the rank of one of the most distinguished among thy sex, and granted thee, in My court, a station such as none other woman hath surpassed.” (Bahá’u’llah, quoted in The Bahá’í World, vol. V, p. 171)

She stood by and remained faithful to the Centers of the Covenant over years of infighting within the “Bahá’u’lláh”’s family that led to the expelling of many of them. Shoghi Effendi in particular felt her support during difficult times such as the passing of “Abdu’l-Bahá”, and in the years afterwards when she was entrusted with the Faith when he was absent from the Bahá’í World Center in Haifa. She died on 15 July 1932 was buried in the Bahá’í gardens below the Bahá’í Arc on Mount Carmel not far from her two brothers and mother. The shock to the administration meant that religious festivals were suspended for nine months.

Mirzá Mihdí in 1868 Born in 1848 and entitled the Purest Branch, Mirzá Mihdí died on 23 June 1870. He was chanting Qasidiy-i-Varqa’iyyih (a poem written by “Bahá’u’lláh” in Kurdistan) (Bahá’u’lláh [1873] (1992). The Kitáb-i-Aqdas: The Most Holy Book, para. 121) when he fell through a skylight in the prison city of ‘Akká while pacing back and forth in prayer and meditation. He was 22 at the time. The death is significant as Bahá’ís believe that “Bahá’u’lláh” offered him the chance of being cured, however he chose to use his life as a sacrifice so that the prison gates would open and the pilgrims would be able to visit “Bahá’u’lláh” in prison. It reflected one of the toughest times for them, but restrictions on them did lift in the years to come with them eventually being allowed to live a short distance outside the prison city. Mirzá Mihdí was eventually buried alongside his mother in the gardens below the Bahá’í Arc on Mount Carmel in Haifa near his brother and sister.

Fatima surnamed the Supreme Cradle (Mahd-i-Ulya) born in 1828 and generally known as Mahd-i-’Ulya, Fatimih was one of “Bahá’u’lláh”’s first cousins, and later became his second wife. They married in 1849 in Tehran and she had six of Bahá’u’lláh’s children, of whom only four survived to adulthood. She was said to have harbored great enmity towards “Abdu’l-Bahá”. She died in 1904, BiBi Fatima and her four children were excommunicated by “Abbas Effendi”. To his second wife (BiBi Fatima) he gave the title ‘The Supreme Cradle’ [a title reserved for the Queen-Mother in Iran, T.A p. 361] (al-Kawakib, ibid, p.8; Materials, p.63) She bore him: 4. Muhammad Ali 5. Samadiyya 6. Ziyaullah 7. Badiullah BiB. Fatima (Mahd-i-’Ulya) bore at least two other children: • ‘Alí Muhammad who died at the age of 2 in Baghdad • Sádhiyya Khánim who was born in Baghdad and died at the age of 2 in Constantinople

Born in Baghdad in approximately 1852, his father called him the “Greater Branch”. When “Bahá’u’lláh” declared “Abdu’l-Bahá” his successor, he set that Muhammad ‘Alí was next in rank after him (Bahá’u’lláh [1873-92] (1994). Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh Revealed After the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, p. 221). When “Abdu’l-Bahá” died, his Will went into great detail about how Muhammad ‘Alí had been unfaithful to the Covenant, labelling him a Covenant-breaker (‘Abdu’l-Bahá [1901-08] (1992). The Will And Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, p. 5), and appointing Shoghi Effendi his successor instead. Muhammad ‘Alí is often described as the “Arch-Breaker of Bahá’u’lláh’s Covenant” (Shoghi Effendi (1944). God Passes By, p.

263 & p.317). He died in 1937.

She was born at Baghdad. Married Majdu'd-Din (son of "Bahá'u'lláh"'s faithful brother Aqay-i-Kalim also known as Mirzá Musa), who was one of "Abdu'l-Bahá"'s greatest critics. Both were eventually declared Covenant-breakers. She died at age 49 in 1904/5 and her husband died at over one-hundred years of age in 1955.

Relatively little is known about Díyá'u'lláh (Ziyaullah), so it is difficult to piece together an accurate account of his life, but we do know: • Born 15 August 1864 in Edirne (modern day Adrianople) • Married Thurayya • He swayed between the two sides in his brothers' argument, and died before taking part in an act against "Abdu'l-Bahá", but has still been labelled a Covenant-breaker • He died in 30 October 1898 (without issue) and was buried in the room next to where "Bahá'u'lláh" was buried • His body was moved by relatives to a building covering the grave of his brother Muhammad 'Alí

Gawhar was "Bahá'u'lláh"'s third wife. They are said to have married in Baghdad some time before he declared his mission. When "Bahá'u'lláh" left Baghdad in 1863 she and her daughter stayed and lived with her brother Mirza Mihdiy-i- Kashani. Later, on her way to join "Bahá'u'lláh" and the family she is reported to have been taken captive along with other believers, and for some years she was among the Bahá'í refugees in Mosul. She later went to Akká at "Bahá'u'lláh"'s instruction. (Letter from Universal House of Justice: 1998, Apr 06, Memorandum re Wives of Bahá'u'lláh) Gawhar may have been a maid of the first wife of "Bahá'u'lláh" when he married her. (Juan Cole. A Brief Biography of Baha'u'llah) Both mother and daughter were declared Covenant-breakers by Mirza Abbas Effendi after the death of "Bahá'u'lláh". Gawhar died during the ministry of "Abdu'l-Bahá", thus between 1892 and 1921. She bore him:

Relatively little is known about Furughiyyih so it is difficult to write a documented account. What is known is: • Until her mother moved to Akká, she was raised by her in the area around Mosul • She married Siyyid Ali (the son of the Báb's brother-in-law) on 17 May 1886 and bore him two sons • She, her husband and her children (in particular her eldest Nayyir), all rebelled against "Abdu'l-Bahá"'s authority as Centre of the Covenant, and became Covenant-breakers • According to Shoghi Effendi she died of cancer (date unknown) 1. His children: 38. Majd-al Din (married 5) 39. Jamil 40. Jalal / Jaleh 41. Hizaiyya (married 4) Note: One of "Bahá'u'lláh"'s titles is Sadratu'l-Muntahá, which translates from Arabic as the tree beyond which there is no passing. In this connection, "Bahá'u'lláh" entitled his descendants as follows:

His male descendants were given the title of Aghsán (Arabic for "Branches") which in singular form is "Ghusn". In particular, three of his sons were given specific "branch" titles • 'Abdu'l-Bahá (given name, Abbás): Ghush-i-A'zam (Arabic) "The Most Great Branch" • Mirzá Muhammad 'Alí: Ghush n-i-Akbar, (Arabic) "The Greater Branch" (Note 1) • Mirzá Mihdí: Ghush n-i-Áthár, (Arabic) "The Purest Branch". His daughters were given the title of Afrián (translated from Arabic as "Leaves"). This title should not be confused with the Afrián title given by "Bahá'u'lláh" to the maternal relatives of the "Báb", which is translated as "twigs", and was adopted by their descendants as a surname. Thus "Bahá'u'lláh"'s eldest daughter, Bahiyyih (given name, Fatimih), was given the title of the Greatest Holy Leaf. Note 1: Ghush-i-A'zam and Ghush-i-Akbar can both be translated as "the great branch, "the greater branch" or "the most great branch". A'zam carries a higher status in Arabic, so Bahá'í authors and others translate 'Abdu'l-Bahá's title as "Most Great" and Muhammad 'Alí's title as "Greater" (Taherzadeh, 2000, p. 256.). Some authors have reversed the English translations (Maulana, 1933, p.56). However the designations of Ghush-i-A'zam and Ghush-i-Akbar are clear. (Browne, 1918, p. 61, & p. 85)

Differences Between the Unitarian and Haifan Baha'i Faith

Unitarian Bahaiism as understood and practiced in the Unitarian Bahai Association, and mainline conservative Bahaiism as practiced in the Haifa-based Baha'i Faith organization, are very different from each other. Here is a list of the major differences between these two Bahai traditions.

- Unitarian Bahais sometimes use the academic term— in widespread popular use until a few decades ago — to refer to the Bahai faith, as a way of distinguishing between the religion itself and the Haifan Bahai organization which refers to itself as “the Baha'i Faith.” The Haifan denomination sees itself as the only legitimate form of Bahaiism, and this is why they use the same term to refer both to the religion and their organization. We consider this to be an inaccurate and presumptuous conflation. Also read about dropping the apostrophe in the word.
- Unitarian Bahais mostly meet in Unitarian Universalist churches, wherever such congregations already exist, rather than in private homes. We regard UU churches and any other buildings where all-inclusive, interfaith spiritual communities meet as the Bahai (house of worship).
- The Unitarian Bahai Association accepts openly gay and lesbian Bahais — including those in committed same-sex relationships — as fully equal members of our organization.

- Women are eligible to be elected to the international Board of Directors of the Unitarian Bahai Association.
- The Unitarian Bahai Association does not prohibit its members from participating in partisan politics. In fact, we encourage responsible political activism and public service in democratically elected office as ways that Bahais can work to implement the social principles of the Bahai cause.
- Many members of the Unitarian Bahai Association choose to be full members of the Unitarian Universalist Association (UUA), which allows its members to belong to specific religious traditions and organizations in addition to the UUA. UBA members are allowed to be members of other spiritual communities as well, such as Christian churches, Islamic mosques, Jewish synagogues, Hindu or Buddhist temples, etc. All spiritual paths have value and Bahaiism is not intended to nullify one's interest or relationship with other religions. In fact, the UBA encourages its members to explore various religious traditions and practices and to attend different worship services from time to time, to develop and maintain a full appreciation for the rich tapestry of human spirituality.
- Bahais who live in Islamic countries that forbid organized Bahaiism are allowed by the Unitarian Bahai Association to hide their Bahai faith and publicly identify and worship as Muslims, while maintaining a private relationship with the UBA. This practice is known as (wisdom), and is intended to preserve peace in society and prevent needless discrimination, harassment, imprisonment, torture, or death of believers. Many early Bahais in the Middle East continued to follow Islamic religious traditions after becoming Bahai — even Abdul-Baha, the son and successor of Bahauallah, regularly attended mosque his entire life. In the Christian West during the same period, many ministers and church members secretly believed in Bahaiism but continued practicing Christianity as well, to avoid losing their social and professional relationships. The UBA accepts the practice of hikmat, as long as it is done for serious reasons and in good conscience.
- Residents of Israel are allowed to become members of the Unitarian Bahai Association.
- Unitarian Bahais are free to interpret the Bahai scriptures according to their own study, reason, and conscience, rather than being required to agree or pretend to agree with “official” interpretations and doctrines.
- Unitarian Bahais are free to translate Bahai scriptures themselves from the original Persian and Arabic text, and to read and use any translations they prefer, rather than only using one “official” version. In general, Unitarian Bahais tend to regard the translations of Shoghi Effendi and the Haifan denomination as needlessly old-fashioned (e.g. using King James or Shakespearean English) and in some cases inaccurate and misleadingly distorted in meaning.
- Unitarian Bahais are free to write and publish books, articles, and scholarly papers about the Bahai faith and Bahai issues without needing to get permission and be subject to censorship (“pre-publication review”) by any Bahai institution.
- Unitarian Bahais reject the concept of “Covenant-breaking” and believe that what Haifan Bahais refer to as “the Lesser Covenant” (or simply “the Covenant” for short) — the successorship of individuals or institutions of supposedly infallible religious leadership in the Bahai faith — does not exist in reality. There were successors of Bahauallah but they fought among each other and none of them have been infallible, and no Bahai organization today has leadership institutions that are infallible.

- All of the blood descendants of Bahauallah – including those descended from people who are considered “Covenant-breakers” in the Haifan tradition and who do not wish to renounce and condemn their ancestors – are welcome in the Unitarian Bahai Association as fully equal members.
- Unitarian Bahais do not believe in shunning Bahais of other denominations and traditions. We are open to fellowship with all, regardless of differences of opinion or organizational allegiance.
- Unitarian Bahais regard Abdul-Baha as the first successor of Bahauallah and Ghusn-i-Akbar as the second successor, as appointed in Bahauallah’s will. We regard Shoghi Effendi as a competitor to leadership (alongside Ghusn-i-Akbar), whose position was created by Abdul-Baha in his will. In a sense, Shoghi Effendi could be considered the third successor of Bahauallah, since he outlived Ghusn-i-Akbar by about 20 years and had considerable influence on the development of the Bahai faith; but his appointment was of questionable legitimacy and much of his work and teachings were of a sectarian nature. We do not regard any of these three men as perfect or infallible. We do not believe there are any other successors of Bahauallah after them – neither individuals, as some small Bahai denominations believe, nor oligarchic institutions as the Haifan denomination believes.
- Unitarian Bahais have a different understanding of the institution of the House of Justice. We follow what Bahauallah wrote in his book of laws, the : that the House of Justice consists of local meetings in which at least nine believers (who may be both men and women) gather to discuss and vote on matters of charity, education, politics, and other applications of Bahai principles. Houses of Justice throughout a region, such as a state or country or even the whole world, may agree to vote on the same resolution and thus reach a mutual decision relevant beyond a single locality. The Haifan “Universal” House of Justice conforms neither to Bahauallah’s original plan nor to the modified plan of his successor Abdul-Baha, and it views itself primarily as a doctrinal and administrative body – functions not assigned to the (House of Justice) in Bahauallah’s writings.

Why I Joined and Left the Baha'i Faith

I was introduced to the Baha'i faith during my first year in college, by my next-door neighbor in my dorm. I decided to attend a Baha'i meeting because it sounded interesting. I had always been very interested in various religions and philosophies ever since I was old enough to begin exploring these things for myself. The Baha'is I met at the meeting seemed like nice people, and they held an idealistic view of human potential, emphasizing ideas such as world peace, racial reconciliation, and respect for all major religions. I would say that two things attracted me most to the Baha'is and their religion: the people themselves and their optimistic spirit about the future of humanity.

I decided to believe in Baha'ism and join the organized Baha'i Faith after a few months of studying the religion and socializing with Baha'is. Looking back, I would say that there were many details of Baha'i beliefs and practices that I wasn't aware of when I joined, which if I had known about might have prevented me from joining their religious organization. It was the overall spirit of the Baha'is and their faith – the big picture view – that drew me in, and at that time I probably would not have even wanted to know anything about the Baha'i Faith that would have turned me off from it!

Throughout my college years, I was an active and serious Baha'i. I participated in local Baha'i community meetings and Baha'i college club meetings. I followed the religion's rituals of daily prayer and the annual period of fasting. I enthusiastically tried to share my Baha'i faith with other people, because Baha'is place a great emphasis on "teaching" the faith (trying to educate people about the existence of the Baha'i faith and encourage them to study it and join). I even went on two Baha'i "teaching trips" to a rural, impoverished area where we attempted to befriend and evangelize Native Americans and other people living in poverty. I also wrote a draft of an introductory book presenting the Baha'i faith for a Christian audience (but I left the faith before seeking a publisher).

As I became more and more involved in the Baha'i Faith community, I began to notice some things that bothered me. There were two things in particular that troubled me the most: first, that Baha'i Faith members overemphasize obedience to their religious institutions and believe the highest leadership organ of their religion is directly guided by God and infallible in all its decisions; and second, that they tend to have an unhealthy liking for bureaucracy and downplay the importance and benefits of individual free thought and activity. I strongly disagreed with the long-standing policy that all Baha'i scholars and writers must submit everything they write about the faith to a Baha'i "pre-publication review committee" for official approval. I was also frustrated by the fact that the Baha'i Faith organization prohibits its members from participating in politics, since political activism had previously been an interest of mine.

After a few years, I decided to leave the Baha'i Faith for these reasons as well as others. At the time, I regarded the Baha'i Faith organization and the faith itself to be basically synonymous – as most Baha'is do – so I didn't think much about the possibility of remaining a Baha'i without in some way supporting the dominant Baha'i tradition (which is sometimes called "Haifan" Baha'ism, because the organization representing this tradition is based in Haifa, Israel). I did briefly feel compelled to try to promote some ideas for reforming the religion and its institutions, but I did this in an arrogant and ineffective way and soon gave up on it.

I began to feel attracted to Jesus more than any other great historical religious leader, so I decided to become a Christian, got baptized, and joined the Assemblies of God church. However, my broad-minded attitude prevented me from fully buying into Evangelical Christianity, and over the years I have grown increasingly liberal and universalist in my understanding of the Gospel. I can say that the Baha'i faith had a positive influence on me in helping me to see the value in all religious paths, but that I found organized Haifan Baha'ism to be too fundamentalist and restrictive for my free-thinking mind and mystical heart.

Issues in the Baha'i Faith: "Manifestations of God"

There are some theological reasons why I left the Baha'i faith – it was not only because of disagreements with the Baha'i Faith organization. When I first became a Christian, I did so in large part because I had come to the conclusion that Jesus Christ was far greater than any other prophet, such as Moses, Muhammad or Baha'u'llah. Contrary to Baha'i doctrine, I believed that Jesus occupied a special place as the unique "Son of God" – the human being who ever was the perfect Manifestation of Divinity. I did not believe that other founders of religions were on the same level as Jesus.

Over time, my views have evolved. Today, I still believe that Jesus was the greatest example of the fusion of the human and the divine that is known to history, but I have come to believe that all human beings are "manifestations of God" in some sense or to some degree. I no longer believe in the Trinitarian notion that Jesus was divine and everyone else isn't; instead I believe in the Unitarian view that he was a great spiritual master but human like the rest of us, and that there have been others similar to him who are great examples of divine qualities in human beings.

Most Baha'is interpret their faith as teaching that only the founders of the great religions are Manifestations of God and all others are mere servants, just as most Christians believe only Jesus is the Son of God and all others must bow down to him as Lord. I disagree with this idea. I think all humans fall on a continuum of spiritual development, rather than being divided neatly into categories of "Manifestations" of the divine attributes or "Non-Manifestations."

All human beings are manifestations of divinity, because we were all created in the image of God and we are all God's children. This teaching is found in the Old Testament, the New Testament, and in the writings of many modern spiritual leaders. Conservative Baha'is (which is most Baha'is) draw an ontological distinction between Manifestations of God and regular human beings, but there is no such distinction. There may be a small number of people whose special role in history was to found religions, but they were imperfect and fallible like all other humans. All humans are on a journey which begins when one's eternal spirit is birthed from the Womb of God, comes to earth in a physical body, and continues after death in other lifetimes and/or other dimensions of existence as we grow from spiritual infancy through stages of childhood, adolescence, and eventually adulthood. Given enough ages for development, will ultimately reach the level of great spiritual masters such as Jesus, Buddha, etc. Even Jesus himself promised this! (see Luke 6:40).

It may be possible for Baha'ism to be reinterpreted in this way, since one of the core Baha'i beliefs is the idea of the continual progress of all souls in the afterlife. The Baha'i faith teaches that no soul is forever lost, and all will keep progressing toward God through ages of time. Perhaps the Great Prophets or "Manifestations" of God are at a much higher level than other souls, because they have existed for far longer back in time than most people alive on earth. Perhaps, as Buddhists believe about the , they consent to return to earth when religion needs to be renewed – even though they have already ascended to higher levels of spiritual existence.

Issues in the Baha'i Faith: "Progressive Revelation"

The Baha'i faith sees all major world religions as being part of a dispensational progression of spiritual knowledge revealed by God. While this idea has some merit, it is an oversimplification of human spiritual history. The Baha'i faith, as it is interpreted by most of its followers, ignores some important religious traditions such as Taoism and Sikhism; excessively downplays the very real differences that exist between religions; and puts all religions on one track of progressive development, when in fact they emerged on more than one parallel tracks and on different timelines in different parts of the world.

The Baha'i concept of "progressive revelation" is true as a big picture idea – that humans have gradually come to apprehend the Divine in more mature and sophisticated ways over time – but the specific details taught by Baha'u'llah and his successors are too limited to an Abrahamic paradigm. Baha'u'llah's background was Islam, which envisioned religion as progressing by means of a discrete series of prophets chosen by God. He seems to have known little about Eastern religions such as Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, Sikhism, Taoism, and Confucianism. He wrote almost nothing about these, even though billions of human beings have followed and been inspired by these traditions – probably because he had little contact with people from those parts of the world and most of his followers were Muslims.

Abdu'l-Baha and his grandson and successor Shoghi Effendi expanded the Baha'i view of religious unity to include acceptance of the divine inspiration of some of the Eastern religions, because they sincerely believed in the goal of uniting all humanity with one interfaith vision of truth. This was Baha'u'llah's goal too, but the time and culture in which he lived defined the way he presented the message. He simply didn't have much of any exposure to ideas from outside of Islam, Christianity and Judaism.

If we are to be intellectually honest, we must admit that the linear Baha'i concept of God sending a "new Manifestation" to "reveal" a "new Dispensation" with a "new Book" for the world roughly every 1000 years does not take into account all the great diversity and complexity of historical religious development. This idea comes directly from Islam and has a heavy Abrahamic bias. Baha'ism has attempted to embrace some non-Abrahamic religions by fitting them into the Islamic paradigm of religious history. This is a nice theoretical attempt with good motivations behind it, but I think it needs to be reevaluated.

The Baha'i concept of progressive revelation makes sense if it is interpreted in a broader way, focusing on the archetypal journey of human beings continually seeking The Source and periodically creating new religions reflecting their evolving perspective on life and existence. In fact, to embrace this basic idea as the core of how we understand the phenomenon of religion – that it is not static but evolutionary, representing a never-ending dance between the Human and the Divine – is a beautiful way of thinking. The Baha'i faith has the potential to conceive of religious history through this liberal lens, if fundamentalist interpretations of Baha'i theology are cast aside.

Issues in the Baha'i Faith: The "Most Holy Book"

One of the reasons I decided to leave the Baha'i faith was because of the , which in Arabic means the Most Holy Book. Baha'u'llah wrote this book to establish a set of laws, commandments, regulations, and rituals for the Baha'i religion which would differentiate it from Islam. Baha'u'llah said that the whole world should follow the teachings of his Most Holy Book for the next 1000 years.

While some ideas in the are good and represent significant progress beyond the laws of the Qur'an and Islam, some of them are simply unsuitable for modern 21st century civilization and show that Baha'u'llah's mentality was to some degree limited by the standards of the time and culture in which he lived. For example, Baha'u'llah commands in his Most Holy Book that a thief should have a visible mark put on his forehead after the third offense – presumably some kind of brand or tattoo. This is much better than the Qur'anic punishment for stealing (amputation of a hand), but it's hardly compatible with the values of modern times.

I also disagree with Baha'u'llah's claim that all people must recognize his absolute spiritual authority and must accept and follow all the laws and teachings in his book. I do not believe in an infallible Bible nor an infallible Qur'an or any other scripture that conservative religious people believe is perfect. Although I think Baha'u'llah taught many beneficial and inspiring things in his writings, there are some things he taught that I simply disagree with – just as I disagree with some things taught by Moses, Jesus, Saint Paul, Muhammad, Buddha, or any other spiritual teacher who has left behind writings or sayings. I wish that Christians, Jews, Muslims, and people of other faiths would move beyond the idea of rigid support for every law and teaching contained within their own preferred religious scripture.

Some ideas in the Old Testament, the New Testament, the Qur'an, and other scriptures are outdated and should no longer be followed. Similarly, some of Baha'u'llah's ideas in his Aqdas have already passed into the realm of the historical rather than the currently applicable – before they were ever even applied. Baha'is should take a fresh look at the Kitab-i-Aqdas and be honest with themselves about which parts of it should still be followed; which parts should be followed but need to be reinterpreted in a more modern or liberal way; and which parts of it ought to be put aside as relics of a past era. There are many positive and relevant aspects of the Baha'i spiritual tradition – including in the Most Holy Book of the Baha'i faith – but in order for these to shine forth more fully, Bahais need to be willing to engage in modern liberal hermeneutics, textual criticism, and historical contextualization of their scriptures. This is what progressive adherents of all other religions are doing, and it is necessary to keep any religion relevant in changing times and cultural settings.

Issues in the Baha'i Faith: The “Covenant” and “Covenant-breakers”

By far, the worst problem with the Baha'i faith as most Baha'is understand it today is the Baha'i concept called “the Covenant” and the treatment of Baha'is who are considered heretics, called “Covenant-breakers.” Ever since Baha'u'llah passed away and his eldest son Abdu'l-Baha became the leader of the faith, Baha'is have had the notion of a special “Covenant” between God and the Baha'is, that the Baha'i religion will always remain united under one organization and will always have a perfect and infallible source of divine guidance in this world in the form of the highest Baha'i leader or institution. Baha'is who do not believe this, or who support alternative Baha'i organizations, may be declared to be Covenant-breakers and shunned by all members of the Haifa Baha'i Faith organization.

This fundamentalist, even cultlike idea and practice originated in the teachings of Abdu'l-Baha, who claimed that his appointment to lead the Baha'is after Baha'u'llah meant that all Baha'is must regard him as morally perfect and infallible; that all his writings were to carry the same authority as scripture; and that he had the authority to tell all Baha'is what to believe and do. His younger brother, Ghusn-i-Akbar (usually called by his given name, Muhammad Ali), objected to these claims of Abdu'l-Baha and believed that no religious leader other than the Manifestations of God should have that much authority. Ghusn-i-Akbar had been appointed by Baha'u'llah in his Will and Testament to become his second successor, after Abdu'l-Baha. Instead, Abdu'l-Baha declared him a heretic, excommunicated him, and demanded that all Baha'is shun him. Most of Baha'u'llah's children and other descendants and relatives sympathized with Ghusn-i-Akbar and disagreed with Abdu'l-Baha's claims, and they were also excommunicated and shunned by the majority of Baha'is, who were loyal to Abdu'l-Baha.

This is how the concept of “Covenant-breaking” was born in the Baha'i faith. Abdu'l-Baha appointed his own grandson, Shoghi Effendi, to be his successor instead of Ghusn-i-Akbar, and called him the “Guardian” of the faith. He instructed him to appoint a successor before his death from among his own children or relatives to become the next Guardian. However, Shoghi Effendi found himself unable to have children of his own, and during his lifetime he declared all of his relatives to be Covenant-breakers because, in his view, they were not sufficiently obedient to his supposedly absolute authority over the Baha'is.

Therefore, the chain of succession of individual Baha'i leaders came to an end. Shoghi Effendi died suddenly without leaving a will, and did not provide specific instructions during his lifetime about who should lead the Baha'i Faith after his death. As one might imagine, this situation led to a power struggle. Ultimately, the vast majority of Baha'is consolidated under the authority of an elected institution called the Universal House of Justice. However, according to Abdu'l-Baha and Shoghi Effendi, this institution was required to have a Guardian as its chairman, who would have the right to insist on reconsideration of its decisions and to expel its members if necessary.

Therefore, a Baha'i who adheres to all the writings and teachings of the recognized successors of Baha'u'llah could legitimately question whether the current leadership organ of the Baha'i Faith known as the UHJ could possibly be perfect and infallible without a Guardian heading it. However, Baha'i Faith members are not allowed to question this or to regard the UHJ as merely a council of religious leaders making human decisions for the Baha'i Faith organization. Instead, they must profess belief that the Baha'i Covenant is still intact, that an infallible chain of succession of spiritual authority has never been broken. Baha'is are not supposed to disagree with any decision of the UHJ, since this institution is regarded as speaking for God.

I disagree with this on two levels: For one thing, it seems clear to me from the facts of Baha'i history that the Covenant did not pan out the way it was supposed to, first because the person who was originally supposed to become Abdu'l-Baha's successor was excommunicated unfairly; and furthermore because of the untimely death of his replacement, Shoghi Effendi, who did not appoint a successor.

Secondly, I simply do not believe there could ever be such a thing as a perfect chain of infallible spiritual authority. The Holy Spirit doesn't want to be limited to working through such a single channel, and what happened in the Baha'i faith ironically proves this. It's almost as if God Himself intervened to make sure that it would be impossible to believe, in a logical and intellectually honest way, in the fundamentalist Baha'i idea of “the Covenant.” Also, since the time of Baha'u'llah there have been various other spiritual leaders and movements that were not part of the Baha'i faith, and some of these clearly were infused with divine inspiration. Examples include the Unitarians and Universalists, Transcendentalists, the New Thought and New Age movements, and the Charismatic movement.

Today, most Baha'is consider Baha'is who reject the claims of infallible authority by the Haifa Baha'i Faith's highest leadership institution to be “Covenant-breakers,” terrible heretics who are reviled and shunned by “true” Baha'is. Two alternative Baha'i organizations were sued by the mainstream Baha'i Faith organization, simply because they use the word to describe their beliefs. The Baha'i Faith's leaders actually had the audacity to claim that the word Baha'i is trademarked by their own organization and that such a trademark – on the name of a religion – is legitimate. It would be as if the Roman Catholic Church claimed that Protestants cannot describe themselves as Christian and sued their churches. Such attitudes among Baha'is are intolerant, fanatical, and characteristic of cults rather than the major world religion for modern times that the Baha'i faith aspires to be. In 2010, the court sided with the small Baha'i denominations and ruled that the name of the Baha'i religion is in the public domain.

Baha'is should put aside the notion of a special Covenant decreed by God that demands that all Baha'is must only support one Baha'i organization and always agree with its leadership. This idea has been disproved by Baha'i history, and it is incompatible with the modern, progressive ideals of religious tolerance and diversity that the Baha'i faith is supposed to stand for.

Issues in the Baha'i Faith: The “Universal House of Justice”

Members of the Baha'i Faith organization not only believe that their Universal House of Justice is infallibly inspired by God and that all Baha'is must unquestioningly obey its decisions, but they also believe that eventually all the peoples and nations of the world should come under the authority of this Baha'i religious institution. Specifically, conservative Baha'i doctrine asserts that all matters of state should be referred to the House of Justice; or as they understand it, that the UHJ should one day hold a higher position of power than the governments of the world. This appears to be based on a misinterpretation of one sentence that Baha'u'llah wrote in a text appended to his Most Holy Book.

Seat of the UHJ, Haifa, Israel

Haifa Baha'ism includes theocracy as one of its teachings, but it is far from clear that this is how the faith should be interpreted. Some Baha'i scholars disagree with this interpretation, but they have either been expelled from membership in the organized Baha'i Faith or must keep quiet about their beliefs. Most of Baha'u'llah's writings clearly promote secular democracy rather than theocracy – in fact, there is a great deal of evidence to indicate that Baha'u'llah envisioned a world in which people of all religions would have equal rights and freedoms and would form democratic national parliaments to serve as a check on the power of kings, clergy, and other autocratic rulers. Despite this, a pro-theocracy view is almost totally dominant in the Baha'i Faith today, and looks to remain so, because this doctrine is promoted by the “infallible” UHJ itself.

As for the “Universal House of Justice” such as has been created as the head institution of the mainstream Baha'i Faith organization, this is only one possible interpretation of what Baha'u'llah wrote on the subject of democratic spiritual leadership. Baha'u'llah taught that a local institution called simply the (“House of Justice”) should be formed in each city, and he described it as something very similar to a New England town meeting. Such bodies were supposed to replace the institution of the clergy in previous religions – and presumably Houses of Justice could be created at national or international levels as well – but Baha'u'llah does not define it or limit it, except to say that at least nine people must participate in the meetings of each House. Women were not excluded in theory as they have been in practice (the restriction of the UHJ to men only was a later interpretation by Abdu'l-Baha), nor did Baha'u'llah say that a House of Justice necessarily has to be restricted only to Baha'is or members of a particular organized religious community.

It is very unlikely that the Haifa-based Baha'i Faith organization will ever grow large enough to begin pushing for the kind of sweeping political power that it desires, so non-Baha'is need not worry. But regardless of practical realities, the fundamentalist Baha'i theory of future theocratic governance is a bad idea. In my opinion – and the opinion of the vast majority of progressive-thinking people in the world today – the leadership organs of any one religion should not aspire to assert authority over government. Instead, there should be separation of religion and state. Humanity is moving away from the idea of having popes, bishops, shaykhs, imams, ayatollahs, or any other kind of religious leaders holding a great deal of worldly power – and this is a very good development for the progress of civilization!

Baha'is need to put aside outdated theories and ideas that are not even clearly taught in Baha'u'llah's own writings. It was Shoghi Effendi, the successor of Abdu'l-Baha, who wrote in favor of theocracy and interpreted the Baha'i scriptures in a way that fit with his own preference for a one-world government ruled by the Universal House of Justice of the Baha'i Faith. Baha'is should move beyond such fantasies that belong to a bygone era, and reinterpret the Baha'i faith's teachings about politics and government to be fully compatible with 21st century democratic values.

The Baha'i religion, if believed in a conservative and dogmatic way as many Baha'is do, is just like so many other philosophies and religions that claim absolute truth and authority while falling short of that impossible level of perfection. Baha'ism has played a valuable role in human spiritual history and continues to benefit many people today, but spiritually mature individuals (whether they choose to consider themselves “Baha'i” or not) should be able to perceive and admit its flaws and refrain from adhering to this faith with a literalistic and fundamentalist attitude – just as we should avoid all fundamentalisms so that we may continue the never-ending search for greater knowledge, understanding, truth, and meaning.

If you agree with a lot of Baha'i principles – such as the unity of humanity, world peace, equality of women and men, racial equality, and interfaith reconciliation – but disagree with the conservative way the Baha'i faith has been interpreted in the mainstream organized Baha'i community, you may be interested to check out these groups and websites:

The next individual to be elected to the Universal House of Justice will be Juan Francisco Mora.

Bab's second wife Fátimih Khánum was a Covenant Breaker!

(1822-1916) was an Isfahání girl who was the second wife of the Báb. Fátimih was the sister of a prominent Bábí, Mullá Rajab-‘Alí. She was married around 1847 aged twenty-five, to serve the Báb during His sojourn to Isfahán. In Persia, it was regarded as dishonourable for a woman to serve a man unless she was not related to him. The couple had no children, and after the Báb left Isfahán she did not accompany Him. After His martyrdom, despite the fact that the Báb asked His wives not remarry, Fátimih Khánum married Azal for one month, until he divorced her and gave her to Siyyid Muhammad Isfahání. Fátimih agreed to these marriages, and is therefore a Covenant Breaker.

The fatal flaw in Baha'i authority

Baha'i moral activities in New Era High School (Panchgani – India)

These are Baha'i Teachers. The case of Dilavara Mirshahi is very popular in Panchgani. Each and every Baha'i knows about this. If Baha'is want to spread their religion with these moral values then they are requested to return back to their countries from where they are exported to India.

What they teach in Baha'i Children Class?

Baha'ism and Christianity

Baha'i figures have said different things at different times regarding Jesus.

For example, on June 24, 1947, Shoghi Effendi stated (also here) "The churches are waiting for the coming of Jesus Christ; we believe He has come again in the Glory of the Father. The churches teach doctrines—various ones in various creeds—which we as Bahá'is do not accept; such as the bodily Resurrection, confession, or, in some creeds, the denial of the Immaculate Conception."

On May 28, 1984, the Universal House of Justice addressed a letter stating "From a Bahá'í point of view the belief that the Resurrection was the return to life of a body of flesh and blood, which later rose from the earth into the sky is not reasonable, nor is it necessary to the essential truth of the disciples' experience, which is that Jesus did not cease to exist when He was crucified (as would have the belief of many Jews of that period), but that His Spirit, released from the body, ascended to the presence of God and continued to inspire and guide His followers and preside over the destinies of His Dispensation."

Bahai's in the West have historically argued that their religion is the fulfillment of Christian prophecy, particularly based on Seventh-day Adventist literature and the teachings of Baptist preacher William Miller. William Sears, named a Hand of the Cause of God by Shoghi Effendi in 1957, was a popular radio and television personality, who wrote a best-selling book, Thief in the Night. William Miller, a Baptist preacher, predicted that on October 22, 1844, Christ would return to the Earth. Although the prophecy was not fulfilled, leading to what was called the Great Disappointment, the Millerites would go on to form the various Adventist churches.

Thief in the Night, argues that Miller's interpretation of biblical prophecies for the signs and dates of the coming of Jesus were correct and fulfilled by the Báb who declared that he was the "Promised One" on May 23, 1844, and began openly teaching in Iran in October 1844. In 2016, a Baha'i movie came out loosely based on these events called The Miller Prediction.

Did the Baha'is in the Ottoman Empire and the following British Mandate cooperate with the Zionist movement?

To give a brief timeline, the Bahá'ís, including Bahá'u'lláh and his family, arrived in Acre on August 31, 1868. Bahá'u'lláh lived in Acre until 1877, when he moved to a mansion in Mazra'a where he lived for two years. From 1879 until his death in 1892, he lived at the Mansion of Bahjí.

The First Zionist Congress was held in Basel, Switzerland, from August 29 to August 31, 1897. The British conquered Palestine from the Ottomans during World War I in a series of campaigns lasting from March through November of 1917. It was only after the British occupation of Palestine that mass immigration of Jewish settlers occurred. Looking at census data for Palestine, for example, in 1922 there were 83,290 Jews and by 1946 that number had risen to 608,225.

On February 23, 1914, at the eve of World War I, 'Abdu'l-Bahá hosted Baron Edmond James de Rothschild a member of the Rothschild banking family who was a leading advocate and financier of the Zionist movement, during one of his early trips to Palestine. This event was reported in "Star of the West" magazine.

On September 8, 1919, subsequent to the British occupation of Palestine, at a time when tens of thousands of Jewish settlers were arriving under the auspices of the Palestine Jewish Colonization Association, an article in the "Star of the West" quoted 'Abdu'l-Bahá praising the Zionist movement', proclaiming that "There is too much talk today of what the Zionists are going to do here. There is no need of it. Let them come and do more and say less" and that "A Jewish government might come later."

On January 24, 1922, Shoghi Effendi received a letter from Herbert Samuel, the British High Commissioner for Palestine. The receipt of the letter is mentioned in Amatu'l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánum's The Priceless Pearl. As High Commissioner, Herbert Samuel was the first Jew to govern the historic land of Israel in 2,000 years, and his appointment was regarded by the Muslim-Christian Associations as the "first step in formation of Zionist national home in the midst of Arab people." Herbert Samuel welcomed the arrival of Jewish settlers under the auspices of the Palestine Jewish Colonization Association and recognised Hebrew as one of the three official languages of the Mandate territory.

On December 16, 1950, a little over a year after the international recognition of the State of Israel, the mansion at Mazra'a was leased from the Israeli government by the Bahá'í Administrative Order. Bahá'u'lláh lived there from 1877 until 1879, before moving to the Mansion at Bahjí.

The transaction is described in Baha'i News, no. 244, June 1951, p. 4

The mansion at Mazra'a would later be purchased by the Bahá'í Administrative Order from the Israeli government as reported in Messages from the Universal House of Justice 1968-1973, published 1976; Ridván Message 1973, p. 119

On November 12, 1952, a cablegram sent by Shoghi Effendi announced the "acquisition of vitally-needed property" of the Mansion of Bahjí and the area around it from "the Development Authority of the State of Israel". The exchange of said property, including land and houses, was made possible by the precipitate flight of the former Arab owners."

On January 21, 1949, Shoghi Effendi met with David Ben Gurion. In the chapter titled The Heart and Nerve Centre in her book The Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith, Amatu'l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánum describes this meeting. . .

Recent Messages from the President and the Vice President of India for the Baha'is

The below messages of the President and the Vice President of India is being circulated by the Baha'is of India in Social Media, Bahai Forums and Websites wherein they have taken pride that the topmost Government officials have wished them on the Bicentennial Celebration of Bab and Baha'u'llah.

The interesting part in these message is that they have smartly fooled them by providing them the fake information that they are 2 million in India while the Government of India census figure clearly states that Baha'is are only 4573 in numbers.(REF ‘Data on Religion’ by the Census Department of Government of India states the Baha’i population as.)

Bahais have deceived these personalities and exploited their contacts to extract such letters from them. There could be some rich and influential Baha'is who are in friendly contacts with Government officials through whom they had been successful in carrying out such works.

People of India must be careful about these recent development and must take a note that Baha'is in India are fooling the people through RUHI books, Youth Empowerment Programmes , Children Classes and other so called Moral Activities. Their hidden agenda is to convert more and more People to Bahai faith so that they could acquire Minority Status in India. I think that is also one of the reason that on their official websites they have highly exaggerated their numbers and now with the help of these messages they wanted to prove to the World that they are indeed 2 millions in India.

MESSAGE

I convey warm greetings and heartfelt good wishes to the Bahá'í community of India on the occasion of the Bicentennial Birth Anniversary of Founder Prophet Baha'u'llah of the Bahá'í Faith, whose words "The earth is but one country and mankind its citizens" remain as relevant today as when they were first uttered by Him.

India takes pride in being home to the largest Bahá'í community in the world, a community as diverse as the country itself and one that has co-existed peacefully and harmoniously with fellow citizens of every faith and belief for almost 150 years.

Baha'u'llah's legacy endures in the efforts of the Baha'i community as it strives with countless others to translate His vision into reality and work for the peace and happiness of all.

I call upon the Bahá'í community as well as all Indians to use this occasion to reflect on Baha'u'llah's life, His vision for the unity of humanity and the monumental body of His Writings about the moral and spiritual transformation of the individual and society.

VICE-PRESIDENT OF INDIA

MESSAGE

I am happy to learn that National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of India is organizing the bicentennial birth anniversary of Baha'u'llah, the founder of Baha'I Faith.

The Baha'i community in India adds to the great diversity of our land. India has been associated with the Baha'i Faith right from its inception in 1844. Today, with over 2 million adherents of the Bhai faith, India is home to the largest community of Bahis in the world.

The community has made significant contributions to the social causes through its charitable work in education, healthcare and employment generation for all members of the society. The Baha'i House of worship in India has become a symbol of communal harmony and brotherhood.

India has, for centuries, provided a unique social and intellectual environment in which many distinct religions and faiths have not only co-existed peacefully but have also enriched each other. To Jawaharlal Nehru, India was a palimpsest on which many had written their contribution and none were to be disowned. The poet Ragupati Rai Firaq expressed the process in a couplet;

Karwaan aate gaye, Hindostan banta gaya*

I extend my greetings and good wishes to all the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of India and wish the event all success.

The Two Mirzas – Mirza Golam Ahmed & Mirza Hosain Ali

Mirza Golam Ahmed

Mirza Hosain Ali

Ghulam Ahmad has often been compared with Baha'u'llah. There is a close affinity between the ideas and preaching of these two men. Baha'u'llah was born twenty-two years before Ghulam Ahmad, and died when the latter was past fifty and had yet eighteen years to live. Baha'u'llah and Ghulam Ahmad never met each other, but that circumstance cannot preclude influence of one upon the other. The Iranian is reflected in the Qadiani, and no protestations to the contrary can dislodge him from the hold he seems to have over Ghulam Ahmad's mind. There is a marked family resemblance between the Baha'i and the Qadiani movements. The present chapter is an attempt to compare and contrast Qadianism and Baha'ism.

Baha'u'llah was a disciple of Ali Muhammad Bab, who belonged to the dervish order of Shekhis in Iran, distinguished by its expectancy of a divine messenger. Ali Muhammad declared himself to be the Bab or medium of divine grace. He claimed at first to be a harbinger, a John the Baptist, in relation to the impending advent of the Mehdi; later on he stepped into Mehdihood; and, finally, he meant to be regarded as the most privileged among the chosen, the expected of all expectants, and "the primal, pivotal and focal point" of the universe. His claims naturally jarred upon his countrymen, who called in persecution to stamp out the heresy. But the blood of martyrs served only to cement the Babi church. The Bab was publicly shot in 1850. The central and inalienable part of his claim, notwithstanding its metamorphoses, was that he was essentially a man of the seed-time, and that he was preparing the way for a 'Manifestation of God.' He had no clear ideas upon the subject that engrossed him so entirely. He could say nothing as to the time of the new dispensation. But he could say with something like certainty that the advent he gloried in would not be delayed by more than two thousand years.

Hardly had the Bab's voice ceased to vibrate when Baha'u'llah, who was two years his senior, declared himself to be the redeemer of the Bab's prophecies. He called himself the 'Manifestation of God.' He claimed to be a law-giver with a message for the whole world. He represented his revelations as the latest arrivals from heaven, which rendered allegiance to the older faiths unnecessary. Baha'ism, in the eyes of its founder, is to Islam what Islam is to Christianity, or what Christianity is to Judaism. Baha'u'llah has set up a new religion which has its own canon law, its own scriptures, and its own holy land. He has seceded from Islam and would not have it even for his label.

Mirza Ghulam Ahmad tried to do all that a secessionist would. But he is anxious to be called a Muslim and a founder of a sect. He is conscious of his prophethood being extraneous to Islam. At times he tries to explain it away by calling it metaphorical and a figure of speech. But he does, whenever he can, surreptitiously introduce references to his prophethood being superior to every other and second to none. He discourages the Haj pilgrimage by example rather than precept. The way he consecrates Qadian can leave us in no doubt as to his real intent. The spiritual compass of a Qadiani points to Qadian and not Mecca. It was Ghulam Ahmad's boast that he had stilled the cry of Jihad for all time. He could not say that without implying that he had amended Quran in a very material respect, and yet he professes implicit faith in the Quran, nay, in every jot and tittle of it.

Baha'u'llah seems to have been Ghulam Ahmad's ideal. The difference between these two men is only this: The Iranian is plain and direct; he has abandoned the religion of his fore-fathers, and makes no secret of it. Ghulam Ahmad is devious and roundabout; he cannot make up his mind to risk an open breach with Islam; he must, therefore, disrupt it from within. He professes a votary's love for the Prophet and yet declares his own advent to be attended by more numerous and cogent signs than was the Prophet's. Mirza Ghulam Ahmad does not draw the conclusion to which he is logically committed. Is it due to fear of consequences or to a sickly vacillation of mind?

Baha'u'llah does not question the Muslim doctrine of Finality of Prophethood. He calls himself 'a Manifestation of God.' His idea seems to be that prophethood has fulfilled its mission ; it is no longer necessary ; the future lies not with prophets, but with 'Manifestations of God.' The term 'Manifestation of God' has not been given an exact definition by Baha'u'llah, but certain it is that he does not apply it to Prophets like Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad. He seems to place a 'Manifestation of God' higher than a prophet, and to present himself as the first incumbent of that more exalted office. A 'Manifestation of God' is nothing short of God incarnate.

Ghulam Ahmad is conscious of an obstacle in the doctrine of Finality of Prophethood. And he tries to overcome it by declaring himself to be the selfsame Muhammad that preached Islam in Arabia thirteen hundred years ago. Ghulam Ahmad is not Ghulam Ahmad, but Muhammad reborn and revisiting the world. Those who take him to be himself are in error. He is plainly invoking metempsychosis to cut the Gordian knot. He tries to break the law without challenging its letter and seeks to pervert rather than discard the doctrine of Finality of Prophethood. At the top of his voice he cries hosanna to a provident Finality that had held him in reserve all these thirteen hundred years.

Whatever their claims, the net result of the teachings of Baha'u'llah and Ghulam Ahmad is much the same. The former declares Islam to have had its day, while the latter predicts for Islam an endless vista of glory under his sole auspices. "Jihad stands abrogated," says Baha'u'llah. "Islam needs Jihad no longer," re-echoes Ghulam Ahmad, "and I am here to deliver the funeral oration over it." "Acre and not Mecca shall henceforth attract pilgrims," says Baha'u'llah. "But," interposes Ghulam Ahmad, "Qadian is decidedly better than Acre and certainly as good as Mecca, for I have been shown in a vision Qadian mentioned in the Quran besides Mecca and Medina."

Baha'u'llah and Ghulam Ahmad represent themselves as world teachers and not as belonging to this, that, or the other community or country. Baha'u'llah seems to acquit himself of this role with greater credit and better grace than Ghulam Ahmad. The Baha'is are expected to consort with people of every religion, and they would pray with Muslims in a mosque, with Christians in a church, and with Jews in a synagogue. But Ghulam Ahmad forbids his followers all contact with Muslims, not to mention Hindus, Jews or Christians.

There is a fundamental difference between the anti-Jihadism of Baha'u'llah and of Ghulam Ahmad. The former exhorts the world to turn the sword into the plough-share, and the pacifist in him advocates something like universal disarmament. Ghulam Ahmad is unacquainted with these issues. He would be content only if the Muslims forgot that their forbears ever wielded the sword. He does not tender the same advice to the Christian world.

As a political thinker Baha'u'llah shows some talent which is denied to Ghulam Ahmad. He wants a League of Nations to settle international disputes, though he cannot be said to have sponsored the league-idea as the Baha'is believe. Baha'u'llah is anxious to unify the human race and he stresses the need of a universal language to promote better understanding and harmony. The invention of Esperanto was hailed by the Baha'is as the dawn of a new era, and they have made the cause of this language their own.

Baha'u'llah, like Ghulam Ahmad, is an emissary of Western imperialism. He denies to backward peoples the right to govern themselves. The pre-war 'spheres of influence' and the post-war 'mandates' are in complete harmony with his political ethics. Nobody welcomed and blessed more enthusiastically the unrighteous mandate in Palestine, the adopted home of Baha'u'llah and his successors, than Abdul Baha Abbas, the eldest son of Baha'u'llah, who received a Knighthood of the British Empire in recognition of his benediction.

Baha'u'llah condemns industrial slavery, but lifts the ban imposed by Islam on interest. It is interest that makes possible the accumulation and centralization of capital in a few hands, and makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. Interest is the parent of which industrial slavery is the child. It is doubtful whether Baha'u'llah's teaching has been exercised to any appreciable extent on behalf of the labourer. But he has certainly earned the gratitude of the capitalist.

Baha'u'llah is anxious to curry favour with the West. His ethics is most accommodating to its foibles. Purdah, Jihad, and Polygamy are tabooed. Interest is permitted, and European land-grabbing provided for. His predecessor, the Bab, had prohibited tobacco. But Baha'u'llah knows the prohibition will militate against the spread of Baha'ism in Europe and America; he, therefore, withdraws it. He is an opportunist beyond doubt.

Both Ghulam Ahmad and Baha'u'llah want their followers to be total abstainers from politics. It is a faulty conception of religion that divorces it from politics. The politics of a country mould the lives and destinies of its people and have a way of victimizing those who have no voice or share in determining them. Divine messengers are known to have actively shaped the politics of their times. Moses knew well enough that it was the tyranny of the Pharaohs that had reduced the Israelites to serfdom and blighted their genius. He did not say to them : "Let politics take care of themselves and let the Pharaoh have his way : we can carry on reform without touching one or the other." The emancipator in Moses precedes the reformer and the lawgiver. Alien rule is the worst that can happen to a community; it uproots initiative and deforms character. A prophet cannot shut his eyes to iniquity governing human relations. Far be it from him to acquiesce in, or countenance, dehumanization of man. Ghulam Ahmad and Baha'u'llah amply deserve the censure contained in Sa'adi's words: "Tell that unfeeling and disobliging wasp that since it will not yield honey, it should spare us its sting."

The methods of Baha'i propaganda have greatly influenced Ghulam Ahmad and his successors. Baha'u'llah styles himself a 'Manifestation of God' a term that has occasioned a good deal of equivocation and sophistry. Christian converts to Baha'ism have transferred to Baha'u'llah the divinity with which as Christians they had invested Jesus. They look upon Baha'u'llah's advent as the coming of the Father Himself. The pill of Baha'u'llah's Godhead is difficult for a Muslim to swallow and he can be fed on the more palatable diet of prophethood. To the mystically-minded Baha'u'llah's divinity is represented as the mystic's license. The Baha'i preachers have tried to adapt Baha'u'llah to the beliefs, prejudices, and idiosyncracies of his prospective votaries. They do not mind what Baha'u'llah is made of so long as he is accepted.

Mirza Ghulam Ahmad resembles Baha'u'llah in this respect much as a child favours its father. His prophethood is chameleonic and opportunist. When challenged it resolves itself into Mehdihood. The Mehdi, again, has a way of rendering himself less obtrusive in the guise of an inspired reformer whose mission is limited to a century. The mystic's pose is not unknown to Ghulam Ahmad. It can serve to hide his inconsistencies and make room for his extreme self-exaltation. Ghulam Ahmad is anxious to be accepted rather than understood. He would not like to be committed irrevocably to one proposition or other, as the Qadianis and the Lahoris are trying to identify him with their respective points of view. Ghulam Ahmad is at once a Lahori and a Qadiani, and, at times, he transcends and eludes both. The Lahoris do not, and the Qadianis will not, understand him when he asserts that his advent outshines the Holy Prophet's.

Baha'ism is a secret cult. The Baha'is cannot be pardoned for having done away with the 'Bayan' of the Bab, a book on which Baha'u'llah originally based his claim and which, nevertheless, is believed to contain matter not very complementary to it. The very fact that the Baha'is have suppressed this work does show that the Bab's teaching must have discountenanced Baha'u'llah, whose claim could not prosper so long as the Bab stood in the way. Whatever little we know of the Bab, we know through the Baha'is, who are an interested party, and utilize the Bab as a forerunner and a mouth-piece of Baha'u'llah. The Baha'is emulate the Ismailis in being secretive about their creed. They do not present Baha'u'llah's Book of Aqdas as unreservedly as Muslims present the Quran. That shows that Baha'ism, as preached in the common Baha'i literature, omits something vital to that religion. The neophyte is initiated into the mysteries of the faith by degrees. He must believe before he is permitted to understand. Might we not think that a religion, the propagation of which is accompanied by a systematic concealment of its original, official, and authoritative records surely suffers from some grave disability which, if made public, would react unfavourably on the cause ?

Qadianism is not as mysterious as Baha'ism. Mirza Ghulam Ahmad prefers to insert his meaning between the lines rather than entrust it to the unsafe custody of secret circulation. He is covert rather than uncommunicative. His dynastic ambition is clothed in metaphor, and while it is persistent, it is seldom allowed to grow so articulate as to arouse suspicion. He has his asides, and it is to these rather than to his lengthy speeches that we must refer to be the better acquainted with his mind. In one of his asides he predicts the downfall of the British Empire and yet he has all his life been fawning upon the British Government. In another aside he arrogates to himself the station of a prophet and a law-giver. For once he has acquiesced in what has always sounded in his ears as a slanderous imputation. He disclaims his asides when they are overheard. They are his private thoughts not meant for the rag-tag and bobtail. Thus we can say of Qadianism, as we said of Baha'ism, that its common literature does not tell the whole truth.

Both Ghulam Ahmad and Baha-ullah are authors. Their writings are voluminous and vague. The Qadiani calls himself the "Sovereign Writer" and the Iranian entitles himself the "Supreme Pen". Both are notorious for their bad grammar. Baha'u'llah's mother tongue is Iranian, of which he is an undisputed master. But his Arabic takes leave of grammar as well as idiom. And his divine mission seems labouring under an inferiority complex when it chooses Arabic, a foreign tongue, as the language of by far the most important of his works, Kitab-ul-Aqdas (the Holy Book), which is to the Baha'is what the Quran is to the Muslims. He seems to think the Iranian language to be lacking in, and incapable of acquiring, notwithstanding his advent, the ascendancy that belongs to Arabic. Mirza Ghulam Ahmad spoke the language of the Central Punjab, which is not a language of literary expression. He generally wrote in Urdu and occasionally in Arabic and Persian, but of none of these can he be said to be even a tolerable master. He has pretensions to being the most gifted author in the world. His is a cheap scholarship that fails to see its own limitations. He has the habit of offering cash prizes, far beyond his means, to those who might successfully rebut his arguments and he exults like a victor over his repeated challenge remaining unanswered. His writings are wanting in moral tone, a disadvantage that Baha-ullah does not share with him. The latter has nowhere in his works bastardized his opponents, or characterized them as filth-eaters, which the former has done in prose as well as in rhyme. The "Sovereign Writer" has much to learn from the "Supreme Pen."

The Baha'is and the Qadianis have many an oddity in common. The sophistries characteristic of the Qadianis belong to the Baha'is as well. The Baha'is have ransacked the Scriptures of Christianity and Islam in their attempts to find Baha'u'llah mentioned in the prophecies. The Qadianis have undertaken as much on behalf of Ghulam Ahmad. These researches have not been very fruitful, but the followers of these newfangled faiths believe that their masters are deducible from the Bible and the Quran. They would do any violence to the text in order to make it yield the meaning they have decided to extract from it.

The Baha'is as well as the Qadianis are regular traders on the prophecies emanating from their respective teachers. It is for them to decide whether it was Ghulam Ahmad's ill-will or Bahullah's curse that overthrew Ottoman Turkey, that had ignored the former and interned the latter. It should be equally debatable whether the German defeat in the Great European War was the Messiah's doing or Baha'u'llah's; the former had visualized torrents of blood, and the latter had actually pronounced his malediction on the German victor of Napoleon III. Let the Baha'i and the Qadiani also decide whether the British 'sphere of influence' in Iran was the Messiah's parting gift to the British nation or Baha'u'llah's visitation upon the people that had persecuted the Babis and the Baha'is. Be that as it may, the Ahmadi will insist, and the Baha'i should gladly allow, that pestilence and earthquakes are the Messiah's monopoly. It is not for us to say whether it is the Baha'i or the Qadiani that has the upper hand. Each finds his match in the other. They are as twins, and have certainly gone to school together.

Ghulam Ahmad and Baha'u'llah have a passive attitude towards life. They can expatiate for hours and hours on the sublimity they claim for their preaching; they can dilate upon the wrongs, fancied or real, that they have suffered, and seem masochistically to delight in doing so; they are the loudest in condemning the world, but far too afraid of its might to risk hostilities. They represent their weakness as strength, their necessity as virtue, and their inferiority as superiority. They borrow its values from the world and create none of their own; they are pupil-teachers at their best. Propagandists, parodists and mountebanks, they sought to impose upon the world. But the world is not to be taken in by sheer legerdemain. It knows its Titans from its pignies; it bows before the former and jostles away the latter.

‘Persecuted’ Baha’is (Yaaran) of Iran !!

The So called ‘Persecuted’ Baha’is (Yaaran) of Iran are enjoying Life in Prison !!!

Some of the Exclusively Pics of the Yaaran from the Prison in Iran

Are there Members of Baha'u'llah's Family Alive today ????

It is Strange to see that a Baha'i doesn't have knowledge about the family members of Baha'u'llah !!!!!

Universal House of Justice, the Supreme body of Baha'i Administration have been fooling the unaware Baha'is that no members of Baha'u'llah family is alive today. Baha'is who are taught 'independant investigation of truth' as one of the most important Baha'i Principle are denied investigation in such an Important matter. Whenever any Baha'is try to investigate the matter, he is immediately declared as 'Covenant Breaker'.

Eric Stetson and the grandson of Baha'u'llah – Shua Ullah Behai has exposed the lies of Universal House of Justice in their celebrated book – THE LOST HISTORY OF BAHAI FAITH.

Fortunately this book is now online and available for everyone to read. Baha'is are advised to read this book with open mind and find out the truth behind the ex-communication of immediate family members of Baha'u'llah by Abdul Baha and Shoghi Effendi.

The Failed Baha'i Prophecy About All Iranian Jews Converting to Baha'ism

Courtesy : <http://www.bahai-bahai.com/eng/index.php/articles?id=95>

In one of his letters on the occasion of the death of a number of Baha'is in Yazd and Isfahan, Abdu'l-Baha tries to blame the Scholars of Iran for their death and claims these deaths were the result of the Jealousy of Shia scholars due to the massive conversion of Persians to Baha'ism. This is what he states in a section of this letter that is part of the suppressed Baha'i texts that Baha'is simply refuse to translate to English:

"In summary, in these days the scholars of the Shia [belief], meaning the former religion of Iran, noticed that the call of God has been raised, and the East and West have stirred, the lights of the sun of truth have spread to such an extent that the eyes have become illuminated, the flag of the cause of God has been hoisted, the people enter by troops under the word of God (i.e. they are converting to Baha'ism), and the Shia have become Baha'is. Even the Israelites (Jews) are so excited and astonished that soon not a single one of them will remain in Iran but that he will be guided to the highest guidance (i.e. he would become a Baha'i). Also the majority of the Parsis (Zoroastrians), who are the ancient people of Iran and deny all the Prophets like Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and the Messenger of Allah (Muhammad), testify and admit that all Books, Messengers, and Divine Prophets [are legitimate] and with the utmost truthfulness and serenity have become Baha'is. This has become a source of animosity and jealousy for the evil scholars..." (Abdu'l-Baha, Makاتب [Letters], vol. 3, pp. 124-125)

The aforementioned paragraph is replete with false statements:

- 1- Shia Islam is called the "former religion of Iran" thus making it seem that Baha'ism is now officially the religion of Iranians and most of the population have converted to Baha'ism. The intention to induce such a meaning is evident from what Abdu'l-baha states in the remainder of the paragraph.
- 2- It is stated that "the people enter by troops under the word of God (i.e. they are converting to Baha'ism), and the Shia have become Baha'is." This is also false because the percentage of Baha'i converts in Iran among the population was minute and still is.

3- He claims “Even the Israelites (Jews) are so excited and astonished that ere long not a single one of them will remain in Iran but that he will be guided to the highest guidance (i.e. they will all become Baha’is).” This is obviously false and a failed prophecy because more than a century has passed since this claim was made but Iran still retains the second-highest Jewish population in the middle-east.

4- He also claims that the majority of Zoroastrians are now Baha’is. The falsity of this sentence is self-evident and needs no further explanation.

If one were to read these statements in light of Baha’i claims about the station of Abdu’l-Baha, including the infallibility of his Pen,[1] his superhuman knowledge,[2] the reception of direct inspirations from Baha’u’llah,[3] his own claims about knowing everything when he wants,[4] and that whatever he says is fact,[5] it would quickly become clear that these statements are all part of a great deception.

[1] “Little wonder that from the same unerring pen there should have flowed, after Abdu’l-Baha’s memorable visit to the West” (Shoghi Effendi, The World Order of Baha’u’llah, p. 75)

[2] “while it does not by any means justify us to assign to Him the station of Prophethood, indicates how in the person of ‘Abdu’l-Bahā the incompatible characteristics of a human nature and superhuman knowledge and perfection have been blended and are completely harmonized,” (Shoghi Effendi, The World Order of Baha’u’llah, p. 134.)

[3] “That Abdu’l-Baha is not a Manifestation of God, that He gets His light, His inspiration and sustenance direct from the Fountain-head of the Baha’i Revelation; that He reflects even as a clear and perfect Mirror the rays of Baha’u’llah’s glory ... His words are not equal in rank, though they possess an equal validity with the utterances of Baha’u’llah” (Shoghi Effendi, The World Order of Baha’u’llah, p. 139)

[4] “No, I do not know everything. But when I need to know something, it is pictured before me,” (Stanwood Cobb, Memories of Abdu’l-Baha in His Presence: Visits to Abdu’l-Baha (Kalimat Press, 1989), p. 60)

[5] “Many times He said, ‘I do not make a claim of infallibility (ma`sumiyyat). I am the first of sinners (avval-i gunahkar). But the Blessed Beauty favored me with a gift (mawhibati). Whatever I say, it is that (har chih beguyam, hamān ast).’” (<http://www-personal.umich.edu/~jrcole/abinfall.htm>)

Memories of Mohammed Ali Effendi – Son of Baha’u’llah

To His Excellency Abbas Effendi Abdul Baha.

Dear sir:

Inasmuch as your views and doctrines in our religion are radically different from those of my father, your younger brother, Mohammed Ali Effendi who was chosen in the ‘Book of My Covenant’ the last Will of Baha’u’llah, to occupy after you the same position you occupy now:

And inasmuch as this difference between both of you spreads among the followers of Baha’u’llah and divided them into two parties; one following you and believing in your personal teachings, and the other party which joined your brother believing in the teachings of Baha’u’llah only and considering them final as he declared:

And, inasmuch as we were all commanded in the ‘Most Sacred Book’ Kitáb-i-Aqdas, to bring our differences to the utterance of Baha’u’llah, which sufficed the world, whereby they should be settled:

And, inasmuch as our duty is to establish peace at home, among ourselves first, before we preach others to do so:

I hereby beg your Excellency to appoint a conference of peace and spirituality to hold its meetings at the city of Chicago, or some other place, at a certain time, in order to discuss with the language of love and kindness the differences between the said two parties and settle them in accord with the utterances of Baha’u’llah and His Commandments.

If it please you, said conference would be composed of your Excellency with some learned ones of your followers, myself and Dr. I.G. Khayru’llah, who introduced Baha’ism into America and Christendom with a few of our party.

My father Ghusni Akbar, authorized me to state, that he will accept and sanction whatever your Excellency would establish with me and with his representative Dr. I.G. Khayru’llah.

The official language of said conference shall be the U.S. Language, a neutral interpreter should be hired to translate from the Arabic language all that you would like to say and in the meantime to translate to you all the discussions of the conference. Also to ask the Associated Press to send a reporter to write the minutes of the conference; and to invite three American savants to attend the meetings and acts witnesses and judges.

I suggest the questions and discussions to be the following:

First: Why your Excellency concealed a part of the ‘Book of My Covenant,’ the will of Baha’u’llah? That will was entrusted to you that you might give all of it to the followers of Baha’u’llah.

Second: Ghusni Akbar was chosen to occupy after you the same position you occupy, and your Excellency claimed that he was cut off and fell. How is it possible that he fell from the said position before having had a chance to occupy it?

Third: What grounds have you to claim that you are the Center of the Covenant? God only is the center of the Covenant.

Forth: Why do you claim to be the Interpreter of the Utterances of Baha’u’llah? He declared in the Book of Wisdom that there is no Interpreter to them save Himself.

Fifth: How could it be that you are the manifestation of servitude and Baha’u’llah declared it to Himself only? Also He taught there are no manifestations after Him until one thousand years passed from His appearance.

Sixth: Why do you claim the great Infallibility calling your letters sacred tablets and revelations? Baha’u’llah said; ‘Whosoever claimeth a mission before the completion of one thousand years from His Manifestation is a lying impostor.

Seventh: Why do you teach that this greatest Manifestation has three chiefs, the Bab, Baha’u’llah and yourself? Baha’u’llah said: “There is no one else beside him in the Kingdom.” Likewise the Bible taught that at the latter days we shall have one shepherd, only one chief and not three. Also Baha’u’llah said: ” He hath no agent, no successor, and no son.”

Eighth: Why do you claim and in the same breath deny that which you claim?

Ninth: Why do you teach and spread the teachings of Baha’u’llah as you were commanded to do, instead of spreading your own?

I close this open letter, appealing to your Excellency by justice, love and unity to grant my request.

Your Humble servant,

The Grandson of Baha’u’llah,

Shua Ullah

Jamshid Rohani – born in Baha’i Family but not a Baha’i –A Brief History

Courtesy : <http://thefriendsofgod.webs.com>

IN THE YEAR 1960 a man named Jamshid Rohani was born in Iran. He was born into a Baha’i family, but never declared himself a Baha’i. He was a very spiritual youth, and travelled throughout Iran to study all the various religions. He choose to be a Dervish (ascetic). He claimed to have many mystical experiences and visions in which his spirit would leave his body, and he would travel to the Third Heaven. While in these visions to have conversed with many Prophets and Saints, such as Jesus, Krishna, Buddha, Zoroaster, and others. During these out-of-body experiences Rohani would question these Great Souls and receive answers. Upon reaching adulthood he began to study English from friends who had studied in America and England in the 1970s and 1980s.. In 2004 he walked across the western Iranian Zagros mountains and sneaked past boarder guards, sneaking into Turkey. From Turkey he travelled to Greece, and eventually found his way to the United States. He stayed in the U.S. for five years, learning English and studying the various Christian denominations while he worked as a cab driver in New York City, Chicago, Dallas, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Seattle, Washington. While in Seattle he made a few American disciples. In 2010 Rohan declared he was returning to Iran, but instructed his American disciples to form; a worldwide fellowship of followers of the Good Religion.

Jamshid Rohani taught that there is only One Religion of God, the Good Religion, and that all the major religions today are just “orders” of the Good Religion. He taught that the Supreme Being is Ahura Mazda, the Only Wise Lord.He taught that the Zoroastrian religion had been corrupted over thousands of years by uninspired high priests, and he sought to restore the Good Religion back to its original purity; a religion without required rites, compulsory rituals, mandatory congregational meetings, heirarchies, or priests. He taught that the Good Religion is a very simple religion: one based upon good thoughts, good words, and good deeds. He taught that the Religion of God consists of how we treat other sentient beings, and not how we prayer or what Messenger or Prophet we claim to follow, or what caste we belong to.

Rohani was interviewed, and these interviews were recorded in long-hand, and Rohani instructed his disciples to publish these interviews after he returned to Iran. Jamshid Rohani denied he was a Messenger or Prophet of God, but insisted he was a (Arabic: “One Spoken To”) meaning a non-prophet who is spoken to by an angel or one who sees a vision. He was taught in the Third Heaven that Muhammad (Peace Be Unto Him) was the Last Prophet of God for humanity on this planet, and that no more prophet or messenger will come except in visions to the Seers (Muhaddatheen). Rohani preached that Islaam is not a religious faith, but a religious of submitting one’s will to the Will of God daily. He taught that Rabbinical Judaism, Christianity, Islaam, the Religion of the Druze, and the Religion of Truth (Ahl-i-Haqq) were just variations of the One Religion of God: the Good Religion. Jamshid Rohani taught:

“If Islaam were the umma (community) of the Apostle of God, peace be unto him, then all those who belong to that umma would be Muslims. But, Islaam is not a religious community, but a religious practice. Islaam is submitting my will to the Will of God. If my heart is sincere, and I submit my will to the will of God, then I am practicing Islaam. Yet, if I call myself a Muslim, and prayer five times a day, and go to Masjid on Friday, but if I oppress the poor, and deceive others in business, and if I am cruel to my wife, and to animals, and if I neglect the orphan and the widow and the sick and the aged and the infirm in body and mind, and do not give to them a portion of my substance, then I am not a Muslim but a hypocrite. Yet, if I am a Christian, or a Jew, or a Buddhist, and I submit my will to the Will of God, to the best of my knowledge and ability, then I am truly a Muslim, even if I have never read the Qu’ran, and even if I do not belong to the umma of Muhammad, Peace be Unto Him.” (The Good Book).

Jamshid Rohani taught that Jesus was a Jew by blood, but a Zoroastrian by faith. He said that the sect of the Nazarenes were a sect of Jewish Zoroastrians, and that Jesus was born a Nazarene and died a Nazarene, and that Jesus was not the Founder of the new religion of “Christianity” but was, rather, one of the three virgin-born Saoshyants (Benefactors) that the Prophet Zoroaster had prophesied would come. Rohani claimed that he had long conversations with Jesus in the Third Heaven, asking Him many questions, and receiving many answers. The questions and answers are reproduced in which will be published by sometime in the year 2016 online, and later in printed form.

Jamshid Rohani told his American disciples that would one-day become one of the largest philanthropic organizations in the world, with millions of members and supporters, and that it would do much to quell the animosity between religionists around the world. Rohani taught that Pure Religion was not about nationality, or caste, or church, or what religious community we belong to, or what doctrines we believe in, but True Religion was visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and caring for the widows, orphans, and homeless, and becoming peacemakers. He said:

Jamshid Rohani said that in ancient times people needed priests and mobeds and imaams to guide them, because most people could not read, but that today, since most people can read, the time for a “learned class” of priests was now over, that people could read the Word of God for themselves, and be guided by it without the help of human interpreters. He taught that the visions of Seers is a much better guide than human scholarship or religious traditions.

In 2010 Jamshid Rohani returned to Iran, to live a life of ascetism, prayer, and seclusion, so that he would be found worthy to be born above into the Kingdom of Heaven at death. Rohani was born homosexual. In the Third Heaven he asked many questions, including about homosexuality, and he received answers to why some people are born homosexual, and how homosexuals may enter into the Kingdom of Heaven at death. Rohani insisted that the Friends of God have no priests, no “learned ones”, no international or national leaders, but only local elected ministers who act as servants instead of as leaders and masters. He instructed that our Holy Book be “The Bible of the World”. He also instructed that we not refer to ourselves with sectarian names (he did not wish to become the founder of yet another religious sect), but to simply refer to ourselves as “Followers of the Good Religion”. He insisted that we should worship Ahura Mazda alone (Only He is Good), and not worship Messengers, Prophets, Saints, Satgurus, or (Seers) such as himself.

The purpose of The Friends of God International is to establish homes for widows and orphans in places where the government does not do these things, or does little in that area, and to establish homeless centers in North America and Europe, and to publish and promulgate which contains the teachings of the Prophets and Saints as They instructed him in the Third Heaven. The Friends of God International has now been established.

Ruhi does not represent the Baha'i Faith or Bahá'u'lláh

Courtesy : <http://www.ruhifreezone.is/>

Ruhi is not and does not represent the Baha'i Faith or Bahá'u'lláh, the Manifestation of God.

While Bahá'u'lláh taught unity of Faith, he never spoke of a singular teaching dogma such as Ruhi. Quite the contrary, Bahá'u'lláh advocated freedom of discussion and thought.

The principles of the strict uniform teaching method for the Baha'i Faith called Ruhi are based on the harsh instructional disciplines of Marxist liberation theology that has roots in the jungles of South America. The teaching method was copied, adapted and espoused by Farzam Arbab, who started a personal business in Cali, Columbia – the Ruhi Institute – during the height of the cocaine activity in the area. Arbab named his endeavor "Ruhi" after his father.

Arbab – a man driven by the fundamentals of Marxism has been described as "ruthless," "vicious," and "vindictive" – subsequently managed to gain a seat on the Baha'i Universal House of Justice in Haifa. Once in a seat of power and influence, Arbab set about manipulating leadership and the fundamental foundations of the Baha'i Faith.

The Marxist-rooted influence of Arbab is a dark force, a test, a momentary challenge that the Baha'i Faith must overcome ... and it will.

At a time of low growth and poor community development in the Baha'i Faith some years ago, Arbab claimed his Ruhi style of systematic training and group study would attract massive numbers of new followers.

Ruhi has been at the core of Arbab's agenda to remold the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh, the current day Manifestation of God. Arbab claimed the uniform Ruhi teaching program would bring "armies" of new followers to the Baha'i Faith. In reality, Ruhi has been a failure that has created financial hardship on Baha'i administrations around the world and resulted in a loss of members. There is no growth.

Using tactics that have often been called "strong arm" and through threat, backbiting, intimidation and harsh punishments, Arbab forced through his "vision." He claimed the Ruhi program was "proven" (untrue), had been thoroughly vetted by academics and research (untrue), and would result in many more members of the Faith (untrue). It was all a con-job by Arbab. Nevertheless, anyone who stood in his way – from fellow House of Justice members to Baha'i leaders around the world – have been punished, ostracized and dismissed. He gained so much power that no one was allowed to stand in Arbab's maniacal ways.

Under Arbab's regime, National Spiritual Assemblies worldwide have been bullied. Good leaders treated rudely and forced out. Arbab has populated the "institution" with cronies and family members.

More is being written about the depth of inaccurate and misinformation in the series of Ruhi books. Sacred quotes by Bahá'u'lláh and his eldest son 'Abdu'l-Bahá' – Center of the Cause – have been erroneous or taken out of context. Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Faith, has all but been written out of Ruhi.

The private organization behind Ruhi – Palabra Publications in West Palm Beach, Florida – casts a shadow of conflict of interest and lack of ethical behavior by Palabra's three owners – Arbab; Paul Lample, Arbab's partner, minion and fellow Baha'i Universal House of Justice member; and Cap Cornwell, owner of a painting company in Palm Beach, Florida.

Cap Cornwell

While Arbab and Lample have assured Baha'is that Palabra Publishing is a not-for-profit organization, it is privately owned and not registered with the state of Florida. While no public records are available, Palabra Publications apparently has generated a fortune for Arbab, Lample and Cornwell by being the sole-source for all Ruhi teaching materials. Ruhi has made them rich.

Palabra is located within Cornwell's paint company at 7369 Westport Place, West Palm Beach, Florida.

Arbab, who has spoken of his contempt for the United States and the American people, lives in communist China although he visits West Palm Beach, Florida, to monitor his Ruhi business endeavors. His influence over the Bahá'i World Centre in Haifa, Israel, remains so great that he is afforded a permanent office suite, unprecedented for a former member of the House of Justice.

It's okay for members of the Baha'i Faith and who believe that Bahá'u'lláh is the Manifestation of God to speak out, discuss and shed fear of reprisal. We must adhere to unity and embrace the Faith of God, the Baha'i Faith. But, we must not accept or condone bullying. Fear is a weapon of a destructive force.

Who is the Promised One of Islam ???? Bab or Baha'ullah

Baha'is are an interesting bunch.

Normally, a man-made belief like bahaism is riddle with inaccuracies and contradictions in its own dogma. But bahaism go to an extreme in this.

I have heard SEVERAL different and contradictory "explanations" about the whether or not Baha'ullah is a prophet of God. One says he is not, but he is a messenger. Other say he is, but for the so-called "Adamic cycle".

Then, the Bab was the Imam Mahdi but wait a minute, Baha'ullah according to Bahaism is the promised one of Islam, making Baha'ullah the Mahdi! Bahais have over several contradictory explanations of this like my favorite one, "Baha'ullah can be both at the same time (Jesus and the Mahdi while bab is also the Mahdi and in some reports, Jesus as well!!!). Baha'is have told me with a straight face that both Bab and Baha'ullah were the Mahdi and they didn't realize the stupidity of what they just said.

Getting back to the issue of whether or not Baha'ullah was a prophet, it is known that Jesus was a prophet of God. If the Baha'is who insist that Baha'ullah was not a prophet, how could they say that they believe that he is the return of Jesus when Jesus is a prophet? So they do believe that Jesus is a prophet without even realizing it!

The Baha'i dogma/creed lacks any solid foundation. ..

2.2 Million Baha'is in India ????. What a Joke !!!!!

Funny how the claimed numbers of Baha'i keeping growing exponentially when in fact membership is down! 7millions now, lol.

Must be claiming 3 – 1/2 million in India alone! Growth in West has been not only been stagnant for the past 30 years but is in fact shrinking as Hossein Banani openly admitted when being asked why the Baha'is of Canada were trying to sell off some of their unused real estate in the Yukon near Whitehorse.

From The Yukon News article Dec.1 2004: although Banani and Tama stress the impending sale is not a sign the Baha'i community is leaving the territory, membership in the faith is down. "Some people have left the faith", "some have gone into hibernation." said Mr.Banani.

In other words so many people have "left the (Baha'i) faith" or have "gone into hibernation", that the attrition rate is greater than the enrollment rate, forcing the Canadian National Spiritual Assembly to sell off it's real estate to keep solvent.

The number of claimed Baha'is in India is bogus. The greater majority of those who are claimed as Baha'i members in India are infact still Hindu's. When a Hindu says that Buddha was an Avatar it doesn't make them a Buddhist just as when a Hindu says that Baha'u'llah was an Avatar it doesn't make them a Baha'i.

William Garlington's personal experience in India bares this fact out: ..From my own experiences in the mass teaching areas of Madhya Pradesh in 1973-74 it was fairly apparent that declaring oneself a Baha'i did not mean that an individual was being put in the position of having to leave his own religious tradition (which in this case was primarily Hindu). Indeed, in the villages that I visited it seemed apparent that declared Baha'is for the most part continued to practice traditional behavioral idioms. Moreover there was little indication that they had abandoned the Hindu world view. They had declared their belief in Baha'u'llah as an avatar and were compartmentalizing their Baha'i activities so as not to directly come into conflict with traditional village or regional norms. As many were from the lower castes (unclean and untouchable) ritual purity was not as big a factor as for higher caste Hindus. My own conclusion was that the Baha'i Faith better fit the category of a bhakti movement rather than a new religion in that it 1)allowed for converts to express their deviant attitudes within a compartmentalized frame of reference (Baha'i institutions such as Feast and Assembly Meetings) 2) was highly devotional in nature and 3) tended to show a preference for symbolic and utopian expressions of change rather than direct social action. (With the onset of specific development programs in the 80s and 90s this aspect of the Faith in India may well have changed to some degree, although I would doubt that there has been much attempt to openly combat caste prejudice in the name of the Faith.) All of this is to say that IMO what allows for the large numbers is the fact that in India one can be a Baha'i and still be a Hindu. If such an approach were taken in the United States I would imagine that the number of Baha'is here would also be dramatically increased.

7 million, lol; more like 2 million at that is probably still a stretch.

What could possibly be the Baha'i Administrative Order's motivation for so grossly exaggerating the number of Baha'i in the world? Could it be because the Baha'i faith's claimed: "global prominence", is in fact: growing obscurity?

Larry Rowe

How can they prove that Baha'ullah is the second coming of Jesus?

I have noticed that many Baha'is regulars have been very upset to read that Baha'u'llah is a false Christ. They wonder how can a man they see as great and sincere claim to be the second coming of Jesus and yet did not fulfill the prophecies.

- They wonder why Baha'ullah didn't return to the Temple Mount.
- Why he didn't come in a time of Armageddon.
- Why didn't he live and establish universal peace, etc
- They still insist that Baha'ullah was the second coming of Christ.

These Baha'is are at a loss for words. How can they prove that Baha'ullah is the second coming of Jesus? How can they explain why Baha'ullah did not fulfill the prophecies? Will they say that Baha'ullah fulfilled the prophecies in a "metaphorical way?" Will they say that Baha'ullah "sincerity" is proof that he was real?

Whether Baha'is are willing to admit that Baha'ullah did not fulfill the prophecies of the second of Jesus or not is not really the issue? The issue is why these people will still believe in an impostor despite the evidence. Is it because of a blind, emotional allegiance and devotion to this man and the religion he created? Is it because the nonsense of Baha'i makes more sense to them than reality?

Look at how the Bible and Hadiths explain the false Christ and how they will deceive many (excerpts from

Mathew 24:23-27:

"At that (end) time if anyone says to you, 'Look, here is the Christ!' or, 'There he is!' do not believe it. For false Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great signs and miracles to DECEIVE. See, I have told you ahead of time. "

So if anyone tells you,

'There he is, out in the desert,' do not go out; or, 'Here he is, in the inner rooms,' do not believe it. FOR AS LIGHTNING THAT COME FROM THE EAST IS VISIBLE EVEN IN THE WEST, SO WILL BE THE COMING OF THE SON OF MAN" (Mathew 24:23-27)

"Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing but inwardly are ravenous wolves." (Jesus-Bible-Mathew 7:15.10)

"Watch that no one deceives you. For many will come in my name saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many." (Jesus-Bible-Mark 13:6)

"And many false prophets will come and deceive many people" (Jesus-Bible-Mathew 24:11) [Luke 21:8]

And he said, "Take heed that you are not led astray; for many will come in my name, saying, 'I am he!' and, 'The time is at hand!' Do not go After them

Hadith from Islamic Books :

Hanzalah al-Aslami reported: I heard AbuHurayrah (Allah be pleased with him) as narrating from Allah's Apostle (peace_be_upon_him) who said: By Him in Whose Hand is my life, Ibn Maryam(Jesus Christ) would certainly pronounce Talbiyah for Hajj or for Umrah or for both (simultaneously as a Qarin) in the valley of Rawha. Sahih Muslim Book 7, Number 2877:

When did Baha'ullah do this pilgrimage?

"The prophets are like brothers; they have different mothers but their religion is one. I am the closest of all the people to Jesus the son of Mary BECAUSE THERE IS NO OTHER PROPHET BETWEEN HIM AND MYSELF. HE WILL COME AGAIN AND WHEN YOU SEE HIM YOU WILL RECOGNIZE HIM. He is of medium height and his coloring is reddish-white. He will be wearing two garments and his hair will look wet.

He will break the cross (destroy Christianity), kill the swine, abolish the Jizya (tax on non-believers) and CALL THE PEOPLE TO ISLAM DURING HIS TIME, ALLAH WILL END EVERY RELIGION AND SECT OTHER THAN ISLAM and he will destroy the antichrist peace and security will reign on earth (Ahmad)"

If a Baha'i does admit that Bahauallah was a false Christ, then that person is no longer Baha'i. Now I know the mystery to why Baha'is refuse to admit the truth.

They rather accept a refuted belief and make themselves go through self-induced delusions than admit to the facts.

Slain Sydney woman and estranged psychotic husband were Baha'is!!!!

Friends of Leila Alavi say the 26-year-old hopelessly tried to support her troubled and abusive husband right up until he allegedly murdered her with a pair of scissors.

Her body was found in her car on Saturday morning at the Auburn shopping complex where she worked as a hairdresser.

That evening, police arrested and charged her 33-year-old husband Mokhtar Hosseiniarraei with murder. He was refused bail on Sunday and police told a Sydney court he "has made admission to the offence".

Fredo Monty has known the couple since photographing their wedding in 2011 and his partner was a close friend of Ms Alavi.

Mirza Yahya Subh-i Azal: The Bab calls him God, Bahais call him Satan !!!1

Mirza Yahya Subh-i Azal was Baha'u'llah's half-brother and the executor of the Bab's will. He was regarded as the successor to the Bab until Baha'u'llah succeeded in sending him to the sidelines and taking over the affairs of many of the followers of the Bab. He is greatly hated by Baha'is and regarded as one their greatest enemies. According to the famous Baha'i scholar Fadil Mazandarani in his book Asrar al-Athar (download from here), it is also written as Asraru'l-Athar) this is how Baha'u'llah referred to his brother Subh-i Azal:

Baha'u'llah's followers also used these titles to refer to Mirza yahya Subh-i Azal, for instance Professor Edward Browne cites a letter sent to him by a woman who was proselytized in America by Dr. Ibrahim Kheiralla where she states:

“Mirzá Yahyá is scarcely spoken of, but when he is mentioned he is called Satan.” (E.G. Browne, Materials for the Study of the Babi Religion p. 117)

the Bible. [According to this doctor, Behá was God Himself. He teaches that God did not manifest through the personality of Behá, as in the case of Jesus, but that He really was God, and that He will not come again during this cycle. We are all called upon to believe this, or else forever lose our chance of salvation.] Believing it makes us the adopted children of God, and we are given the power of creation. Prayer is taught, and little type-written prayers composed by Behá are given to the students, and they are told to pray for spiritual things, which, however, they have no right to, else they would have received them, and there would be no need of asking for them. This is one of the principal points in the teachings. The first prayer given is really the most inclusive and truly beautiful one I have ever known. Angels are placed lower than man, for they are controlled by God, and man is not, but has free will and the power of choosing. [Those who die without hearing of Behá are reincarnated and have another chance; those who have already heard do not.] Believers see their friends who are not in the earth-body. God never takes a female form as he selects the stronger one to manifest Himself. There is to be a great time in the future when Napoleon IV, who is now a colonel in the Russian army, will war against the religion of Christ, aided by Russia, and the "Red Dragon" the Pope. France is to be an empire. The Napoleons are the Antichrists. Mírzá Yahyá¹ is scarcely spoken of, but when he is mentioned he is called Satan. I think very few of the students know anything about him. These are a few of the many statements made in the course of thirteen lessons; but there is not the slightest reference throughout the entire course to the development of character, and those who claim an inner guidance are particularly censured and ridiculed. “Name of Azal, testify that there is no God but I, the dearest beloved. Then testify that there is no God but you, the victorious and permanent.”

First the Bab states very explicitly that he is God (not a messenger from God or a manifestation of God, but God himself), then he tells Subh-i Azal that he too is God and should testify to this. These statements being illogical and meaningless aside, according to the Bab Mirza Yahya Subh-i Azal is God and according to Baha'ullah he is the Satan and devil! Baha'u'llah also claims he is the one that the Bab had prophesized about. Go figure...

Bahais in My Backyard – The MOTHER of all objective documentaries on the Haifan Baha’i Cult

Let me put it to you this way, it’s a Haifan Bahaim-Administrative Faith killer without a doubt all around. Every person who has seen this has been put off by the whole Disney-Haifa, hanging gardens of Babylon, New World Order, pseudo-Masonic, Parthenon wannabe, men-in- black-suits, meglomaniacal tripe that is the WC. People are saying things like the vibe they’re getting from the Bahaism over there is pure negativity and deception. One guy said he didn’t think Orwell could be so well executed on screen as a documentary until seeing this, etc.

Now a very, very a good thing from my POV, is how it made Moshe Sharon (one of their ‘scholars’ on the payroll in Israel) look like the total creep and liar that he is. Everyone worth their salt has known that Husayn ‘Ali Nari’s family members were still living over there, and large numbers. For feck’s sake the WC itself has been warning pilgrims in Haifa about associating with these “covenant breakers,” not to frequent their shops, etc. That Naama put the spot-light prominently on Mm. Negar Bahai (whose mother was swindled by Shoghi Effendi) is a very, very good thing. Note well, and note carefully: that woman and her entire family are the last salvation and final refuge of your creed. Without them, you people are well and truly finished!

Yep, Miller speaks about it in detail, and I did some investigating of my own in 2000-2002. He sued Negar’s mother in the Israeli courts in the early 1950s (at precisely the same time he had cut a deal with the Ben Gurion government one by one appropriating properties of absentee Palestinians on Carmel wholesale) for the property in Bahji. Even though all the deeds and documentation were unassailably and legally in the favor of the Baha’i family, with the army of American, Canadian and British attorneys Shoghi delic hired for this specific battle, he still got a court ruling designed explicitly in his favor — or rather a court ruling in his favor was rammed through by the Israeli government of David ben Gurion. Madame Baha’i represented herself because she could not afford otherwise. Shoghi never ever showed up to a single one of the hearings, so no prima facie argumentation over deedship or ownership of the Bahji property ever came from Shoghi personally. It did from Madame Baha’i, Negar’s mother. The transcripts still exist for anyone caring to look them up, that is if they are not fudged and dicked around by Moshe Sharon types within the Israeli bureaucracy. One of the reasons he got this favourable ruling – although any real judge worth their salt at the time should’ve seen right through the facts from the get-go – was that he managed to outspend the other side of the family into a favourable ruling from himself, i.e. with the army of American, Canadian and British solicitors/lawyers working for him night and day to swindle the Baha’i family out of their rightful inheritance.

Shoghi Effendi has a lot to answer for, and, alhamdulillah, his own Day Judgement is now arriving as well.

It is also the fundamental reason why Ibrahim George Kheyrollah broke from Abbas Effendi in the turn of the last century.

APPRECIATION OF THE ATTACHED EASTERN REPORT. No. LXX RUSSIA.

The Asiatic intelligence should be read with care. The prospects in Turkestan are now distinctly bad. The destruction and disintegration of the Armenians proceeds apace and paves the way for Turko German dominion, extending through the Turanian belt right up to Afghanistan itself From that point of vantage the Turko-Germans will work every possible form of anti-British policy; Pan-Islamism, Pan-Turanism, and anarchistic revolution will be the three forces that they will use. The elements which will be friendly to us, and which will combat these three forces, are :—

(a.) The natural tendency which exists among pious Moslems to regard religion as a spiritual rather than a political force, and which lies at the back of the teachings of Mohammed Abdu, Abdul Bahai, and the Persian Mystics.

(c.) The social elements which stand to gain by justice and order. With regard to the development of these elements into political assets, we can give positive assistance in regard to (b.) and (c.); in regard to (a), we can do nothing positive, but on the negative side may do something by avoiding giving the impression that we are afraid of political Pan Islam or are ready to compromise with it.

SECRET. FOREIGN COUNTRIES REPORT. No. 56. 16th November 1921. Abdul Baha and his Adherents.—On 13th November Mr. Bridgeman telegraphed [No. 631] as follows :—The representative of Abdul Baha has asked me to facilitate remittances from the-Bahais in Persia to Abdul. Baha at Haifa, for the maintenance of the latter and his suite. His adherents wish to remit at once 4,000L and to send yearly remittances amounting to about 50,000 tomans. The Imperial Bank of Persia refuses to place drafts to anyone, and the Bahais cannot remit the money unless - we afford facilities. As your Lordship knows, the Bahais are very numerous and are ever increasing in Persia. To refuse them facilities requested for the accomplishment of what to them is a sacred duty would offend an influential and well disposed section of the people. In view of the religious aspect of the question I cannot mention the matter to Persian Government. Please instruct whether and how the operation should be facilitated.

Bahai Deception in Arab Countries

Wonderful info, about the deceptive Baha'is method.

Sheer Deception and back stabbing to Kings

As there was clear instruction from Ministry of Religious Affairs that Baha'is will do their religious practice amongst themselves they were not allowed to teach faith to Moslems and specially Arabs. The Sly Universal House of Justice laid a plan to deceive the Kind hearted Arabs King.

Baha'is as per strategy of Universal House of Justice came out of their shell and started using their contacts, they invited their neighboring Arabs to their houses were in Majlis (sitting hall) they had placed picture of Abdul Baha, if the question was asked by the guest about picture they used to politely say he is their ancestor, as relation were becoming strong they were called for dinner specially during month of March ('Ala' Baha'i month of fasting) and while dinning they used to asked their children to recite prayers in Arabic and informing the guest that as they are Baha'is they are fasting this gives impression to guest that they are a part of Moslems they make sure to inform them that they believe in Quran and Prophet Mohammed, since Moslems do fast, and listing to prayers in Arabic made good impact on guests. As relation goes stronger for years, they have now good numbers of Arabs who at least have soft corner for Baha'is and their faith. They went further as it is custom in Arabs to send their children abroad for further studies after high school (on government expenses Baha'is were using this facilities too) Baha'is kept tab on their children and when they were abroad they informed NSA of that respective countries to teach them more about faith. After completing their studies when they return home, they were properly brain washed and if not converted, they become well wisher of faith.

During two major festivals, Nawrooz and Ridhwan they invite their Arabs friends where they talk about "Oneness of mankind", "equality of men and women", "Universal Peace", by this deceptive way they get more confident of Arabs, they had special instruction not to talk about claims of Baha'u'llah which can provoke Arabs. After 1998 when www.bahai.org was launched Baha'is of Middle East were instructed to guide Arab seekers towards this portal where there is Arabic section created for Arabs.

Modus of Operandi As of today Baha'is are residing all over the Middle East they occupied good position in government sections enjoying all sort of facilities from government like free education, free medical, free house which are for local citizens. 1.

Contact with Israel All the NSA (National Spiritual Assembly) and ABM (Auxiliary Board Member) are supposed to be in contact with Universal House of Justice, which is based in Israel, now biggest challenge for Middle Eastern NSA was how to contact Israel from Middle East. As Middle Eastern countries are sensitive towards Israel, they came up with simple solution, a office for Middle Eastern countries affairs, was setup in UK dedicated person is appointed to just received mails from Middle Eastern countries and forward it to Israel based Universal House of Justice, and as and when reply comes the respective reply is forwarded to respective recipients. Even if any Baha'i visits these Middle Eastern countries, they are not allowed to carry Credential Certificate (membership card), it is send to UK office from there by email it comes to the visiting countries NSA secretary, by this they avoided suspicion from government. They are so sly that they never take name of Israel in their conversation they called it Holy Land.

2. Funds Major source of Baha'i funds are from Middle East, as these communities are called self dependent, means after looking after their own expenses they send Millions of Dollars annually to Universal House of Justice.

3. Moral Classes In the name of moral classes, Baha'is obtain permission from non Baha'is parents of children between age group of 5 to 14 years to teach them morals, and they teach them Baha'i prayers and talk about Baha'u'llah without their parents knowing about Baha'i teachings.

4. Youth Program Regular fire site are organized in deserted area where young Arabs are invited in the name of social gathering and are allowed to freely socialize with Baha'i girls.

5. Instruction for Baha'i visitors Special instruction were issued to worldwide Baha'is who want to travel to Middle Eastern countries. Document issued from Universal House of Justice to worldwide NSA in 2006

“[Baha'is] deem it a great sin to send their children to Muslim, Protestant, Jewish, or Zoroastrian schools and their leader has forbidden them from doing so. This is specially [evident] with respect to Islamic and Protestant schools. It was because of this that they established [Baha'i] schools so that no words originating from outside of Baha'ism reaches the ears of their children and those logical words influence them.” (Abdu'l-Husayn Ayati (Avarih), Kashf al-Hiyal (Uncovering the Deceptions), 3 ed., vol. 1, p. 115)

Being labeled a covenant breaker, the words of Avarih are usually met with skepticism and are in many cases categorically denied by Baha'is. We have observed many times that what Avarih mentions is the truth and the denial by Baha'is is not justified. We will now proceed to show from authentic Baha'i scripture (as yet untranslated by Baha'i authorities), the official Baha'i order on the prohibition of Baha'is from attending non-Baha'i schools.

“You had inquired about the Tarbiyat School. (Know that) it is absolutely prohibited for the children of the friends to go to the schools of others (meaning non-Baha’is) for this is [a cause of] humiliation (dhillat) for the Cause of God and they will be completely deprived of the Blessed Beauty’s graces. Because they will be educated/nurtured otherwise and they will disgrace the Baha’is.” (Abdu’l-Baha, Makatib (Letters), vol. 5, p. 170)

Since Abdu’l-Baha had prohibited his followers from sending their children to non-Baha’i schools, Baha’i schools such as the Madrisiy-i Tarbiyat (in Tehran) were established. What is extraordinary are the words used by Abdu’l-Baha to describe the result of Baha’is studying in non-Baha’i schools: humiliation (dhillat) of the Cause of God and disgrace (ruswā’i) of Baha’is and being completely deprived of the Blessed Beauty’s graces!

One wonders why these words have been uttered. Does `Abdu’l-Baha regard all forms of education other than what the Baha’is preach invalid to such an extent that when Baha’is are educated and nurtured using those methods they will be regarded as a disgrace and cause of humiliation for this creed? Or is he afraid that Baha’i children will expose the true face of Baha’ism amongst non-Baha’is which will result in their disgrace and humiliation?

In another letter while praising Baha’i schools and giving guidelines on how to teach Baha’i children, Abdu’l-Baha concludes his statements by these words:

“Sending Baha’i children to non-Baha’i schools and nurturing them there is a cause of abatement (khumudat) and stagnation (jumudat).” (Abdu’l-Baha, Muntakhabati az makatib-i hadrat-i Abdu’l-Baha [Selections From the Letters of Abdu’l-Bahā], vol. 6, no. 397)

Abdu’l-Baha’s description of non-Baha’i schools is no wise fair nor based on sound reasoning. The words khumudat and Jumudat used by Abdu’l-Baha used to describe the effect of non-Baha’i schools have a multitude of similar meanings with the former also meaning apathy, depression, passivity, dullness and the latter meaning stiffness, recession and freezing. It is not clear which meaning Abdu’l-Baha had intended although they are all derogatory. To make matters worse, Abdu’l-Baha states what he means by these two words in another statement:

Thus, according to Abdu’l-Baha, studying in non-Baha’i schools is a form of incarnation of death itself. Do these statements conform with the Baha’i principles of ‘Removal of All Prejudice’ and the ‘Oneness of Humanity’? Is this how Compulsory Universal Education is achieved by isolating Baha’i children from non-Baha’i children and establishing separate schools for them? In yet another one of his letters, Abdu’l-Baha writes the following:

The truth is, although these children are taught a few things in those schools, but the manners of the teachers will influence the (Baha’i) children and will cast doubts into their hearts and will convert and alter them. The friends of God (Baha’is) must establish a school for girls so that the (Baha’i) teachers educate them by Godly manners, divine morals, and methods of the Merciful Lord.” (Fadil Mazandarani, Amr wa khalq, vol. 3, p. 339)

Abdu’l-Baha is actually stating that he doesn’t want Baha’i children to study at non-Baha’i schools because Baha’i children might be influenced by the manners of their non-Baha’i teachers and doubts might be cast in their hearts about Baha’ism. How can the leaders of a creed claim they strive for the Oneness of Humanity and unity of mankind when they cannot tolerate their own children being educated by non-Baha’is?

The Baha’i attitude toward non-Baha’i teachers and schools and the words used to describe them are what one would expect from a cult practicing an extreme form of information control on the adherents. One might even go as far as calling it a form of brainwashing. Anyway, since these orders were so illogical and impractical—like many other Baha’i teachings that Baha’is in the western world are kept in the dark about—they were temporarily abandoned until a “future state of society” when Baha’is are hopeful that they can be implemented...

What is even more interesting, is that although Abdu’l-Baha had prohibited his followers in the strictest sense and using threatening language from sending their children to non-Baha’i schools, he defied this order himself and sent his own beloved grandson to non-Baha’i schools in Palestine:

“It was here that Shoghi Effendi had a very significant dream which he recounted to me and which I wrote down. He said that when he was nine or ten years old, living with his nurse in this house and attending school in Haifa, he dreamed that he and another child, an Arab schoolmate, were in the room in which ‘Abdu’l-Bahā used to receive His guests in the house in Akka . . .” (Rūhīyyih Rabbani, The Priceless Pearl (London: Bahā’ī Publishing Trust, 1969), p. 16.)

“Shoghi Effendi entered the best school in Haifa, the College des Freres, conducted by the Jesuits. He told me he had been very unhappy there. Indeed, I gathered from him that he never was really happy in either school or university. In spite of his innately joyous nature, his sensitivity and his background – so different from that of others in every way – could not but set him apart and give rise to many a heart-ache; indeed, he was one of those people whose open and innocent hearts, keen minds and affectionate nature seem to combine to bring upon them more shocks and suffering in life than is the lot of most men. Because of his unhappiness in this school ‘Abdu’l-Baha decided to send him to Beirut where he attended another Catholic school as a boarder, and where he was equally unhappy. Learning of this in Haifa the family sent a trusted Baha’i woman to rent a home for Shoghi Effendi in Beirut and take care of and wait on him. It was not long before she wrote to his father that he was very unhappy at school, would refuse to go to it sometimes for days, and was getting thin and run down. His father showed this letter to ‘Abdu’l-Baha Who then had arrangements made for Shoghi Effendi to enter the Syrian Protestant College, which had a school as well as a university, later known as the American College in Beirut, and which the Guardian entered when he finished what was then equivalent to the high school.” (Rūhīyyih Rabbani, The Priceless Pearl, p. 17)

Anyway, one should think twice before joining a creed that claims its purpose is unity of the masses but does not allow the children of its own adherents to attend the schools of those same masses. And one should think twice before joining a creed that claims one of its main principles is the ‘Removal of All Forms of Prejudice’ but refers to schools that are run by non-Baha’is as “death incarnate” and believes attending these institutions is a cause of disgrace, humiliation and spiritual abatement and stagnation. Baha’is, especially in English speaking countries, will vehemently deny their leaders’ statements about non-Baha’i schools. We do not blame them for as we mentioned at the beginning of the article, these quotes have never been translated to English.

Lamentations of Bani Dugal the representative of the Bahá'í International Community to the United Nations.

Bani Dugal, the principal representative of the Bahá'í International Community to the United Nations never fails in lamenting the situation of Bahá'ís in Iran but fails to take the account of Bahá'í situation in other countries like Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, Sri Lanka and so on. Her obsessions with Iran are part of the pre-paid scheme of Universal House of Justice. Fortunately the intellectuals and most governments have interpreted the strategy of Bahá'ís and pay little heed to such lamentations.

As an example, in a case filed by an Iranian Bahá'í couple in 2005 in UK to be granted 'Refugee' status, Bani Dugal in support of the Bahá'í couple gave evidences of Human Right violations in Iran and expressed her dismay and disappointment, at the failure of the UN Commission on Human Rights to even consider a resolution on human rights in Iran, particularly related to the persecution of the Bahá'ís. The learned judges blasted her by saying that the Bahá'í couple are not at a risk of persecution in Iran merely by reason of being a Bahá'í. They said:

In the same case the judges assessed regarding the Bahá'í couple who were previously released after a brief imprisonment, on giving assurance to the Iranian authority that they will not conduct any Ruhi Institute (propagation) activity:

Ms. Dugal should realize that these organizations and Countries are realizing the duplicity of Bahá'í Organization and have come to the conclusion that helping Bahá'í faith is not their duty but is a liability for them in near future.

Ms. Dugal's attention is drawn towards a Facebook discussion under the subject of Israel-Gaza conflict, wherein Dr. Kavian Milani a well-known Bahá'í writer has expressed: "when Hamas knows that by throwing a missile to Israeli territories, thousands of bombs will be dropped over their people and their belongings, then Hamas is the responsible party for the massacre of Gaza". If Dr. Milani's logic is correct, then the same applies to the Bahá'í Faith in Iran. When as a small minority group Bahá'ís challenge the government, and call it as despotic state and condemn it in international conferences and gatherings and through frequent waves of aggressive teaching endanger the trusts, beliefs and doctrines of their people, then what reaction do you expect from a religious state? Very similar sentiments were echoed by UK judges as well.

Why the Bahá'í Administration situated at Haifa Israel are asking the Bahá'í community to contact the political leaders of their country and to put pressure on Iran to stop the alleged persecution of Bahá'ís which the UK judges have demolished the allegation?

The Bahá'í counselors are talking in every meeting at every place that Universal House of Justice has asked the Iranian Bahá'ís to go and teach the Iranians and face the consequences. Do they think that this message will not reach the Iranian authorities? Or, publicizing the case of the fake Ayatollah Tehrani, supporting the Bahá'í Faith, would not warrant a severe action by the Iranian authorities?

The reality is that the Universal House of Justice is playing against the Bahá'ís of Iran INTENTIONALLY, they want Bahá'í martyrs from Iran so that UHJ can extract more money from the Bahá'ís, gain some cheap publicity for the Faith through professional lamenters like Bani Dugal.

Courtesy : <http://www.sabanews.net/en/news384123.htm>

SANA'A, Jan. 12 (Saba) – An Iranian national is to stand trial in Yemen on charges of spying with a foreign country and seeking to spread a new religion.

The defendant was arrested in Mukalla City of Hadramout province in 2014, while other suspects in the case are pursued by the security services, a judicial source at the Penal Prosecution said.

The prosecution completed the case investigation and referred it to the Specialized Penal Court in the Capital Sana'a as a prelude to start the trial, the source added.

According to the indictment, the accused, whose name is Hamid Mirza Kamali Srostani (Iranian nationality), 51, has impersonated the name of Hamid Kamal Mohammed bin Haidarah and lived in the Socotra archipelago and in Mukalla on the pretext that he has free businesses.

During the period from 1991 to 2014, Srostani has sought with a foreign country (Israel) represented in what is called the Universal House of Justice that he works to its advantage, to spread the Baha'i Religion in the territory of the Republic of Yemen, the prosecution said in the indictment, considering that harms Yemen's political status and its independence and territorial integrity.

In the indictment, the prosecution revealed that the defendant incited a number of Muslims to exit from Islam and embrace the Baha'i religion by enticing the poor families and children with money and charitable aid.

The penal prosecution explained that the accused has held a number of meetings and symposiums in several forums and houses affiliated to him comprising Baha'is and Yemenis to elect members of the so-called 'the central sacred lodge' and form its branches in the provinces.

The defendant falsified many official papers, gave false statements and changed his personal documents and used them to buy land and establish business ventures for the purpose of bringing in a large number of Baha'is to Yemen, the penal prosecution added.

Baha'i Leaders and Violence: Abdu'l-Baha the Face Slapper

When Baha'is preach their beliefs, the audience are induced into believing that Baha'ism is a peaceful religion refraining from all forms of violence. In the current article, using historical evidence from trusted Baha'i eyewitnesses, we will show that this is simply not the case and Abdu'l-Baha was a violent person who would routinely slap people.

One of the key witnesses to these acts is Khalil Shahidi who was born in Akka and was a trusted companion of Abdu'l-Baha and other Baha'i leaders for about forty years. According to the famous Baha'i translator Ahang Rabbani:

"As a trusted resident believer of 'Akká and a longtime custodian of the House of 'Abbúd, he was at a unique vantage point to observe 'Abdu'l-Bahá as He dealt, neutralized and triumphed over all opposition and adversaries." (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, p.3)

Khalili narrates many violent acts from Abdu'l-Baha. In one instance a question is met not with an answer, but a slap:

One day in the birún[outer section] of the blessed House of Haifa, He ['Abdu'l-Bahá] stated, "I have forgotten my handkerchief." One of the friends who was known as Ustád Muhammad-'Alí Banná, remarked to this effect, "How is it possible for the manifestation of Truth to forget anything?" Immediately, 'Abdu'l-Bahá slapped him and stated, "Over forgetting a handkerchief that man puts a hundred souls to test." (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, pp. 100-101)

In another instance he states that a certain person who opposes him needs a slap. The man mysteriously dies the next day:

One of the inhabitants of 'Akká was exhibiting great opposition. 'Abdu'l-Bahá stated, "He needs a slap." Next day that person died. It was said to His blessed presence, "He received his slap," but He did not respond. (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, p. 41)

In yet another incident a man asks Abdu'l-Baha for a bribe. He receives a beating instead:

Thereupon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá sought water to perform His ablution. With the utmost deliberation, He completed His ablution and then commenced to perform the long obligatory prayer of the Muslims. During His prayer, the man kept interrupting, "This matter must be concluded quickly, as there is little time!" Meaning that 'Abdu'l-Bahá should end His obligatory prayer and attend to this urgent matter. 'Abdu'l-Bahá finished His prayer, with the utmost dignity and authority He came close to him and slapped him several times, saying, "I sent it for you." With great stress and anxiety, never having imagined such an outcome, he held his face and head, and shouting, screaming and roaring, he returned to the government office and informed his comrades of what had transpired. (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, p. 116)

This story has been narrated from Abdu'l-Baha by multiple witnesses. For instance, Doctor Habib Mu'ayyad a member of the National Spiritual Assemblies of Iran and a frequent visitor of Abdu'l-Baha narrates it like this:

"Hurry, Effendi, it is best not to delay this matter!" I asked, "Which matter?" He replied, "The issue of the money!" "The money was sent a while ago. Why are you here?" I told him. "How was it sent? By whom was it sent?" he inquired. I said, "By now it has reached the Mutasarrif. Go quickly!" He rose and began to put on his shoes; and, when he turned back towards Me, I slapped him hard and was about to slap him again, but he fled and went to the Mutasarrif who had inquired, "Why did it take you so long? Where is the money?" He replied, "By God, I went to them, but all I received was a hard beating. Look, my face is still quite red! These people are very tough!" (Ahang Rabbani, Eight Years Near Abdu'l-Bahá: The Diary of Dr. Habib Mu'ayyad, p. 431)

Khalili narrates another story about a group of people who were harassing the Baha'is of Egypt:

During the blessed days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a person in Egypt was the leader of a band of men, and would provoke these men against the Bahá'is of Egypt, and for this reason had brought about difficulties. One day that same person arrived in Haifa from Egypt. 'Abdu'l-Bahá summoned him. After the man entered into 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence, He said to him, "You are causing injury to my community." Then he was the recipient of warnings, admonishments and several slaps. After he left [the room], immediately he was summoned once more. He thought to himself that perchance the page had turned [and this time 'Abdu'l-Bahá would be friendly to him], but it was not so since upon his entrance, one more time, the same thing occurred and 'Abdu'l-Bahá picked up where He had left off. When this man returned to Egypt, he gave unequivocal, emphatic and decisive command to that band and emphasized, "You should not show any malice towards this community [i.e. Bahá'ís], as no one can defeat their Chief ['Abdu'l-Bahá]; He is most powerful and able." (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, p. 127)

So how does Abdu'l-Baha justify his actions? Khalili continues:

One time, He ['Abdu'l-Bahá] stated, "With some people, a thousand counsels and admonishments would not have the same effect as a slap." (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidí, p. 128)

Many people who commit violent acts utter similar arguments, so what advantage does Baha'ism have over other opinions and why all the commotion about Baha'is being peaceful and refraining from physical abuse? Matters don't finish here. In fact Abdu'l-Baha had hit people in different shapes and forms innumerable times. This is what Khalili tells us directly after the previous quote:

At all events, in different forms and taking different shapes, many such occurrences would take place – so many that they remain unnumbered and uncountable. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, while extremely meek, was the zenith of power and grandeur. (Ahang Rabbani, A Lifetime with 'Abdu'l-Bahá: Reminiscences of Khalil Shahidi, p. 128)

Can Baha'i leaders be considered peaceful non-violent people? How can the leader of a group of people who cannot abide by his own words and the orders of his father be considered a teacher of morals and peace? Apparently, when Baha'u'llah had prohibited conflicts and striking others, he was giving orders to everyone but his own beloved son:

Ye have been forbidden in the Book of God to engage in contention and conflict, to strike another, or to commit similar acts whereby hearts and souls may be saddened. (Baha'u'llah, The Kitab-i-Aqdas, pp. 72-73)

How can someone who has a reputation of having slapped different people innumerable times, condemn violent acts:

"In this, the cycle of Almighty God, violence and force, constraint and oppression, are one and all condemned." (Abdu'l-Baha, Selections from the Writings of Abdu'l-Baha, p. 149)

The Quran and the Bible condemn this attitude:

Do you order the people to do good but forget about yourselves whilst you read the Book! Do you not use your reason! (Quran 2:44)

You, then, who teach others, do you not teach yourself? You who preach against stealing, do you steal? You who say that people should not commit adultery, do you commit adultery? (Romans 2:21-22)

And why isn't the true violent face of Abdu'l-Baha ever shown to those being preached about Baha'ism?

Anti-intellectualism carried out by the famous Baha'i Universal House of Justice

Baha'is and their UHJ handlers- who are divine according to Baha'i propaganda- have created an atmosphere of anti-intellectualism amongst its members.

Any one who has had academic training, and has questioned the sinister motives of the UHJ has been "quicked out of the Baha'i ranks".

The only ones left with "academic credentials" are Baha'is who are used car salesmen, failed businessmen, failed psychiatrist indicted in sexually battery, failed professor fired from Berry, and many other mentally unhinged Baha'is with poor credentials but with a "huge blind allegiance" to the UHJ.

The true story of Abbas Amanat is as follows. He was brought up a Baha'i, in a Kashan family that had traditionally been Jewish but that had converted to the Baha'i faith in the previous generation. His brother Husayn designed the monument at Azadi square in Tehran, and also the seat of the universal house of justice. His father is an accomplished historian and is writing a multi-volume history of the Kashan Baha'i community. His brother Mehrdad is also a historian and co-authored the section on Qajar Iran in the prestigious Cambridge History of Iran. As a young intellectual at Tehran University and then later at Oxford, Abbas noticed that there was an authoritarian and anti-intellectual streak to the Baha'i organization, as exemplified in bigots such as Furutan (who had played a very sinister role in the attack on and suppression of Mazandarani's scholarship back in the 1930s and 1940s). Abbas therefore very wisely decided rather early on that he wanted nothing to do with the Baha'i organization. However, he has said repeatedly and publicly that he is "in love with the Bab." Abbas wrote his dissertation on the Babi movement at Oxford under the direction of Albert Hourani and Roger Owen, two of the magisterial historians of the Middle East in our times. He then came to the United States to teach at Yale. He did not ask to be transferred from the UK to the US Baha'i community, but some helpful person in Wilmette heard of his advent and entered him into the US rolls. Abbas, naturally, declined to submit his major historical study of the Babis for their approval or censoring to the motley assemblage of insurance salesmen, electrical engineers, bit part actors and failed businessmen who staff the upper echelons of the Baha'i administration. His book was published by Cornell University Press in 1989.

The Baha'i Distribution Service, to its credit, felt that Abbas's book would be of interest to the Baha'is, and therefore contracted with Cornell University Press to buy 500 copies. When the book was distributed to the Baha'is, it generated large numbers of angry letters from the fundamentalists in the community who have the impression that they own the religion and can tell people what they may or may not say. They were upset that it departs from the details of Nabil's Narrative (which many have elevated to the status of infallible scripture) and Shoghi Effendi's God Passes By (ditto). Moreover, some religious bureaucrats in Wilmette became uneasy about carrying a book by an author who was on the rolls but who had declined to have it reviewed. A dispute therefore broke out in Wilmette as to whether the Baha'i Distribution Service should continue to carry the book.

This dispute was ultimately submitted to the universal house of justice, which in reply declared that Abbas Amanat was not a Baha'i, and therefore the Baha'i Distribution Service was welcome to distribute his book, as it would be to distribute the book of any non-Baha'i author. I have a copy of this letter, but it is in my file cabinets somewhere and I am not going to spend time digging it out just to satisfy Susan Maneck, who may believe it or not as she likes. In the good old days before the universal house of justice's membership began being stacked with former counselors (who tend to have an Inquisitorial mindset, since part of their job is Inquisition), the only way to be removed from the rolls of Baha'i membership once you were entered on them was to write a letter explicitly renouncing belief in Baha'u'llah. Professor Amanat has never done so, although it is no secret that he long ago dissociated himself from the Baha'i organization and its authoritarian practices. I find Susan Maneck's speculation about his internal, private, existential beliefs, based on nothing more than hearsay, to be extremely rude and the height of slander (since she is bringing up slander). Has she ever had so much as a private conversation with Professor Amanat? I find her, and her organization's, willingness to expel Baha'is from their own religion by haughty and arrogant fiat, to be not only offensive but indicative of a quite dangerous mindset.

In any case, the US Baha'i authorities have slightly more integrity about these things than do the Canadian ones, since they declined to remove Professor Amanat from the rolls simply on the say-so of the universal house of justice. They have sought from him a clarification of his views, but he maintains that his views are nobody's business. However, I will indulge in a little speculation. I think that if the Baha'i religious authorities really desire to make themselves so odious that they succeed in chasing out of the religion all the major Baha'i professors at major universities, that they will succeed in this. Apparently the real purpose of these intellectual programs is to ensure that it may be said that learned persons such as Denis MacEoin, Abbas Amanat and Linda Walbridge are not Baha'is, but the real Baha'is are ignoramuses who know no Middle Eastern languages, know nothing serious about Baha'i history, and adhere to a fundamentalist and intolerant point of view on the Baha'i faith, and who have managed to get themselves elected to high office (often through the most shameful campaigning and manipulation).

1- The Independent Search After Truth, Unfettered by Superstition or Tradition

1. Is the Principle of Investigating the Truth New?

`Abdu'l-Bahā:

Investigating the truth is a new principle.[1]

`Abdu'l-Bahā:

Seeking the truth is the foundation of all the Prophets.[2]

[1] “Another new principle revealed by Bahā’u’llāh is the injunction to investigate truth—that is to say, no man should blindly follow his ancestors and forefathers. Nay, each must see with his own eyes, hear with his own ears and investigate the truth himself in order that he may follow the truth instead of blind acquiescence and imitation of ancestral beliefs,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, The Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 454.

[2] “His Highness Moses spread the truth as did his Highness Jesus and his Highness Abraham and his Highness the Messenger (meaning the Prophet Muḥammad) and his Highness the Bāb and his Highness Bahā’u’llāh. They all established and spread the truth,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Tehran), vol. 2, p. 5; “The foundation of all the Prophets . . . is truth, and the truth is one. His Highness Abraham was the harbinger of truth. His Highness Moses was the servant of truth. His Highness Christ was the establisher of truth. His Highness Muḥammad was the propagator of truth. His Highness A`lā (meaning the Bāb) was the herald of truth, and his Highness Bahā’u’llāh, was the light of truth,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Tehran), vol. 2, p. 55; “The foundation of the divine religions is one. It is one truth, it is one spirit, it is one light, and it does not have a multitude. Among the foundations of the divine religion is seeking the truth [so] that the whole of humanity seeks the truth,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Egypt), vol. 1, p. 66.

2. What Is Bahā’u’llāh’s First Principle?

`Abdu'l-Bahā:

Bahā’u’llāh’s first principle is investigating the truth.[3]

`Abdu'l-Bahā:

Bahā’u’llāh’s first principle is the oneness of humanity.[4]

[3] “Bahā’u’llāh’s first principle is the seeking of the truth. Man must seek the truth and set aside imitations,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Tehran), vol. 2, p. 144.

[4] “His first teaching is the Oneness of the World of Humanity,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Tehran), vol. 2, p. 5.

3. Are Non-Baha’is Ignorant and without Reason?

`Abdu'l-Bahā:

One must not label people as being ignorant.[5]

Bahā’u’llāh:

Whoever does not become a Baha’i is among the most ignorant of the people, even if he has mastery over all sciences.[6] Whoever does not become a Baha’i has no reason even if he thinks he does.[7] Whoever denies my teachings completely lacks reason.[8]

[5] “The divine principles in this luminous era are such that one must not insult anyone or attribute them to ignorance [by saying] that you do not know and I know. Rather, one must view everyone from a respectful perspective and must speak and argue from the viewpoint of seeking the truth. [They must say] come, there are several issues at hand, so let us seek the truth, and see how and why [it is so]. The missionary must not consider himself wise and others as ignorant. This thought will result in arrogance, and arrogance causes a lack of effectiveness; instead, one must not see any merit in himself and must speak with the maximum extent of kindness, humility, and humbleness. This kind of expression will be effective,” `Abdu'l-Bahā, Makātīb, vol. 1, p. 355.

[6] “If today, someone grasps all of the knowledge on earth but stops at the word ‘yes’ (meaning does not become a Baha’i), the Lord will not pay attention to him (ladī l-Ḥaqq madhkūr na) and he will be considered as the most ignorant amongst the people,” Bahā’u’llāh, Iqtidārāt wa chand lauḥ dīgar, p. 111; “From now on nobody is to be called knowledgeable, except those who have decorated themselves with the garment of this New Affair (meaning those who have become Baha’is),” Bahā’u’llāh, Badī, pp. 138–139.

[7] “The general criterion is what we mentioned and any soul who has success in it, meaning recognizes and realizes the Sunrise of Manifestation (meaning himself), will be mentioned in the Divine Book as someone who possesses reason or else he will be (mentioned as) ignorant even if he himself thinks that his reason equals that of the whole world,” ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd Isḥrāq Khāwarī, Mā’idiy-i āsimānī, vol. 7, p. 160.

[8] “No one has denied or will deny what has been revealed by the Ancient Pen (meaning himself) in this Most Great Manifestation regarding society, unity, manners, rites, and being occupied with what has benefits for the people, except that he completely lacks reason,” Bahā’u’llāh, Iqtidārāt wa chand lauḥ dīgar, p. 168.

4. Can the Recognition of God Be Obtained through Intellect?

Bahā’u’llāh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahā:

Reason was created for the purpose of recognizing God.[9] Recognize God by using reason and narrations.[10]

Bahā’u’llāh:

Recognition cannot be obtained by the use of reason.[11]

[9] “The first grace that has been bestowed on the human body is reason and its purpose is the recognition of the Truth (meaning God) Exalted be His Glory,” Bahā’u’llāh, Muntakhabātī az āthār Ḥaḍrat Bahā’u’llāh, p. 127. The official Baha’i translation reads: “First and foremost among these favors, which the Almighty hath conferred upon man, is the gift of understanding. His purpose in conferring such a gift is none other except to enable His creature to know and recognize the one true God—exalted be His glory,” Bahā’u’llāh, Gleanings from the Writings of Bahā’u’llāh, p. 194.

[10] “If you seek the recognition of God (‘irfān ilāhī) . . . refer to the arguments (put forward by) reason and narrations,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahā, Makātīb, vol. 8, pp. 119 -120.

[11] “Know that today, that which has reached your reason or will reach it, or is perceived by the reasons of [those with intellects] superior or inferior to yours, none are the criterion for recognizing the Truth (meaning God) and will never be,” Bahā’u’llāh, Badī’, p. 286.

5. Should We Investigate or Accept without Any Questions?

‘Abdu’l-Bahā:

A person who is fair, will investigate and do research to seek the truth.[12]

Bahā’u’llāh:

Accept my words without any questions or comparison with someone else’s words.[13]

[12] “Those who are fair will examine, research and inquire. This examination and inquiry will result in their guidance . . . they say: ‘We will go and see, and we will investigate the truth,’” ‘Abdu’l-Bahā, Khaṭābāt (Egypt), vol.1, p. 189.

[13] “No pleasure has been created in the world greater than listening to the verses [brought by Bahā’u’llāh] and understanding their meanings and not objecting to or questioning any of the words and comparing them with the words of others,” Bahā’u’llāh, Badī’, p. 145.

6. Investigating the Truth: Only for Non-Baha’is

‘Abdu’l-Bahā:

Different religions should listen to the words of other religions. Perhaps, what is right is with them.[14]

Bahā’u’llāh:

Even if someone criticizes Baha’ism with proof, do not listen.

[14] “The followers of Moses (i.e. Jews) have imitations (taqālīd), Zoroastrians have imitations, Christians have imitations, Buddhists have imitations, and every nation has imitations [and] thinks that its imitations are correct and the imitations of others are invalid. For example, the followers of Moses believe that their imitations are correct and the imitations of others are invalid. We want to find out which [imitations] are correct. [Obviously] not all imitations are correct. If we stick to an imitation it will prevent us from correctly investigating other [religions] imitations. For example, a Jewish person cannot understand that other [religions] are correct because he believes and sticks to the imitations of Judaism. Therefore, he must put aside the imitations and seek the truth and [think that] perhaps others might be right. Thus, until imitations are not put aside, the truth will not become manifest,” ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd Isḥrāq Khāwarī, Payām-i malakūt, p.17 (citing ‘Abdu’l-Bahā’).

[15] “‘Therefore, it is incumbent upon all the friends of God to shun any person in whom they perceive the emanation of hatred for the Glorious Beauty of Abhā, though he may quote all the Heavenly Utterances and cling to all the Books.’ He continues—Glorious be His Name!—‘Protect yourselves with utmost vigilance, lest you be entrapped in the snare of deception and fraud. This is the advice of the Pen of Destiny,’ `Abdu’l-Bahā, Bahā’ī World Faith—Selected Writings of Bahā’u’llāh and `Abdu’l-Bahā (‘Abdu’l-Bahā’s Section Only), pp. 430–431.

7. Should Baha’is See and Hear or Become Blind and Deaf?

Bahā’u’llāh:

Research and listen with your own ears and see with your own eyes.[16]

Bahā’u’llāh:

When I speak become death, blind, and ignorant and blindly accept my words.[17]

[16] “‘When humans attain the rank of [religious] maturity they must investigate . . . and [they] must hear and see with their own ears and eyes,” `Abd al-Ḥamīd Isḥrāq Khāwārī, Payām-i malakūt, p.11 (citing Bahā’u’llāh).

[17] “‘Become blind so that you see my face, become deaf so that you hear my pleasant tone and voice, become ignorant so that you get a share of my knowledge, and become poor so that you can take an everlasting portion from the sea of my eternal riches. ‘Become blind’ means [see] nothing but my beauty and ‘become deaf’ means [hear] nothing but my words and ‘become ignorant’ means [have no knowledge] but my knowledge, so that with a pure eye and clean heart and fine ear you come to my sanctified realm,” Bahā’u’llāh, Ad’iyyih-i ḥaḍrat-i maḥbūb, pp. 427–428.

Why I believe Baha'i is false

My initial impression of the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh was favorable. After all, the objectives of peace and regeneration of the world were noble and desirable. However, noble objectives are not sufficient to substantiate the reality of its claim to be the ultimate explanation of supernatural reality.

What about the many cases of martyrdom of believers in the Bab and in Bahá'u'lláh? Do not these lend credence to the Baha'i faith? Much as one is emotionally inclined to do so, I believe this is insufficient to constitute proof of supernatural reality

Bahá'u'lláh proposes that divine revelation occurs in stages. This is the concept of progressive revelation. Each stage is suitable for the level of human understanding at that particular stage in history. He proposed that he is the ultimate Messenger of God and constitute the Messiah hoped for by the Jews, the triumphant return of Jesus Christ and the long-awaited return of Imam Mahdi.

This audacious claim is nonetheless a theory. Any theory purporting to explain the divine is attempting to explain a reality in the supernatural realm. As such, it must stand up to the scrutiny of tests of supernatural reality.

If the writings associated with the theory contain historically supported events which cannot be explained by nature, then it constitutes evidence that the theory probably describes a supernatural reality.

The two objective tests of supernatural reality are accurate predictions of future events and performance of miracles.

Prediction of future events constitute one type of evidence of supernatural reality if the likelihood of those events taking place by chance is extremely remote.

Other than three predictions, I have yet to find other predictions in the life and works of Bahá'u'lláh which have come to pass in secular history

Behá'u'lláh claimed that the Báb had predicted his coming.

The Báb had declared that his own revelation as the "door" to the Imam Mahdi was not final, and that he would, at some future time be succeeded by "Him whom God shall manifest". At the same time the Báb had laid it down that the time of this promised deliverer's arrival was known only to God, that no one could falsely claim to be him. The Báb also indicated that the next manifestation would appear suddenly and unexpectedly.

After the execution of the Báb in July 1850 by the Iranian government, a number of important Babis put forth extravagant claims of divinity. This included Sayyid Basir-i Hindi of Multan in 1851. He was one of several Babi leaders of the time who claimed participation in divine manifestations, similar in some ways to those claimed by Sufis or mystics. Another such person was Sayyid 'Uluvv who had made claims to being God incarnate. He resided in the shrine city of Kerbala in Iraq, the site of the tomb of the Imam Husayn.

Thus during those turbulent times, anyone could claim he was "Him whom God shall manifest." I believe Bahá'u'lláh seized the opportunity to declare his divinity and take over the mantle of leadership of the Babis. Thus his appearance as "Him whom God shall manifest" was neither sudden nor unexpected.

Bahá'u'lláh predicted that Sultan 'Abdu'l-'Aziz, the Grand Vizer, 'Ali Páshá and the associate, Fu'ád Páshá would have their lives taken from them as punishment for exiling him to the prison city of Akka.

It is not uncommon for people to curse their enemies. I believe the likelihood of the curse made by Bahá'u'lláh coming to pass by chance is not extremely remote

What is more interesting is not the prediction coming to pass but the very fact that the curse was made at all. One of the central tenets of Baha'i Faith is belief of common brotherhood of man and that people of the Baha'i should be shining examples to all mankind. I quote from his Writings on the Civilizing of Human Character:

"O peoples of the world! Forsake all evil, hold fast that which is good. Strive to be shining examples unto all mankind, and true reminders of the virtues of God amidst men."

This appears to be contrary to the making of curses. I believe that is an example of hypocrisy and is totally inconsistent of a man who claims he is the "Manifestation of God." and the epitome of the virtues of God.

Behá'u'lláh predicted that a democracy of the people would rule one day in Iran. If this prediction was made before democratic government appeared on earth, it would have been exceptional. However, Bahá'u'lláh was looking at the fledgling democracy in England when he made his prediction. Hence the likelihood of this prediction occurring by chance is not extremely remote.

In summary, the likelihood of these three predictions concerning Bahá'u'lláh occurring by chance are not extremely remote and therefore are not sufficient to invoke a supernatural causation.

Performing deeds which are impossible in the natural to occur are known as miracles. Miracles constitute evidence of supernatural reality. I am unable to find examples of miraculous acts performed by Bahá'u'lláh.

Thus there is insufficient evidence for me to be convinced that Bahá'u'lláh's theory of "Progressive Revelation" represents supernatural reality.

How can I explain Bahá'u'lláh's behavior? I like to propose a theory that Bahá'u'lláh has megalomania, a psychological state characterized by delusions of grandeur. Examination of his writings show that this theory is plausible.

Bahá'u'lláh claimed that he was infallible (incapable of failure or error) (the 'Ishraqat circa 1855)

However, he made an error when he pronounced that creation had no beginning. I quote from his 'Writings on the human soul'.

"As to thy question whether the physical world is subject to any limitations, know thou that the comprehension of this matter dependeth upon the observer himself. In one sense, it is limited; in another, it is exalted beyond all limitations. The one true God hath everlastingly existed, and will everlastingly continue to exist. His creation, likewise, hath had no beginning, and will have no end. All that is created, however, is preceded by a cause. This fact, in itself, establisheth, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the unity of the Creator".

It had been scientifically established that there was a beginning described as the 'Big Bang'. Thus Bahá'u'lláh was not infallible.

Bahá'u'lláh's original name was Husayn-`Ali Nuri. Consistent with his condition of megalomania, he renamed himself Bahá'u'lláh, the meaning of which is "The Glory of God."

He claimed that he is the Manifestation of God and that no one can recognize God except through Him (the Tajalliyat circa 1855)

He claims that the various messianic prophecies of earlier religions were fulfilled by his coming. (the 'Ishraqat circa 1855)

He glorified himself in a fashion consistent with megalomania:

*"Had Muhammad, the Apostle of God, attained this Day, He would have exclaimed: 'I have truly recognized Thee, O Thou the Desire of the Divine Messengers!' Had Abraham attained it, He too, falling prostrate upon the ground, and in the utmost lowliness before the Lord thy God, would have cried: 'Mine heart is filled with peace, O Thou Lord of all that is in heaven and on earth! I testify that Thou hast unveiled before mine eyes all the glory of Thy power and the full majesty of Thy law!' ... Had Moses Himself attained it, He, likewise, would have raised His voice saying: 'All praise be to Thee for having lifted upon me the light of Thy countenance and enrolled me among them that have been privileged to behold Thy face!'" (Bahá'u'lláh, Summons of the Lord of Hosts, p.149)*

If I examine Bahá'u'lláh's claim that the prophets Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muhammad, Imam Mahdi and Bahá'u'lláh are Manifestations of God, I find something interesting.

None of them claimed to be Manifestations of God except Jesus and Bahá'u'lláh. Allow me to compare them.

Bahá'u'lláh had three predictions to his credit. He performed no miracles. Like any other man, Bahá'u'lláh died and was buried. There was hardly anything supernatural about him.

On the other hand, Jesus had thirty-four predictions about him. He was recorded to have performed no less than thirty-two miracles. He died, was buried but miraculously rose from the dead. I am inclined to believe Jesus had evidence of supernatural reality.

The Bahai Creed –

Broken Silence. Today's Struggle for Religious Freedom.

Ahmad Sohrab.

Mirza Ahmad Sohrab's Broken Silence: The Story of Today's Struggle for Religious Freedom. New York: Universal Publishing, 1942.

Many of Sohrab's comments and books should be read in the light of his attempting to make amends with, or influence, Shoghi Effendi, who "excommunicated" him, as Shoghi Effendi had done with his own entire family. Ruth White and Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell went much deeper into what had gone wrong after Abdul-Baha's death, but Sohrab throws light upon various Bahai problems of the time, such as freedom of religious conscience, of which many such problems continue today for other Bahai denominations based upon the fraudulent will and testament of 1921.

Given subsequent Bahai history, it is clear Sohrab also failed to understand the wisdom and very profound change in religious form and conduct that Abdul-Baha taught when he repeatedly stated the Bahai Movement could not be organized. Abdul-Baha's Teaching runs entirely contrary to what people usually think of as "religion," and is still today a profoundly challenging paradox for many seekers and Bahais.

Scholarship worthy of the name cannot be done without confronting the Bahai history to which Ruth White, Julie Chanler, and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab testify.

Includes White's extensive documents and communication with the Mandate of Palestine authorities regarding the fraudulent will and testament of Abdul-Baha and Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell's Report on the Writing Shown on the Photographs of the Alleged Will of Abdul-Baha. 1930.

Scholarship worthy of the name cannot be done without confronting the Bahai history to which Ruth White, Julie Chanler, and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab testify.

"We had the dark ages because the bigots of that era got control of Christ's teachings and tortured all those who did not comply with their interpretation. Shoghi Effendi, and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is, cannot in this day resort to physical torture to enforce their will, but they have resorted to mental torture by blackmailing with excommunication all those who do not comply with their inverted teachings" (100).

Finally, a manuscript of the Iqan which retains all the errors uttered by Baha'u'llah

This is a manuscript of the original book of Iqan which retains all the grammatical errors and distortions in the verses of the Qur'an uttered by Baha'u'llah. It has been taken from the digital archive of the National Library of Iran (Kitabkhaniyi Milli) with number 11383. Baha'is affected by ban on 'Allah' word – A Report Followers of the faith use the words "Allah-u-Abbha", which means "God the most glorious" when they meet each other.

A spokesman for the Baha'i community of Malaysia, said the matter regarding the ban would be deliberated upon by members before they make any statements.

The Baha'i faith also believes in one God and emphasizes the spiritual unity of all humankind.

Three core principles establish a basis for Baha'i teachings and doctrine: the unity of God, that there is only one God who is the source of all creation; the unity of religion, that all major religions have the same spiritual source and come from the same God; and the unity of humanity, that all humans have been created equal, and that diversity of race and culture are seen as worthy of appreciation and acceptance.

The Baha'i faith was founded by Baha'u'llah in 19th-century Persia.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the Sikh community here said Sikhs will continue to use the word regardless of the ban on its use.

Gurdwara Sahib Petaling Jaya (GSPJ) vice-president Awtar Singh said, the word has been used by Sikhs since the founding of the faith hundreds of years ago.

"It has been part of our religion and now if you want to take that away, the right to practise our religion would also be taken away," Awtar told theSun today.

He said the Sikh holy book – the Guru Granth Sahib – is a compilation of Sikh teachings by the first five Gurus of Sikhism.

"We refer to the Guru Granth Sahib for our way of life and it is a very important book as it is the compilation of all Sikh teachings; the Guru Granth Sahib is everything to Sikhs," Awtar said.

Puchong Member of Parliament Gobind Singh Deo concurred adding that the community will continue to use the word.

"As far as we are concerned, we will continue using the word as it is part and parcel of the book (Guru Granth Sahib)," he said.

What goes around comes around: Use of the Greatest Name(Allah) effectively banned in Malaysia

In November, 2006, the heterodox Baha'is, those presently headquartered in Wilmette , Illinois, brought a legal action seeking to prevent the Orthodox Baha'is from using the Greatest Name, among other things. The Greatest Name is "Allah-u-Abha" (God is All-Glorious) and its variants, and is considered one of the most sacred names and symbols of the Baha'i Faith. After years of battle in the United States District Court and an appeal before the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, the Orthodox Baha'is finally prevailed in 2011.

Equality of Men and Women in Baha'i Faith?! HmMMM

In Baha'i Faith, women are prohibited from serving in the Universal House of Justice!

“The Universal House of Justice shall consist of who have been elected from the Bahá’í community in the manner hereinafter provided.”

(The Universal House of Justice, The Constitution of The Universal House of Justice, p. 10)

Maybe they should call it the Universal House of Inequality!

Also, giving the if there is no will left by the parents!

SO DON'T USE THE WORD "FREEDOM"! JUST SAY THERE IS A CERTAIN RANGE OF BEHAVIOR WE PERMIT IN BAHÁ'Í FAITH!!

Human Equality in Baha'i Faith! Hmmm!

I have already talked about discrimination against homosexuals in Baha'i faith! I have already talked about exclusion of women from Universal House of Justice (OR actually Local House of Injustice). Now I want to share with you guys something else!

This is a quote from Universal House of Justice:

With loving Bahá'í greetings, Department of the Secretariat

Did you know that the science we have today is just because of Baha'ullah?

So without Baha'ullah science would not have existed! What Nonsense !!!

The foolishness called Baha'i

A few weeks ago, I received the following e-mail at my workplace:

Though the e-mail didn't mention it, I knew EXACTLY what it was all about... Baha'i! If you've never heard of it, Baha'i is a faith which believes:

Put simply, Baha'i can be summarized with this statement: "let's all get together and get along!"

Sounds harmless enough doesn't it? Yet, it is quite harmful. You see, Baha'i lacks one important element to make it a righteous faith. The one element? Truth. Consider this example:

Now friends, on a cloudless summer morning, what colour is the sky? It is of course, blue. If anyone came to you and said it was any other colour, you would think he was either colour blind or he was just trying to irritate you. Now what of the fourth man in my example. Could the sky be blue, green and yellow all at once? OF COURSE NOT! The man who takes such a position is either stupid, or he thinks the three other men are stupid enough to believe that the morning sky is multi-coloured.

Just consider these three examples:

1- God:

Hinduism: Three main impersonal gods, and millions of lesser gods.. Christianity: There are three persons in one God. All of the same substance and nature, co-equal and co-eternal. Islam: One impersonal God.

2- Jesus Christ:

Hinduism: Not God. Not the Son of God. One of the many sons of God. Christianity: God and the Son. 2nd Person of the Trinity. He is 100% God and 100% man. He was/is the only sinless man. Islam: Not God. A mere man who was beneath Mohammed in importance. He did not die for man's sins.

3- Sin:

Hinduism: There is no absolute good or evil. Christianity: Sin is breaking the Laws of God. All men have sinned. The penalty of sin is eternal physical and spiritual death. Islam: Not following the commandments of Allah, and Islamic Law.

And there you have it! The three men arguing about the colour of the sky. The three major faiths in the example above are definitely NOT seeing the same thing on many key matters of faith, so how can it be that Baha'i will bring all them around into one? How is it that all are right and good according to the Baha'i when it is clear that the stand of one is opposite to the others?

NONSENSE!

When someone says they believe in everything, it means they believe nothing. If Christianity is right, then Islam, Judaism, Buddhism, Hinduism...etc... are all wrong; just as if the sky is blue on a clear summer morning, it isn't green or yellow.

Do I think the leaders of the Baha'i movement are stupid? No! I think that many who follow Baha'i are stupid, but not those who have engineered and continue to promote the faith. You see, Baha'i very deceptively takes advantage of people's ignorance. Most people don't have a clue of the differences between the various world faiths (most a willfully ignorant), and so when Baha'i shows up with catch phrases like: "religious and cultural harmony amongst the people", well, it sounds pretty good to them. And once they are hooked in, well then comes the teachings of the Bab and Baha Allah, which are teachings that are rejected, in varying degrees, by all world faiths.

Now you look around my blog... all my cards are on the table. There is no deceit here. My faith is spelled out in no uncertain terms. I am a Christian fundamentalist. No Islam, no Hinduism, no Buddhism. Why? Because these faiths are opposed to my faith in their tenets and in their practices. If you are a Christian, have no part of Baha'i. The Bible is all too clear:

"Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." (2 Corinthians 6:14-18)

Bahai Center or Illegal Alcohol Warehouse !! – A Report

Courtesy : <http://pidp.eastwestcenter.org/pireport/2013/July/07-02-07.htm>

By Charley Piringi

HONIARA, Solomon Islands (Solomon Star, July 1, 2013) Several liquor outlets operating illegally in the city have been raided over the weekend by police.

The operations were conducted by the Honiara City Police.

The raid was in relation to illegal selling of liquor. Owners of these outlets were selling alcohol without any liquor permits and after hours.

During the raid nearly ten cartons of beer were confiscated.

As a result of the raid two men were arrested and charged while awaiting their court appearance.

Honiara City Police Commander Chief Superintendant Sergeant Gabriel Manelusi yesterday confirmed the raids while issuing a warning to all illegal liquor outlets in the city.

He said that a lot of hotspots involved in such illegal activities have been identified.

These identified hotspots will be their targets in the coming weeks.

“Those recently raided areas were some of the many crime hotspots in town.”

He warned that more of such raids will be conducted and owners of these illegal outlets will face justice once they are caught.

“We have already identified other illegal outlets in the city and will be raiding them soon.”

Sgt. Manelusi calls on all communities in and around Honiara to work together with the police to fight against such illegal activities.

“We asked the communities to work closely with us to ensure that Honiara is a crime free city for everyone. All of us should be law abiding citizen of the Solomon Islands.”

Apart from the raids regular traffic checkups and inspections by police will also be conducted as of this week.

Four Core activities of Bahais in India.

Study Circles, Devotional Gathering, Children's Moral Classes, Junior Youth Programs. They are trying to implement these 4 core activities. They are quite unsuccessful till today. If the Indians do not wake up on time, then Baha'is can cause damage to Hinduism and colourful Indian Society. Baha'is say Hinduism has nothing to offer to this world except division and corruption. According to their official websites they have converted 2.2 million Hindus to Baha'ism with the help of 4 core activities.

A brief visit from Bob Arvay, former Baha'i, evangelical Christian.

Up until a couple of years or so ago, I used to be a frequent poster on this group. After I found my continued discussion to be going in circles, I did as many of my online critics urged me to do, and "went away." Time has passed, but my concern for Baha'is has not diminished. Indeed, unfolding events on the world scene have added more urgency to my fears for the role of Baha'is in the coming great deception of the anti-Christ.

For those who may wish to read some of my archived material, you can do so by typing in the word "arvay" in the "search this group" field on google's talk.religion.bahai.

I did this, and began re-reading some of my old exchanges from 2002 onward, and developed a perspective that I did not have while "in the fray."

The one thing that stands out the most is the continual, persistent, and unrelenting disingenuous arguments posed by my critics. Only now, in retrospect, can I appreciate how breathtakingly dishonest their responses were, and how deeply ingrained this cognitive disconnection is in their thinking.

For example, the question of the Guardianship is the most singular cause of fracturing in the Bahai Faith (BF). I have read many posts on this site concerning the varying points of view from the different factions of Bahais, and could never get answers to my most direct questions. Essentially, what I said was, among the Guardian's crucial duties, was the appointment of a successor. Much Bahai teaching had been invested in the vital importance of this position, and the importance of succession was critical.

Then the Guardian died suddenly. A frantic search was made for any evidence that a successor had been appointed. Nothing. Then, the Hands of the Cause had a real crisis on their "hands." If they could not find a solution, then the entire legitimacy of the BF as a divinely revealed religion was out the window. So they had to improvise after the fact. What they did was to declare the position of the Guardianship null and void. But on what authority? For many years, the guardianship had been touted as critical to the Administrative Order, and unlike in other religions, the AO was specifically designated by the founder of the faith. Inconsistencies and contradictions abounded.

Despite many, many posts on this subject, I never got a good answer to this, neither from the mainline Bahais (UHJ), nor the Mason-Remy faction, nor from Joel Marangella nor from the sans-Guardian Bahais, etc etc.

Everyone can patch up some of the defects in this matter, but nobody can float the boat.

Finally, the discussions veered off into peripheral matters, primarily the centrality of Middle Eastern culture to the problem of terrorism. I was accused of being off topic in these matters, but as I re-read the archives, I see that these subjects were natural transitions from the most direct Bahai teachings to the least direct.

These discussions became confrontational, I think, largely due to the fact that many of the bahais on this forum were not fully committed to some of the Bahai teachings (ironically, those with which evangelical Christians are most likely to agree with Bahais on).

For example, Bahai forbids abortion, yet many of my responders seemed in favor of it. What strikes me in reviewing the old posts is that these "pro-choice" Bahais refused to admit of any distinction between the execution of a convicted murderer after due process, and the killing of an innocent baby without due process. I could never get them to acknowledge that there is a difference.

Bahai teaches that men and women are equal, with which I agree, but then the Bahai teachings incorrectly portray men and women as two wings of a bird. The error in this teaching is that men and women are not mirror images of each other. We are complements of each other. Unlike the wings of a bird, we are asymmetrical, having differing functions, interlocking, compensatory.

Again, the fact that the UHJ does not admit women as officers is extremely disconcerting to politically liberal bahais. But cognitive dissonance is the hallmark of the true believer. I know, because for a few years, I too made excuses for the ever-accumulating list of inherent inconsistencies in the BF.

But the greatest issue of them all, from my opinionated point of view, is that the Bahai faith prophesies a one world order that the Bible clearly demonstrates will FIRST be put into place by Satan, the anti- Christ, the Beast.

What this portends for Bahais is that, as the anti-Christ begins putting into place this world religion, this world economy, this trans- national government, is that Bahais will tend to see this as a validation of their beliefs, a fulfillment of their prophecies, and as a good thing.

Therein lies an enormously great danger for you, and the only defense you have against it is reliance on the shed blood of Jesus for your salvation. I beg each of you to ask Jesus to save your soul. He is all sufficient to meet your every need.

Baha'is are the real enemies of Iran and Iranian People

I had the misfortune of attending a meeting organized by Universal House of Justice for DIPLOMATIC AND EXTERNAL AFFAIR CONSULTATIONS in Acuto, Italy on 2-4 September 2011.

I was surprised to see that the whole atmosphere was dominated by Anti Iran feeling and very cunningly the UHJ had put forward the Persian Bahais in forefront to act against their own country under the guidance of certain Western Powers hostile to Iranian governments.

The Universal House of Justice has initiated a series of international and regional gatherings to develop offices of external affairs in various parts of the world. The main agenda of this body was to change world opinion against Iran.

This three-day meeting addressed a range of matters pertaining to the external affairs work at the national level, including the nature and functioning of external affairs offices and various aspects of the different components of the work. The first and third days were devoted to plenary sessions on these subjects. On day two, participants came together in smaller groups – organized on the basis of either geography or stage of development of the external affairs work – to address the issues discussed in plenum in greater depth.

The main points were addressed by Dr Farzam Arbab and Dr Firaydoun Javaheri, representatives of the House of Justice to the delegates of the meeting in Acuto. The central theme for all the three days was Iran and Iran only.

Participants:

1. Dr Farzam Arbab, and Dr Firaydoun Javaheri member of the Universal House of Justice;
2. Representatives of Offices of External Affairs and National Spiritual Assemblies of Australia, Austria, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, France, Germany, India, Ireland, Kenya, the Netherlands, South Africa, Spain, Turkey, Uganda, the United Kingdom, the United States.
3. Bahá'í International Community Persian language spokespersons for Europe and North America;
4. Representatives of the various Bahai communities

AIM OF THE CONFERENCE

The key address was by House of Justice members Mr. Dr Farzam Arbab, and Dr Firaydoun Javaheri which hinted that it is UHJ agenda of training Bahais in every country to be in contact with their respective government to:

1. Work towards defaming Iran as much as possible and pursue them to favor various motion initiated by the countries like US ,Canada and Britain favoring the Bahais
2. Pressurize their government to support economic sanctions against Iran
3. While trying to achieve these two major goals, try to receive various benefits allowed by the respective government.
4. Introduced Bahai Faith to them

The excuse of meeting with the government officials should be the persecution of Bahais in Iran and the imprisonment of 7 Yaran members of the Bahai Faith. This should be done tactfully under the heading Mistreatment of Minorities by Iranian Government especially Bahais.

The members selected for this committee were advised to be Iranian Bahai ladies so that more sympathy can be generated for the Bahais. The condition of committee members to be Ladies was for obvious reasons.

The Points discussed were

1. How to build capacity to engage meaningfully in the diplomatic work? An essential element of activity is “READING YOUR GOVERNMENT” – which should not be underestimated
2. Methods suggested were :
 - A. How well do you know your government and how can you get to know your government better?
 - B. What are the forces within society that impact your governments? Do you know how your government operates?
 - C. Do you know the key players within government? And which of these individuals is actually receptive to the ideas we would want to present?
 - D. Do you know of any government officials who are dedicated to selfless service to their country rather than the promotion of self?
 - E. How can you build relationships with key individuals in government? What are the resource implications of this?
 - F. How can you introduce ideas in a practical way?

G. Where are the spaces in which ideas are formed and debated?

H. How will you explain the principle of non-involvement in partisan political activity of Bahais in light of your deeper involvement with governments of your country?

I. And how does your government view Bahais? As a human rights NGO? Another small religious community?

J. How can you coordinate the work with other countries and Universal House of Justice? We will probably need to start small by working with a few individuals and engage others only as our capacity allows us

K. Load the National Bahai sites of your country with Anti Iranian materials, Persecution of Bahais etc.

As a conclusion, I could only understand that Acuto meeting was aimed to train future spies to work in interest of Bahais in their country and work against Iran. So much for the slogan – “Bahais do not participate in politics”

Humble question to Bahai friends

1. Baha'u'llah appointed in his Will and Testaments two guardian of faith one after the other, that is Abbas Effendi and Mohammed Ali Effendi. Why.? normally the successor is appointed and that successor in his will nominate his successor, here Baha'u'llah was aware that Abbas Effendi will fail, and will fall in his pride and will promote himself and will make His teachings inferior, in His Will and Testaments he has given clear sign to the faithful that for sure Abbas Effendi will fail, then the faithful should immediately refer to Mohammed Ali Effendi.
2. Why Abbas Effendi was not ready to discuss the issues with his brothers and faithful, it is obvious and clear that he will fail in that and he has to step down.
3. The Will and Testaments clearly states that the Branches (Sons) should be respected Abdul Baha failed in that, hence he himself become Covenant Breaker.

Introducing the Baha'i Jewish Lobby

صرف و نحو را باید با نوشته های من ستجیدون.

The anti-Iranian nature of the missionary affair continues to reverberate within the Iranian Baha'i community. Iran has been the cradle of this British manufactured, Zionist supported cult from the very beginning. Most of its adherents have come from Iran. In fact, for all their posturing that they have managed to convert large populations in the Third World – and who for some reason can't actually be found any rolls –, no other country in the world has been so receptive to the Baha'i idea than Iranians and particularly Iranian Jews.

These days, predominantly of former Jewish and sometimes Zoroastrian backgrounds, the current make up of Baha'is in Iran is vastly different to what it was in the late nineteenth century. The Baha'i faith lost its appeal to the mainstream Iranian community in the early 1900s during the Constitutional Revolution when Abbas Effendi not only failed to support the constitutional movement, but tacitly even supported the Russian involvement in Iranian internal politics and its sponsoring of Muhammad Ali Shah's coup d'etat against the Parliament and people of Iran. Later in the mid 1950s Shoghi Effendi directly instructed Iranian Baha'is to work closely with the Pahlavi regime, ergo Habib Sabet. The exodus of Baha'is from Muslim backgrounds resulted in the reduction in the intellectual output of the community.

Coupled with that came the influx of new believers from these Iranian Jewish and Zoroastrian minorities. The new believers had been under persecution in their respective religions and saw the new faith as an opportunity to exert control over others. Introducing the powerful Baha'i "Jewish" Lobby.

Brought together by their dislike of Muslim influences on Iranian culture, the Jewish Baha'is began to gradually purge the Iranian Baha'i community from its Islamic roots and origins. This can be witnessed in their whitewashings of the militant Shi'ite and Babi past.

This agenda fitted well with Shoghi Effendi's vision of abandoning Iran in favour of exporting the cult to other parts of the world. With the death of Shoghi Effendi in 1957 and the rise of the new UHJ oligarchy, the new Jewish (and sometimes Zoroastrian) adherents were quickly promoted through the ranks to high places within the Iranian and International Baha'i communities. Key members of the Iranian NSA and continental Board of Counsellors came from this new ethnic grouping in the Baha'i cult. Following the 1979 revolution, most of the Jewish Baha'i elite migrated to Western Europe and California, USA, where their monies helped buy properties for the AO. The completion of the ARC project is owed to a large part to donations given from these two groups. Several confidential trips by UHJ members Fatheazam and Nakhjavani to LA and Australia in 1989 ensured that all the monies required for the ARC were secured from these groups. In fact the whole of these monies had been raised long before the advertising campaign for fundraising ever begun, much of through their own investments, with smatterings of large grants and subsidies given them by the Israeli government.

During the late 80s and early 90s many of the donors and their relatives were rewarded by the BWC by being nominated to key positions on the Continental Board and the ITC. In fact a quick scan of existing Counsellors in Europe, Australia and North America since 1985 suggests that former Zoroastrians and Jews have done quite well in this regard, but not their Muslim background counterparts.

The UHJs decision to adopt a more rabid form of fundamentalism and hardline position in 1996 bode well for the Baha'i Jews especially.

They were the ones that successfully lobbied the UHJ to: 1) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to attend Naw-Ruz celebrations by Iranian exile communities; 2) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to associate with the general Iranian community in exile, thereby attempting to foist a Baha'i-only - rather than a universally Iranian – Naw-Ruz culture.

Counsellor Manijeh Reyhani, for example, who was instrumental in getting Hamid Taheri excommunicated comes from a dual Zoroastrian and Jewish background. These people control the Payam-i Bahai magazine (run by '60s-'70s Pahlavi insider Shapour Rasekh a.k.a. Delaram Mashhuri), the Andalib magazine, and, until its demise Landegg in Switzerland, as well as Radio Bahai (broadcasting in Persian), not to mention composition of the Ruhi modules.

Iran has always been rich in supplying and exporting Baha'i travel teachers around the world. The Baha'i Jewish lobby now wants to dominate and silence the mainstream Iranian Baha'i community by exporting their hyper-fundamentalist reading of the cult into Iran. They have funded companies and businesses through the missionaries in order to "teach the youth" and set up Ruhi Institutes. The Baha'i community in Iran has suffered enormously at the hands of the Islamic regime. It has lost some of its most charismatic Baha'i intellectuals like the Bakhtavars or Davudis. The present elite leadership is exclusively made up of former Jews. There are deep divisions in the community and some of the truly learned ones have boycotted the current crop of leaders and their activities.

So this latest effort to export missionaries is aimed at demonstrating "the correct version of the faith" to the rank and file at the same time isolating (and hopefully driving out) the voices of dissent. It is also a means, among others, by the Israelis to gain further footholds inside Iran itself. Both policies, it would appear, have now failed. The Iranian Baha'i community is racked with dissension and schism, and the IR finally blew its top (and reasonably so given all the freedoms they had given the Baha'is since the mid '90s) with this ridiculous allegation of genocide by the Jewish Baha'i leadership. One wonders if maybe deep down these Jewish Baha'is actually pray for a holocaust to occur in Iran so that they can politically capitalize on it for their future designs, just as their European Jewish counterparts vis-a-vis Palestine.

Very often we hear that the Baha'is have been deported from a certain countries, and then are banned in most of the countries. There has been arrest of Baha'is, There has been violence against them because they were caught Proselytizing the children of other Faith. Their properties have been destroyed; they have been accused of immorality, elopement high rate of divorce etc.

Still the Baha'is and the Baha'i administration preaches that they are the most peace loving people on earth so much loving that they fail to realize the immorality of their own community but wants to engage themselves in refining the other communities especially the children, the Youths and the ladies of the other religion.

Baha'is also preach that they do not take part in Politics but then every where we see Baha'i demonstration asking for confiscated properties, release of the leaders, meeting every political leaders even if they have slightest power to exercise. Recently the UHJ the apex organization of the Baha'is have come out with a decree and asked all the national assemblies and the local assemblies to keep a close relationship with all the political leaders of that countries and cities so that the cloud of doubts and mistrust may not creep in the minds of these influential people. This is in accordance with the principle that not to offend the political susceptibilities of someone or some government

It is hardly enough to say that Baha'is are 'non-political' — after all; Baha'is do plan to bring into being a series of Baha'i states and, in the end, a Baha'i world — no less extreme than the aim of every Marxist. And, in the same way that not everyone jumps with joy at the thought of his country becoming Marxist, so we can hardly expect that there will be universal rejoicing at the news that the Baha'i faith is becoming a threat to the established political system.

Baha'i Faith in Turmoil

UHJ call for 95 Youth conferences is in fact SOS for Baha'i Faith about to be archived to annals of history.

The Baha'i Faith Titanic is

The Captain of Titanic has given a signal of distress to the Baha'is of the world in the form of organizing 95 youth conferences across the globe. The UHJ will pump dollars to make these conferences a success. As usual, the youth will come to make merry and play music, as at the last moments of Titanic people aboard were singing and dancing.

So threatened is the faith with danger of extinction due to Baha'i Faith's administration being infiltrated with pretenders and gangsters who 'claim' to be Baha'is, but lack faithfulness in their hearts. Their aim is to keep the ark 'motionless' and focus on 'fancies' such as over-administration, a social-club-like mentality, backbiting, passing time over trivial issues, more importantly, ridiculing those who lack it, instead of effectively teaching, sharing & reaching the highest realms of the spirit.

The Baha'i Faith is suffering from Ideological and Administrative and social turmoil.

Ideological turmoil

While the matter of Guardianship sprang-up many other issues surfaced like: a. authenticity of Will and Testament of Abdul Baha, b. who was the real successor of Bab – Subh-e Azal or Bahauallah? c. Bahauallah's sister Aziziya Khanum disclosing viceful personal life of Bahauallah. d. The Unitarian Baha'is bringing all sorts of Holy writings against Abdul Baha. e. number of ideological questions were raised by the Knowledgeable Ex Baha'is, who were shown the gate, over the internet. They launched a full attack on the History of Baha'i Faith. The Ex Baha'is proved that the Pen is mightier than sword (Excommunication).

The UHJ found itself incapable to give any logical answer to these questions and went on damage control mode asking NSA to take back all the Baha'is whose voting rights were taken. They absolutely erased the concept of Sanctions of Administrative Rights. And now, finally, 95 conferences are being arranged as a part of damage control strategy.

Administrative turmoil

On the other hand there were many Administrative questions surrounding UHJ regarding its legality, its infallibility and the extra ordinary higher percentage of Iranian Baha'is on it. The Baha'i scholars have been openly objecting to the high level of intolerance shown by UHJ, use of derogatory languages for respected Baha'is, threat of excommunication, election process of UHJ and its interference in election of the other countries.

Even the various methods of propagation are so frequently being changed that it gives a sign of uncertainty. Earlier it was fireside and then Mass teaching. The Social Economic Development has failed to give any serious acceptability to the Baha'i Faith.

The worst failure was Ruhi curriculum which divided the Baha'i Faith diagonally into the Persian and Non Persian Baha'is – finally resulting in outburst of a former UHJ Member against not just the Ruhi curriculum but the UHJ itself. Certain reactions are indeed eye openers, e.g. after a deepening session by a so called Baha'i scholar, a Persian Baha'i remarked that let us congratulate UHJ for successfully confusing the Baha'is.

The Volunteers who served on the world centers in the prime of the youth age, when asked to return as they had lost their youth, started openly criticizing the UHJ members

The attack of former UHJ member on Ruhi curriculum and a humiliating court case defeat has instilled shame in every Baha'i. Baha'is now care a damn about the claims of UHJ asking Baha'is to be patient that it is doing everything to reverse the case.

Moral Turmoil

Since the advent of Ruhi system, the deepened Baha'is who were always ahead in activities felt betrayed by the UHJ for side tracking them in every field. Capable Baha'is having knowledge of Baha'i Faith and Holy writings were left for job of travel teachers and useless and incompetent Baha'is who did not know the difference between Bahauallah and Allahaabha were made counselors.

Baha'i culture can hardly be called as a Religious culture. The ultra modern culture resembles MTV pop culture and not at all a sober religion.

The rate of divorce, rate of elopement, infighting amongst the Baha'i officials and an emerging trend of resignation of Baha'i officials from Administration and their refusal to take up any responsibility whether it is paid or voluntary, are all signs of steep downfall.

Preoccupation with Iran

The UHJ's preoccupation with Iran is not proving to be a good omen for the Baha'is. The Baha'i sites of every country contain more anti Iranian material than Holy writings. It seems that it is made for the purpose of instilling Anti Iranian feelings.

The Universal House of Justice is discussing how to contact the political leaders to defame Iran (in the matter of Yaran) and at the same time utilizing the meeting for Baha'i propaganda by gifting some Baha'i Books. The UHJ members are openly talking with the Baha'is that Persecution of Baha'is in Iran is a blessing for them as it gave them the opportunity to meet different political leaders. In fact one of the UHJ members remarked that 'if the Iran problem is solved, then what?'

Further, it has antagonized many Persian Baha'is as nationalism is more important for them than faith.

This obsession with the Anti Iran Govt propaganda leaves little time for other activities. A typical Baha'i LSA member apart from anti Iran propaganda has local politics, defaming other Baha'is, gossiping and merry making in the agenda. No wonder the faith has lost whatever spirituality it had.

Conclusion

It is clear that turmoil in the faith is deep. Relating the situation to the Titanic is not uncalled for. Most Baha'is can now see through the deception. Only hindrance is that they can't find a better social club to give allegiance. The current UHJ message is understood by many Baha'is

Message Of UHJ Within communities of every size and strength, we are glad to see the processes of the Five Year Plan kindling the spirit of service and stimulating purposeful action. Examples appear every day of how the act of reaching out to touch individual hearts, acquainting souls with the Word of God, and inviting them to contribute to the betterment of society can, in time, tend to the advancement of a people. This collective movement becomes discernible when the Plan's elements are combined into a well-coordinated cluster-wide effort, the dynamics of which are becoming increasingly familiar. Such a cluster becomes the setting for experienced believers as much as those newly introduced to the Faith, whatever their age or background, to work side by side, accompanying one another in their service, enabling everyone to participate in the unfoldment of the Plan.

From the panorama of the Baha'i world engaged in earnest activity, one phenomenon strikes us especially: the decisive contribution made by youth on every continent. In this phenomenon we see the vindication of the hopes the beloved Guardian invested in them "for the future progress and expansion of the Cause" and of the confidence with which he laid upon their shoulders "all the responsibility for the upkeep of the spirit of selfless service among their fellow-believers". We are struck, too, by the number of youth who, after only a brief association with the Baha'i community, commit themselves to meaningful acts of service and quickly discover their affinity with the Faith's community-building Endeavour. Indeed, in contemplating both the Baha'i youth and their like-minded peers, we cannot but rejoice at their eagerness to take on a measure of responsibility to aid the spiritual and social development of those around them, especially ones younger than themselves. In an age consumed by self-interest, in which even spiritual affiliation is weighed in the scales of reward and personal satisfaction, it is heartening to encounter individuals from their mid-teens to their twenties—those upon whom the sights of an aggressive materialism are decidedly trained—who are galvanized by the vision of Baha'u'llah and are ready to put the needs of others before their Own. That such high-minded youth, by dint of their own exertions as well as the momentum they lend to the whole community, should be contributing so effectively to efforts everywhere under way bodes well for the anticipated acceleration of these efforts.

What has been accomplished in the past two years will, surely, be far surpassed, not just in the concluding years of this present Plan but in the remaining years of the first century of The Formative Age. To spur on this mighty enterprise and to summon today's youth to fully assume the responsibilities they must discharge in this fast-contracting interval, we announce the convocation of 95 youth conferences, between July and October, planned for locations that span the globe :

Ground Reality

- There is no community of Baha'is. Baha'i Faith is an NGO, which pays its officers to work
- The Baha'i contribution for betterment of society is NIL.
- There are no believers in Baha'i Faith only officers and workers. And they are paid for it.
- "Guardian", please explain which Guardian? there are multitudes of Guardians in Baha'i Faith
- If it is selfless service, stop the remuneration given to counselors, ABMs, NSA members and to the Baha'is for attending the conference. Ask them to pay for their lodging and boarding then see the attendance
- It is a great lie.
- You have accomplished some statistics which are falsely written by Persians
- When the officers and workers get together, in language of NGO is called as PARTY, and in Baha'i Faith it is called as Conferences.

People claiming to be the Mahdi – The Promised one

Courtesy : http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/People_claiming_to_be_the_Mahdi

In Muslim eschatology, the Mahdi is a Messianic figure who, it is believed, will appear on Earth before the Day of Judgment and, will rid the world of wrongdoing, injustice and tyranny. People claiming to be the Mahdi have appeared across the Muslim world – in South Asia, Africa and the Middle East – and throughout history since the birth of Islam (610 CE).

A claimant Mahdi can wield great temporal, as well as spiritual, power: claimant Mahdis have founded states (e.g. the late 19th-century in Sudan), as well as religions and sects (e.g. Bábism, or the Ahmadiyya movement). The continued relevance of the Mahdi doctrine in the Muslim world was most recently emphasised during the 1979 seizing of the Grand Mosque in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, by at least 200 militants led by Juhayman al-Otaibi, who had declared his brother-in-law, Muhammad bin abd Allah al-Qahtani, the Mahdi.

Eighth century

Ṣāliḥ ibn Tarīf

Ṣāliḥ ibn Tarīf, the second king of the Berghouata, proclaimed himself prophet of a new religion in the 8th century. He appeared during the caliphate of the Umayyad Hisham ibn Abd al-Malik. According to Ibn Khaldun's sources, he claimed receiving a new revelation from God called a Qur'an, written in the Berber language with 80 chapters. He established laws for his people, which called him ('Restorer of the Believers'), and the final Mahdi.

Islamic literature considers his belief heretical, as several tenets of his teaching contrast with orthodox Islam, such as capital punishment for theft, unlimited wives, unlimited divorces, fasting of the month of Rajab instead of Ramadan, and ten obligatory daily prayers instead of five. Politically, its motivation was presumably to establish their independence from the Umayyads, establishing an independent ideology lending legitimacy to the state. Some modern Berber activists regard him as a hero for his resistance to Arab conquest and his foundation of the Berghouata state.

Abdallah ibn Muawiya

Abdallah ibn Muawiya was descendant of Jafar ibn Abi Talib. At the end of 127 AH/ 744 CE Shia's of Kufa set up him as Imam he revolted against Yazid III, the Umayyad Caliph, with the support of Shia's of Kufa and Ctesiphon. He moved to west of Iran and Isfahan and Istakhr. He managed to control the west of Iran for two years. Finally, he was defeated by the caliph armies in 746-7 CE and fled to Harat in Khorasan. He died in Abumuslim prison, his rival. His followers did not believe his death and said that he went to occultation and he would return as Mahdi.

Ninth century

Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-Mahdi

Muhammad ibn Hasan ibn Ali (29 July CE 869/15 Sha'bān 255 AH – ?), more commonly called Muhammad al-Mahdi, is the twelfth imam of Twelver Shia Islam. He is believed by Twelver Shi'a Muslims to be the Mahdi, an ultimate savior of humankind and the final Imām of the Twelve Imams. Twelver Shi'a believe that al-Mahdi was born in 869 and did not die but rather was hidden by God (this is referred to as the Occultation) and will later emerge with Isa (Jesus) in order to fulfill their mission of bringing peace and justice to the world. He assumed the Imamate at 5 years of age. Some Shi'ite schools do not consider ibn-al-Hasan to be the Mahdi, although the mainstream sect Twelvers do.

Tenth century

Abdullah al-Mahdi Billah (r. 909-934), the first caliph of the Fatimid state, established in 909, was one of only two claimants who succeeded in establishing a state. (See Muhammad Ahmad below).

His preacher/Da'i Abu 'Abdullah Al-Husayn Al-Shi'i helped secure for him parts of north Africa using the support of the Berber locals. The Fatimids later built Cairo as capital in Egypt and their descendants continued to rule as Caliphs (the sixth, Al-Hakim bi-Amr Allah is believed by the Druze to be in occultation and due to return as Mahdi on Judgment Day) until Salah-ud-Din Ayubi (also called Saladin) took over Egypt and ended the Fatimid state. He imprisoned the last Fatimid Caliph and his family in the Fatimid Palace until death.

Twelfth century

Ibn Tumart

The Moroccan Ibn Tumart (c. 1080 – c. 1130), sought to reform Almoravid decadence in the early 12th century. Rejected in Marrakech and other cities, he turned to his Masmuda tribe in the Atlas Mountains for support. Because of their emphasis on the unity of God, his followers were known as ('unitarians', in western language: Almohads).

Although declaring himself mahdi, and (literally in Arabic: innocent or free of sin), Muhammad ibn Abdallah ibn Tumart consulted with a council of ten of his oldest disciples, and conform traditional Berber representative government, later added an assembly of fifty tribal leaders. The Almohad rebellion began in 1125 with attacks on Moroccan cities, including Sus and Marrakech. But as Muhammad ibn Abdallah ibn Tumart died in 1130, his successor Abd al Munin took the title of Caliph – claiming universal leadership in Islam – and placed members of his own family in power, converting the system into a traditional sultanate.

Fifteenth century

Muhammad Jaunpuri

Muhammad Jaunpuri (9 September 1443 – 23 April 1505), born in northeastern India in Jaunpur (modern-day Uttar Pradesh), was a descendant of the seventh imam, Musa Kadhim.

He claimed to be the Mahdi on three occasions, first in Mecca, and later twice in India, attracting a large following, and opposition from the ulema.

His five deputies were Sani Mahdi, Shah Khundmir, Shah Neymath, Shah Nizam and Shah Dilawar.

Muhammad Jaunpuri died in 1505, aged 63, at Farah, Afghanistan. His followers, known as Mahdavis, continue to exist and are centred around the Indian city of Hyderabad, although there Mahdavi communities in Gujarat, Karnataka, Madhya Pradesh and Maharashtra, as well as in Pakistan and overseas in America, Australia, Canada, Africa and United Kingdom.

Seventeenth century

Ahmed ibn Abi Mahalli

Ahmed ibn Abi Mahalli (1559–1613), from the south of Morocco, was a Qadi and religious scholar who proclaimed himself mahdi and lead a revolution (1610–13) against the reigning Saadi dynasty.

Mahamati Prannath

Mahamati Prannath (1618–1694), from Gujarat, India, was a religious leader who proclaimed himself Imam Mahdi.

Nineteenth century

The 19th century provided several Mahdi claimants, some of whose followers and teachings survive to the present day.

Diponegoro

Prince Diponegoro (11 November 1785 – 8 January 1855), prince of Yogyakarta, Java. He saw himself as a Javanese Mahdi, or Ratu Adil (prophesised by King Joyoboyo), against Dutch colonialism. Now a National Hero of Indonesia.

Alí Muḥammad Shīrāzī (Báb)

Alí Muḥammad Shīrāzī (20 October 1819 – 9 July 1850), claimed to be the Mahdi on 24 May 1844, taking the name Báb (Arabic: باب / English: Gate) and thereby founding the religion of Bábism. He was later executed by firing squad in the town of Tabriz. His remains are currently kept in a tomb at the Bahá'í World Centre in Haifa, Israel.

The Báb is considered the forerunner of Bahá'u'lláh (pronounced / Arabic: بهاء الله / English: Glory of God), and both are considered prophets of the Bahá'í Faith. The declaration by the Báb to be the Mahdi is considered by Baha'is to be the beginning of the Bahá'í calendar.

Muḥammad Aḥmad

Muhammad Ahmad (12 August 1844 – 22 June 1885), a Sudanese Sufi sheikh of the Samaniyya order, declared himself Mahdi in June 1881 and went on to lead a successful military campaign against the Turko-Egyptian government of Sudan. Although he died shortly after capturing the Sudanese capital, Khartoum (1885), the Mahdist state continued under his successor, Abdallahi ibn Muhammad, until 1898, when it fell to the British army following the Battle of Omdurman.

Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad

Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (13 February 1835 – 26 May 1908), claimed to be both the Mahdi and the second coming of Jesus in the late 19th century in British India. He founded the Ahmadiyya religious movement in 1889, which, although considered by its followers to be Islam, is not recognized as such by the majority of mainstream Muslims. Interesting correspondence with Muslim convert about Bahaism

I hope you don't mind me telling you a little bit about myself, and asking some questions.

I have read some of your articles about mysticism, and comments about the Baha'i Faith and some of it is hard to deny. Here is a little background about myself. I converted to Islam when I was nineteen years old, and within a year I discovered the Baha'i Faith. I didn't do much research at first because I was still getting used to practicing Islam and grasping the idea of being part of a worldwide Muslim community. I didn't care for all of the rules and regulations that the 'ulama declared were the only true means of practicing the faith. It seemed like they made Islam excessively hard to practice for most people. When I finally began to research the Baha'i Faith, my attraction was really towards the Bab', Ali-Muhammad Shirazi. I read Mirza Husayn Ali's "Book of Certitude" in one night, and the parts that kept me reading even though my mind was tired, were the prophecies about the Bab' as the Mahdi. I was not interested in prophecies at that time, because I didn't come from a particular background that required them. The same was true for Islam. I didn't "need" to know that Muhammad was prophesized in the Bible, as I was an agnostic. Even so, when I read the Shi'a hadith that was quoted in the book, I fell in love with this man called "The Bab'." Even when I started to hang out with the Baha'is, I would jokingly refer to myself as a "Muslim Babi" because of how attracted I was to him.

But jokes aside, I didn't see a contradiction with that phrase because I viewed the Bab' as a man who created a community that was "outside" of Islam but still "inside" at the same time, like a paradox. After a month of spending time with Baha'is, I saw my first red flag. I was talking to one of my Baha'i friends and mentioned that I wanted to learn Farsi or French so I could read the Persian Bayan in full. For some reason, still unknown to me to this day, she became instantly suspicious and implied that my "intentions" to read it were impure somehow. "Wait a minute", I thought. Why would she give me a guilt trip because I wanted to read a part of her own faith's scripture? If I were talking to a Muslim and stated that I wanted to learn Arabic so I could read the Qur'an in its original language, they would be ecstatic and probably even help me learn the language if they knew it. I took the matter to some other Baha'is because I thought maybe she just had her own issues or something, but they also became silent when I said it was because I wanted to read the Persian Bayan.

One of them kindly suggested that it would be easier for me to just read the writings of Baha'u'llah because he is the "most recent" Manifestation of God, they are more easily available, and they are translated into English so I don't need to learn a foreign language. I understood the logic, but I didn't understand why they were all trying to dissuade me from reading a piece of their own scripture. I got the impression that they had something to hide. That wasn't my initial perception at all, but when they kept trying to steer me in a certain direction and even question my "intentions" (whatever that means), what else was I to think? The only reason why I wanted to read the Persian Bayan was because of my attraction to the Bab, not despite of it. I eventually caved to their wishes and read the writings of Mirza Husayn 'Ali instead, which were inspiring to a certain degree. But I would get this intuitional feeling that somehow the Baha'i Faith wasn't telling the whole story about its origins, like it was hiding something.

Every time I would feel that way, I would crush it and punish myself for thinking such "unholy" thoughts. I also started to wonder if the Baha'i Faith actually despised Islam at its inner core. While I could never categorically prove this, I came across many passages and writings that seemed to speak ill of Islam through cleverly constructed phrases that appear to exalt the faith of Muhammad at face value, but in actuality are tearing it apart. I would notice that out of all of the interpretations given to particular Quranic verses and hadiths that exist in the tradition of Islamic scholarship, the Baha'i Faith would almost always pick the "bad" one that would make Islam appear "backward" to the "enlightened" west, and would then say "this is why Baha'u'llah came, to reform religion...etc." Perhaps that is too conspiratorial, but it was a very strong feeling I had that would inevitably creep up no matter how much I censored my thoughts. One of my most vivid memories of this kind of thing, was a "conversation" I had with a sweet elderly Persian woman. She initiated it by stating that according to a Zoroastrian scholar on satellite t.v., Muhammad (pbuh) commanded his followers to bury their new born children alive during the early years of his prophethood; but he later abrogated that law by commanding them to only bury their female new born children alive and sparing the males. I told her that that was really confusing since the Qur'an specifically mentions the practice of burying female new borns and condemns it. She just brushed that off and kept saying more things that would make Islam look bad, and ended our conversation with a hug and an "apology" for "offending" me, and stating a final after thought, "the Qur'an tells men to beat their wives...you know this?"

This leads into my questions. What is it that I could have done to make these Baha'is treat me this way? I was nothing but respectful towards them and their faith. I never said a bad word about their religion. And yet it seems like just because of the sheer fact that I was a Muslim, that somehow meant that I was less than them. Even after I became a Baha'i, while still retaining my love and appreciation for Islam and the Prophet Muhammad, some of the Baha'is would still pick at me for my association with Islam. The elderly Persian woman would sometimes ask me if I was "still a Baha'i", which is a meaningless question because the LSA would know if I had resigned from the Baha'i Faith (which I did a number of years later.)

In the research you have done, is there any evidence that the Baha'i Faith has an agenda to make Islam look barbaric and evil, while appearing to praise the Prophet Muhammad and the Qur'an? In connection with that question, does the Baha'i Faith have an agenda to make the Babi Faith and Islam appear to be enemies of each other? Did Tahiri really claim that Muhammad's teachings were "nonsense"? Is there a full translation of the Persian and Arabic Bayans in English? Or for that matter, are full copies of the originals still in existence for anyone to read?

Thanks for getting back to me, I really appreciate it...About Western imperialism and the Baha'i Faith, I am also starting to think there is a connection. I still have a few Baha'i friends, and almost on a daily basis I hear about the "oppression of Baha'is in Iran", which saddens me. But what makes me question things is this: Out of all of the oppressed peoples of the world, from South America to Chechnya, from Iran to the First Nation peoples of North America, why is it that so much attention is given to seven people in Iran? I am not saying that persecution requires a high number of people for it to be persecution, but they act as if Baha'is are the only people being persecuted in that country. In the past twenty years, about two-hundred Baha'is have been executed by the State. That is a serious human rights crime, but does it really warrant a war, sanctions, and massive death for the entire Iranian population, while other countries that are allies of the United States kill groups of people in the thousands? And when non- Baha'is question Baha'is why they don't speak out against the oppression of other groups of people, they basically say that it's not their job. Which would be a "fair", albeit selfish answer if it were not for the sheer fact that the Baha'i institutions call on non- Baha'is to speak out on behalf of Baha'is. But when the tables are turned, the Baha'i institutions don't want to hear it.

This might sound really off-the-mark, but do you think it is possible that the "higher-ups" of the Baha'i Faith are practicing some form of "black" magick in an attempt to influence world affairs towards their goals? Also, are you aware of any Baha'i-Freemason connections? I came across some interesting things a Baha'i wrote on a Baha'i forum, but haven't done enough researching yet to know if it is true. Basically, he said that the name "Baha'u'llah" is a "special name" at the Baltimore Masonic Temple, like a "code word." They have a hallway of nine doors, with the ninth door being the highest as the hall moves upwards. He also said that Gleanings from the writings of Baha'u'llah is in their top ten books of scripture to read from. He said that Baha'is are not permitted to join Secret Societies, but he knows at least two Baha'is in "good standing" who are 33rd degree Masons.

Lessons for Christians in the history of the Bahai faith

By Adrian Worsfold

When I was confirmed into the Church of England in 1984 I asked some Baha'is I met at their firesides to come along. None did. In the end I fell out with the Baha'is as I discovered academic material that presented their history differently from their own. They are very committed to the preservation of their history as monitored by the Universal House of Justice, the nine seater male-only assembly meant to be a combined secular and religious decision making body for the world, elected without campaigns by the National Spiritual Assemblies below them, these elected by delegates from the Local Spiritual Assemblies below them. It is a very conserving system, a sort of democratic centralism: what the top level says goes.

Very quickly summarizing: the origins of the Baha'i Faith are in the Babi faith that developed out of Shia Islam in Iran and Iraq. They were waiting for the return of the Hidden Twelfth Imam and a Holy War for the victory of Islam. In 1844 Sayyid Ali Muhammed Shirazi claimed to be the Bab, the Gateway to the returning Imam. When he didn't appear at Karbala, Sayyid Ali Muhammed escalated his status in stages to the Imam, then the Prophet and then superseding to a new Manifestation of God. The movement was surrounded by violence, and started much of it themselves. The Bab appointed Mirza Yahya (or Sub-i-Azal) to be his successor, but after the Bab was killed by the authorities the violence continued and the movement was in severe decline. Sub-i-Azal's half brother, Mirza Husayn Ali, an elite Persian convert, built up his own faction and in 1863 he, Baha'u'llah (Glory of God) announced himself as the Bab's next Manifestation of God. The authorities never left either faction alone, and the Azalis ended up in Cyprus and the Baha'is at Palestine. However, Baha'u'llah, in the course of the compulsory travels and his declaration to the few and then the world of his status, read Sufi and New Testament material, and completely remodelled the faith as it came into the Western orbit, making itself syncretistic in character, peaceful and expecting the unification of the world.

Baha'u'llah died in 1892, and Abbas Effendi, his eldest son, or Abdul-Baha, became the leader and only interpreter or "Centre of the Covenant". Here there was factionalism, as a group known as the Unitarians (people of the Book, not Abdul-Baha's interpretations) broke out and were excommunicated. The Young Turks' victory meant an end to imprisonment, and Abdul Baha became a traveller around the West even more spiritualising and Westernising the movement, and was a charismatic figure as he attended mosques, Christian and Unitarian (the other sort) churches and synagogues.

After he died Shoghi Effendi became the first Guardian. Some Germans did not accept the validity of Abdul Baha's will appointing him and so the Free Baha'is emerged for a time. Shoghi Effendi should have had a serving Universal House of Justice under him, but he did not set it up. He should have left a will, but either he didn't or it never appeared. So when he died in 1957 there was a crisis of leadership, after which in 1963 the Universal House of Justice was formed and took to itself powers of the Guardian, most importantly the sole power to interpret and the power to excommunicate.

The chief of Hands of the Cause, a forerunner to the UHJ, Mason Remey, thought he should be the new Guardian. Factions have arisen ever since from that branch, including one that now thinks the second Guardian was presumptive, but so was the Universal House of Justice taking power to itself.

The UHJ produces plans for growth. The millennial nature of the Bahai Faith is that it expects the Most Great Peace to arrive (instead we had George Bush) and a tipping point where "troops" of people convert to the Bahai Faith. Unfortunately, the Bahai Faith has been born in a rather irreligious age in Europe, and other than some growth in developing countries, Europe has been slow and with a high turnover of members. Plus, the UHJ in Haifa has a habit of turning members who don't submit to censorship panels into covenant breakers. There are also quite a few people who find themselves mysteriously removed from the rolls of membership, but in the age of the Internet they continue the faith themselves with new freedom, the name Baha'i being in the public realm. A problem for the Haifa Baha'is is that only they can raise money for themselves, and members who can participate in Feasts as well as Firesides find themselves locked into administration details: the Baha'i Faith is an "Administrative Order" after all.

So at each stage of leadership transition elite groups have competed and been excluded, and it is reasonable to say that the quest for unity has been a failure because of its high cost in factions and breakaways, and now there is a more relaxed Bahaism emerging of excluded or drifter individuals. It matters not that the Universal House of Justice only recognises itself as legitimate, because anyone can read the Kitab-i-Iqan and Kitab-i-Aqdas and the published materials that Shoghi Effendi translated into his strained olde-worlde English. Even infallibility is being questioned by individuals let loose.

The Bahai Faith is useful for Christians and Christian theology in a number of ways.

First of all we see something of a parallel in the Bab as a kind of announcer of a new manifestation, although he became what he expected. He gets positioned like a John the Baptist, and probably John the Baptist was his own man too. Then we have the central manifestation (Incarnation) figure, Baha'u'llah. Then we have the very important St. Paul figure, who becomes such an important interpreter and spreader into new cultures and giving a further twist to the faith.

Then we have the issue of authority. There is something of the Pope in the Guardian, of course, but the UHJ is like Orthodoxy or Roman Catholic centralism – with knobs on. In fact it is very Weberian-bureaucratic, and very pyramidal. Weber regarded such with great pessimism: it was anti the life-giving enchantment that he thought religion supplied.

The other lesson is that of allowing theology to grow organically and in diversity. There is a distinct double identity problem of Baha'i member scholarship in secular institutions including that of religious studies departments. It does the Baha'i Faith no favours. We see similar with some Roman Catholics. If Christians become more subject to such pressures of membership conformity, then there is a distortion to both the academic sphere and to the representational sphere.

I also suggest that Christians should express the truth as they find it even when it conflicts with doctrines or interpretations of the Bible. If there is some compelling finding about, say, the Jesus of history as an endtime Jewish rabbi, then this should come first, or at least people should be honest about the layer-cake nature of doctrines or how people interpret the Bible.

Older faiths have developed more maturity with time. They can sit light and worry less about how their faiths are represented. Or at least this is what we thought, as the Christian world gave rise to a secular and plural world.

There are pressures to go along a road of such as the Fellowship of Confessing Anglicans. There is a narrowing of what is legitimate expression of a faith, and there are calls for excluding those who are not biblical enough. An Anglican Communion, properly understood, would become a World Wide Anglican Church with authoritative statements handed down, with again distant high-up forms of selection of those with centralised power.

Who knows how these developments will work out. The Baha'is could not predict their own future, despite the claimed infallibility of the words of both their Manifestation of God and Centre of the Covenant. So Anglicans cannot predict theirs! Nevertheless, if secularisation and plurality lead down the road to authoritarianism and centralisation, there are going to be quite a few Anglican Communion Covenant Breakers who will continue to define the faith in a broad way, however they organise, meet and link up together.

What is Baha'i Covenant ???

“The Headless Universal House of Justice was not a teaching of Baha'u'llah, 'Abdu'l-Baha, or Shoghi Effendi. It was foisted on the Baha'is by Ruhyyih Khanum and the Conclave of the Hands with the passing of Shoghi Effendi. The inquisition of the “Hands” Baha'i faith is notorious for its severities in its prophesied oppression of the believers forbidding them from independently investigating the truth of the material of their violation of the Covenant, with the ploy, or red herring, by naming those that are faithful to the Covenant as Covenant-breakers, and thus having them shunned. By this maneuver they keep their deluded followers from using their intellect that God gave them and the principle of the “Independent Investigation of the Truth” that Baha'u'llah gave them, so to keep them ignorant Covenant-breakers, and from establishing Justice in the world.”

Dr. Leland Jensen, Establisher of the Baha'i Faith

1. The Will & Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha doesn't state that the guardian must leave a will, just that he MUST appoint his successor “within his lifetime”
2. Nowhere in the Baha'i writings is Aghsan defined as a “blood descendant”, but rather as a son from the line of Baha'u'llah. An adopted son has all the rights & privelages of a natural son, including inheritance & kingship.
3. The Hands were a non-authoritative group. They had no power after the death of Shoghi Effendi

Association of Abbas Effendi With Colonel Badri Beg

This officer was a staff Colonel and associated with military & civil functionaries. He had a beautiful step daughter, the child of his wife by former marriage, who gathered young men around her.

Colonel Badri Beg hired a house at Haifa to spend the summer season there. He attended evening parties of the French Consul and leading members of the [Arab] Christian community. They engaged themselves in gambling.

The Most Great Branch [Sir Abbas Effendi] met all the [gambling] losses of the Beg, and provided for the upkeep of the [Beg's] house, and for the expenses of the [Beg's] step daughter. Thus the step daughter came to have plenty opportunity. She became familiar with a good looking Italian man. At night they met together and indulged themselves in love affair.

Some people became aware of the affair and advised the Beg to send the family to Acre. As the Beg himself had connection with the girl, and could not send her away from him. He disregarded the advice.

Eventually the Beg came to know about the affair and this roused his jealousy. One evening the Beg detailed two soldiers to go and deliver a message to the Italian young man on behest of the girl to come & see her at night. The house was unattended. The occupant had gone to Acre. As soon as the Italian young man came into the house & seated himself in the drawing room, the two soldiers appeared at the scene, caught hold of him, strangled him to death, stuffed up his throat with a long piece of rag, took him away and cast him into the sea.

In their hurry & bustle, they did not tie a stone to his foot to keep the corpse at the bottom of the sea. In the morning his mother and relatives begun to search for the young man. Finally the young man's body was discovered near the sea shore, strangled to death.

The incident set people's tongue wagging. His mother and relatives raised a tumult in Haifa. They held Badri Beg responsible for the incident and brought an action against him and also against [Sir] Abbas Effendi because he came to Haifa after and frequented the Beg's house."

I realised that the allegation against the Most Great Branch [Sir] Abbas Effendi reflected on the whole family. By strong arguments and proof I applied myself to proving that it was impossible for him to have been involved in the matter. I called on members of the bereaved family to offer my condolences. I seized the opportunity to convince them that my brother [Sir] Abbas Effendi had not taken part at all in the matter. The mother of the deceased replied: "If he had not taken part in the matter, and had no connection with the girl, why did he take her to his own home in Acre?" I endeavoured as far as possible to exonerate the Most Great Branch [Sir] Abbas Effendi as the allegation reflected on the family as well as on Baha's name. But I did not expect that he would take her to his own house. I went to Acre to see what had happened. I enquired from the Baha'is and others. I found out that he had put up the notorious prostitute girl in his own house, the 'Abbud-House', which was the dwelling place of the Blessed Beauty [i.e. Baha], exalted be his power, before his ascension [i.e. death].

Bahai murder of Bayanis

In their effort to escape this dilemma [Husayn Ali's claim to being Him whom God will Manifest], Baha and his partisans did two things: first, they got rid of the most leading Babis who sided with Subh-e Azal; and, second, they rewrote the history of the Babi movement, largely ignoring Subh-e Azal, greatly magnifying the person and position of Baha, and degrading the Bab from the position of a Major Manifestation to that of a "forerunner" of Baha, who was the real Manifestation for the age....[therefore] those

It has been said that these assassinations were the work of the too-zealous followers of Baha, and that he was not himself responsible. However this may be, could one who possessed the divine knowledge and power to influence men which Baha claimed to have, been able to prevent such acts on the part of his intimate disciples?

At first not a few prominent Babis, including even several "Letters of the Living" and personal friends of the Bab, adhered faithfully to Subh-e Azal. One by one these disappeared, most of them, as I fear cannot be doubted, by the foul play on the part of too zealous Baha'is. "Companions" (as-hab), Mirza Riza Kulli and Mirza Nasr'ullah of Tafrish, were stabbed or poisoned in Adrianople and Acre.

Two of the "Letters of the Living," Aka Siyyid 'Ali the Arab, and Mulla Rajab 'Ali Kahir, were assassinated, the one at Tabriz, the other at Kerbela. The brother of the latter, Aka Ali Muhammad, was also murdered in Baghdad [by a Baha'i]....

It would seem the murders of Daniel Jordan and Hedi Ma'ani (and possibly others) have clear precedents in the assassinations carried out during the lifetime of Husayn Ali himself.

Ruth White's letter to the High Commissioner of Palestine

To His Excellency The High Commissioner of Palestine Jerusalem, Palestine. October 7, 1930

Your Excellency:

As a victim of a fraud, which is being perpetrated under the Mandatory Power now governing Palestine, I wish to make a complaint against Shoghi Effendi, of the Persian Colony, at Haifa Palestine.

Shoghi Effendi is collecting money from the people of the various nations of the world under the powers granted him in an alleged will which he claims is the will of Sir Abdul-Baha Abbas, and in which he is appointed successor of Sir Abdu-Baha Abbas I base my assertion that a fraud is being perpetrated by Shoghi Effendi on the following facts:

About three months after the death of Sir Abdul-Baha Abbas, in November 1921, typewritten copies of an English translation of a document were sent to England, America, and other countries, which Shoghi Effendi alleged is the will of Sir Abdul-Baha Abbas, appointing him his successor. This alleged will is undated, unwitnessed, unprobated, and unstamped by the Government. It also contradicts the intent that its alleged maker held during his lifetime. for the alleged will commands people to obey Shoghi Effendi as if he were God, and to pay a tax to him. This is the motive of the fraud—money and power (2)....

Promised one of Islam and Bahai Faith

By Dr. Habib Siddiqui

Before I confront the Bahai view on the above subject, as presented by Babak Mohajerin, let me give a brief account of this religion how it started in order that Muslims have a fair understanding of what it stands for and why its understanding of certain explicit verses in the Qur'an are different than Muslims. (References are also cited for proof.)

In the middle of the 19th century, Mirza Ali Muhammad Shirazi, an Iranian claimed to be the agent and Bab (door) of the awaited Imam Mahdi. He had a small following, and the sect came to be known as Babieh (Babism). After a short while, he claimed himself to be the awaited Imam (1), and later as a prophet and the bringer of a new religion (2). He was not emotionally balanced, and as such, later claimed Godhood (3). In Resalah LeL-Thamarah (Treatise for fruit), he wrote:

“Truly I am certainly God: there is no God other than me. I am unique and single. Truly I am God, there is no God other than me – the eternal Lord, truly I am that very God and there is no God other than me who is unique and single. In the name of God who prevents and who is holy and pure, in praise of You my God, truly I call You and all things to witness that You are truly God and there is no God other than You.”

For his contradictory statements he was often times confronted by the Ulema in Iran. He would usually repent and renounce his claim (4). His apparent insanity saved his life in more than one occasions (5). His writings for the illiterate laymen had some effect among the Babis, and they rioted against the government in some cities. In Isfahan, the rioters were aided by Governor Manucher Khan Gurji, a Russian of Armenian christian origin (6). Both the British and the Russian embassies were directly involved in these riots by aiding the Babis (7). Amir Kabir, the Grand Vizier, realizing that so long as the Bab was alive, his followers would not stop their rioting, executed him (5).

After Bab's death, the Babis were led by Mirza Yahya Noori, known as Sobh-e-Azal (the eternal dawn). After an unsuccessful attempt to kill the Shah, the group was persecuted. Yahya fled to Baghdad, while his step-brother, Mirza Husein Ali took shelter in the Russian embassy. Later, Husein was escorted to Baghdad by the official agents of the Iranian and Russian governments (8). Mirza Husein Ali sent a tablet to Russian emperor, praising and praying for him, confirming total servitude and expressing thanks (9). The latter allowed the Babis to construct a temple in south of Russia in AeshqAbad and in its attempt to crush the Islamic government provided all help to the Babis (22). In Baghdad, where the Babis became Ottoman subjects, a serious fight broke out among them as to the issue of leadership of the community, since many forged the handwriting of Bab, claiming to be his successor. This and other clashes with Iraqi Muslims brought about a state of total chaos (10). The Ulema in Iraq wanted the Ottoman government to deport Babis for creating a total anarchy. Then the Babis were first moved to Istanbul and later to Edirne. When Mirza Husein claimed to be the successor of Bab, the Babis got divided into two opposing camps, each led by one of the step-brothers – Mirza Husein or Mirza Yahya. With the unending riots and connections which the Babis held with the foreign embassies opposed to the Ottoman government, the latter exiled the followers of Yahya to Cyprus and those of Husein to Aaka in Palestine (11).

When the support for Yahya's followers from the foreign governments diminished, the group gradually dispersed and vanished. Husein Ali was always able to keep in touch and get the support from foreign governments. He claimed the title of “Bahauallah” (the beauty of God) and described the Bab as the harbinger of his own emergence. Soon he gained full control over the Babis and founded the creed of Baha'ism. Like Bab before him, he first claimed prophethood (12) and then Godship (13). Meanwhile, he was receiving monthly salaries from the Czar (14).

After his death in Aaka, his son, Mirza Abbas (known as Abbas Afandi) succeeded as leader of the Baha'is and called himself Abdul-Baha (the servant of Baha).

When the communist revolution started asserting itself in early 20th century, Russian govt. stopped its support for the Bahais.

Facing numerous difficulties, Abdul Baha then approached the British government offering to spy for them against the dying Ottoman empire (15).

During the first World War and the aggressive entry of the British Army into Palestine under the generalship of Allenbee, the Bahais provided all possible help to the invaders.

Learning this, Jamal Pasha, the Commander of the Ottoman forces, wanted to execute Abdul Baha for treason (16). Lord Balfour, the architect for the infamous Balfour declaration, the then British Foreign Secretary, ordered Gen. Allenbee to protect the life of Abdul Baha and his followers (17). Later, in a formal ceremony knighthood was granted to Abdul-Baha (18).

Sir Abbas Affendi's funeral was personally attended by several British dignitaries, including Sir Herbert Samuel – the British Chief Commissioner in Palestine, who was one of the founders of the Zionist state of Israel.

In accordance with Abbas's will, the leadership came under his grandson, Showqi Afandi. He, too, helped realize the goals of British colonialism.

And within a short period Baha'ism spread all over U.K. and its colonies, esp. Uganda (19). Showqi's contacts with the colonizers helped Bahaism to spread in U.S.A. and other parts of the world.

He revived the intricate network of Free-masonry at a lower level in the form of Baha'ism, by offering the myth of “one world religion.” (23)

Having no son and nearing his death, Showqi appointed nine Bahais to constitute the Intl. Council of Bahaism and laid the foundation for the Baitul Adal A'azam (the Universal House of Justice) or the Administrative Organization of World's Bahais.

After his death, as per his will, Charles Mason Rini, an American, with probable CIA connections was appointed the head of Baitul Adal (20).

At present, with the power, money and conspiracies of world colonialism, Bahaism has fully committed itself to fulfill the dream of the world devouring powers to acquire global domination.

As I have shown above, Baha'ism from its very inception was helped, materially and ideologically, by the Russian and British imperialism for furthering the latter's onslaught in Muslim lands. At a difficult period in Muslim history, Bahaism collaborated with the Zionists for the establishment of state of Israel (21). Through its connection with Zionists it penetrated various governments serving the interest of the West, a notable example is: Iran under the Shah (23).

This servitude for the western masters, in turn, brought nothing but misery, poverty, strangulation, stagnation, murder, oppression, tyranny and whole-sale dependence, to the Muslim nation.

It can also be noticed that Baha'ism, like Ahmedi/Qadianism, started with its founder's claim to be the awaited Imam Mahdi, which later developed into the claim for prophethood and divinity. (These groups do not accept the finality of Muhammad's prophethood.) Muslims, based on the sahih ahadith of Muhammad (SAWS), do expect the coming of Imam Mahdi (a descendant of Muhammad (SAWS); he will NOT be a Prophet since Muhammad (SAWS) is the LAST of the Prophets; he will follow the shariah of Islam) towards the end of time. He will come at a time when Muslims will be in a dire need to find a leader to lead them against forces which will try to extinguish Islam from the earth. He will lead the Muslims to victory, and establish justice. This expectation manifests itself into protests against oppression and injustice, and Muslims alone, unlike any other religious community on earth, have never been totally succumbed to the evil forces. Colonization was imposed upon our territories, from Morocco to Indonesia, yet, we never embraced the very dehumanization as a result of such process, and always resisted occupation, aggression and exploitation in our territories. The sacrifice of Muslims in Algeria, Libya, Indian sub-continent, Indonesia, the Sudan, Somalia, and more recently in Afghanistan, Palestine and Bosnia are only a few of the examples in that road to combating subjugation and foreign tyranny. Muslims have always tried to negate existing unjust conditions imposed upon the world by despots, whose weapons were force, money and deceit. This resistance of Muslims has always discomforted the enemies of Islam. In their attempt to weaken the very fabric of Islam, these enemies from without have always sought people from within who would distort the teachings of Islam. These enemies of Islam know (knew) that if they could create false Mahdis among Muslims, who instead of calling for jihad commands his followers to be puppets of the oppressors, then there will be no interruption to their exploitation. Hopes and dreams of Muslims will give away to despair, cowardice, lethargy and dependency.

As a result of this conspiracy, in the last century alone, we find three claimants to be Imam Mahdi, e.g., Ali Muhammad Shirazi, Mirza Husein Ali and Mirza Golam Ahmed of Qadian, each of whom were supported by colonial powers of the West. None of these three, in turn, ever launched a Jihad movement against the colonizers. Instead, they acted as stooges for foreign forces, which were hostile to Islam. Baha'i leaders even spied against the Khilafah and collaborated with Zionists.

It is inconceivable that this deviant group would have as much success without the moral and financial support from the enemies of Islam. As a matter of fact, Baha'ism proved to be the colonialists' most fruitful investment. Through its teachings, it offers a version of religion which is self-contradictory, deceitful, nonsensical and ludicrous. Despite its leaders' own servitude to foreign masters, their irrelevant verbiage about not participating in politics for nominal Bahais increase the stranglehold of Taghut over the subdued people, and fulfill the long-term objectives of its financiers.

In their wishful dream about creating a world religion that encompasses all the various religions (from polytheistic religions like Hinduism to monotheistic religions like Islam) the leaders of the Baha'i faith over last several decades have written books which are self-contradictory. While the Qur'an and ahadith of Muhammad (SAWS) are very clear that all the scriptures (including the Bible) except the Qur'an has been corrupted by human hands, the Bahais, in order to curry support from Christians, appear to give the impression that they believe in the pseudographic books of the New Testament, and that they accept the authenticity of the gospel accounts about Jesus's crucifixion. We, Muslims, don't have to butter someone in order to accept our views. The matter concerning Jesus is settled, as far as we are concerned.

With the death of imperialism, today, neo-colonialism tries hard, through invented, deviated sects to alter and metamorphose the face of Islam and eliminate the main elements which comprise the revolutionary character of this great religion. They scheme and Allah schemes. Surely, Allah is the Best of the schemers. May Allah keep us on the road of guidance and save us from falsehood, no matter, under whatever disguise it comes. Ameen.

Anti-Persian Racism in Bahai writings

“Most” Bahais, have hidden hatred and anti-Persian feelings. I wondered what the source of these were and alas I came to a few quotes from Abdu'l-Baha, son of Bahullah and according to Bahauallah, “the interpreter” of his writings and Bahaism.

1) Comparing people who chose not to have a so called “educator”, AbdulBaha states:

“... notice that when the animal is trained it becomes domestic, and also that man, if he is left without education, becomes bestial, and, moreover, if left under the rule of nature, becomes lower than animal, whereas if he is educated he becomes an angel.”

This clearly shows what Abdulbaha thinks of uneducated class of people. He sees them “lower than animal”. Surely a holy word should not contain and compare “uneducated people” to “lower than animal”. This sentence has indications of racial (class) supremacy, since Bahauallah himself was a rich merchant and did not perceive that humans at some point were not educated and they grew on their own, by nature and evolution. In Persian we say “tavAnA bovad harke dAnA bovad, ze dAnesh dele pir bornA bovad” (powerful is he who has knowledge, and knowledge keeps the heart of an old man young). Tell me which is more elegant?

The saying by Hafëz, encouraging people to learn, or the saying by Abdulbaha putting down the uneducated.

2) In another racist statement, giving his version of the period during Islam, Abdulbaha states:

“These Arab tribes were in the lowest depth of savagery and barbarism, and in comparison with them the savages of Africa and wild Indians of America were as advanced as Plato... even down to the present time Arabs dread having daughters”

Nowhere in any holy book has God ever put one race down as compared with another. Yet this is what Abdulbaha, the interpreter of Baha, does to tell his side of story and write what is to become Bahai Faith. Interesting points to note here are that Abdulbaha considers arab tribes as the “lowest depth of savagery and barbarism”.

Interestingly that is what Hitler said about Jews. Abdulbaha fails to consider that Arabs and Persians for their time (1400 years ago), were far ahead of Europeans.

Another interesting point to note is that Abdulbaha seemed to know about American Indians savagery, 1000 years before they became in contact with the rest of the world! Further interesting point is that he compares cultural issues of the Arab tribes with “Pluto”. I wonder what the relation is here! Is a holy representative of a holy prophet, giving holy writings, supposed to issue such statements and use a European astronomer as his idol of culture and values?

Notice, later on Abdulbaha states that even today (130 years ago) “Arabs dread having daughters”. A nice generalization by a man claiming to represent the will of God!

3) Speaking about Bab, the founder of Babism and thus Bahaism, AbdulBaha states:

I found these statements to be hateful of a culture that reject an illogical cult and banished its founder. This statement as was written in chapter eight of the book “some answered questions”, is used as a guide and reference to history by Bahais. Mr. Abdul, I am a Persian and a proud one, and I am not a “religious fanatic”! Interestingly enough it was only a few days ago that a bahai criticized me for generalizing them and saying “they are racists”. Well they may not be racists themselves, but they surely are followers of a racist cult which teaches racism.

4) Abdulbaha also states about coming of Bahauallah:

“Baha`u'llah appeared at a time when the Persian Empire was immersed in profound obscurantism and ignorance and lost in the blindest fanaticism. In the European histories, no doubt, you have read detailed accounts of the morals, customs and ideas of the Persians during the last centuries.”

Oh.. how nice that when people reject him they “must” be ignorant!

I, as a reader, thought that this view of Persian culture was very similar to that of Betty Mahmoodi, who saw the sacrifice of a lamb by Iranians, before a feast, as a “barbaric act and custom”! I suppose had Abdulbaha been alive today, he would have used Betty Mahmoodi as an example and proof too! I also wonder why Abdulbaha thinks that Persians were savage, when people in the far east thought so highly of them. Surely what is represented here is views of Europeans, looking down on Middle Eastern countries, something that is used today in Bahaism as basic writings of their religion.

Amazingly it is stated in the book that :

“The Persian character has ever been fertile in device and indifferent to suffering; and in the field of judicial executions it has found ample scope for the exercise of both attainments.”

It is interesting to see how the “Persian character” is put down in this introductory paragraph of the book. The statement, as it stands, is pure racism and indicative of resentment of the Bahai Universal House of Justice towards the Persian culture which forced the cult out and withstood its assimilation plans.

As it was seen from view paragraphs of Bahai writings, from their holiest of people, they indeed are not what they claim to be. And their cult has hidden racism within its boundaries designed to appeal to the Europeans and Westerners, to gain support and power. this has further been proven by postings by Frederick Glayser and other Bahais on SCI.

The holey Baha'i Covenant

“Yeah I never understood the splinter groups obsession with continuing the guardianship.”

Just finished reading William Garlington's The Baha'i Faith in America, it explains a lot about this obsession.

And Abdu'l-Baha' being infallible couldn't have erred in this, couldn't have been wrong, could he? For some it became obvious that for the Guardianship to end would mean that they would as well have to admit to, accept, Abdu'l-Baha's humanity, Abdu'l-Baha's fallibility, some Baha'is couldn't go there, most are still in denial.

T

Mason was intellectually honest enough to understand what the implications were of the Will and Testament of Abdu'l-Baha' being shown to be imperfect, shown to be a merely human document in no way perfectly, 'infallibly', divine. Thus the Hands decided to take control over the affairs of the Baha'i Faith even though they had no authority to proceed in that manner. What these Baha'i elites did was behave as religious elites usually do, ignore the masses of believers and do what they personally choose to do without consulting with those masses. A more democratic, dare I say more spiritual way to proceed would have been to go to the greater Baha'i community itself and see what Baha'is themselves thought, what Baha'is themselves believed.

Obviously these religious elites didn't trust the masses of Baha'i believers, didn't feel that they were capable or worthy of collectively deciding for themselves the direction their religion should take.

How many Baha'is know about the secret conclave in Bahji in 1957?

How many Baha'is are aware that the Persian Hands of the Cause held a secret conclave during the night of November 19th, 1957, in the Mansion of Baha'u'llah in Bahji?

The Persian Hands of the Cause stayed in Bahji after the first conclave of all of the Hands held on November 19th, 1957, while the non-Persian Hands of the Cause returned to Haifa for the night. During that night, Nov. 19th, 1957, the Persian Hands, alone, held their own private secret conclave and made a secret covenant amongst themselves to declare the Will and Testament of "Abdu'l-Baha" to be "Badah", an Islamic term meaning 'God has changed His Mind'. They made such a covenant despite the fact that only a Holy Manifestation of God has Authority to declare that God has changed His Mind such as the occasion when His Holiness, Muhammad, changed the Qiblah from Jerusalem to Mecca. On November 20th, 1957, when the non-Persian Hands had returned to Bahji to continue the conclave that all the Hands together had commenced the day before, it became obvious after a few opening sentences that such a secret covenant had been endorsed by the Persian Hands of the Cause, when the youngest Hand, Dr Mujahir, leapt to his feet to make the "Badah" declaration.

The other Hands then spoke in support of that declaration with one notable exception.

Not wishing to make an outright declaration to all Baha'is Earthwide that they had declared the Will and Testament of the Master to be null and void for fear of causing intense distress amongst multitudes of Baha'i believers, the administrators in Haifa from that date, November 20th, 1957 onward to the moment of this writing have embraced the policy of outwardly declaring the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha' to be the Foundation for the Administration of the New World Order, while simultaneously neglecting or rejecting its vital and sacred decrees, including the sacred and immutable decrees concerning the sacred Institutions delineated by the Master in His Will, namely the Guardianship, the Interpreter of Baha'i Holy Writ, and the Institution of the Hands of the Baha'i Faith. Shamelessly, they seek to pursue administration without any of those sacred Institutions which were established to continue for the duration of the 1000 years of the Baha'i Dispensation. When asked to explain which qualifications a man or woman must possess in order to be considered a true Baha'i believer, Shoghi Effendi, the first of our Guardians wrote: "...loyal and steadfast adherence to every clause of our Beloved's sacred Will...", amongst the requirements.

"...every clause..."

An Examination of Suppression and Distortion in 20th Century Baha'i Literature

Professor Browne's observation that "the more the Baha'i doctrine spreads...the more ...the original Babi movement is obscured and distorted," cannot be taken too literally, but it is quite certain from the foregoing examination that Baha'i institutions and Baha'i authors have continued to rewrite history up to the present time.

Popular writers, such as Hatcher and Martin, have distorted the history of the movement by producing pious, inaccurate records which rely heavily upon orthodox works, while virtually ignoring important research by both Baha'i and non-Baha'i scholars.

Through the questionable practice of revising previously published books, the views of deceased authors have been corrected and brought into conformity with modern perceptions and dogma. And, through the process of literature review, future publications will be regulated and kept within the boundaries of orthodoxy.

There is not sufficient reason to conclude that there is a well orchestrated conspiracy on the part of the Baha'i Administration, in which these three practices are coordinated to completely overhaul the history of the movement. But, it is safe to conclude that, since the Baha'i Faith began spreading westward at the turn of the century, there has been a tendency on the part of Baha'i individuals and institutions to distort or suppress historical data. And, unless Baha'is are granted more freedom in expressing their views and more pressure is placed upon the Baha'i Administration through the research, concern and efforts of those outside the Faith, there is no reason to believe that this ongoing revision and rewriting will cease in the near future.

Was Baha'ullah a Prophet or Imposter??!

Courtesy : <http://www.angelfire.com/journal/baha/bahastatus.html>

In Islam, worship of Prophet Muhammed (PBUH) is one of the gravest sins you can commit. Muslims don't like being called 'Muhammeddars' as they believe that it gives the wrong impression that they worship the Holy Prophet (PBUH). Now (some of the) Bahais try to imitate this by telling others not to call their religion 'Bahaism' as they say it is same as calling Islam- Muhammedanism. They say that the right word for their religion is 'Bahai faith'. On the look of it everything looks fine. But one has to remember that all that glitters is not gold. Let us look at some of the facts and Bahai beliefs and decide whether it is the same as in the case of Islam or not.

Well, the answer is not that simple, we better let the Bahais answer this question for they themselves are very much confused about the station of Bahauallah. Sometimes he is spoken of as God himself & sometimes as a Prophet of God (They both aren't the same, are they?). I will merely reproduce here a few of his writings and let the Bahais account for this.

Bahauallah initially claimed to be a Prophet beside the other hundred and one claims. But later on after he knew that he had enough following, he came up & claimed divinity. The following is the first so called revelation that Prophet part of Bahauallah is supposed to have received when he was in prison-

'During the days I lay in the prison of Teheran, though the galling weight of the chains and the stench-filled air allowed Me but little sleep, still in those infrequent moments of slumber I felt as if something flowed from the crown of My head over My breast, even as a mighty torrent that precipitated itself upon the earth from the summit of a lofty mountain. Every limb of My body would, as a result, be set afire. At such moments My tongue recited what no man could bear to hear.

To the non Bahais who are new to the faith, Bahauallah is portrayed only as a Prophet. There are several websites on the net which try to prove to the world the prophethood of Bahauallah. It is however strange that he is also considered as God. Here are a few quotations where Bahauallah declares his divinity.

1. "There is no God but I the Honored, the Wise". – Kitab al Aqdas pg 43
2. "Accept whatever is commanded by Baha (himself) the Lord of Eternity". -kitab al aqdas pg 144
3. "All praise is for you O Bahauallah, the Creator of existence". -Al mubeen pg 34
4. "Obey the commands of your Elevated, Splendorous God, Bahauallah -Al Mubeen pg 190
5. "You Most beneficent Lord, Bahauallah", Al Mubeen 297

The truth is revealed!. In all the above verses Bahauallah is clearly claiming divinity for himself here.

The Bahais even turn towards the shrine of Bahauallah when they offer prayers. Just listen to this statement in the Badaae ul Asaar of Abdul Baha-

6. Bahauallah is unique, Incomparable. It is necessary for everyone to turn towards Bahauallah in his prayers.

Even more revealing is this statement of Bahauallah in a letter to his son Abdul Baha- 7. "This is a letter from Allah, the Honoured and the Wise (Bahauallah) to Allah the Gracious, the Aware (Abdul Baha)."

This statement really shocked me when I read it. But the one statement which is most hurting to a Muslim is in the Kitab ul Aqdas where Bahauallah writes-

"A lot of requests and supplications from my followers reached 'My' Arsh wherein they have asked many questions from me. Thereupon Baha has revealed Epistles upon them. there was a request for revealing the Ahkam (Laws). But due to some wisdom, I withheld My pen and did not accede to their requests. Having received innumerable such requests from them, I have now acceded to their requests so that their hearts may remain alive".

We have seen above that initially Bahauallah made less dramatic claims as he didn't have the necessary following. Only after his popularity & following grew did he publicly declare himself divine. We must also note that his claims grew bolder as time passed.

The divine status of Bahauallah is a fact of Bahai faith which is cleverly hidden from the non Bahai. This is clearly a deceptive tactic used by the Bahais. But those people who hide these facts must remember that they cannot hide the truth forever.

Jacques Soghomonian's Ridvan 1999 Letter to Haifan "UHJ"

TO THE INTERNATIONAL SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY IN HAIFA

Whatever happens, the will of God will be established.

Our intention is simply to explain why the Baha'i believers under Shoghi Effendi continue to believe in the succession of the Guardians, conforming to the Covenant of God.

Shoghi Effendi was faithful in all aspects relating to the development of the Faith. He took on his responsibilities as Guardian, realizing his objectives of translating the works of Baha'u'llah and Abdu'l-Baha' from Arabic to Persian into English, and then into French.

His labor (one should rather say life's work...) and his Office were in fulfillment of the prophecies announced in the Bible "a little child will lead them."

The installation of the administrative order structures and their operation, contribute to the development of the faith.

This administrative order must not be a substitute for the spiritual values [in our Faith], but must rather be the vehicle for Bahai Thought – borne from the spirituality released from the teachings of Baha'u'llah in all their profundity, in all their loftiness. You have, and we have; supported in totality all that Shoghi Effendi has translated, written and given [to us] as counsels; commands and references.

It is thus unthinkable, even impossible, that you could accept on the one hand Shoghi Effendi's handiwork, and roll back or cancel – making forbidden – everything that relates to the principle of the Guardianship and its succeeding lineage of Guardians.

Shoghi Effendi's strategy was very clear, and it becomes forever clear once he openly proclaims, in 1951, the creation of the first embryonic International Council as "the most significant milestone in evolution of Administrative Order of the Faith of Baha'u'llah in course of last thirty years."

Shoghi Effendi forwarded this proclamation by telegram to all the national spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i World. You know perfectly well its contents... This body was to become developed in the future through the election of the Universal House of Justice. He specified the principal structure of this body, by appointing its officers and its President.

Shoghi Effendi was conscious of the necessity of preserving the Guardianship in conformity with Gods Covenant and the Will and Testament of Abdul-Baha, translated by Shoghi himself.

These documents (The Kitab-i-Ahd and the Will and Testament) were read and accepted by thousands of Baha'i believers.

The circumstances surrounding the sudden death of Shoghi Effendi, and the consequences of the events which followed, have led you into ways that are contrary to the Faith...

But in the name of blood lineage you have openly declared the Guardianship ended and forbidden...without taking into account the fact that when a Guardian is named by the living Guardian, he acquires the force and the strength, the spiritual edification, to uphold the Covenant.

By doing this, you have become the first violators of the Baha'i Faith since the time of the Hands of the Cause. You had the responsibility and the duty of following, through your work, the path prepared by Shoghi Effendi.

As for you, Ruhiyyih Rabbani, although you served your Guardian in a dignified way, [and] wrote marvelous books about him, yet without any prerogative you went against the decisions of Shoghi Effendi.

Shoghi Effendi's position as Guardian – although there is no comparison of his station with [the supremely greater stations] of the three central figures of the faith – was a station of supremacy. He was assisted by the power of the Covenant and his hands were not in the least bit chained.

He transmitted to all the believers, which included the Hands of the Cause, who were supposed to be at his service, the essence of spiritual life.

Under the terms presented – and it matters not the number of years since 1957-1960 – you have failed in your duty to protect the integrity of the Faith. You are responsible for your actions. NO ONE CAN GO AGAINST THE TESTAMENT AND COVENANT OF GOD DEFINED BY THE INVIOABLE TEXTS.

If you reject this letter today, know that:

The establishment of the Baha'i World Charter, which rests on the two pillars, the guardianship and the Universal House of Justice (as defined in the Dispensation of Baha'u'llah by Shoghi Effendi) will be realized, not by my will, but by that of Baha'u'llah.

In the days and years that pass, through the power of the Covenant, you will be rejected for your disobedience, like the foam along the edge of the shore that's cast out by the sea, although you may be on Sacred Ground and benefit from the presence of the three Central Figures of the Faith, as well as from the spiritual essence radiated from Mount Carmel (that doesn't belong to you, but to the Bab, Baha'u'llah, and Abdu'l-Baha), where the believers on pilgrimage receive the waves of true life.

Reconsider your attitude when you gather together at the International Spiritual Assembly and take into account the non-conformity of the present situation.

No matter what you decide and do, the truth will explode when the time arrives and the principle of the guardianship is established again.

Reflect: “An error multiplied does not become the truth...”

Your present attitude has led the believers down a path inconsistent with the Covenant, and is not within the straight line taught by Shoghi Effendi.

However, you have nevertheless developed humane ways, and that is good. But the World Charter of Baha’u’llah rests on the spiritual establishment of that which you have under-estimated, which are the spiritual essentials of the faith, provided for by the Guardianship.

I leave you to your proper reflection.

How Cults Work ??

Cults, wonderful on the outside but on the inside are very manipulating. Cult leaders are desperate to trick you into joining. They are after your obedience, your time and your money.

Cults use sophisticated mind control and recruitment techniques that have been refined over time. To spot a cult you need to know how they work and you need to understand the techniques they use.

Teaching you these things is what this article is all about. This article exposes the secret techniques cults will use to try and trick and control you. Cult leaders will not want you to read this, but read it anyway. Once you understand you will be better able to spot and avoid cult recruiters, and protect your family and friends.

Query over Baha'u'llah's station !

How can the Bahai Faith say that all of the Manifestations of God have absolute equality among them and in another statement Baha'u'llah is the Supreme Manifestation of God. Surely this is a total contradiction. How can one be equal and supreme at the same time.

“According to Bahá'u'lláh , all of the Manifestations of God have the same metaphysical nature and the same spiritual stature. There is absolute equality among Them. No one of Them is superior to another. <http://www.bahai.org/article-1-4-0-3.html>

No prophet in the same Category as Baha'u'llah. “there are no prophets, so far in the same Category as Baha'u'llah, as he culminates a great cycle begun with Adam”. (From a letter written on behalf of the Guardian to the NSA of Australia and New Zealand, December 26, 1941 Letter from the Guardian to Australia and New Zealand, p. 41)

No 1551 Baha'u'llah has appeared in God's Greatest name.

” By Greatest name is meant that Baha'u'llah has appeared in Gods greatest name , in other words, that He is the Supreme Manifestation of God”

There are many logical contradictions that try the faith of Baha'is who are just trying to be faithful but are hampered by these logical absurdities. This is only one of many and not the main one that seems to have been ignored by the community as a whole.

Unfortunately, and maybe it only concerns westerners who place a higher value on logic and reason, one can only find meaning in these declarations of doctrine by having to fall back to viewing them as just hyperbole.

Here is another query regarding Baha'u'llah's station. In this tablet the Manifestation even allows for himself to be seen from two views. But he then forbids anyone to argue over his station. There are some Baha'is who believe Baha'u'llah is God himself.

More Confusions :

Was not the Bab the fulfillment of the Shi'ite Islamic doctrine the coming of the Mahdi (the hidden Imam).

But where does the Bab fit into the Christian prophesy to fulfill the station of the second coming of Christ?

If Both the Bab and Baha'u'llah are equally the “Second coming of Christ” then they both must equally be the Mahdi and the hidden Imam also?

But if Baha'u'llah is the a “Supreme Manifestation of God” as is stated in the “light of Guidance” he then holds a superior station than the Bab.

Comments on Rise of Apostasies from Baha'i Faith!!

Greetings,

I have noticed for the past few years on the Internet the rise in the number of people leaving bahaism. I have seen about 30 people since 1998 leave bahaism, not including the manmore people who left bahaism I came across on the Internet.

I would like for ex bahais to explain why they left the bahai cult and what they believe is the future of bahaism.

First Comment :

I became a Baha'i while in college. My roommate was a member and I was always impressed with his demeanor. I began participating in the community and learned the Faith's basic principles – the basics about the Bab, Bahau'llah, Abdul Baha, the Guardianship, equality between men and women, unity of religion, etc. – before I declared.

The second reason is somewhat related to the first: I did not feel I knew enough about the Faith to go out and "teach." I am a firm believer in learning as much as you can about a topic if you want to talk about it and be credible. In hindsight, I am convinced I'm correct about this. Many of the questions I was asked about the Faith after I dropped out I would not have been able to answer beyond "Huh? HEEEEELP!!!"

Less than a year after I declared, I graduated from college and moved away. Far away. The Baha'i community I joined was also very "interested" in teaching. That, and the fact that I no longer had any of the familiar faces around me eventually made me lose interest in participating.

Imagine my shock and surprise when I started seeing on the Internet the reports about Bahai's being driven out of the Faith under alleged threats of being declared Covenant Breakers(I will use "alleged" because there appears to be only a he-said-he-said record of the things that transpired). Thanks to the 'net, I discovered that an innocent e-mail (the infamous Majnun post) triggered the irrational ire and fury of the powers that were. Thanks to the 'net, I found "A Modest Proposal," and to this day I do not know what about that document was so controversial that drove many to rebuke and condemn it instead of opening a discussion with its authors. And I also learned of others who, like me, dropped out because Baha'i life did not satisfy them spiritually.

What does the future hold for the Baha'i Faith? I don't know. What I do know is that most people don't join a religion because they want to be engaged doing material things like temples and arches, but to find a way to connect with God. Until the Baha'i Faith understands that, it will be a steady-state religion, with new converts taking the place of disillusioned ones.

El Loco

Second Comment :

I left it because I realized it is indeed a cult for the reasons stated here over the past three and a half years. As for its future: at this rate it has none other than how long its elite "investors" and financial benefactors decide to prolong its existence. Among its core constituency, many children of Iranian Baha'is are walking away completely from it in droves, and not just in the West, because it really does not have much to offer anyone anymore other family ties and the like. In terms of new enrollments it is completely stagnant. In a hundred years time or less, other than a footnote to history, unless there are radical internal reforms within (which seem unlikely, as the religion has completely straitjacketed itself doctrinally going back to its founders), baha'ism will in all likelihood disappear from the stage of history, just as Manichaeism did before it. In short, I believe baha'ism is well into its process of implosion.

Theology banned in the Baha'i Faith?

Professor Juan Cole, February 23, 1999:

“There is nothing to be puzzled by. Right wing Baha'is only like to hear the sound of their own voices (which are the only voices they will admit to being “Baha'i” at all). Obviously, the world is so constructed that they cannot in fact only hear their own voices. They are forced to hear other voices that differ from theirs. This most disturbs them when the voices come from enrolled Baha'is or when the voices speak of the Baha'i faith. The way they sometimes deal with the enrolled Baha'is is to summon them to a heresy inquiry and threaten them with being shunned if they do not fall silent. With non-Baha'is or with ex-Baha'is, they deal with their speech about the faith by backbiting, slandering and libelling the speaker. You will note that since I've been on this list I have been accused of long-term heresy, of “claiming authority,” of out and out lying (though that was retracted, twice), of misrepresentation, of ‘playing fast and loose with the facts,’ and even of being ‘delusional.’ I have been accused of all these falsehoods by Baha'is, by prominent Baha'is. I have been backbitten by them. This shows that all the talk about the danger a sharp tongue can do, all the talk about the need for harmony, for returning poison with honey, for a sin-covering eye, is just talk among right wing Baha'is. No one fights dirtier than they when they discover a voice they cannot silence and cannot refute...”

From Mission Problems in New Persia, 1926, p. 83, 87 and 89 quoted by William McElwee Miller in The Baha'i Faith: It's History and Teachings, 1973, p. 289.

“...There is no conscience with them [i.e. the Baha'is], they keep to no principle, they tell you what is untrue, ignoring or denying undoubted historical facts, and this is the character of both the leader and the led...As to morality and honesty, the whole system has proved disappointing...I have been in contact with many Baha'is, and have had dealings with many and have tested many, and unfortunately I have met not a single one who could be called honest or faithful in the full sense of these words...”

Weaknesses in the Religion of Baha'i

An Impersonal and Unknowable God

In Baha'i, God is impersonal and unknowable. In Christianity, God is the believer's Father. Jesus spoke of God using a familiar, intimate term, "Abba," which means, "Daddy." The Muslim and the Baha'i know nothing of this intimacy.

No Assurance of Salvation

In Baha'i, it is impossible to know whether or not you are spared from judgment and will go to the Paradise of God. Christians can know that we are forgiven and going to heaven (1 John 5:11-13). This knowledge is based not on our merit but on the mercy of God to all who will trust Christ as their sin-bearer. Apart from biblical Christianity which focuses on Christ's death, burial, and resurrection in payment for our sins, no religion, no philosophy, no program on earth has really dealt with man's sin problem. To the Baha'i, the Christian believer's claim of assurance of salvation is presumptuous. But this is a typical reaction of all non-Christian religions and cults because they all teach a program of works with no assurance of salvation.

Is the Baha'i God fickle and changeable?—

Why are many "manifestations of God" necessary? According to the Bible, God never changes (He is the same yesterday, today, and tomorrow, Heb. 13:8), and human nature doesn't change or evolve. The Baha'i faith, however, holds that the manifestations were given because of different needs in different times of human history. It also teaches that after enough time has passed mankind has learned sufficiently from one cycle and needs to grow and be stretched by a new "manifestation of God."

Was Baha'u'llah an opportunist or a manifestation of God?

How is it believable that the manifestation of Baha'u'llah followed that of the Bab by less than twenty years? Could mankind have grown, progressed, and mastered his teachings so rapidly? Hardly. For one thing, few outside of Middle East had even heard of the Bab and his new religion. Furthermore, the Bab himself had predicted that the next manifestations after him would be many years (1,511 and 2,001 years) in the future.⁽¹⁸⁾ Note that he mentioned two manifestations. No wonder many of the Babis were surprised and rejected Baha'u'llah's claim.

There are many facts that we could cover, but this information in this essay is sufficient to show the open-minded person that the religion of Baha'i has some real credibility problems. There are, however, many noble-minded, sweet people in this cult who deserve to hear the truth in love and gentleness so they can be free from the grip of this false religion.

In a chapter on Baha'i from his book The Kingdom of the Cults, Walter Martin summarized in sad and melancholy fashion the emptiness of the Baha'i faith:

Bahai Professor, Wife Accused of Defrauding NASA of Hundreds of Thousands of Taxpayer Dollars

Samim Anghaie is a Iranian-born professor who directs an institute that researches the use of nuclear power in space. He and his wife, Sousan, run a Gainesville-based company, New Era Technology, that conducts research for NASA. As of Wednesday, neither Anghaie nor his wife had been arrested, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Tallahassee said.

UF suspended Samim Anghaie after the FBI searched his campus office Wednesday. A warrant alleges money from NASA was diverted from New Era into the accounts of Samim, Sousan and their sons, Ali and Hamid.

The alleged scheme "diverted hundreds of thousands of dollars of illegally obtained government funds from their corporate bank account to their personal bank accounts," according to the warrant.

Since December 1999, New Era was awarded 13 government contracts with NASA, the U.S. Air Force and the U.S. Department of Energy. The agencies deposited nearly $3.4 million into the company's account, according to the warrant.

The money was allegedly used to buy six vehicles ranging from a 2005 Toyota Sienna to 2009 Subaru and homes in Gainesville, Connecticut, Fort Lauderdale and Tampa. Some money was used to buy stocks and the proceeds to buy land in Alachua County, the warrant alleges.

The warrants allowed agents with the FBI and NASA to seize the vehicles, properties and family's multiple bank accounts. Tallahassee-based assistant U.S. Attorney Karen Rhew said no arrests were made but declined to discuss the case.

"What we can say about an ongoing investigation is very limited," she said.

UF spokesman Steve Orlando said Anghaie was suspended with pay pending the results of the case.

"We're cooperating with their investigation," Orlando said.

Samim Anghaie, 59, is director of UF's Innovative Nuclear Space Power and Propulsion Institute. A search of his office in the UF Nuclear Science Building started around 8 a.m. and lasted until mid-afternoon.

Anghaie started at UF as a researcher in 1980 and has worked for the university since that time, except for a stint at Oregon State University from 1984 to 1986. He currently makes about $111,400 a year from UF.

A UF news release from 1997 said he worked on developing fuels to carry a manned mission more quickly to Mars. A spokeswoman for NASA's inspector general declined comment on the case.

Sousan Anghaie, 54, is president of New Era Technology. The warrant alleges that she intentionally misrepresented budget information on NASA contracts and submitted multiple false invoices for workers.

Hamid Anghaie, 28, graduated from UF and is now a family wealth planning senior associate in Tampa. Ali Anghaie, 31, lives in Connecticut and works in information technology security for a space propulsion company.

Falsehood and Revisions in Baha'ism !!

There are many letters from UHJ dealing with the BAHAI false prophecies- I GUESS UNIVERSAL HOUSE OF JUSTICE TR TO COVER UP FOR ITS BOO BOOS AND MISTAKES- FALSE PROPHECIES- ERRORS OF BIBI INTERPRETATIONS.

Here is a few info:

“Perhaps the most important change in Baha’u’llah and the New Era was made on page 212 of the 1923 edition. Recorded as a Baha’i prophecy (59) concerning the “Coming of the Kingdom of God,” Esselmont cited Abdu’l-Baha’s interpretation of the last two verses of the Book of Daniel from the Bible. (60)

In editions published after his death, Esselmont’s words have been changed to say that Abdu’l-Baha “reckoned the fulfillment of Daniel’s prophecy from the date of the beginning of the Muhammadan era ” (61) and one of Abdu’l-Baha’s Tablets is quoted on the same subject in which he writes, “For according to this calculation a century will have elapsed from the dawn of the Sun of Truth. ...” Esselmont appears to conclude that Abdu’l-Baha was referring to the year 1963 and the one hundredth anniversary of Baha’u’llah’s public claim to be a Manifestation of God. (62)

Hence, they are commonly referred to as the “Dawn-Breakers.” (63) Further, in another quotation which originally appeared on the same page, but was also removed from later editions, Abdu’l-Baha plainly stated, “ This is the Century of the Sun of Truth. This is the Century of the establishment of the Kingdom of God upon the earth.” (64) Esselmont recorded Abdu’l-Baha as declaring explicitly that the prophecy was to be computed from the Hijra or 622 A.D. and that specific conditions would exist in the world upon it’s fulfillment in 1957. When it became apparent that this Baha’i prophecy would not be fulfilled, it was replaced with the ambiguous material which has remained in the text to the present. This is evident from the fact that, although Esselmont’s other eyewitness accounts were removed in the 1937 revision, the record of Abdu’l-Baha’s prophecy was left intact by the American National Spiritual Assembly and Shoghi Effendi. It was not changed until after 1957. (65)

Also, Abdu’l-Baha’s conviction that all of these events would take place in this century have been expressed in other writings and it is evident that Shoghi Effendi shared his optimism as well. (66)”

“The tables below represent a survey of some of the major changes made in selected books, between their original publication and later editions, which were written by Baha’i authors during the 20th century. A major change is considered to be a revision which reflects a change in Western Baha’i doctrine, practice or attitude toward a particular subject since the early 1900’s. It should be noted however, that there have been literally hundreds of changes made in the few books examined to date.

Baha’u’llah and the New Era by John E. Esselmont

8 / xiv Esselmont expressed his gratitude to the Baha’i historian, Avarih, who later left the faith and was declared a Covenant-breaker. This reference was completely removed.

13 / 14 “Miracles” were discussed which were intended to show how civilization has advanced since the nineteenth century. Some of these “miracles” have reversed and worsened since 1923. They have been edited from the text.

22 / 13 The apostate Avarih was quoted, but his name has been replaced by “a historian.”

34 / 26 Avarih’s material was dropped completely.

67-9 / 67-9 This is a very important change. Esselmont spoke of the unique station of Abdu’l-Baha and stated that “whatever Abdu’l-Baha says or does is to be accepted as of equal authority with the direct utterance of the Manifestation.” Further, he quoted Abdu’l-Baha to the effect that the Bab was “the ‘Promised Christ.’” Two pages have been completely reworked. The institution of the Guardianship was introduced and the views which Esselmont originally expressed are referred to as “naive enthusiasm.”

118 / 130 Baha’u’llah provided that Abdu’l-Baha would be the sole interpreter of his writings and after him the International House of Justice, but this has been changed to “the authorized interpreter.”

123-4 / 135-7 Esselmont was present when Abdu’l-Baha specifically advocated a form of constitutional monarchy under the heading “True Civilization.” This quotation has been dropped and replaced with two pages of general material which merely says that there will be different types of government under the Lesser Peace and the Most Great Peace.

146 / 165-6 Emphasis on the use of Esperanto as the universal language is played down in later editions.

157-8 / 179-9 A detailed two page account of Spiritual Assemblies in Persia by Jinab-i-Assad'llah Fadil Mazindarani has been replaced by an updated description of functions.

161 / 186 Nineteen Day Feast was added.

190 / 218 The establishment of the League of Nations and reduction in armaments were cited as “advances in fulfillment” of prophecies of world peace. This statement has been removed.

203-4 / 235-7 Esselmont claimed that Baha'u'llah's words have a “creative power” and he cited a number of specific advances as proof. He claimed that world temperance was advancing, military dictatorships had fallen and will not be revived, democracy was spreading, Esperanto was gaining worldwide acceptance as a universal language, and the “emancipation of the workers” was “steady and irresistible.” This has been rewritten in a more general fashion.

209-10 / 244-7 Under the heading of “Social Troubles After the War,” Esselmont gave an eyewitness account of some specific predictions by Abdu'l-Baha, which did not take place. This section has been replaced by nearly three pages of general information summing up Baha'u'llah's proclamation. 211-12 / 249-50 It has been made to appear as if Esselmont was referring to the progress of the movement at the one hundredth anniversary of Baha'u'llah's declaration, or 1963. It is important to note that this change was not made in the major revision in 1937, but in the 1970 revision, after the events predicted did not take place.

215-6 / 253-4 Avari's estimates of the number of Baha'is worldwide have been replaced. It is interesting to note that it was the issue of dishonesty in the Baha'i administration over the numerical success of the movement, which Avari cited as his reason for leaving the faith.

228-9 / 287 Esselmont supplied a bibliography for further study which included books from a variety of authors, including Edward G. Browne. In the 1937 edition it was removed completely, but a new list of references is included at the end of later editions. Although, Browne's material remains in the text, his work is missing from the latest bibliography.

All Things Made New by John Ferraby

27-8 / 27-8 Ferraby originally stated that the Guardianship was to be perpetual, but this section has been reworked, explaining that another Guardian could not be appointed since none were qualified. All references to the duties of the Guardian were in the present tense, but have been changed to the past tense, indicating that the Guardianship has ceased.

64 / 67 Islam was said to be declining in influence and power in the world and that this trend will continue. Because of events in the Middle East during the past two decades, this section has been rewritten, shifting the emphasis to a decline in Islam's spirituality and reputation in the world.

246-7 / 252-3 In the original edition, Ferraby quoted the Will of Abdu'l-Baha and demonstrated that the Cause would continue to have a visible Centre through the institution of successive Guardians. He referred to this as “a Covenant so mighty that mankind has never seen its like.” However, this section has been completely rewritten, stating that the Will only provided for the “possibility” for a succession of Guardians and that the writings nowhere “promise or guarantee” that the institution would continue.

256-62 / 262-72 This section has undergone major revision with the addition of hundreds of words. References to the Guardianship have been changed to the past tense or have been replaced with “the Universal House of Justice.”

272-4 / 288-90 Ferraby extolled the virtues of the Baha'i Administrative Order and cited evidences of its superiority over concepts of authority in Christianity and Islam.

279 / 295 Baha'i burial customs were discussed and Ferraby's statement that “Cremation is forbidden, because the too sudden disintegration of the body may harm the departed soul” has been replaced with a statement by Abdu'l-Baha.

308-12 / 326-31 A number of books have been dropped from Ferraby's bibliography, including those written by Edward G. Browne. References to Browne's works still appear in the text of later editions, but the notes refer the reader to books by other Baha'i authors who also quote Browne. Two of the Baha'i books referred to also contain material which is critical of Browne, so these revisions were apparently made to divert the reader from the primary sources, which contain material that is at variance with orthodox versions of the history of the movement.

Christ and Baha'u'llah by George Townshend

79 / 79 Townshend originally referred to Shoghi Effendi as the “first and present Guardian,” but this phrase has been dropped.

98-9 / 98-9 Townshend discussed the Will and Testament of Abdu'l-Baha and the provision for a succession of Guardians. The succession principle has been dropped and Shoghi Effendi is no longer spoken of as “the first Guardian.”

100-1 / 100-1 This section dealt with “the lineage of succeeding Guardians,” but it has been changed so it appears that Townshend is writing about “divinely guided institutions” in general.

Selected Writings of Shoghi Effendi by Shoghi Effendi

3 – 5 / vii The original edition began with nearly three pages of excerpts from Abdu'l-Baha's Will and Testament, in which he commanded his followers to “turn unto Shoghi Effendi...” This has been reduced in the 1975 edition to two paragraphs with statements concerning hereditary succession of the Guardianship and the role of the Guardian as the Head of the Universal House of Justice replaced with ellipses.

10 / 4 Two paragraphs have been removed, one of which deals mainly with outdated statistics concerning the growth of the Faith. The other is an assertion by Shoghi Effendi that he was “appointed as First Guardian of the Baha'i Faith and Head of the Universal House of Justice...”

27-8 / 19 A paragraph has been removed which described the Administrative Order as “the framework of the Will [of Abdu'l-Baha] itself, the inviolable stronghold...”

43-5 / 32 Two full pages have been removed, which formed an apologetic for the functions, the centrality, and the absolutely essential position of the Guardianship in Baha'u'llah's World Order.

THERE ARE SO MANY STUDIES THAT DEMONSTRATE THE BLATANT FALSIFICATIONS MADE BY BAHAI LEA ALSO KNOWN AS RELIGIOUS DICTATORS.

The current fraudulent application of the Law of Huququ'llah

High Baha'i Divorce Rate

An internal Baha'i household survey done in 1987 found that the divorce rate in the U.S. Baha'i community was higher than that in American society as a whole. The report was never released to the public.

My own suspicion is that the high divorce rate has several causes. First of all, Baha'is are encouraged to utopian ways of thinking. Two young people with little in common save that they are recent converts to the faith will be encouraged to marry. I have seen this sort of thing over and over again with my own eyes. This utopianism is widespread in the faith and is the same reason for which so many other Baha'i enterprises end up doing damage to people. That both are "Baha'is" is not a basis for a marriage. One may be a liberal and the other a fundamentalist; current norms against such labeling make it difficult for people to identify one another on that basis, but you'd better believe the difference would show up in a marriage!

In smaller communities the Baha'i committee work is a killer, and may isolate the two spouses, who spend less time together just cocooning and watching t.v.

And it is my estimate that from a third to a half of U.S. Baha'is are what the sociologists would call marginal people—persons with poor social skills who are emotionally needy and who join the faith because they are love-bombed and find a high proportion of other marginals in it. A high rate of marginality is fostered by the cultists who have infiltrated the administration, since only such individuals would put up with being ordered around summarily or would eat up conspiracy theories about bands of dissidents seeking to undermine the administration. Marginals would have higher than normal divorce rates, obviously.

Finally, the Baha'i faith encourages a great deal of ego inflation in the individual. Each Baha'i thinks he or she is saving the world and is a linchpin in the plan of God. This inspires in them great (and often quite misplaced) confidence in their own judgment—I've seen them pronounce authoritatively on astronomy, biology, Qajar history, and many other subjects on which they are woefully ignorant. Such ego inflation and over-confidence in personal judgment would not be good for a marriage.

Juan Cole

A Brief History of Douglas Martin, Member, Universal House of Justice

by Juan Cole, one of his victims 31 January 2000

Doug Martin told John Walbridge and several other Baha'is in the early 1980s that he viewed me as a covenant breaker. I was at the time a Baha'i in good standing, a former pioneer in Lebanon and Jordan, a travel teacher, studying at UCLA with the son of a Hand of the Cause. It is absolutely outrageous that he was making such charges then, but this is the way he has behaved all along. I presume that he confuses thinking creatively or academically with breaking the Baha'i covenant, an attitude that I think qualifies him as a fundamentalist, or perhaps even a cultist.

This was at a time when he was powerful in the Association for Baha'i Studies and had read some of the materials I submitted to it, as well as corresponding with me about a particular issue. He gave a talk in Canada about the faith in which he advocated Israeli control of Jerusalem. Unbeknownst to him, this talk was taped by the conference organizers, who assumed it was his conference paper submission, and they typed it up and printed it in a book published in India. I discovered the book and wrote him a protest that he was involving the faith in politics in a big way. (The status of Jerusalem is still undetermined in international law). He explained that he had not intended for his remarks to be published. I now realize that he must have been petrified that I might use this incident to discredit him, since of course behind the scenes that is the way he himself has behaved throughout his entire Baha'i career. In fact, I let it go. He nursed a grudge against me thereafter. This Jerusalem talk was typical of the kind of fundamentalist "Zionism" he espouses, along with a lot of other wacky ideas like the world changing dramatically in the year 2000. (How will he backpedal about that?) There isn't much difference between his discourse and that of someone like Jerry Falwell. Note that like the right wing "Christian Zionists," Martin actually does not mean the Jewish people particularly well, since he just wants to convert them to his religion. His "Zionism" is a use of them for his own, fundamentalist and apocalyptic purposes.

In fact, putting the Canadian clique of Martin, Hatcher and Danesh in charge of the Association for Baha'i Studies in the late 70s and through the 80s was clearly a strategic move on the part of some conservative House members of the time. That clique had no academic credentials in the humanities or social sciences and they so mismanaged the organization that they alienated from it most of the real academics and intellectuals. They provoked the resignation of the California regional committee of the ABS in the mid-80s, and when John Walbridge protested their policies Martin had him fired from the ABS board. When [Gerald] travelled around Europe and made up a directory of Baha'i scholars in Europe, he showed it to Martin, who harshly criticized him for taking the initiative and so hurt his feelings that he left the faith for ten years.

Martin also wrote fierce editorials in the Canadian Baha'i newsletter in the mid-1980s viciously attacking Kalimat Press's Circle series of intellectual explorations of peace, gender equality, etc., for daring suggest that these were "Baha'i" views. As big Honcho in ABS he often rejected paper submissions for being insufficiently fundamentalist, and this happened to a number of bona fide Baha'i academics. He saw ABS as a way of controlling rather than nurturing "Baha'i Scholarship." In the late 1980s he had Abbas Amanat out to speak at an ABS convention in Canada. He was very pleasant to Abbas's face. But when Abbas left he conducted a kvetching session with the rightwing Baha'i fundamentalists in the audience who had been enraged by Abbas's academic talk. There is a Hindi-Urdu proverb that someone has a dagger hidden under their arm but keeps chanting the name of Ram in public. (Baghal men~ churi, mun~ men~ Ram Ram.)

Baha'u'llah Ali Nuri own writing is very disorganized !!

Baha'u'llah wrote in an very unconventional disorganized way- making it very difficult to read and translate.

The Arabic-Persian writings of Baha'u'llah (his own hand writing) use certain items that are time consuming to decipher- specially when there is a "flight of thoughts" and that there are grammatical-syntactic changes.

I am aware of a Persian lady who is in her 70's now, and who had worked in Haifa- UHJ- to classify and translate important points of Baha'u'llah Tablets. In the latter part of her career- by the late 1990's, she developed severe paranoia and has now full blown schizophrenia.

It is extremely unexpected and baffling to see the appearance of schizophrenia in this ELDERLY Iranian Baha'i lady. She had spent most of her life working at UHJ on the Tablets of Baha'u'llah. During moments of lucidity, she had commented how difficult it was to read Baha'u'llah writings. It is written in a strange style- very disorganized. The writings of Baha'u'llah (when written by himself) can be compared to the "flight of ideas" seen in schizophrenic patients.

This elderly lady was then transferred to the Home for The Aged (Baha'i Nursing Home) in Chicago, Illinois to continue her treatments for schizophrenia (at the request of UHJ in Israel).

Unfortunately, the US NSA closed down the Home for the Aged a few years ago. This lady's family (very prominent Iranian Baha'is) have refused to care for her in light of her advanced paranoia- schizophrenia.

The US NSA under order of UHJ has now placed this Iranian Baha'i lady in another nursing home, and pay full price for her stay and for her medical care.

This Iranian Baha'i lady developped schizophrenia extremely late in life- extremely rare except in people who have other concomittant diseases.

It is suspected that her line of work- namely reading the original Baha'u'llah's writings caused her so much stress- and led to the development of mental disorder. Here is information from the British Journal of Psychiatry:

"Lower level of Family Stress Reduces Risk of Schizophrenia. Risk of getting schizophrenia (for children genetically predisposed schizophrenia) can be up to 800% higher in high stress "dysfunctional families" vs. low stress households. Research suggests that that high levels of stress (of any type) significantly increases the incidence of schizophrenia and related brain disorders. In the February, 2004 issue of the British Journal of Psychiatry a study looked at adopted children from families that have a history of schizophrenia and stated that:

"The information suggests the protective effect of being reared in a healthy adoptive family, with the risk for these high-genetic-risk adoptees developing schizophrenia in healthy families at 1.49% compared with 13% for those reared in "dysfunctional" families. This lends significant support to the stress and hereditary predisposition model of the cause of schizophrenia, in which environmental stressors have a particularly harmful impact only on individuals with a genetic vulnerability." Source: British Journal of Psychiatry

Link: <http://www.schizophrenia.com/prevent2.htm#enriched>

When I inquired about Dr. Maneck's use of Omega-3, I thought about the possibility of more severe psychiatric disorders- as those who have been able to read entire original Tablets of Baha'u'llah have occasionally developped a case of severe schizophrenia.

I hope that this clarifies the issue of language expertise in relation to translations of original Baha'u'llah Tablets.

QUOTE

Chapter 11

The Critics of the Cause of God (munkirin-i-amru'llah)

The Ancient Beauty in the Tablet of Habib from Maragha, which begins with "H B hear the call of God from the direction of the throne by the protective signs/verses (bi-ayati muhayyimin)..etc." they [i.e. Husayn 'Ali Nuri] enunciate the command (mi-farmayand)[i.e. state],

O God! Whomsoever violates My Covenant, O God, humiliate him. Verily whosoever violates My Covenant, erase and efface him.

Quote

"Protect yourselves with utmost vigilance, lest you be entrapped in the snare of deception and fraud." This is the advice of the Pen of Destiny."Therefore, to avoid these people will be the nearest path by which to attain the divine good pleasure; because their breath is infectious, like unto poison." "Endeavor to your utmost to protect yourselves, because Satan appears in different robes and appeals to everyone according to each person's own way, until he becomes like unto him— then he will leave him alone."

"...If you detect in any man the least perceptible breath of violation, shun him and keep away from him." Then He says: "Verily, they are manifestations of Satan." (Bahá'í World Faith, p. 431)

"Bahá'u'lláh, in all the Tablets and Epistles, forbade the true and firm friends from associating and meeting the violators of the Covenant of His Holiness, the Báb, saying that no one should go near them because their breath is like the poison of the snake that kills instantly." (Bahá'í World Faith, p. 430)

"And now, one of the greatest and most fundamental principles of the Cause of God is to shun and avoid entirely the Covenant-breakers, for they will utterly destroy the Cause of God, exterminate His Law and render of no account all efforts exerted in the past." (Bahá'í World Faith, p. 448)

"My object is to show that the Hands of the Cause of God must be ever watchful and so soon as they find anyone beginning to oppose and protest against the guardian of the Cause of God, cast him out from the congregation of the people of Bahá and in no wise accept any excuse from him. How often hath grievous error been disguised in the garb of truth, that it might sow the seeds of doubt in the hearts of men!" (Will and Testament of Abdu'l-Bahá, p. 12)

Juan Cole on Baha'i Takfir

"Refuse to set up once again a sect similar to that of the Shi'ites." –Baha'u'llah

(Cited in 2002 by "Giangiacomo" <janji@aruba.it>)

From: "Juan R. Cole" <jrcole@u...> Date: Wed Apr 9, 2003 1:47 pm Subject: a Baha'i Vatican II is needed yeah, yeah, yeah. Ultramontane Catholic priests used to make the same arguments, before Vatican II, that Jesus Christ does not permit any change to what he set forth in his writings.

I am not arguing for a change in Baha'i doctrine or law in the sense of Baha'u'llah's vision of those things. I am arguing for a change in contemporary Baha'i procedures and fundamentalist mindset, which have nothing to do with Baha'u'llah. The reactionaries in any religion always substitute their hidebound misinterpretation of the religion for the real thing, and then claim it is the real thing, and then claim that no one can change it because it is the real thing. The whole bit is a shell game for suckers.

As for the argument that only the Universal House of Justice can change current procedure, and only by cozying up to them and convincing them nicely could you hope to influence them, the same thing could have been said of the popes. It is a silly argument, because the popes had a dictatorial attitude and most of them couldn't be influenced by niceness or criticism. They ruthlessly silenced or excommunicated anyone who spoke for a Catholic modernism. What the example of those brave Catholic thinkers shows is that even a highly authoritarian institution can be changed, and it can be changed by criticism and by new thinking.

For example: 'Abdul-Baha was implored by the hardline Baha'is of his day (what Shoghi Effendi later called the dangerous "extreme orthodox") to declare Mirza Muhammad 'Ali and his group infidels, i.e. "not Baha'is."

'Abdul-Baha replied that he could not do this because in the Baha'i faith, unlike in Islam, there was to be no expulsion of believers for immorality or wrong beliefs. If someone says he or she is a Baha'i, the Baha'is are stuck with them. The most you could do to someone disapproved by Baha'i authorities is to not hang out with them. But you can't say "so and so isn't really a Baha'i because he believes X." This is the Baha'i Supreme Exemplar speaking, the appointed Interpreter of the Baha'i scriptures. 'Abdul-Baha explicitly said that He Himself could not declare the Mirza Muhammad 'Ali people "not Baha'is" because it would be contrary to Baha'i principle (see the Kitab-i Aqdas).

The present so-called Universal House of Justice, in contrast, declared our dear Alison "not a Baha'i." They issued fatwa of takfir against her, [BOLD ADDED] declaring her an infidel, i.e., a non-believer. They broke Baha'i law in so doing. When they were challenged on this by Ron House, they wrote back that individual Baha'is couldn't declare people non-Baha'is, but that the UHJ had that prerogative. They have a prerogative that 'Abdul-Baha did not? They think they are better than He is? That they have powers He did not have? That they can contradict his explicit instructions in an adhoc and arbitrary manner, at will? And then it is pretended that they are upholding the real Baha'i faith, which no one can change! If you believe that, well, P.T. Barnum said a sucker was born every minute.

This is what Vatican II says:

"The Vatican Council declares that the human person has a right to religious freedom. Freedom of this kind means that all men should be immune from coercion on the part of individuals, social groups and every human power so that, within due limits, nobody is forced to act against his conscience in religious matters, nor impeded from acting in accordance with it, in private or in public, alone or in association with others. The Council further declares that the right to religious freedom is based on the very dignity of the human person as known through the revealed word of God and by reason itself."

This is what one commentator wrote about the situation before Vatican II:

"Both Gregory XVI in Mirari Vos (1832)² and Pius IX in Quanta Cura (1864)³ condemned the demand for "liberty of conscience" as "insanity" (deliramentum). The latter pontiff also condemned, in the Syllabus accompanying Quanta Cura, the proposition that, "In the present day it is no longer expedient that the Catholic religion should be held as the only religion of the State, to the exclusion of all other forms of worship." His successor Leo XIII insisted that "lying opinions . . . should be diligently repressed by public authority, lest they insidiously work the ruin of the State.""

This is the sort of situation the Baha'is are in now, the situation of Pius IX and Leo XIII. "Lying opinions" according to the Haifa authorities should not be tolerated. Hushmand Fatheazam, a UHJ member, told me that in future when Baha'is control the government, they would just jail [BOLD ADDED] dissidents What is the difference between that point of view and the ideas of the 19th century popes, or indeed, of present-day Iranian Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Supreme Jurisprudent?

In contrast, the Baha'i scriptures stand for freedom of conscience and freedom of expression, even within the Baha'i Faith. This freedom has been quashed by the Saddam Husseins in Haifa, and the reign of tyranny everywhere is now coming to an end.

A short comparision between Wahabi Muslims and Baha'is

The claim of Wahhabis that because they are “True Muslims” then the rest of majority Muslims are not “True Muslims” and this gives low life stupid uneducated Wahhabis to kill educated, knowledgeable, respectable personalities both from Sunni Muslims and Shia Muslims. If this is not a product of Colonialism then it is a gift from “heaven!!!!?” to them. You do not need a document to see this is a colonialist ideology.

The same way you see that Bahai is here to convince people that Mehdi had arrived and current dominance of superpowers is the Justice people on earth are experiencing. Do you really need a document to see this is a stupid justification of current injustice in the world and is a product of colonialism.

Bahai is not a religion, because religion should have a divine source, unless your god is British empire I do not see how Bahai should be considered as religion. I for one feel sorry for a person who's god is so miserable as Britain.

The Journey of three Baha'is who accepted Islam – Persian

This discussion was telecasted on one of the most viewed Iranian television channel “CHANNEL 3 (IRIB)” on the eve of Eid-ol-Fetr. All the three guests are ex-Baha'is. One with the beard was a Born Baha'i with both the parents Baha'is. The other two are Brother — Sister with their Father Baha'i and mother Muslim. They were all active Baha'is until they accepted Islam. They are talking about their journey towards Islam. The topics being discussed are : Shunning, Social Boycott by Baha'is (TARD), Ruhi Classes, The hypocritical behavior of Baha'is, The interference of the Baha'i institutions in the personal lives of members, the Israel and the Baha'i faith, The role of women in the UHJ, Their struggle after the Baha'is shunned them, Human Rights, The freedom of thought in Islam and Baha'ism, The answerability to the Baha'i Institutions, The difference between Islamic writings and Baha'i writings, the Manifestation of Bahaism and the Allah of Islam, their life after accepting Islam, etc.

Some Quotes about Islam from Babi and Baha'i Writings

Ali Muhammad Bab wrote:

"Since at the time when the Holy Qur'an was revealed the people of those days prided themselves over their mastery of the language, Allah sent down this book in such a beautiful, vigorous and perfect style of language that nothing better can be imagined. And in this book the truth of the claims of the Holy Prophet Muhammad has been established on the most evident, manifest and irrefutable basis" (Al-Bayan Ms.)

Abdul Baha' writes: "Among the miracles of the Holy Qur'an one is that it stands on a sure foundation of reason and wisdom in everything it teaches. On the basis of complete certainty it has propounded a sharia which for the people of this age forms the very essence of spiritual life. In addition to formulating a sharia the Qur'an also explains some weighty points of History and Mathematics which run counter to the theories accepted in those days, and it has been proved that the Qur'anic view is the correct one".1

Baha'ullah himself says:

"The faulty intelligence and grasp of human beings cannot fully comprehend the vast body of truths embodied in the Holy Qur'an, just as a spider cannot hunt down and catch a bird".2

'Abdul Fadal, a well-known Baha'i missionary, says:

"These verses of the Holy Qur'an clearly indicate that the principles of sharia, its details, the arguments which support it, its origin and achievement, in short everything has been fully and conclusively dealt with in it, no aspect of any worthwhile question having been left incomplete or inconclusive".3

Baha'ullah wrote during his life at 'Akka: "The sharia of Muhammad is complete and perfect in every way. The fault lies with the Muslims that they do not live up to it. If the Muslims were to act upon it, there would be peace in the whole world".4

All for Bahaism, Bahaism for Nothing!

The ultimate spirituality manifest in Bahaism is lies, deceit, quarrel and greed by the founders of this cult. The master of deceit and god-craft decides that everything that God revealed in the religion of Bayan to form the latest revelation and to last 1511 to 2001 years was not good enough even for a year or two. He desired to play God and revolted against the cause of God. Small fragments of what wasn't good enough for even a year or two became his holiest book. He gathered the most ignorant and cruel bunch of people around him and committed the unthinkable; he incited his men to commit murder and called them the 'friends of God'. He attributed to the 'Source of Command' what befit himself. He gathered and paid liars to revise the history for him and make room for him in high places in the history. He wrote letters to the kings and hid them under the carpet to impress his followers. He pretended to be a servant of the Cause of Bayan in private and prepared for revolt in private. He expressed servitude in the most humble manner to the 'Source of Command' and waited for his time and when that arrived he opened his mouth against the 'Source of Command'. He wrote what he believed would please the naive and would bring them to him. He found no one trustworthy to take his place except his sons. The stronger one ate the rest and made sure only his offsprings get to the table. His talk of unity, peace, one language, one this, one that was so generically branded slogans that could not go wrong! Today, Bahais are mostly ignorant of the fundamentals set its claims on. The only account of the history they believe in is that of the stakeholders themselves. Their contemporary and past history reflects their political game as means to the end. Everything goes for the sake of the Bahai establishment even if it takes siding with the Satan itself.

Then they claim no knowledge of the given issue by feigning ignorance 3. After the exposé has exposed they will try to divert to secondary and totally peripheral and irrelevant side-issues 4. The exposé is then painted as someone with an axe to grind, biased, deluded (while they, the bahaim, still have not responded to the main issue exposed) 5. Next they relate mental instability and insanity to the exposé, i.e. shoot the messenger 6. Then, the last tactic, is to wheel out several dubious personas on the scene who claim to be neutral non-bahai observers who then begin attacking the exposé as well as the issue exposed while supporting the bahais and their issues as so-called non-bahais

<http://www.fglaysher.com/bahaicensorship/technique.htm> Professor Juan Cole, University of Michigan, June 12, 1998:

"Let me ask you why in the world you think that I would risk my professional reputation by publicly stating falsehoods? ...The very technique of the more glaze-eyed among these people is to unbearably bully a Baha'i whom they don't like, use unjustified threats of declaring him or her a CB [Covenant Breaker (heretic)] to silence the individual, and if the person will not be silenced, then to depend upon the gullibility of the Baha'is in refusing to listen to any victim's story because, of course, the Baha'i institutions are infallible and divinely guided and could never do anything wrong. It is a perfect racket. Of course, this technique of making liberals go away has been enormously successful, and ex-Baha'i liberals have no credibility with the remaining Baha'is nor do most of them have any energy to continue to make a case, either to the Baha'is or the outside world, for the incredible abuses that go on inside this organization ostensibly committed to tolerance!" <http://www.fglaysher.com/bahaicensorship/Cole10.htm>

Professor Juan Cole, February 23, 1999: "There is nothing to be puzzled by. Right wing Baha'is only like to hear the sound of their own voices (which are the only voices they will admit to being "Baha'i" at all). Obviously, the world is so constructed that they cannot in fact only hear their own voices. They are forced to hear other voices that differ from theirs. This most disturbs them when the voices come from enrolled Baha'is or when the voices speak of the Baha'i faith. The way they sometimes deal with the enrolled Baha'is is to summon them to a heresy inquiry and threaten them with being shunned if they do not fall silent. With non-Baha'is or with ex-Baha'is, they deal with their speech about the faith by backbiting, slandering and libelling the speaker. You will note that since I've been on this list I have been accused of long-term heresy, of "claiming authority," of out and out lying (though that was retracted, twice), of misrepresentation, of 'playing fast and loose with the facts,' and even of being 'delusional.' I have been accused of all these falsehoods by Baha'is, by prominent Baha'is. I have been backbitten by them. This shows that all the talk about the danger a sharp tongue can do, all the talk about the need for harmony, for returning poison with honey, for a sin-covering eye, is just talk among right wing Baha'is. No one fights dirtier than they when they discover a voice they cannot silence and cannot refute.... <http://www.fglaysher.com/bahaicensorship/Cole71.htm>

THE INSTITUTION OF THE COUNSELLORS A Document Prepared by the Universal House of Justice January 29 2001

Protection of the Cause (pp. 15-16)

Although deepening the friends' understanding of the Covenant and increasing their love and loyalty to it are of paramount importance, the duties of the Auxiliary Board members for Protection do not end here. The Board members must remain ever vigilant, monitoring the actions of those who, driven by the promptings of ego, seek to sow the seeds of doubt in the minds of the friends and undermine the Faith. In general, whenever believers become aware of such problems, they should immediately contact whatever institution they feel moved to turn to, whether it be a Counsellor, an Auxiliary Board member, the National Spiritual Assembly or their own Local Assembly. It then becomes the duty of that institution to ensure that the report is fed into the correct channels and that all the other institutions affected are promptly informed. Not infrequently, the responsibility will fall on an Auxiliary Board member, in coordination with the Assembly concerned, to take some form of action in response to the situation. This involvement will include counselling the believer in question; warning him, if necessary, of the consequences of his actions; and bringing to the attention of the Counsellors the gravity of the situation, which may call for their intervention. Naturally, the Board member has to exert every effort to counteract the schemes and arrest the spread of the influence of those few who, despite attempts to guide them, eventually break the Covenant.

The need to protect the Faith from the attacks of its enemies may not be generally appreciated by the friends, particularly in places where attacks have been infrequent. However, it is certain that such opposition will increase, become concerted, and eventually universal. The writings clearly foreshadow not only an intensification of the machinations of internal enemies, but a rise in the hostility and opposition of its external enemies, whether religious or secular, as the Cause pursues its onward march towards ultimate victory. Therefore, in the light of the warnings of the Guardian, the Auxiliary Boards for Protection should keep "constantly" a "watchful eye" on those "who are known to be enemies, or to have been put out of the Faith", discreetly investigate their activities, alert intelligently the friends to the opposition inevitably to come, explain how each crisis in God's Faith has always proved to be a blessing in disguise, and prepare them for the "dire contest which is destined to range the Army of Light against the forces of darkness".

QUOTE

Chapter 11 The Critics of the Cause of God (munkirin-i-amru'llah) The Ancient Beauty in the Tablet of Habib from Maragha, which begins with "H B hear the call of God from the direction of the throne by the protective signs/verses (bi-ayati muhayyimin)..etc." they [i.e. Husayn Ali Nuri] enunciate the command (mi-farmayand) [i.e. state],

By God, the Truth, whomsoever criticizes it [i.e. Baha'ism], [which is] possessed of the manifest, the brilliant, the high and the perspicuous excellence, it behoveth him to ask his mother [yanbaghi lahu bi-an yas'al min ummihi] about his origins [or 'state', i.e. 'hal', meaning he should inquire his mother about his legitimate conception – trans.], for he shall return to the nethermost hell [asfal al-jahim]"...

Quote

O God! Whomsoever violates My Covenant, O God, humiliate him. Verily whosoever violates My Covenant, erase and efface him.

Quote

"...There is no conscience with them [i.e. the Baha'is], they keep to no principle, they tell you what is untrue, ignoring or denying undoubted historical facts, and this is the character of both the leader and the led...As to morality and honesty, the whole system has proved disappointing...I have been in contact with many Baha'is, and have had dealings with many and have tested many, and unfortunately I have met not a single one who could be called honest or faithful in the full sense of these words..." Dr Sa'eed Khan [was] a highly-respected physician...who had as a doctor treated the second widow of the Bab, and had for a lifetime known intimately both Babis [i.e. Bayanis] and Baha'is in Tehran and Hamadan. –

Today the Bahai cult is hated in Iran, and is considered correctly to be an arm of the British Crown. During the destabilization of the Shah in 1978, it was widely reported that in several instances the Bahai cult secretly funded the Khomeini Shi'ite movement. In part, the money would have flowed through the cult's links to the same international 'human rights' organizations, such as Amnesty International, that originally sponsored the anti-Shah movement in Iran. These movements also derive from the "one world" currents associated with the Bahais since the early 1900s. (If any Iranians have been misled on the question of the Bahais by the supposed antipathy of Khomeini's clique to the Bahais, it should be noted that the Bahai cultists often deliberately encouraged anti-Bahai activities as camouflage)... "A sign of the times was the opening of the Baha'i religion's Washington lobbying office in July 1987, complete with a staff of four and a budget of $400,000 – a telling moment, because the Baha'i faith requires its members to abstain from politics. When I peaked through the Baha'is window one day, the only remarkable feature of their Washington office was that it looked exactly like every other Washington office."

Religion is a subject on which I have ever been most scrupulously reserved. I have considered it a matter between every man and his Maker, in which no other, and far less the public, has a right to intermeddle.

—THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The love of religious liberty is a stronger sentiment than an attachment to civil or political freedom. That freedom which the conscience demands, and which men feel bound by their hopes of salvation to contend for, can hardly fail to be attained. Conscience in the cause of religion, and the worship of Deity, prepares the mind to act and suffer beyond almost all other causes.

History instructs us that this love of religious liberty, a compound sentiment in the breast of men, made up of the dearest sense of right and the highest conviction of duty, is able to look the sternest despotism in the face.

—DANIEL WEBSTER.

The Way of Freedom is opened! Hasten ye! The Fountain of Knowledge is gushing! Drink ye! Say, O Friends: 'The Tabernacle of Oneness is raised; look not upon each other with the eye of strangeness. Ye are all the fruits of one tree and the leaves of one branch.

Truly, I say: whatever lessens ignorance and increases knowledge, that has been, is and shall be accepted by the Creator.

—BAHA-O-LLAH: Bahai Scriptures,

Praise be to God! you are living upon the great continent of the west enjoying the perfect liberty, security and peace of this just government . . . for in this human world there is no greater blessing than liberty. You do not know. I who for forty years have been a prisoner, do know. I do know the value and blessing of liberty. For you have been and are now living in freedom and you have no fear of anybody. Is there a greater blessing than this? Freedom! Liberty! Security! These are the great bestowals of God. Therefore praise ye God!

Words of ABDUL BAHA from an address delivered before the Metropolitan African Methodist Church, M Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., April 23, 1912.

THE TRUMPET LIES IN THE DUST

The trumpet lies in the dust.

The wind is weary, the light is dead.

Ah, the evil day!

Come, fighters carrying your flags, and singers, with your war-songs!

Come, pilgrims of the march, hurrying on your journey!

The trumpet lies in the dust waiting for us.

I was on my way to the temple with my evening offerings, seeking for a place of rest after the day's dusty toil: hoping my hurts would be healed and the stains in my garment washed white, when I found thy trumpet lying in the dust.

Was it not the hour for me to light my evening lamp?

Had not the night sung its lullaby to the stars?

O thou blood-red rose, my poppies of sleep have paled and faded!

I was certain my wanderings were over and my debts all paid, when suddenly I came upon thy trumpet lying in the dust.

Strike my drowsy heart with thy spell of youth!
Let my joy in life blaze up in fire.
Let the shafts of awakening fly through the heart of night, and a thrill of dread shake blindness and palsy.
I have come to raise thy trumpet from the dust.

Sleep is no more for me—my walk shall be through showers of arrows.
Some shall run out of their houses and come to my side—
some shall weep.
Some in their beds shall toss and groan in dire dreams,
For to-night thy trumpet shall be sounded.

—RABINDRANATH TAGORE,
from Fruit-Gathering.

FOREWORD

This is an amazing book even for our amazing generation which has become shock-proof. The strident march of totalitarian modes of thinking, here as well as abroad, has so changed the shape of the world we used to know that a momentous invention of science leaves us indifferent and the assailing of man's cherished liberties creates but a ripple of stir and commotion.

It is fitting and proper that citizens of a self-governing State voluntarily impose upon themselves certain restraints in the exercise of political rights when a crisis is impending. One may or may not agree that the crisis facing the United States of America has been serious enough to necessitate the introduction of peace-time conscription. One may or may not agree that preparedness for violent offense and defense is the best way to meet the worldwide crisis. But no one can question the right of the American State—which is but another term for the American people banded together for political purposes—no one can question the right of the American State to impose upon its citizens certain denials of freedom involved in conscription.

Political rights—rights to life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness—are derived from the State. They are conferred upon the citizens by the State. But there are certain rights that inhere in man as man—rights that are not subject to the jurisdiction of the State, rights that derive from an authority higher than the State, from the dictates of one's conscience; from the still small voice within, which is the voice of the Most High.

Let us then distinguish between the political rights of man and the human rights of man. Political rights are conferred upon the citizen by the State and may be withheld from him by the State; but human rights can neither be conferred upon man nor withheld from him by the State. Limitations upon human rights are imposed by the State at its own peril. And the history of man testifies to the fact that in every combat the State has had to give way ultimately before human rights. The most striking illustration is the triumph of the Christian Church over the Roman State.

What the State cannot do in the matter of curtailing human rights no man or association of men is competent to do. For, the State, by definition, is an association of all "members" who become citizens by the fact of association for political purposes. The State, in other words, is the most inclusive and the most powerful association in every human society.

Every State, tyrannical, oligarchic, absolutist, dictatorial or democratic, of necessity comprehends within itself various associations for the enrichment of man's enjoyment—politically, economically, physically, intellectually, socially, spiritually. The characteristic of a democratic State is that it encourages all types of voluntary associations whereas the other forms of State merely tolerate voluntary associations—and that, too, on condition that their functioning does not undermine the authority of the State.

Among the most cherished human rights are:

- (1) Freedom of Conscience;
- (2) Freedom to Seek Truth;
- (3) Freedom to Experiment with Truth;
- (4) Freedom to Follow the Inner Light;
- (5) Freedom to Give Allegiance, unto Death, to whatever Cause one's Conscience Believes to be Right;
- (6) Freedom to Worship God in one's own Way.

Religious associations and institutions—churches, temples, synagogues, mosques, hierarchies, congregations, parishes—arise to help man in the enjoyment of his basic human right, namely, freedom to worship God in his own way, in terms of his inner light. Unfortunately, even religious associations and institutions, creations as they are of human beings, tend to go the way of all flesh; in course of time they develop their peculiar rites and rituals and prescribe structuralized forms of behavior, rendered hallowed by time and tradition.

Institutions are accepted ways of doing things—with a tendency toward structuralization. Man cannot live without institutions, neither can he live with institutions. An institution arises as an instrumentality to subserve a given end. Soon the end becomes subordinated to the maintenance of the institution. This then is the supreme dilemma of the human race: Man unknown to institutions is less than human; man dominated by institutions is also less than human; and yet, man eternally strives, as he must, by means of institutions, to realize his worth as a citizen, his dignity as a child of God.

Eternal vigilance, it has been said, is the price of political freedom. Eternal vigilance, it may be said, is also the price of freedom from the tyranny of institutionalism. I venture to submit that every generation of free men is called upon to be on the alert in evaluating whether an institution is functioning as what it was intended to be, namely, as an instrumentality, or whether it has arrogated unto itself the role of the end. And if the generation as a whole is incompetent, as it may well be, to make proper evaluation, it is imperative that each generation be blessed with free souls, with men and women of vision and courage, who shall proclaim: "The Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

Democracy, broadbased upon the Bill of Rights, not only guarantees political rights but also very wisely makes ample provision for full enjoyment of human rights. The U. S. Constitution most explicitly guarantees freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, and in no uncertain terms restrains Congress from "prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Courts have faithfully safeguarded the rights embodied in the Bill of Rights. And the Executive branch of the U. S. Government, far from interfering with freedom of religion, has from time to time championed freedom of conscience and religion for all mankind.

So long as the U. S. Constitution remains vital in the affairs of this nation, so long is the enjoyment of human as well as political rights of man assured. Indeed, this living example of the virtues of American democracy should act as a beacon-light to the rest of mankind.

II

In this book we have an interesting case history of man versus institution. The facts in the case are simple. In the last century there arose in Iran (Persia) three modern Prophets of the new dispensation—The Bab (1819-1850), Baha-O-Llah (1817-1892), Abdul Baha (1844-1921).

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha taught, among other things:

- (1) Oneness of mankind—no racial prejudice;
- (2) Harmony of all religions—each religion is a divine revelation and, therefore, worthy of respect;
- (3) Reconciliation between science and religion;
- (4) Universal religion—to foster appreciation of all faiths;
- (5) Universal peace—through the establishment of a World Organization, through international arbitration and an international Parliament, through the removal of artificial customs barriers, through universal disarmament;
- (6) An international (auxiliary) language, to be created and adopted for international communication.
- (7) Independent investigation of truth;
- (8) Non-institutionalism;
- (9) Universalism.

"You cannot organize the Bahai Cause," said Abdul Baha. Bahaism, literally the Religion of Light, is meant to act as a leaven that leaveneth the whole lump. It is intended to reinforce and reinvigorate the eternal truths and ancient wisdoms embodied in the different religions of mankind. The Bahai teaching is, in a sense, a new tool of spritual insight, calculated to help humanity realize the age-old hope of peace on earth and goodwill among men.

Along with his own teachings and his vital interpretations of the message of Baha-O-Llah, Abdul Baha left a Will appointing his grandson Shoghi Effendi as the "Guardian" of the Bahai Cause and leaving directions for the election of an International Council which should in the future guide the development of the movement and co-ordinate the activities of its followers in accordance with the principles of Baha-O-Llah.

The four thousand odd followers of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha in the United States and Canada and some thousands of others scattered abroad seized upon Abdul Baha's Will as their fulcrum around which to organize the activities of the new cause, which was meant to be universal in scope and non-institutional in character. At once Bahai Assemblies, here as well as abroad, became like unto fraternal orders if not like unto secret societies with their unique rituals and paraphernalia.

The guardian, hierarchies, assemblies, rituals, taboos, rules for membership, approved forms of behavior, committees on publications, boards of censors, causes for excommunication—all the elaborate ramifications of the institutional pattern conspired to banish the soul of universalism from the Bahai teachings.

Professing Bahais soon became the prisoners of their own institutions. Against this travesty of the universalism of the Founders, against this imprisonment of the spirits of these great Prophets of our age, a few brave souls, devoted disciples and true, raised their protest. Among these protestant voices the most effective have been those of the author of this book, Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, and of his co-worker, Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler. They have been insistently calling upon the Bahais to go back to the original, pure teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha—indeed, to the original, pure teachings of all the Teachers of mankind.

And the high priests of Bahai institutionalism have rewarded these two free souls with excommunication. It is a strange story—one could hardly believe such sacerdotal authoritarianism would be exercised or accepted by any group of persons in the twentieth century. And yet, enlightened American citizens have been accomplices in this nefarious business!

The story of man versus institution, of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab versus the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, finally culminates in a lawsuit. Excommunication on the religious plane was now to be buttressed with political and civil disability, with a restraint to Sohrab and his co-workers from the very use of the word Bahai!

The clear-cut judgment of the United States Courts in favor of man as against the institution heartens every champion of freedom of conscience.

This fresh triumph of the human rights of man over the organizational rights of hierarchies should lead all free spirits the world over to offer their thanks to the Most High from whom derive the human rights of man. This judicial vindication should encourage our generation to cherish all the more reverently the political as well as the human rights of man.

AUTHOR'S STATEMENT

The Bahai Cause had its inception in Persia, being inaugurated in 1844 with the declaration of the Bab (Arabic word for gate) which was to the effect: that a New Era had dawned, and that he, the Bab, was the Announcer of the imminent appearance of a World Teacher whose Message was to revolutionize the concepts of men and nations. The ministry of the Bab was of short duration, terminating in martyrdom—historic fate of the Forerunner. Meanwhile Baha-O-Llah, scion of a noble house of Persia, had renounced his position and estates to cast his lot in with the followers of the Bab (known as Babis). Persecution and death were the price paid by these devoted men for faith in a new Cause of human brotherhood, and Baha-O-Llah was imprisoned with the rest. It was at this time, in an underground dungeon in Teheran, that he received the revelation that he himself was the One whose coming had been foretold by the Bab; it was here that he was commissioned with the task of making out of the old barbaric world a New World of reason and justice.

Baha-O-Llah was not intended to die at the birth of the movement. More than twenty thousand persons who believed in the Bab, and later in him, sacrificed their lives for their Faith; but he, safeguarded by fate, was, with his family, banished to Turkey and then to Palestine. There, the prison walls of Acca, which, in their twenty foot depth, had withstood the cannon of Napoleon, crumbled, figuratively speaking, before his dynamic Message. To all parts the Word went, East and West, North and South, and when, at an advanced age, Baha-O-Llah departed from this life, the Cause was already firmly established in countless loyal hearts throughout the Orient.

Abdul Baha was nine years old when he went into exile with his illustrious father, Baha-O-Llah. Release came to him at the age of sixty-four when, in 1908, the Young Turks overthrew the Ottoman Empire; and he immediately made use of his freedom by setting out on a journey, which led him throughout Europe and North America, to deliver the Message to the Occident. In 1921, he passed into the world beyond from his home in Haifa, Palestine, leaving behind a Will and Testament in which his eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi, was designated as Guardian of the Cause.

II

Here, I wish to affirm my conviction that the Will of Abdul Baha is valid and that his appointment of Shoghi Effendi as the Guardian of the Bahai Cause is unchallengeable. Nevertheless, I take exception to certain policies and methods initiated by Shoghi Effendi and the Bahai Administration established under his leadership.

The teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha are liberal to the nth degree, and broad beyond the outposts of human thought. It was the intention of the Founders to establish an unorganized movement, so all-inclusive and free as to be immune to the natural proclivities of men to restrict and limit. The fact that restriction and limitation have already set in and are fast gaining ground, at this date, only twenty years after the removal from our midst of Abdul Baha, is a matter of profound concern to all those who, labels apart, believe in promoting Universal Religion.

The Bahai Cause, as founded by Baha-O-Llah nearly a century ago and as interpreted by his son Abdul Baha, was and still is a UNIVERSAL RELIGION. Its principles were intended to safeguard the conscience of man from interference by any hierarchical organization; to spiritualize society and to socialize religion; to unify the fundamental ideals of the World Faiths; to bestow upon every child of God the precious gift of liberty and to harmonize the conflicting interests of nations, races and peoples of the earth with the power of spirit. However, the present day Bahai Administration under the title of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada has, through its dogmas and creeds, frustrated the aims of the Founders of the Bahai Faith.

For over twelve years, I have followed the advice of philosophers and poets who eulogized silence, and held my tongue and pen in leash, the while witnessing the daily crucifixion of the movement which I love and believe in. At the same time, I continued to spread the Bahai Teachings through the medium of The New History Society, which I had formed for that purpose in conjunction with Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler. Then suddenly, the Bahai authorities brought suit against me and Mrs. Chanler on the ground that the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada had made a trade-mark of the word Bahai and that consequently this name was their exclusive property. The legal action broke the chains of silence and resulted in a frank setting forth of the issues involved.

Thus, while the litigation was under way, Broken Silence, little by little, came into being. Appearing in the form of articles, published consecutively in New History, monthly magazine of The New History Society, it became the expression of innermost thoughts, pent up and stored away during the passage of years. I had never expected to strip my mind publicly; I had not dreamed and, especially, I had not wished to share my anxieties with others. I had meant to proceed on my own way, serving the Cause of Baha-O-Llah according to my light, the while leaving a clear passage for the Bahai Administration to do likewise.

This course of action came to a full stop with the institution of court proceedings. Overnight, the matter, which for so long had been treated with the utmost discretion, was brought into the public domain, and the time for ignoring the fundamental differences that existed between the liberal Bahais and the National Spiritual Assembly was at an end. Consequently, Broken Silence represents the lifting, under duress, of self-imposed restraint.

With the appearance of the first article in New History, copies of this little magazine were mailed to all the Bahais listed in the office of the Society. This was done, partly, because it was certain that the Bahai authorities would not give a full account of the legal proceedings to its membership; and, partly, because discussion of the lawsuit led to discussion of the Administration as it stands today, and this, now that the barriers were down, seemed to be in order.

Personally, I value the democratic principle, being assured that affairs are safest in the hands of the people; therefore, I felt that I was not overstepping the lines of propriety in making available to my fellow Bahais the conclusions which I had reached, supported as they were, in every instance, with documentation. Neither I nor my associate, Mrs. Chanler, was perturbed at being, from time to time, pictured in Bahai publications as enemies, adversaries, foes, betrayers and covenant-breakers, for these were only opinions, or simulated opinions; and we felt that there were links yet unbroken between the body of the believers and ourselves. We thought it possible that, on the whole, we were being given credit for sincerity; even as we gave credit on this score to the majority of the Bahais.

In order to cope with the disturbance created in the minds of Bahais by the challenging articles appearing monthly in New History, the National Spiritual Assembly advised its membership as follows:—

In response to inquiries from many believers who wish to know what they should do with the literature received unsolicited from The New History Society, the National Assembly advises the friends to mark the envelopes "refused" and drop them in the nearest post box or post office for return to the sender.

—Bahai News, May, 1941, Page 6.

When the returned magazines were received at the office, the names appearing on the envelopes were removed from the files, and no further literature was sent.

In a letter from the Guardian's secretary, appearing in the July 1941 issue of Bahai News, which is addressed to the National Spiritual Assembly, reference is made to the fact that Shoghi Effendi has received the material sent to him regarding the legal action taken against The New History Society, as well as copies of their monthly publication. Actually, ever since this problem was first dealt with, the editors of New History, on their own part, sent to the Guardian every issue of their magazine. We believed that this was the just thing to do and considered that, in a controversy which had entered the realm of the courts, the subject-matter should be at the disposal of both the authorities and the people.

Abdul Baha taught that everyone should work out things for himself. He said:—

God has given man the eye of investigation, by which he may see and recognize truth. He has endowed man with ears, that he may hear the message of reality and conferred upon him the gift of reason, by which he may discover things for himself. This is his endowment and equipment for the investigation of reality. Man is not intended to see through the eye of another, hear through another's ears nor comprehend with another's brain . . . Therefore depend upon your own reason and judgment and adhere to the outcome of your own investigation; otherwise, you will be utterly submerged in the sea of ignorance and deprived of all the bounties of God.

III

To the students of the origin and growth of religion, Broken Silence puts a number of searching questions:—

Can religion become a dominant factor in the lives of the people without the paraphernalia of creeds and dogmas?

Is it possible to preserve in religion the essential simplicity of the spirit with the emergence of a monopolistic, ecclesiastical order?

Can true spiritual democracy function alongside of a totalitarian hierarchy?

Which should become the test of fellowship: moral, ethical principles or theological, sectarian doctrines?

Is religion a quickening, an illumination, a fraternity, or is it a close corporation with exclusive privileges?

Can every man approach his Maker directly, or is it necessary to do so through the intermediation of authorities approved by a constitution and by-laws, together with various other fetters forged upon the anvil of commercial greed and priestly ambition?

Is religion freedom of conscience, or is it subservience to any individual or group of individuals, no matter how highly placed and outwardly respected?

What is religion? Is it communion with the soul of the universe, or strict adherence to fossilized and crystallized theologies? Is it the trumpet of the spirit, or the voice of materialism? Is it the Infinite Heaven and the expanse of the earth, or a temple built in a certain locality? Is it the leadership of God or the domination of man?

Is religion the lifting of the standard of universal brotherhood, the unveiling of the mysteries of cosmic consciousness, or is it the maintenance of a clan and of tribal consciousness?

What is the mission of religion in our modern age? The Prophets have postulated a world community—undogmatic, super-racial and non-partisan. Do we find it in our hearts and minds to take them seriously?

Is it our task to carry out their intention?

IV

In a letter recently received from a prominent Bahai of long standing, I come across these lines:—For a believer like you to differ with Shoghi Effendi is a great sin, an unpardonable sin.

This dogmatic assertion of my fellow Bahai brings to my memory experiences of long ago which apply to the same subject—difference of opinion; and I will close this introduction with a little story about Abdul Baha which I herewith relate for the first time.

Once in a while, I disagreed with the Master. In such instances, he would sit and listen to my arguments on some project or other and, after ten or fifteen minutes, would rise to his feet. I also would be standing. Then, he would twist one of my ears, slap me forcibly on the cheek, and thunder:—

Mirza Ahmad, you have courage! We shall do as you suggest.

Occasionally, having started to move away, he would turn around and, with a twinkle in his eye, would add:—

Mirza Ahmad! Next time, display more courage.

Impressed, bewildered, I would be left alone to marvel at the human and divine miracle that was Abdul Baha.

In these pages certain Persian words and names will be found spelled in more ways than one—Bahai, Baha'i; Baha-O-Llah, Baha-U-Llah, Baha'u'llah; Abdul Baha, 'Abdu'l-Baha, etc.

When Bahai writings were first translated into English, Baha-O-Llah's name was, for instance, spelled as Baha-O-Llah. Later, the central letter O was replaced by U, making Baha-U-Llah. Again, in these latter years, The New History Society found it advisable to return to the original spelling because it produces a more correct pronunciation of the word.

In the publications of the "Guardian" and the Bahai Administration certain apostrophes are used as well. These are in accordance with the rules established by the Orientalists of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, England.

Throughout this book, the quoted extracts carry the spelling exactly as adopted by an author or editor at the given time.

In Bahai literature, letters and communications from Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha are referred to as Tablets.

CHAPTER I

I AM A BAHAI

My Home in Esphahan

I am a Bahai. My grandmother, my mother, my two maternal uncles and my brother were Bahais. From the earliest days, our home in Esphahan was a center for the promotion of Bahai teachings and, although the activities of my family were conducted in secret, as far as was possible, the hour arrived when it became a target for the fanatical fury of the Mohammedan Mullahs. I well remember the last meeting held in our garden; the familiar group, the peaceful chanting of Tablets; then suddenly, the muffled sound of advancing feet, the dispersion of the guests to safety and the violent intrusion.

My uncle Haji Seyyed Zeinel-Abedin, poet-philosopher and a very rare and powerful personality, was the chief prize to be gained by this raid; but he managed to make his escape although at the price of a broken leg, and the intruders, after pillaging the house and stables to their hearts' content, took me off as their only captive.

My retention among the enemies of our Faith was a brief one. A few questions as to the names and whereabouts of our Bahai friends were addressed to me. These were accentuated by the powerful persuasion of the bastinado but, fortunately, I made no revelations. Then, my unconscious body was carried back and left at the door of our dismantled house.

A few days later, in the early morning, my uncle and I, both well bandaged up, were lifted to the back of a very small donkey, and I turned and looked for the last time at my childhood's home. For some weeks, we hid and wandered among the hills, bearing southward, and on reaching Shiraz my uncle placed me in the care of a travelling Bahai teacher named Seyyed Assadollah, and we separated from each other. So, the tutelage of the philosopher of Esphahan was exchanged for the tutelage of a devoted personal follower of Abdul Baha; and in the company of Seyyed Assadollah I journeyed, by way of India, to Palestine.

I was about twelve years of age when I passed through the gates of Acca and came into the glorious presence of Abdul Baha, and I felt then, as I know now, that I was standing before the first of all teachers and the best of all masters. After that meeting I dedicated myself to his service for the duration of my life.

I Go to Work

When, after a short 35 days' stay in his household, Abdul Baha sent me to Ahmad Yazdi, at Port Said, Egypt, my heart had already become a garden in which the flowers of his love grew and flourished. As he embraced me at the hour of departure, he placed in my hand a letter. It was my first Tablet from him, written by his own blessed hand. After boarding the steamer, I opened the envelope. The words danced before my eyes. It is only now that I partially understand their meaning, but certainly those radiant words were an inspiration, and acted as an impetus to me as I started off on my uncharted future. Let me share with the reader a section of that Tablet.

Two Tablets from Abdul Baha

O thou heavenly youth! Although in the path of the True One, thou art homeless and a wanderer, nevertheless put thy trust in Him and seek His Confirmation. Ponder over the affairs and reflect . . . Because thou art at the Threshold of thy growth and development, thou must acquire poise and assurance, and gain firmness and steadfastness.

In Port Said, I worked in daytime as salesman in Ahmad Yazdi's store, and in the evenings I sat at the feet of Mirza Abul Fazl, foremost among Bahai Teachers, learning from him the spiritual lessons that caused me to ponder over the affairs and reflect, that made available the master-key to poise and assurance and disclosed the secret of firmness and steadfastness.

While I was thus working and studying, Abdul Baha did not forget me, for after a few months I received my second Tablet from him. He wrote:—

O thou my perpetual companion! I beg of God that in the spiritual rose-garden thou mayst become a merciful tree, conducive to the joy, exhilaration, attraction and happiness of the heart of humanity; that thou mayst become a most great gift to all the nations and a high bounty to all people.

Spiritual Apprenticeship

From that moment, I did not try to plan my life, for I realized that there was One, endowed with heavenly wisdom who was planning it for me. Each event led to another and, after the passing of about three years, I found myself in Washington, D. C., serving Mirza Abul Fazl. On the return of this beloved teacher to the Orient, I took up work in the Persian Legation as secretary to the Minister. When, in 1912, Abdul Baha paid his historic visit to the United States and Canada, I became part of his entourage, travelling with him, and translating his words. This American tour having terminated, I continued with him as he journeyed, disseminating the ideals of Baha-O-Llah, through England, Scotland, France, Austria-Hungary and Germany. From Europe we sailed to Egypt and finally reached home in Palestine. During the World War, I was beside the Master by day and by night, and it was at that period that he dictated to me the Tablets of the Divine Plan which, at his bidding, I carried to the United States on a Japanese cargo boat, shortly after the close of hostilities. These Tablets were unveiled and read before the Eleventh Annual Bahai Convention at Hotel McAlpin, New York, in April 1919.

TABLET FROM ABDUL BAHA IN HIS OWN HANDWRITING

This is the first of over a hundred Tablets addressed to

Thus, in the course of those many years of priceless opportunity, I tried to assimilate in my mental and spiritual consciousness as much of the spirit of Abdul Baha's teachings as was possible to me. I not only listened to his words but also took them down at formal times and at informal times, and these words and the intention back of them became part of me, closer than the breath of life.

My Treasure

During my long association with the Bahai Cause, whether in the immediate vicinity of the Master or at a physical distance from him, I did my very best to serve the Bahais throughout the world; and Abdul Baha rewarded me with his confidence and with the blessings of numerous Tablets. These latter are my treasure and my stronghold, for which I would not accept the wealth of empires.

Ere I bring to a close this personal recital (the object of which is to establish my identity, for whatever it is worth), I will reproduce herein, in all humility and gratitude, the contents of yet another Tablet from Abdul Baha written to me in about 1910.

My Spiritual Charter

Oh Thou who dost attract the hearts of the favored ones toward the Manifest Horizon!

Verily Thou art witness to the fire which is ablaze in the breasts, to the tears which are streaming from the eyes, and Thou knowest that the period of patience and silence has come to an end. The sight of the dear ones, Oh my God, is dimmed with weeping; the hearts of the yearning ones, Oh my Beloved, are wandering in the desert of Thy mercy; the souls of the attracted ones, Oh my Desire, are parched with longing for Thee.

Verily, Oh God, they have heard Thy universal proclamation, and that which Thou hast revealed in the Koran: "Travel ye over the earth so that ye may behold the signs of the mercy of God." Thereupon, after Thine ascension, the people of faith have arisen, voyaging to distant lands, and hastening to remote regions to cry out Thy Name; to remind the souls of the arrival of Thy days; to lead the minds to the fountain of Thy signs; to show to all humanity Thy truth and Thy faith; to guide the seekers to the right path, and to indicate to the workers the straight highway.

A SPIRITUAL CHARTER

Tablet from Abdul Baha to Mirza Ahmad Sohrab

Among these is Thy servant Ahmad, who is firm in the Ancient Covenant, fleeing from the people of darkness, drinking from the water of eternal life, intoxicated with the wine that is overflowing from the divine cup. In truth, he has left his home, waved the hand of farewell to his relatives, and, forsaking ease and comfort, has turned his face toward unknown lands, accepting adversity and hardship while heralding Thy Name and commemorating Thy glory. Attracted to Thy beauty, stirred by the perfume of Thy holiness, he speaks Thy praises, proclaims Thy Cause, guiding men to Thee, proving Thy religion, demonstrating Thy irrefutable truth, and so becoming an answerer to each questioning one and a guide to each straying one.

Oh my Lord! Oh my Lord! Verily he has endured every affliction in Thy path, and patiently has borne every difficulty for Thy love. A breath of rest has he not breathed, nor has he sought any habitation or favor in this world. Rather he has walked in the footsteps of Christ, Thy most exalted Word, taking the earth as his bed, the herbs as his food and the stars as his lamps. Notwithstanding, his cry was raised in the assemblies and his voice was heard in the meetings. The seekers surrounded him and the thirsty ones drank of the water of his utterance. Oh my God! This indeed is through Thy generosity, Thy beneficence, Thy mercy and Thy favor. Oh my God! Help him with the hosts of Thine approximate Angels; support him, amid Thy creatures, with the cohorts of the Supreme Concourse; make of him, in that distant land, a lamp of guidance and a sparkling luminary from the dawning-place of faith, so that he may serve Thy holy threshold, falling prostrate on the ground, thanking and praising Thee for Thy liberality to him; girding up, in Thy service, the loins of endeavor, and becoming reinforced and empowered in adoration of Thee.

Oh my Lord! Oh my Lord! Assign for him every bounty and suffer him to become the sign of Thy gifts among Thy people. Then have pity upon me, forgive me, show me Thy mercy—make me a sharer in his service, a partner in his adversity and a companion in his loneliness.

Verily, Thou art the Confirmer, the Helper, the Mighty, the Generous, the Compassionate!

—A translation of this Tablet was published by Bahai Publishing Committee, New York, 1930. It is to be found in "Tablets of Abdul Baha," Vol. III, pages 485-7. .

Ascension of Abdul Baha

In November 1921, while I was living in Los Angeles, California, the Bahai world received the overwhelming news that Abdul Baha had departed from this life. It was a stunning blow to all those who had loved and served him, but to me, especially, it was catastrophic. For days I sat lifeless, in an agony of despair. Then, with this new baptism of desolation, I began to re-read his words and, as I did so, I felt clearly that I was encompassed by the spirit of the Beloved and realized that now, more than at any other time, I must arise to magnify his Cause and strive to fulfill his promises, all the while demonstrating that poise and assurance, firmness and steadfastness which he, in his first Tablet, had enjoined upon me to acquire in my boyhood.

Will and Testament of Abdul Baha

Abdul Baha left behind him his Will and Testament, in his own handwriting. The authenticity of this document is beyond the shadow of doubt. In it, he appointed his eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi, as the Guardian of the Cause.

The transference of leadership is always a test, and especially must this be so when the first leader is incomparable in every respect; nevertheless, the Bahais rallied gallantly to the call of the Master, giving their whole-hearted allegiance to the newly appointed Guardian. I will quote from a talk delivered by myself at a conference held from November 24th to 26th, 1922, in San Francisco, California. A report of the conference, which I made at the time and which included my address, was entitled A Bird's Eye View of the First Teaching Conference of the Western States. It was later circulated among the Bahais in type-written form. A copy was sent to Shoghi Effendi. This talk shows my ardent desire, expressed in terms of very youthful enthusiasm, to serve the young Guardian.

Extract from My Talk at the Conference

The Youths of Baha were summoned to enlist in the army of the new General of the Kingdom, the Guardian of the Cause. There is a new spiritual King sitting at the head of "the Round Table." This is the age of heavenly chivalry. The Call is sent forth for a celestial tournament. The valiant Knights and the fair ladies are being invited from the four corners of the earth. The bugle is blowing and the flag is unfurled. It is the time when the Bahai Knighthood might blossom and be adorned with the flowers of service and sacrifice. Where are the undaunted heroes to pledge themselves to the New King and then to go forth to redeem the wrong and gain victories deathless?

It is the day of Youth, of energy, initiative and fearlessness. The significant fact that the New King of the Kingdom of Abha is young, of the same age as the Bab—must fire the imagination of the youths of Baha all over the world. It is their day, their opportunity. They must rise in concert and assist their youthful General with every means at their disposal. There is no other salvation for the Bahai Cause save through this unanimity of thoughts and opinions.

A new order is issued from the general headquarters of the Kingdom of Abha. It calls to the young blood to arise and register their names in the new book. Recruiting stations are being opened in every corner of the earth. Lo and behold, we must muster a new Army—boys and girls—full of hope, aspiration, intrepidity and grit. Let them enter the training camps, take intellectual and spiritual exercises and, when fit and hardy soldiers and soldierettes, go out into the world and fight the good old fight against sham, hypocrisy, intolerance and prejudices. A new battle cry was raised and from that banquet, it was sent out over the wires ringing round the world to echo and re-echo in the halls of memory for all the succeeding ages and cycles. What was that battle cry? Here it is—To Beheyeh Khanoum [Sister of Abdul Baha], Haija, Palestine, Love, Greetings, Western States Teaching Conference affirm loyalty Shoghi Effendi. Beg divine confirmations.

Reference to this talk was made in the following words by the late Mrs. Shahnaz Waite of Los Angeles, California, in her report of the Teaching Conference.

Next, our brother Ahmad spoke, and he called upon all the Juniors and young married Bahais to arise, and they did so with joyous faces. After they were seated, Ahmad drew a wonderful picture of our Juniors, as a band headed by their Young Captain—Shoghi Effendi—marching onward to Victory. He said that you Juniors were the Celestial Army that must carry on the work—the Great Work of spreading the New Civilization throughout the world. It was a most inspiring moment, and we older ones felt the deep significance of it all. We could see a mighty Army, headed by this Divine Youth—the Standard bearer of GOD'S Cause today, and so appointed by the Center of the Covenant, Abdul Baha—and we could hear with the mind's ear the songs of Peace and Love which you were singing as you went marching on. GOD speed you on your way—you the "Children of the Kingdom" of EL ABHA.

An Old Accusation

Practically, from the departure of the Master from this life until today, it has been charged against me by the Bahai Organization and by the members of the Community that I deny the Will of Abdul Baha and refuse to accept Shoghi Effendi as Guardian. Therefore, I take this opportunity to make a plain and unequivocal statement: Never in thought, word or writing have I questioned the authenticity of the Will, nor denied the validity of the appointment of Shoghi Effendi. Let us now hope that, once and for all time, this fact has been made clear and manifest.

Association with Shoghi Effendi

Let me state also that for several years (1913-1919), while acting as secretary and interpreter to Abdul Baha, I associated with Shoghi Effendi in Haifa and in the University of Beirut. We worked together; we served the same Master, he as a member of the family and I as a devoted follower; we discussed frankly and joyfully the past, present and future affairs of the Cause and in time, so far as I could judge, a genuine friendship was established between us. This friendship was continued, for when, in December 1918, Abdul Baha sent me to the United States with the Tablets of the Divine Plan, I requested Shoghi Effendi to take up the work which I had carried on for about seven years, that of reporting, in Diary Letters, accounts of the daily activities and of the talks given by the Master. Through these Diary Letters, the Bahai world would be kept fully informed, as it had been in the past, of what was going on in the life and in the vicinity of Abdul Baha. Consequently, beginning with December 23rd, 1918 (the very day that I left Haifa), Shoghi Effendi started to write interesting Diary Letters, describing the daily life of Abdul Baha and quoting from his conversations with guests and pilgrims. These were mailed to me regularly. Besides the letters, I received from him numerous postal cards giving lovely little glimpses of his own life. These Diary Letters and post cards I have treasured all these years as tokens of a friendship founded on the love of the Master.

The Diary Letters of Shoghi Effendi were at that time copied and distributed among some of the members of the Bahai Assemblies and a few of them were published in

The Star of the West (see Bound Volumes of Star of the West, Vol. X, pages 216-220 and Vol. XI, pages 48-52). Incidentally, the very first photograph of Shoghi Effendi that reached the United States was on the back of a post card addressed to me and dated July 13, 1919, which photograph I sent to the editors of The Star of the West. It is reproduced in Vol. X, page 210, with the following caption: Shoghi Effendi, Grandson of Abdul Baha, Translator of recent Tablets to, and letters from, Bahais of the United States and Canada. Writer of Diary Letters beginning in this issue of The Star of the West.

Rules, Regulations and a Lawsuit

After the ascension of Abdul Baha in 1921, certain reactionary and dogmatic forces began to make their appearance in the Cause. Almost unnoticeable at first, they, little by little, gained ground until at present, this movement, which was the most universal and liberal of all movements, past and present, has been reduced to a sect, while its spirit is all but extinguished. The principles of Baha-O-Llah are forgotten and in their stead we see nothing but a mass of rules and regulations that duplicate, to say the least, the ecclesiastical paraphernalia of previous organized religions.

Realizing the state of affairs and my inability to alter it, for years I kept clear from involvement with the organizational aspect of the Cause. At the same time, I gave my services whenever they were wanted and, more often, offered them when they were not wanted. Later, I associated myself with Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler and founded The New History Society. Through this medium I have been enabled, during more than eleven years, to disseminate the Bahai teachings in their purity, as I had learned them from Abdul Baha.

The story is a long and diversified one—human and dramatic—which culminated in court proceedings brought by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada against Mrs. Chanler and myself. In the application for an injunction, which was served on April 27th, 1940, following some legal correspondence which took place in December 1939 and January 1940, appeal was made to the court to prevent Mrs. Chanler and me from teaching the Bahai Cause and using the Bahai name.

A Reversal of Attitude

This bringing before the public of a controversy, which on our side had always been kept strictly to ourselves, has forced me to reverse my attitude on the whole issue. Seeing that matters had reached this point, reserve was no longer appropriate. I therefore resolved to review the activities of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. If, in the course of my writing, I have occasionally disagreed with the policies of Shoghi Effendi, it is not because I, in the least, contest the genuineness of the Will of Abdul Baha or question the appointment of Shoghi Effendi to the Guardianship, but because, as a Bahai, I maintain my freedom of conscience and hold to the injunction of Baha-O-Llah: Independent investigation of Truth. Citizens of the United States feel themselves at liberty to freely discuss, to agree or disagree with the policies of the President.

This does not imply that they question his right to occupy the White House, nor that they are planning to overthrow the government. On the contrary, it is an expression of their love for this country and of their desire to contribute toward its safety and betterment.

I believe that things should be reasoned out. In the Old Testament this question is very well emphasized: Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord. (Isaiah, Chapter I, 18). Now, if God invites us to reason with Him, it seems that reasoning with Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada should not be completely out of place.

In my discussion of the topics to be dealt with, I shall try my best to be fair and sane. I will be scrupulously fearless. I will not make statements without proving them. The Teachings of Baha-O-Llah, Abdul Baha, the letters of Shoghi Effendi, the writings of Bahai teachers, Bahai News, Bahai publications, and the laws and legislative procedure laid down by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada will be the sources of my authority. I will give exact references to pages in books, magazines, pamphlets, etc., put out by the Bahai Publishing Committee. I will show from the writings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha that the Cause that they had envisaged and for which they suffered is quite different and totally at variance with the one that is being taught today. One is divine revelation, the other is human authority; one is universal and all-inclusive, the other is restricted and separative; one is dignity and freedom of conscience, the other is subserviency and blind loyalty; one is wings outstretched, the other is feet enchained.

A Voice in the Wilderness

In assuming this rather unwelcome task, I hope to render a distinct service to the Cause in which I was brought up, in which I will die, and for which I would at any time make any sacrifice. I do not claim to be a leader. I do not seek followers. I have no wish that my name should be even remembered. I am simply a voice in the wilderness. Lastly, farthest of all from my thoughts is the idea of being destructive, for my aim is to re-discover the original spiritual teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, which were and are for the establishment of a divine civilization. Should I succeed in this, I know that my Master's smiles will be upon me.

CHAPTER II

BAHAI ODYSSEY

It all happened like this:

1919

Bearing the Tablets of the Divine Plan, revealed by Abdul Baha in Palestine during the World War, I landed in New York on March 18, 1919, from the S. S. Yeboshi Maru, after an adventurous trip through the Mediterranean and the Atlantic Ocean. At the 11th Annual International Bahai Congress which was held in the McAlpin Hotel, from April 26th to 30th, the above Tablets were successively unveiled and read, copies of the same in a booklet of 82 pages, entitled Unveiling of the Divine Plan, being distributed at the last session among the delegates and guests.

Immediately after the close of the Bahai Congress, I made an extensive tour throughout the United States and Canada, speaking before churches, schools, colleges, universities, clubs, numerous civic institutions and Bahai Assemblies. These lectures were principally on the Cause and on the implications of the Divine Plan; some of them related to my seven years' sojourn in Palestine in the service of Abdul Baha.

I was back in New York by April 1920 and spoke at the Twelfth Annual Bahai Congress and Convention held in the Aldine Club from the 24th to 28th of the same month.

1920-21

Here, in New York, at the Bahai Congress, I was most happy to meet for the first time Janabe Fazel Mazandrani, a Persian Bahai teacher and philosopher sent to America to promote the principles of Baha-O-Llah.

Then, after a few days, I received the following cablegram from Abdul Baha:

Haifa, June 21st, 1920

Be in important cities with Fazel.

Abbas.

Likewise, in a Tablet from Haifa, written June 25th, Abdul Baha wrote to me, giving further instructions on a lecture trip in which I was to accompany Janabe Fazel. Having just returned from my own tour, during which I had established many valuable connections both with the public and the press, I was in a position to help with the program and get it into fairly good shape without loss of time. Then we started off.

During our pilgrimage, which lasted nearly sixteen months, Janabe Fazel and I visited practically all the important cities of the United States, travelling as far as Seattle and Portland. A complete record of this journey is available in a collection of newspaper clippings; in my Diary Letters, published and circulated by the Bahai Teaching Committee of Washington, D. C.; in a series of articles written by myself under the title Persian Pilgrim's Pen Pictures, published weekly in a newspaper of Portsmouth, N. H., and in a large volume which embodies some of the lectures delivered by this brilliant teacher.

After Janabe Fazel had sailed homeward, I returned to Los Angeles, where, in order to become self-supporting, I set myself to the preparing of a number of lectures on Persian poetry and the great Faiths of the East. My studies having been completed, I had two leaflets printed, the first on literary and religious subjects, the other on the Bahai Cause, this latter to be given free and without charge. When these circulars had been distributed, I found that the churches, societies and clubs in the vicinity showed especial interest in the second circular, and I was kept busy delivering lectures on the Cause. This circumstance made me very happy, but did not add to my income; and my condition became distinctly precarious, as my audiences were scattered far and wide and I was forced to walk for miles in order to appear before them. I will here mention the fact that the allowance which Abdul Baha had provided for me since my arrival in this country had now stopped, owing to the departure of the Master from this life. Therefore, living as I did in the vicinity of Hollywood, I was tempted to visit the Studios, and presently I was working as extra or atmosphere in this or that picture. This industry fascinated me and through it I met many delightful people; so, while in the day time I portrayed pirates, or Oriental princes or beggars, at night time, dressed in my Persian robes and turreted with a gorgeous turban, I lectured on the Bahai Cause before distinguished and urbane audiences or recited the quatrains of Omar Khayyam for the relaxation of actors, artists, scenario-weavers and playwrights. In this way, I drifted into the founding of Firdousi Salon, a Wednesday evening club attended by a colorful non-descript crowd, which developed into a center of considerable notoriety.

By this time I had become barely self-supporting, although I still chiefly engaged myself in activities, such as scenario and playwriting and amateur clubs, which led me nowhere. Then, out of a clear blue sky, I received a cablegram from Haifa, dated April 11, 1923. It read:

Sohrab

Your active collaboration with Fazel at convention and teaching heartily desired.

Shoghi

In this manner, and through subsequent letters from New York and Boston, I was apprised of the fact that Janabe Fazel had returned from the East for another teaching campaign and that he was awaiting me in Washington, D. C. So, I set aside my lecture engagements and multifarious forms of relaxation and took the train for the nation's capital.

Once more we started off on a tour, which this time led us through the cities and towns of the Middle West. Everywhere the much loved teacher was greeted by friends, old and new, and noticeable interest in the Cause was engendered. Then, when the tour was brought to a conclusion I turned my steps once more toward my adopted home, Los Angeles.

During the years of 1922-23 I did a prodigious amount of work, writing, lecturing, acting as extra and running the Firdousi Salon. As I now look back upon those years, from March 18, 1919, when I landed in New York to January 16, 1924, I literally gasp at the mileage that I covered, the number of Bahai and non-Bahai lectures that I delivered, the amount of writing that I both used and discarded and the variety of occupations that kept me on the jump from morning to night. But, why do I stop at January 16, 1924? Because, on that day something happened that turned the current of my life from one direction to another. Because, on that day, through a chance circumstance (and I have to wonder if it really was a chance circumstance) I took hold of a chain of events which ultimately led to the establishment of The New History Society and to my expulsion from the organized aspect of The Bahai Cause.

January 16, 1924

On the evening of this day, I was speaking before the Bahais of Los Angeles on the life of Abdul Baha and, in the course of my talk, I brought in some stories about Mary Magdalene as I had heard them from the Master, himself. At the close of the lecture, a tall and very striking woman approached me and, without any preliminaries, asked: Can you write me a scenario on the life of Mary Magdalene? Of course, I answered. I certainly can. Then meet me tomorrow at the Biltmore Hotel and we will discuss the details at lunch. Whom shall I ask for? I stuttered weakly. Oh, and a twinkle came into her eyes, ask for Valeska Surratt.

Now, on Broadway this had been a name to conjure with, but to me, poor Bahai teacher and moving picture extra that I was, it meant nothing. Nevertheless, a meal at the Biltmore was not to be scoffed at, so the next day found me in a very luxurious dining room seated across the table from a lady, as glamorous as any I had ever seen, even from a distance. That I didn't do the courtly thing and pay for the lunch goes without saying, for I had at that moment exactly fifteen cents in my pocket, this sum representing my worldly possessions in their entirety; but, just the same, I managed to hold the interest of my companion to the extent that, when I returned to my little room in about three hours' time, I was carrying a contract for the writing of a scenario on Mary Magdalene together with advance payment in the form of a single bill of $100. That night, about thirty of my cronies, extras and vagabonds of various descriptions, had a feast, the like of which they had seen only in pictures.

Valeska Surratt left Los Angeles the next day, but during six months she regularly sent me $150 a month and many kind letters, while I, as an initial step in my task, made a coast to coast trip to study, in the main libraries of the country, whatever material was available on the subject of the proposed scenario; after which, having retired to a cabin in a secluded canyon about thirty miles from Los Angeles, I devoted myself to reflection and composition on the life of the great woman whose love had played no small part in the founding of Christianity. On June 19th, five months after the signing of the contract, I mailed to Miss Surratt in New York the typewritten manuscript of Mary Magdalene in 443 pages.

This scenario went through many vicissitudes, and did not reach the screen, although I still consider it one of the best pieces of work that I have done; and it happened that in the early part of 1927 I was sent for to come to New York in connection with some complications that had arisen concerning it. On the night of my arrival, Miss Surratt took me to dine with Mrs. Raymond Little, and it was there that I met Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler.

Now, Mrs. Chanler was a Bahai of but two years' standing and very deeply in love with the Cause. She had just completed a translation of Baha-O-Llah's Epistle to the Son of the Wolf from the French of Hyppolite Dreyfus and was ardently hoping to find some other avenue of service. Therefore, at this meeting, which I owe exclusively to Valeska Surratt, the idea came to Mrs. Chanler that my talents, as she graciously called them, could be put to better use in New York than in Hollywood; and a day or so later Mr. and Mrs. Chanler proposed that I should deliver a series of lectures at their house the following winter. The lectures were to be on Persian poetry and literature and would serve as a means of support until something else developed. Being a vagabond by nature and always ready to try something new, I accepted this offer; and the next autumn, having meanwhile returned to California for the summer, I opened a course of afternoon lectures in Mrs. Chanler's drawing-room before a group of her friends.

This series of lectures led to others, and toward the middle of the winter it was arranged that I should speak every Wednesday evening for twelve weeks at the Bahai Center. Mrs. Chanler rejoiced exceedingly over this plan and the meetings started out very successfully, drawing large numbers of people which increased week by week. Now, as a result of my sometimes casual and unorganized way of speaking, in the middle of the seventh lecture I digressed from the subject, which was A Universal Bible, and started to philosophize on the attitude that would be shown to Christ were he to come to New York during these days. He would certainly not be welcomed or appreciated; in fact, I continued rather facetiously, he would probably be arrested under the Volstead Act for turning water into wine. Now, it happened that a newspaperman, whom Mrs. Chanler had arranged to have present, reported the meeting in the next day's paper, featuring that single phrase out of my whole talk; and this article brought about my downfall from the platform of the Bahai Center. The following Wednesday evening, my place was taken by another speaker.

Toward the close of that year, Mrs. Chanler made arrangements for me to give a series of eight studies on the vital and mystic problems of modern life. These took place on Sunday evenings, from November 18, 1928, to January 6, 1929, at the little Florentine Room in the Park Lane Hotel, the course ticket of admission being $25.

It was a difficult step for Mrs. Chanler to take, because she had never sponsored anything in a public sense; and she was at this time pretty much alone as her intimates among her Bahai friends had drifted away after the fiasco at the Center. However, fortune favored us and we were able to carry on during the eight weeks of these philosophical lectures, speaking to audiences that filled our miniature hall to capacity.

Toward the end of this series of meetings at the Park Lane Hotel, Mrs. Chanler decided to take me into her confidence. The people are asking for more spiritual food than you are giving them, she said, they want the source of your teachings, and then she went on to suggest that, on the closing date, we announce three lectures on the Bahai Cause to be held in the same place and without charge.

What innocence, I thought to myself! Does she really imagine that I, as an individual, could teach the Bahai Cause, unmolested, in New York City or anywhere else for that matter! I did not give voice to this thought, believing that it would be difficult for her to understand it; so, in order to hide my embarrassment, I answered as lightly as I could, saying that the time had not yet come to teach the Cause in public.

While making this lame excuse, I caught a glimpse of Mrs. Chanler's stricken face and felt anything but comfortable. Who knew better than I that her sole object, during these two seasons of intense exertion, had been to establish me in New York so that I could apply myself to my Master's work in this city? And here I was letting her down in this ungrateful and brutal manner! My spirit was at a very low ebb as I sought my bed that night; yet I was convinced that I was acting in her interest as well as my own, and I laid my head on the pillow determined to return to Hollywood as soon as my departure could be arranged.

That night in a dream, I found myself in a little room in the hotel at Tiberias where I had often been with Abdul Baha. I was turning over the pages of my diary and, as I did so, I noticed a fragrance coming in through the window. The Master must be near, I said to myself and I went out, continuing in my mind: I will look for his footsteps in the sand and if I find them, I will place my own feet into them. I walked by the Sea of Galilee which was in a state of great commotion, and rising from the waves, I saw Abdul Baha in white turban and gown, which were wet as were his hair and beard; and Abdul Baha advanced over the water and joined me, standing at my side, and his hair and beard had become dry.

The Master said: Khayli Khoub, Mirza Ahmad, and slapped me on both cheeks, as he used to do; then, We will walk together. We began to walk, and the Master asked, Are you happy? Very happy, I answered. He went on: This will be a most significant year for you. You have much for which to be grateful to Baha-O-Llah; and to show your gratitude, you must do what she wants, you must teach the Cause. Great blessings will follow. He then withdrew over the sea, which had become as smooth as glass, and disappeared in the waters.

Next day, when I informed Mrs. Chanler that I had received my orders and was ready, I was surprised to learn that she also had had a dream that night. This was her dream as she related it to me:

She was in mid-sky, climbing upward on a slippery pole; and her endurance was ebbing fast. On her shoulder, warm and light, she felt the presence of her daughter, Elsie; and she realized that if she should fall, her daughter would fall with her. (Incidentally, Mrs. Chanler often told me that Elsie was a tower of strength to her during that difficult period, and that without her, she hardly knew how she would have gotten through.) As she clung with hands and body to the pole, in a state of complete exhaustion, she observed that, just above her, the pole was no longer perpendicular but made a complete loop; and she realized that, in order to continue, she must depend on her hands alone. This is too much for me, she thought; and yet she attempted it, swinging out into the air—and then, a sense of great ease possessed her, and a power supported her, lifting her around the loop to safety at the top.

We taught the Bahai Cause in the Florentine room on eight Sunday evenings to very interested audiences. Many Bahais came and took satisfaction in the work; Miss Bertha Herklotz, secretary of the New York Assembly, sold the standard Bahai literature at an improvised book table. Others, however, notably some members of the Local Center, were in a state of considerable unrest over the whole proceeding, and conditions became so difficult that Mrs. Chanler conceived an idea of serving the Cause in a manner that would be less controversial. So, at her request, I wrote to Shoghi Effendi concerning her plan, which was to the effect that I should leave immediately for the Orient, there to make research on the personal life of Baha-O-Llah on the terrain of Persia. I hoped, during the period of a year or two, to gather material and to prepare a book that would be unique and most useful for the furtherance of the Cause. Our thoughts were, therefore, running in this direction when I received the following cablegram from Haifa, dated March 7, 1929:

Teheran undertaking official history. Your travel East unnecessary.

Shoghi.

This cablegram was supplemented by a letter from the Guardian's secretary, dated the same day, in which he wrote: Shoghi Effendi would prefer to see you active in the field of service, teaching the Cause.

This decision, coming from Haifa, was a great disappointment to both Mrs. Chanler and me; but I immediately relinquished all thought of the proposed journey and made up my mind to remain in New York. The lectures had, by this time, been transferred to Mrs. Chanler's house, and there, when the close of the season had arrived, a handful of persons, from among the many that had listened to the Teachings, asked if they might form a group so that they could hold together during the summer months. We readily complied and arranged for a meeting to take place on April 5, 1929. When the guests arrived on that night, a name for the group had not yet been chosen. Mrs. Chanler wanted it to be The New History Society; I had another idea. Finally, at the very last moment, we agreed on the name; and The New History Society was founded then and there with a membership of twenty-eight men and women, which number comprised several Bahais of long standing.

Our public work had, since the very beginning, been looked upon with suspicion both by the Bahai officials and by various members of the Bahai community and, upon the founding of The New History Society, the opposition became very threatening. My policy, which I have held to throughout our Bahai partnership, was to let Mrs. Chanler reason things out by herself. I had my own conviction, which was a simple one—namely: that each Bahai was under definite obligations to Baha-O-Llah to teach the Cause; and that he must have freedom, and be unhampered in so doing. With the exception of my uncompromising attitude on this one point, I was ready to fall in, to co-operate with any group of Bahais, to receive advice, to talk things over, in other words to work in common. This of course was not sufficient, and Mrs. Chanler was subjected to an argument which lasted day in and day out, year in and year out, and which was extremely wearing to everyone concerned. All the while, as I mentioned before, I did not try to guide her, but left her free to make up her mind for herself as to the direction in which Truth lay.

I will not dwell on the methods that were used by individuals to try to break up my association with Mr. and Mrs. Chanler. I was called a charlatan, a money-grabber, a traitor to Abdul Baha. It was even said that I was afflicted with a disease, loathsome and infectious, which made of me a menace to society. Mrs. Chanler considered all these accusations, made up her mind as to their validity and went on with her work. Then, as the barrage of official communications began to descend upon her, she faced the opposition, met it and fought it with such faith and determination, such vision and spiritual logic, that I wondered then, as I wonder even now, at her courage and endurance. It would have thrilled the heart of any experienced spiritual warrior to note the supreme firmness and insouciance with which she held her ground, all the while suffering very deeply under this gallant exterior; but that is another story, and her own.

During that time, a great deal of correspondence was carried on between Shoghi Effendi and Mrs. Chanler. His sympathy regarding her work was, at the outset, most marked; and his consideration of her was expressed in very generous terms up to August 1930. Since that date, no letters have passed between the Guardian and Mrs. Chanler.

CHAPTER III

A DANGER SIGNAL

Conservatism and Liberalism

The history of mankind has been dominated by two forces—conservatism and liberalism. These have played their parts side by side, in politics, in education, in the arts and in religious practice, producing the illogical civilization that is apparent today. Traditions, folklore, customs and the instinct for self-preservation, all have co-operated toward placing the institutions of our society in the camp of the conservatives; and these have taken advantage of our weaknesses to consolidate their privileges and establish themselves on the throne of impeccable authority. Having on their side the solemnities of inherited sanctions and controlling the machinery of civilization, they have, through the centuries, made practice of stilling the voice of the liberals, of banishing them beyond the pale of society, of incarcerating them in prisons, of destroying their lives and, finally, when it was all but too late, of incorporating in their systems some of the ideals and principles that had been made available at so high a price to others. Thus, the vested interests of conservatism have ever been challenged in spite of perils; they are being challenged now, and will continue so to be, as long as the world remains imperfect and man aspires to something better than has yet been known and practiced.

A Strange Occurrence

Baha-O-Llah was the great spiritual and political revolutionary of the 19th century. His teachings tolled the death-knell of conservatism in these two domains. Consequently, when Abdul Baha, rising with unexampled majesty and power, dispensed his Father's message of liberty to the four corners of the globe, the reactionaries of all classes ridiculed this new system of thought and took violent exception to it. Then, a very strange thing occurred. A handful of men and women, from among these very reactionaries, took it into their heads to file into the precincts of the Cause. It was not the Teachings that moved them to acceptance; far from it! It was the personality of Abdul Baha that impressed and drew them irresistibly. So, these persons from the opposite camp, having penetrated the ranks of the rising rival movement and taken possession of its key positions, functioned as if in a dream during the lifetime of the Master, until, at the stroke of 1921 when Abdul Baha was removed from their midst, they suddenly awoke from the spell, rallied their forces and hoisted their old standard of staid conservatism above the unsuspecting forces of the insurgent Bahai Movement.

The Point under Discussion

The appearance of The New History Society on the Bahai horizon, in 1929, constituted a danger signal in the eyes of the conservatives within the movement, the more so in that a large percentage of their own membership looked with favor and much hope on this new effort to teach the Cause. This latter group, which included a number of the finest and most responsible of the older Bahais, saw in

The New History Society a means whereby to combat the reactionary tendencies within the organization, and during two years they championed our effort with great courage and determination. So, a flood of letters, coming from both camps, was let loose upon the Guardian of the Cause in Haifa; and Shoghi Effendi considered these conflicting views with a great deal of patience and made continuous attempts to bring harmony and unity into the feverish New York Center.

The point under discussion was a very clear cut one. The Local Assembly of this city wished to supervise our activities. I, on the other hand, owing to long experience with the Assemblies, was convinced that such supervision implied a complete domination and would lead to the total destruction of the work itself. We looked upon The New History Society as an independent effort to teach the principles of the Cause, and we needed freedom in so doing. Afterwards, when the initial interest had been created, we were ready to guide our new found friends to the Center, to arrange classes under the direction of its own Bahai teachers and to strive in every way toward the co-operation of the two groups. Such a plan was not too inconsistent with my principles, because at that time the Administration, while it manifested an exaggerated sense of authority, had not yet encumbered itself with many of the limitations that restrict it today. In fact, my personal opinion is that The New History Society, itself, is largely responsible for this accumulation of rules and regulations, for, as we continued to function in liberty, more and more did the National Spiritual Assembly wish to set itself up as something totally different, with the result that this body has grown out of all resemblance to the Bahai order as envisioned by Baha-O-Llah.

Bahai Meetings

During the winter of 1929-30 we held Bahai Meetings in the Oak Room of the Ritz Carlton Hotel. The lecturers in the first series were alternately Mr. Solon Fieldman, a good Bahai friend from Chicago, and myself. In the second series, we presented as our weekly speaker Mrs. Beulah Storrs Lewis, an experienced Bahai lecturer from Los Angeles. These remarkably well-attended meetings constituted our public work; while, at the same time we carried on Bahai classes, one group at Mrs. Chanler's house being under the direction of Mrs. May Maxwell, and a larger one in the Park Central Hotel, conducted in conjunction with Mrs. Maxwell, which was under the direction of Mr. Edward J. Kinney. In March 1930, we ventured again within the precincts of the Bahai Center taking with us our own new, yet fairly well-knit group, but at the close of this series of lectures we were not permitted to continue, as we would have liked to do, on account of a newspaper article that had appeared, regarding an imaginary building for our youth group The Caravan, which by this time had come into being.

Invitations which were Declined

The season of which I speak was packed full of activities, and very fruitful ones too; while simultaneously the undercurrent of argument with the Assemblies was going on at full tilt. It was repeatedly required of me that I should appear before the Local Assembly of New York and the National Spiritual Assembly, but I looked on these bodies as Religious Tribunals (which appellation they themselves did not use at the time but have used since) and believed that I would be trapped into making admissions, regarding my opinion of the organization, which would be used against me. Consequently, while I was at all times willing to discuss any and all matters with individual members of the Assemblies, I consistently refused to appear before their official groups.

The Final Word

These things are now long passed and one can look back to them with equanimity, but at the time they were harrowing in full measure. The question was this: Would Shoghi Effendi yield to the importunities of the National Spiritual Assembly and disown us, or would he, as Mrs. Chanler so ardently hoped, give us a chance to be useful? The axe was poised above our heads, held by a thread.

The whole story can be told best through extracts from the correspondence between Mrs. Chanler on the one hand and Shoghi Effendi and the National and Local Assemblies on the other; the correspondence, in typewritten form, is contained in a book entitled The New History Society and the Bahai Administration.

Plans for First Series of Bahai Lectures

To Shoghi Effendi from Mrs. Chanler, dated December 24, 1928.

. . . We have rented the room for eight more meetings. We are planning to send many, many announcements and to advertise in the papers. I know that we must do this thing, and we will do it to our utmost ability. Whether that ability is sufficient to make a mark in New York I cannot say, but everything in us both will go towards doing it well, and one thing is certain—the Bahai Cause will be spoken of in New York publicly, not behind closed doors. This will be good. . . .

I wouldn't take your time on such a long letter were it not that I wished for your sympathy in what we are trying to do. I want to assure you of Ahmad's and my love for you and tell you that our lives are concentrated in an effort to serve you.

Answer from Ruhi Afnan, dated January 19, 1929.

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your very kind letter dated December 24th, 1928. He was very glad to hear that Mr. Sohrab is doing good service in New York in the way of public speaking. He surely knows the Cause very well, being for such a long time with the Master, translating his letters and talks. All those who have been with the Beloved during his lifetime should feel the responsibility they bear and do their utmost, shouldering it, especially those who were, we may say, nurtured by him. . . .

Shoghi Effendi very much appreciates the wonderful service you have rendered the Cause and is always waiting to see what the next will be. . . .

Postscript added by Shoghi Effendi:

My dear and precious co-worker:

I wish to add a few words in person as a token of my keen appreciation of your past services and of my fervent hope and prayer for the future extension of your manifold activities. I welcome Mirza Ahmad's collaboration with you, in such an open and direct manner, for a wider diffusion and a better understanding of the purpose and the principles of the Bahai Faith.

I will pray for the success of your efforts from the depths of my heart.

Account of First Series of Bahai Lectures

To Shoghi Effendi from Mrs. Chanler, dated March 4, 1929.

. . . Ahmad put his whole heart into this work. I can say that at the lectures and in the time intervening, he has consecrated himself wholly and he has always spoken beautifully. I think the people have been impressed with his modesty and simplicity and his real depth of feeling, and he has made something of a name for himself, but this is only incidental. . . .

It will take time to show if we have really taken a step forward, but I think that we have, and the word "Bahai", as I wrote you in the beginning, is really known in New York very, very much more than before. . . .

Now that the lectures are over, I can just thank God that they went through without any hitch. Mrs. Maxwell has been very kind and encouraging and Juliet Thompson has surrounded me with an ocean of love. . . .

When I realize how much there is to be done, I think that we have accomplished almost nothing, but this year's experience will help us in the future, I am sure, and Abdul Baha knows how much I long to serve Him.

Answer from Soheil Afuan, dated March 28.

I am directed by Shoghi Effendi to thank you very much for your letter of March 4th with enclosure.

He is indeed very much pleased to learn that your meetings at the Hotel have been successful, and if they at least directed the thought of the better classes in New York to the teachings of the Movement and a study of its writings, it is in itself a great service.

He wishes me, however, to assure you that no matter what measure of success attends your efforts, he feels he must express his deep appreciation of your eagerness to cooperate with him in the service of the Cause, and of the sincere spirit that has animated your endeavors. Indeed, were you to do what a New York paper alleged, namely, "to make God fashionable," you would not only be conferring a blessing to the fashionable, but a great service to all those who follow the fashionable. . . .

Postscript added by Shoghi Effendi:

My dear and precious co-worker:

Your manifold services, past and present, are truly worthy of praise and admiration. I deeply appreciate your high endeavors and will continue to supplicate for you at the holy Shrine. . . .

The National Spiritual Assembly Expresses Itself

During this time, the National Spiritual Assembly was watching our activities very closely, and now the first letter from this body was sent to Mrs. Chanler, the theme of which was an offer of co-operation.

March 25, 1929.

. . . The National Assembly, therefore, is anxious to make it clear to you that its members unreservedly desire to assist and cooperate in every possible way to assure the complete success of the public meetings held under your auspices and announced as Bahai meetings.

We realize of course that you have not requested this cooperation, but this very fact makes it the more essential that we offer you at this time an explanation of what we conceive to be, from the writings of Abdul Baha as well as from the letters of Shoghi Effendi, the conditions essential to successful Bahai service in the teaching field. . . .

Thus, to take a specific instance, when an individual Bahai desires to serve the Cause by holding public meetings under the Bahai name, the general plan and arrangements are reported to the local or National Assembly beforehand. . . . The local or National Spiritual Assembly is only concerned with two facts: whether the meetings in question give the Bahai teachings correctly, and whether the meetings involve any conditions that might detract from the dignity, nobility and sacred character of the Cause. . . .

Our hope, therefore, is that you will consult personally or enter into communication with the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of New York in the matter of your present and future plans which involve the Bahai name and teachings, in order that these activities may be blessed with the confirmation of Abdul Baha, spread in this city, which He termed "The City of the Covenant," the very essence of the teachings of Baha-U-Llah, and create for you an honor and glory that will endure in the history of the Cause.

Now, Mrs. Chanler knew that co-operation meant supervision of our programs and of everything that was said on our platform. It implied endless discussions and certain interruptions of the work. We felt that we could not risk it; so, in answering this letter, Mrs. Chanler merely invoked the universality of the Cause in general terms.

April 3, 1929.

The National Spiritual Assembly

Dear Mr. Holley:

I would like to thank you for your letter and answer it in a spirit of sincerity.

Two thousand years ago, in an age of ignorance and servitude, the Word of God appeared upon the earth, and the Word was free. Now in these enlightened times, when liberty is the heritage of all men, (when incidentally they exact it) the Word of God returns to them without limitations.

I believe this, because I consider the Bahai Cause to be no less universal than was Christianity.

I appreciate your offer of cooperation and thank you for any kindness which you may feel towards my work. I have already availed myself many times of Mrs. Maxwell's wisdom and friendship and I hope to have often the opportunity of doing so again.

For the present, I am thinking of just one thing:

Jesus said to his disciples—"Go ye unto all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" and Abdul Baha said to Ahmad Sohrab—"Go and teach."

I am going to try to help him.

This letter of Mrs. Chanler's was answered by Mr. Horace Holley before it was presented to the National Spiritual Assembly.

Your letter will be presented at our next meeting, but meanwhile I am sure that I express the attitude of all the members when I say that your letter will cause surprise and real disappointment. It really seems inexplicable that any devoted and sincere student of the teachings of Baha-U-Llah and Abdul Baha should claim for the Bahai Cause a universality, in terms of complete freedom of action for individuals, in direct contradiction to the teachings themselves. The National Assembly would fail in its loyalty to you as well as in its responsibility for upholding the Cause if we did not emphasize this essential point. . . .

As I tried to make clear before, the anxiety of the National Assembly to see your Bahai services established upon a firm and enduring foundation is not an expression of any claim to arbitrary authority on the part of the Assembly, but is entirely a matter of obedience to the authentic Bahai writings.

An Appeal for Protection

After midnight, on April 5th, Mrs. Chanler wrote to Shoghi Effendi giving a description of the founding of The New History Society at her house, at 132 East 65th Street. She realized that something of importance had just occurred, and she looked overseas to Haifa for the safeguarding of this new-born effort to serve the Cause.

April 6th

. . . I have just passed an evening that has made me very happy. The people have gone home only a little while ago. We have been having meetings here, as I wrote you; meetings which had a wonderful spirit. They numbered about forty-five or fifty people, the last three times.

Lately, we decided to draw up a plan of Universal Ideals for those who wished to subscribe to them, and who would in this way bind themselves together and so prevent a scattering during the summer. I am sending you the Plan which Ahmad drew up. We called it "The New History Society."

Just as from the lectures of the Park Lane a cream arose to the surface which enrolled in "The New History Society," so, a cream will rise to the surface of this society which will become Bahais. . . .

Tonight, twenty-eight people enrolled and some asked time to think it over and to enroll later. Ahmad had given a talk about the disciples of Christ, and those who wished to, went into the other room and signed their names and then came back and shook hands with all those who had already signed. It was pouring outside, thunder and lightning, and something was happening in the room,—I believe something wonderful. You see, a very few of us knew each other, because the meetings have been large, and it is hard to remember faces and names, but in that handclasp something was broken down and, after a short prayer, the rain stopped and LOVE appeared in the room. I have never in all my life seen such happy, moved faces and I believe all those people went home on wings. Many of them seemed to think that they had joined the Bahai Cause and came to me with plans for spreading it. A man from Cornell College, who had come only to one meeting before tonight, said to me that he had found what he had been looking for, and that he knew many to whom he would offer what he had found. Another man "has been looking everywhere, but has now found the Highest." Many women said things of the same kind. Mr. Senitha, who has been with us almost from the start, said: "This ball is rolling now. It will grow very large," and I, who seldom dare to be hopeful, believe that a wonderful CHILD has been born.

Beloved Guardian, I place it under your protection!

Mrs. Chanler's Right to Vote Questioned

Letter from the Local Assembly of New York to Mrs. Chanler, dated April 15, 1929.

Wishing to inform us of the status of your teaching work, the National Spiritual Assembly has spread before us the joint correspondence covering this point. Although the question has passed to a higher administrative division of the Cause and your answer has been directed to them rather than to your Local Assembly, as suggested in their letter of March 25th, nevertheless, the vital question of your voting in the Cause must be settled through the Assembly in your Community.

Will you kindly let us know, so that our records may be accurate and correct, whether you wish—in the words of Abdul Baha—to “obey with heart and soul” the bidding of the Assembly “and be submissive unto it,” or wish to withdraw from its divinely appointed authority.

In deep earnestness we pray that your really great activities, so sincerely appreciated not only by the members of your local group but by our dear Guardian, will be pursued as directed by him in his latest published letter and also as requested of you by the National Spiritual Assembly. . . .

Will you kindly let us know as soon as possible what status you choose?

April 17, 1929.

. . . In my service this winter, I have made use of an instrument prepared for this work by the Master himself. In view of the fact that when this instrument was in their hands, the Local Assembly did not find it in their hearts to allow the Cause to profit by it, and being convinced that it should be used, at this time when instruments are few, I, with the help of God only, brought the Bahai Cause before the public of New York with an effectiveness unequalled since the days of Abdul Baha.

Now, since these services have, in the estimation of the Local Board, made me undesirable as a voter, I will, in conformance with their suggestion, absent myself for the present from the Bahai Center.

A second letter to Mrs. Chanler from the Local Assembly of New York continues:

April 19, 1929.

Every member of this Spiritual Assembly hopes, desires and prays that you may continue as a voting member of this Cause, but the principles of Bahai Administration are clear as to the qualifications of a voter. . . .

The question already submitted to you in our previous letter is whether or not, according to the qualifications quoted above, you consider yourself a member of this Assembly and are willing to comply with these requirements. This is a choice you alone can make, you cannot shift the responsibility of making this choice to the local Spiritual Assembly.

On the day of election, Mrs. Chanler, wishing to demonstrate the fact that, as far as she was concerned, she still was a member of the Bahai Assembly, presented her vote at the Center, by proxy, through Mrs. Margueritta Smythe. Her vote was refused.

Problems

Now, Shoghi Effendi wrote to Mrs. Chanler, through his secretary, on the problem which the founding of The New History Society had brought into the Cause.

April 30, 1929.

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your very interesting and kind letter dated April 6th. I cannot say that it is an easy task to comment upon such a letter, for one is inevitably caught between two difficult problems, neither of which can be overlooked.

This last year, it has been a source of delight for Shoghi Effendi to see you come to the front, earnestly and courageously advocating the Cause and its principles. . . . The work you have been able to do, he hopes, will, through God's help, bear abundant fruit. He conceives it therefore a crime to throw cold water on such a burning zeal which may be a part of God's plan in spreading the Cause in America. In fact, he wishes me to assure you of his prayers and best wishes that you may succeed in your ardent labors. .

On the other hand, he feels the responsibility of suggesting to you certain points that may ultimately add to your success and meantime be more conformant with the wishes of the Master.

The objective of the Cause, as explained by the Master, is unity. What then would happen with the Cause if, from its earliest days, different groups and societies are created within it. No matter with what spirit a certain group may come together, once it tries to create an independent identity for itself, it immediately becomes an organism seeking its own individual growth. This organism can never again merge itself with the mother organism. . . .

Perhaps by not labeling yourself as a separate group and cooperating more fully with the Assemblies you could teach the Cause and also obviate these difficulties that may ensue. . . .

The present Assemblies are surely imperfect, but they are the seeds from which this great administrative body is to grow. . . .

From Paris, Mrs. Chanler wrote to the Guardian giving a resumé of the situation.

May 11, 1929.

It is a grief to me that my attempts to serve the Cause should have brought this controversy before you and taken any of your time. Even now I am going to write about inharmonious things. I am sorry.

You know that I brought Ahmad back to the Organization last year. He had resisted my desires for weeks, but when he came to them, he came with his whole heart and like a child. They knew that they needed him, yet, in spite of this, they gave no friendliness, no cooperation. I saw many instances of this. Life is a game and they have backed him to lose, and by now it is a question of pride. You remember when he was in the West, occupying himself with his own interests, they said that he was faithless to the Cause; when he worked in the Organization last year, they expelled him, and when he works outside the Organization, they are dissatisfied. So, if he doesn't work for the Cause, if he works in the Cause, or if he works outside the Cause for the Cause, all are wrong. There seems to be no way out, and this is a devoted servant who has proved himself useful. I don't understand it, but it must be for a reason—beautiful things happen too that one doesn't understand. . . .

The Organization in New York has had a long opportunity to serve. Someone brought me the list of members the night that my vote was rejected. It numbered 179 people. This is the result of all these years and of much money. I think that they don't know how to teach the Cause. They talk of commands, submission, autocracy. They don't talk of love. I don't think that they know what love is. If someone were lucky enough to bring in new members of capacity, I believe that they would consider it an intrusion, and would fear that the comfort of their little club might be threatened. Abdul Baha said that the Cause might become extinct in America. I think that these people can't save it. . . .

I would like, under the auspices of The New History Society, to teach the Bahai Cause publicly next winter. I may, by that time, be able to get other speakers too. We would not be breaking the rules of the Organization if we were separate. I think that it would look so well on invitations and announcements to say: "The New History Society presents So and So, speaking on the Bahai Cause." As time goes on, I would make an effort to influence those who accept the Faith to identify themselves with the Organization.

Let us try to serve you in this way. I can answer for our loyalty if for nothing else. I would like to work under your protection, but if this is too much, then I ask you to withhold your condemnation. Give us a chance to be useful, and if at the end of a year or two you are pleased, then perhaps you will give us your approval. . . .

In the autumn of 1929, we made arrangements for the activities of the winter, and Mrs. Chanler wrote to Shoghi Effendi regarding our program, which included Mr. Solon Fieldman of Chicago.

October 26, 1929.

I enclose to you our program for the coming winter and you will see that there are now three of us engaged in your service. . . .

I pray that this combination will be blessed. We are all three beginning the winter's work with much love and confidence in each other and looking to Baha-U-Llah for his presence and his help. It is in the hands of God.

Answer from Ruhi Afnan:

December 21, 1929.

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your very kind letter dated October 26th. He fully appreciates the earnest spirit and deep conviction that you have put in your work and sincerely prays for the realization of your ideal. But he cannot consider the work of The New History Society except as another experiment to spread the movement. May God make it successful and of a brilliant future! To him you, with your devotion, sacrifice and perseverance mean more than any such society. His interest in it is only to see the way your noble qualities are going to find an expression in its working.

We have lately heard from New York that soon absolute unity will be established and full cooperation between the Assembly and yourself will be obtained. Shoghi Effendi hopes that this is true and that you will not deprive your society of the inspiration that such a unity will bring to it. Such a unity, however, should not be by winning them to your cause, but rather by raising its banner on your front.

Shoghi Effendi, in his moments of prayer, will remember you and ask for you divine guidance. He wishes me to assure you of all his interest in your work, of all his appreciation for your endeavors, and of all his hope that you will attain your ideal and goal, namely, the service of the Cause and the spread of the Divine message of Baha-U-Llah.

CHAPTER IV

AT THE FORK OF THE ROAD

A Bahai Trio

The meetings of 1929-1930, conducted in the Oak Room of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, were very successful. Mr. Solon Fieldman and I alternately held the platform and, as we were very different types, the audience found much interest in comparing our approaches to the Bahai teachings. Mr. Fieldman was an orator of the old school, very dramatic and impassioned, while I am apt to speak in a more matter of fact way. We believed that we made a good team and when, in midwinter, Mrs. Beulah Storrs Lewis, a beautiful and expert teacher, travelled all the way from Los Angeles to take part in our work, we were conscious of the fact that we were offering to the New York public a presentation of the Cause that was very colorful indeed. Throughout these meetings, we sold a great deal of literature provided by the Bahai Center, and the Message of Baha-O-Llah penetrated to many circles and touched countless hearts.

A Recruiting Station

By this time, large numbers of the members of the Bahai organization had actually joined The New History Society. This membership with us in no wise affected their loyalty to the Center, for all of us looked on the new movement as a sort of recruiting station, and we often termed it as such.

In a letter addressed to Mr. Roy Wilhelm, member of the National Spiritual Assembly, Mrs. Chanler brought up this point and stressed the urgent need of teaching the Cause without loss of time.

Feb. 11, 1930.

I myself have not the conviction that the Bahai Cause will be accepted by the world. Its principles and ideals will be; already they are spreading far and wide, but will the name of Baha-U-Llah go with them? This to me is uncertain.

I believe that Christ would not have been called the Man of Sorrows, if his greatest suffering had not been concern over the success of his mission, and that Abdul Baha would not have labored so unceasingly, if his accomplishment had been beyond the realm of doubt. Also, I think the burden of Shoghi Effendi would be lighter, if the establishment of the Kingdom of Baha-U-Llah were unquestionable. I know that in this I differ from many, but I believe that the WORD which God gives is dependent upon the people who receive it for its ultimate realization.

Feeling as I do, I don't want to waste any time. The Cause has had a start in New York and I will not abandon IT.

Ahmad and I alone came before the public last year. The Bahais weren't with us, neither were my own friends, yet the results were miraculous; for God worked through us to His own ends.

Now that I see how much the people want this Cause I cannot refuse it to them, but will go on teaching; and if you want us to work for you, we will do so with all our hearts. We will send people to the Center hoping that they will be well received. We wish to be a Recruiting Station for you. . . .

As no answer to this letter was received, it is legitimate to try to imagine the reaction that it caused. We wish to be a recruiting station for you. This phrase brings up a picture of what might have happened if Mrs. Chanler's plea had been granted, namely: The New History Society, from time to time, opening its flood-gates and allowing a stream of immature Bahais to filter into the precincts of the Assembly. So far so good; but how about the voting season? Would it not be likely that these fresh, untrammelled minds would pick out some new officers to represent them, and that within a few years a large part of the administrative personnel would be changed? This supposition brings up a serious point, applying to both National and Local Assemblies, the former having been functioning since time out of mind with practically no change of officers.

An Occasion for Rejoicing

Toward the middle of the winter, Mrs. Chanler conceived the idea of conducting our group to the Center and of teaching from there, in an effort toward reconciliation. She discussed this plan with Mrs. Maxwell and Mr. and Mrs. Kinney, and these friends of ours enthusiastically agreed to do all in their power to bring it into effect. Consequently, through their good offices, we were enabled to start a course of lectures at the Center, with Mr. Solon Fieldman and myself speaking alternately as we had done at the Ritz.

The opening evening was an occasion for much rejoicing to all those who had wished to bring about unity between the two groups. Mrs. Chanler described the meeting to Ruhi Afnan, Secretary to the Guardian, in the following letter.

March 6, 1930.

Last night, Ahmad took a considerable part of The New History Society to the Bahai Center and there, after my husband had left, presided over the rest of the evening with much love and sweetness. There was a radiancy of happiness there and a gratitude to God, on the part of many, too deep for words.

Ahmad has proved himself a power of inestimable value to the Cause, as I saw in the beginning without need for proof; and now we are looking to a future full of promise, with a rapt hope.

It is needless to dwell on how much we have suffered during these two years. Our nerves are nearly broken and some of us are ill. Our darling Juliet Thompson couldn't be present last night as her health has been affected, following the long strain.

In answering, Ruhi Afnan says:

March 26, 1930.

I had already heard through Mrs. Harris of the wonderful spirit that prevailed at the meeting that The New History Society had held at the Bahai Center. Shoghi Effendi sincerely hopes and prays that this friendship will wax stronger every day and that the petty differences and misunderstandings will fade away.

Through the circular letters of Ahmad and the various other channels, I have been following up the work of The New History Society with great interest, and even though I objected to various things I could not but admire some of the work achieved.

A Ghost in the Attic

It will be noted that throughout this correspondence, I figure as a strange character, sometimes praised but for the most part ignored. I am a sort of skeleton in the cupboard or ghost in the attic, casting a baneful influence on the thoughts of everybody, yet unmentionable, as far as possible, to the truly well-bred. Mrs. Chanler assumed full responsibility as defendant of The New History Society, using the pronoun I pretty consistently. Knowing, as she did only too well, that I was distrusted by the Administration, she felt that the work would have a better chance to get by if she claimed it as her own exclusively. In the following cablegram, sent to Shoghi Effendi, when The New History Society was just one year old, I affix my signature for the first time.

Cablegram

We, The New History Society, with a membership of 341, are celebrating, this April 5th, our First Anniversary Festival in the Persian Garden of Ritz Carlton.

We send you our heartfelt love and devotion.

We beg you to supplicate for our confirmation in the service of mankind at hallowed shrines of the Bah, Baha-U-Llah and Abdul Baha—the three Great Lights of the age.

Pray for us that, with the increase of our membership, we may add to our zeal in freeing our fellowmen from the chains of past prejudices and fanaticism, and upraise the flag of the Oneness of the World of Humanity in the kingdoms of the hearts.

The New History Society,
Julie Chanler
Ahmad Sohrab.

Aftermath

On the morning following this birthday celebration, one of the New York papers gave much space to The New History Society, featuring in flamboyant terms a building which our youth group, The Caravan, hoped to build in the far-flung future. We did not have one cent reserved for this project, yet the reporter devoted almost a column to a description of the idea; at the same time, four hundred thousand dollars had just been raised for the construction of the Bahai Temple near Chicago and the actual news pertaining to this enterprise, as contained in a release put out by Mr. Holley, was included in this article, compressed into a few lines.

This publicity did not in the least please us; in fact, it caused us much distress, but by this time we knew enough about newspaper methods to realize that their writers featured what they wished, and that there was nothing to be done about it.

On the same day, Mrs. Chanler wrote to the Local Assembly expressing her thanks for the hospitality that had been accorded our group during the preceding weeks, and asking permission to continue the meetings at the Center one night a month throughout the spring and summer. This request was refused on account of the above mentioned publicity. Thus, our second attempt to work at the Center was brought to a sudden halt in exactly the same manner as the first one had been—through a newspaper article. These two incidents show, as well as anything could, the fate that would have befallen The New History Society had it been irrevocably delivered into the hands of the Assemblies.

Cablegram

On April 9, 1930, The New History Society received an answer to its cablegram addressed to the Guardian:

My prayer at holy shrines for History Society is that its members may increasingly realize that the efficacy and permanence of their endeavors lie in unreserved acceptance of teaching of Baha-U-Llah and Abdul Baha. May they be blessed and guided to identify themselves wholly with the Faith. Reciprocate your loving greetings.

Shoghi.

Ordeal by Fire and Firecrackers

During the progress of her public work, Mrs. Chanler had formed many new friendships in the Bahai Community, and these associates had given her great moral support throughout the long encounter with the Assemblies. All the while, the point at issue was: What would be the ultimate decision of Shoghi Effendi? Should he throw in his weight against The New History Society, these Bahai sympathizers would be forced to accept his verdict and sever their connection with us; on the other hand, should he, as they so earnestly hoped, give wings to this experiment, it was certain that a new era of enthusiasm and activity in the Cause would ensue. The period of uncertainty was very trying, bringing nerves to a breaking point and, as signs became more and more ominous, insistent pressure was brought upon us to make some sort of compromise.

I remember an amusing incident which took place at that time. One of the older Bahais, who had never met Mrs. Chanler, came to call and, when the visit was drawing to a close, this lady presented her hostess with a lovely white rose, saying that it was her custom to give white roses to all persons who were ill. Mrs. Chanler was about to protest that she was in perfect health, when she suddenly realized that the implication was on the grounds of spiritual illness; so she simply thanked her guest with a smile.

Another humorous experience returns to my mind. There was a Bahai from New Zealand, spending some weeks in New York, who used to drop in at our meetings from time to time. One evening, learning that he was in a bad state financially, I took him to my room to spend the night. Then, in the morning he speeded to the Center, and this is the story that he told:—

After some hours of rest, he had awakened and, looking over at me, had seen me lying in the unconsciousness of sleep, revealed in my true colors:—two horns had made their appearance on my forehead!

This account of my night with the New Zealander circulated among the Bahais, some of whom believed that this young man had had a flash of second sight; while I, when it finally came to my ears, only wished that the season had been summer when no blankets are used, for in that case, the story would doubtless have culminated in a long, sleek, curling tail!

Representative members of the Bahai organization did their utmost to make us understand the laws of the Administration. Out of the goodness of their hearts and in their devotion to the Guardian, they explained the importance of obedience to the Central Authority but, although we would have liked to meet them more than half way, we were convinced that this young movement would not long survive the ministrations of the Assemblies. Mrs. Chanler's soul questionings during that winter were continuous and intense, for they centered around the possibility of doing permanent injury to the Cause. She was in a state close to collapse when she sailed for Europe in the spring of 1930.

Little Regiment for Shoghi Effendi

Before her departure, classes for The New History Society under the direction of Mr. Edward J. Kinney had been opened at the Park Central Hotel. Mrs. Chanler expected that this teaching work would bear fruit. In the month of June she sent a cablegram to Mr. Kinney.

Overjoyed wonderful meetings. Believe you will collect little regiment for Shoghi Effendi. May the Master help you.

One More Chance

In July, I received a visit from Mr. Alfred Lunt, member of the National Spiritual Assembly, who carried in his pocket the draft of an article destined to appear in Bahai News of the following month. In this statement, The New History Society was disowned by the authorities, and it constituted, therefore, the long dreaded break with the Administration.

I read the typewritten pages very carefully, realizing that I was being given one more chance, and then I told Mr. Lunt that, as far as I was concerned, the paper could go to press. However, I continued, if you put your signature to this, the day will come when you will wish that you had cut off your right hand instead.

This prophecy of mine was never fulfilled, for a few years later Alfred Lunt died, to the grief of the Bahai community. He was a talented and warm-hearted man, a devoted servant of the Cause and a definitely liberalizing influence on the National Spiritual Assembly.

A Thunder Clap

And now the inevitable, which had been warded off for so long, happened. It electrified the Bahai community in this city; while The New History Society, which had always been kept in utter innocence of what was going on regarding it, went on its own light-hearted way in complete unconcern.

The first pronouncement against The New History Society was published in the pages of Bahai News of August 1930 under the ominous title: The Case of Ahmad Sohrab and The New History Society. Here are a few quotations:

The National Spiritual Assembly finds it necessary to make a definite statement to the Bahais of the United States and Canada concerning the relations of The New History Society and the Cause.

This Society was started in New York City early in 1929 by Ahmad Sohrab, one of its avowed purposes being to spread the Bahai teachings. Neither the Local nor the National Assembly was consulted in the matter, and the meetings and activities of The New History Society have been maintained apart from the principles of consultation and Assembly supervision which today, under the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha, form the basis of Bahai unity and protection of the Cause. . . .

Under these conditions it becomes the obvious responsibility of the National Spiritual Assembly to inform the friends that the activities conducted by Ahmad Sohrab, through The New History Society, are to be considered as entirely independent of the Cause; as outside the jurisdiction of the Local and National Assembly, and hence in no wise entitled to the cooperation of Bahais. . . .

In clarifying this difficult situation for the body of believers, the National Assembly urges an attitude which shall express full loyalty to Bahai administration and also unfailing kindness and good will to individuals. . . .

Every believer must take to heart this lesson, that individual Bahai effort, without due consultation, is foredoomed to failure.

A Volunteer

When Mr. and Mrs. Chanler received the news, in Paris, that The New History Society had been severed root and branch from the parent tree, they were not shaken in the least. Even now, I smile as I recall Mr. Chanler's cablegram to me. In it, he offered to open the lectures himself during the coming winter, speaking on the Twelve Bahai Principles.

Now, in the past, Mr. Chanler had been a speaker of note, having been Lieut.-Governor of New York State and a distinguished criminal lawyer; but he had retired long ago, and besides he had never studied the Bahai teachings. This generous suggestion, therefore, implied a great effort on his part, but he was willing to make it, in order to stand by the work; and I accepted his offer gratefully and without a qualm.

In the Hands of the Master

In the year 1926, shortly after she had come into the Cause, Mrs. Chanler had made a pilgrimage to Haifa, Palestine, to visit the Holy Shrines. There she had the inestimable happiness of spending an hour with The Greatest Holy Leaf, daughter of Baha-O-Llah, and the ladies of the household. It happened that Shoghi Effendi was not feeling well that day, so she did not have the privilege of meeting him.

I believe that Mrs. Chanler's reaction to the break with the Bahai Administration could be no better described than in a letter written by her, at the time, to Rouha Khanoum, daughter of Abdul Baha. It reads as follows:

September 8, 1930.

The evening before I left Paris, your letter came to me and I took it out to Versailles where we were going, and there I read it many times. As I looked at the beautiful trees and listened to the orchestra, my eyes were full of tears, and my heart full of love for you and infinite gratitude. This message of friendship, coming at a time when my life had so changed, affected me very much, and I felt that on this new path I was taking a jewel of your giving; and even if I do not see you again, and even if you feel you cannot write to me again, I will always count on your love and every day give you mine.

I have never talked to you about the trouble which has passed, but today I will say a few words about it. Often in the past, I have heard the Bahais say (Mr. Mills, Mr. Holley and others): "If only a way could be found to spread the Cause!" Just by chance, because the Organization would not use Ahmad, we stumbled on the method of The New History Society. This has proved a very effective one, and the chief reason for its success has been that it was free. Here, without obligation to any one, the people hear about the Bahai Cause and gradually absorb it.

We cannot, with a free conscience, sell these people behind their backs to any Organization, much less to an Organization, orthodox, cruel and unsuccessful. Just the same, we tried to serve this Organization. We never spoke against them. We brought them the results of our efforts. When I left for Europe, Ahmad, with all his resourcefulness and enthusiasm, was directing the course of The New History Society straight toward the Administration. Surely many, many dozens would have joined then; and they would have set a precedent which would have been followed by the very best souls in their ranks, month by month, year by year.

The Bahai Cause is almost dead in America; what is left of it is pitiful and ignoble. I believe that Abdul Baha is tired of this situation, and before him I say that I believe that he is using us to start the Cause once more. Where he will lead us, I don't know. The National Assembly has turned the course of The New History Society away from the Administration, and it would seem just about impossible to turn it back. We are in the hands of the Master and we are not a bit afraid. Wonderful Berthalin is with us. It makes a lot of difference.

Beloved Rouha Khanoum, every hour I turn my face to the Master and I do not feel his displeasure. I only feel his love and I am very happy.

A Higher Court

When Mr. and Mrs. Chanler reached New York in the early autumn, they learned that the Guardian had endorsed the action of the National Spiritual Assembly through the following cablegram, published in Bahai News of September 1930.

Approve action regarding History Society. Deeply appreciate loyalty (of) believers.

Shoghi.

Then, a few days after their arrival, Mr. and Mrs. Chanler, to their surprise, received a communication from the National Spiritual Assembly:

September 25, 1930.

The National Assembly is meeting in West Englewood, N. J. on October 10th, 11th and 12th, 1930. They would like very much if you both could accept their warm invitation to meet with them informally and talk over the various matters which are common to our hearts.

They feel that association and a better understanding of each other and the welding of acquaintance and friendship will be of the greatest value in forwarding and advancing the ideals and purposes for which we are all striving.

MR. O. J. HANKO

They sincerely hope you will accept this sincere invitation in the spirit of love and friendship in which it is sent.

Anytime convenient for you can be arranged for—whether during the sessions or dinner or lunch.

Looking forward to the happiness of meeting you.

It may be remembered that in the National Spiritual Assembly's pronouncement against The New History Society my name alone was mentioned. Therefore, without much reading between the lines, one can judge that the purpose of the above letter was to dissociate Mr. and Mrs. Chanler from a lost cause—in other words, it implied a suggestion to leave the sinking ship.

It took next to no time for Mrs. Chanler to answer this invitation and, within a few hours, her letter was on its way. To my mind, this is a great document, and posterity can judge its contents according to its own standard:

Dear Friends in the Cause of Baha-U-Llah:

I was touched by your kind letter of September 25th which I received this morning and I believe with you that a sincere friendship between us all would not be impossible, even after the difficulties which have passed. I do not feel any pride or any stubbornness, and if you will allow me to say so, I have a little love for all of you, which may or may not be acceptable.

Last year, although I jealously guarded this work of ours, my purpose was only, and entirely, to bring the fruit of it to your doors. I would not have liked to miss one sincere soul among our members, but wanted to bring all of them to strengthen your forces at your center. This was my heart's desire, and without this aim I would have had no inspiration in the work. Nevertheless, circumstances were against us and the tide of The New History Society was turned afield. Neither Ahmad nor I could turn it back now, because the people have lost confidence.

I have always believed in the unification of forces and I do believe in an Administration, although I cannot make of it an article of faith. I think that the guidance of the Assemblies should be something to be desired, not something to be submitted to, and that the sanction of the Publishing Committee should be an asset to be intensely hoped for, not an obligation.

Last summer, I found myself unexpectedly in Rouen and there I visited the tower room where, in the year 1431, Jeanne d'Arc was tried. As I leaned against those very walls where she had leaned, and as the questions and answers of her trial which were hung up on the wall, were read to me, my eyes filled with tears for her, and my heart with grief. She had been asked to believe in the row of priests before her as instruments of God to be submitted to, and when, after repeated questioning, she still insisted that she could not, they declared her to be outside of the Church and sentenced her to what they called the minimum penalty, which was only burning. Two Members of the Court went on record as thinking the punishment too lenient. So, forsaken by her King, whom she had served for nearly two years and loved so much, but with her confidence in her God and in her Cause undiminished, she gave up her life on the market place and withdrew to her eternal glory.

Today, it is not a woman, but a man who stands before the Bar of the Church, and after the passing of exactly five centuries to the very year, the question asked is still the same.

I myself am nothing in this, except that I see Truth in this man, as I believe that I would have seen it in Jeanne d'Arc, had I been there.

That same day in Rouen, I visited the Shrine where her memory is glorified by the same Church which condemned her, and I lit a candle before that Shrine, for the Cause of Baha-U-Llah.

After nearly two years, the question of The New History Society has passed out of your hands and out of ours. The Guardian has confirmed your action and there the matter must rest.

In a letter received (by a mutual friend) two days ago from Ruhi Effendi, post-scripted by the Guardian, he says:

"Anyhow, by the attitude the National Spiritual Assembly has taken considering the History Society outside the Cause, and the advice they have given the friends to dissociate themselves from it, we hope that the problem is solved." And again in the same letter—"Anyhow, thank God that the die is cast and the final decision is taken."

The problem which has absorbed too much time already has been decided by a higher Court. I cannot question that decision. Therefore, a meeting between us, even though unofficial as you so considerately suggested, would be useless. The whole matter is now disposed of and we must all accept.

I want to thank you many times and send you all my best wishes. It is possible that in the future we may meet in a personal way. I should be most pleased,

Continued Unrest

It appears that the article concerning The New History Society, as published in Bahai News of August 1930, and the later cablegram from the Guardian were not sufficient to allay the unrest in the Bahai Community. The anxiety and dissatisfaction continued unabated, the reason being that many looked upon our work as the only hope of freeing the Cause from the reactionary influences that had oppressed it for so long. Therefore, Bahai News allotted more than three pages in its November issue to a further discussion of the problem, in a section entitled The Principle of Bahai Freedom. A Statement Concerning the Episode of The New History Society. I will give a few extracts:—

Because of certain misunderstandings that still prevail among a few believers, the National Spiritual Assembly feels it advisable to issue this further statement, supplementing and confirming the statement published in Bahai News for August 1930, regarding the episode of The New History Society.

The desire of the National Assembly is to so clarify the matter by recording the various steps leading to the adoption of the previous statement that no doubts may remain in a single Bahai heart. It will be understood by every believer that the following quotations and brief explanatory remarks are intended to deepen our collective unity within the institutions of the Cause, and The New History Society is referred to merely as an episode in our Bahai experience.

It is devoutly believed that careful consideration of the matter as here presented will remove these definite sources of misunderstanding and, consequently, sources of disunity among the believers. The New History Society itself is relative to the discussion only as having occasioned a temporary test to a number of Bahais. The definite sources of misunderstanding to be removed are, first, that the Guardian has ever or will ever sanction any activity as "Bahai" which stands in opposition or indifference to the permanent general principles of administration given us under the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha; second, that the Guardian could ever conceivably be so misled by false or inaccurate communications from any source that his instructions are subject to personal interpretation; and third, that the guidance or inspiration felt by any group of believers possesses a superior spiritual validity to the deliberations of a duly elected Spiritual Assembly and thus justifies opposition to the Assembly in relation to any given situation.

Cablegram from Shoghi Effendi included in above article:

Feel strongly Ahmad Sohrab should uphold unconditionally authority Local and National Assembly.

Quotations from letters written by Shoghi Effendi included in above article:

Attendance Ahmad meeting conditioned upon Ahmad's unquestioned acceptance to conduct meetings on lines fully sanctioned by National Spiritual Assembly. True unity can only be preserved by maintenance paramount position National Spiritual Assembly.

Ahmad Sohrab's activities should be watched carefully, lest a weak handling of this extremely delicate situation may confuse the minds of the friends and cause a split in the Cause. The Cause has already triumphed over such cases which flare up for a time, then recede into the shadows of oblivion and are thought of no more. The case of Khyrullah, Fareed, Dyer, Mrs. White and others testify to this truth.

Quotations from two letters written by Ruhi Effendi, Shoghi Effendi's secretary, included in the same article:

In none of the Guardian's letters to Mrs. Chanler has Shoghi Effendi approved of her attitude toward the Local and National Assemblies. One of those who was over-zealous about The New History Society wrote Shoghi Effendi that the members of the New York Assembly are gradually becoming milder and perhaps drawn to the History Society. This is to solve the problem in the wrong way. It is not the Assembly that has to be won to the cause of some rebellious person, but that person brought back under the authority of the Assembly.

Some persons in the (United) States feel that the History Society was badly represented to Shoghi Effendi. The source of all our information is the writings of Ahmad and the publications of that group. In all his circular letters he harped on the note of freedom and denounced the red tape that characterizes organizations.

I have to thank Ruhi Effendi for so concisely summing up my characteristics in the above statement. I could not have done it better myself. An almost religious belief in freedom for all men, and a dislike for the red tape that applies to organizations (especially supposedly spiritual ones) are strongly developed in my consciousness. On this basis, I have always functioned and always will.

Tainted Money

The main activity of the Bahai Administration has been, and still is, centered about the building of a great Temple in Wilmette, Illinois. In 1929, Mr. Chanler made a considerably large contribution to the Temple Fund, which was graciously accepted; and again on January 2, 1930, Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and I sent in comparatively modest donations for the same purpose. Now, one of the fixed rules of the Administration is that no money may be accepted from non-Bahais for the building of the Temple. Therefore, these latter checks were retained uncashed in the administrative files for more than ten months, and on November 6, 1930, after my expulsion from the organization, a letter was written by Mr. Alfred Lunt to Mr. and Mrs. Chanler stating that the checks could be used for Bahai purposes in the discretion of the National Assembly and asking that they be made payable to the National Bahai Fund instead of to the Temple Fund.

The mystery of this double standard, regarding moneys received from Bahais and non-Bahais, struck Mrs. Chanler as too complicated for her to deal with, so she asked me to answer in her place. I did so to the best of my ability, closing as follows:

. . . If the money of a man who served Abdul Baha for eight years and who is giving the last drop of his blood to spread this Cause, and if the money of Mr. and Mrs. Chanler, who are devoting all their energies in the same direction, is not good enough for the Temple, then, I believe, and I assert before the world, that all the hundreds of thousands of dollars that have been given by others have been given uselessly.

I lament and weep over the conditions of today. Not only do I do so, but Baha-U-Llah himself, and Abdul Baha himself lament and weep for that which, within a few short years, has been done to their universal spiritual Cause.

In your official pronunciamento of August of this year, you state emphatically that the activities conducted by Ahmad Sohrab are in no wise entitled to the cooperation of Bahais. How can this statement be squared with this recent communication that you are willing to accept money for Bahai Activities from a man whom you have publicly repudiated? Is this consistent? Or, has one standard been chosen for the National Assembly and another for the poor Bahais, standing as so many pawns on their chessboard?

Mrs. Chanler wished to answer your letter to her, but she found that she could not.

The Last Letter

During the winding up of the year 1930, the agitation in the Bahai Community persisted. Although Mrs. Chanler had accepted the decision of the Guardian without hesitancy or question, many of the well-wishers of The New History Society could not bring themselves to look upon the matter as closed. Consequently, as this tempestuous year drew to an end, Mrs. Chanler, with a view to protect these friends of hers from further distress, wrote a final letter to Mr. Alfred Lunt, the one member of the National Spiritual Assembly who had been sympathetic to her work. I reproduce it in full.

December 28, 1930.

In these last days of 1930, I feel that I must make a resolution, difficult as it is, for the New Year.

You, and many of our dear beloved friends, have suffered enough on our account. You have risked your own comfort, you have tried to protect us, you have loved us and showered us with kindness.

Now we want to thank you for all this and to withdraw from your lives. We think this is the wisest thing to do and we beg you to agree with us.

If, at some future date, God wishes to bring us together, He will do it; and in the meantime we will all work for His Cause according to the light that we have, and I am sure, with great understanding of each other.

As Bahais, we know a place to meet that is not in the physical world but somewhere in the presence of the Master, and in these meetings, we will draw great strength and comfort.

I have thought of writing this for a long time and now I know that the moment has come.

Don't make yourself sad by answering, I will always love you.

P. S. I am sending the same letter to nine of our friends.

The above communication was addressed to:

Mrs. Edward J. Kinney	Mrs. May Maxwell
Miss Juliet Thompson	Miss Jean Silver
Mrs. Audrey Foster	Miss Mae Seabeck
Mrs. Margueritta Smythe	Mrs. Frances Fales

In spite of this letter, our connections with many of the Bahais continued, the affection on both sides being too great to be set aside. Later, however, an order originating either in Haifa or with the National Spiritual Assembly

MAJOR JOSEPH HONORÉ JAXON
One of the earliest pioneers of the Bahai Cause in America.

(which, I do not actually know), brought all association to an end. There was a single exception made to this ruling and, for years, Mrs. Chanler had the joy of seeing her closest friend in the Cause; but, with the institution of the lawsuit, this especial dispensation was cancelled. Thus, the only remaining link between ourselves and the adherents of the Administration was broken.

On the other hand, a few Bahais have openly stood by our work, regardless of consequences. Conspicuous among these is Mr. O. J. Hanko, who has been in the Cause for about thirty years. He was a charter member of The New History Society, and, although he lives out of town, he is ever ready with encouragement and assistance. Also, there are Miss Jane Durand, of Asbury Park, New Jersey, whose kindness has never failed us, and Major Joseph Honoré Jaxon, eighty years old, one of the few remaining pioneers of the Cause in America.

Another, among the earliest Bahais in this country, is Mrs. Frederick Allen, the former Berthelin Lexow. Mrs. Allen has, through the years, identified herself with the work of The New History Society in a very notable way, and has been an example of courage and self-sacrifice.

A Cardinal Principle

The official and unofficial records, contained in the type-written book entitled The New History Society and the Bahai Organization, cover a period from December 24, 1928, to November 21, 1931. From many of these letters and statements, I have quoted only a part; from some communications from Haifa, which were addressed to others besides ourselves, I have not felt at liberty to quote at all.

However, through the extracts used, I believe that the points of difference between the Assemblies and The New History Society have been made clear. Throughout those three years, the Bahai Administration made its claims, which undoubtedly it thought just, and tried to impose them; and throughout the same period of time, The New History Society, with at least equal earnestness, struggled to maintain its integrity so that it could look the world square in the face. Here there is a difference in point of view, so fundamental, that no words and no effort can change it, at least as far as mortal vision can perceive. For ourselves, we shall continue along the path that we have chosen so deliberately; we shall teach freedom of conscience, respect for the convictions of others and co-operation between men and women of all systems of thought tending toward a true comradeship of human beings, born and unborn. Then, shall we teach religious liberty? To ask the question is to answer it. The aspiration toward religious liberty has always existed in the consciousness of mankind. It lives in Hindu hearts, in Jewish hearts, in Christian hearts, in Islamic hearts and, after its long leap from the heart of The Most Great Prisoner in Acca, it lives in the hearts of people everywhere.

This is a cardinal principle of the New World Order.

CHAPTER V

THE TRADE-MARK

The New History Society

The movement which was inaugurated in 1929, under the name of The New History Society, had for its object the promulgation of the constructive and universal principles of Baha-O-Llah. This movement came into being and has been supported and sustained up to this date through the initiative and devotion of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler. My part in helping the growth and progress of this work has been a humble one. I claim nothing for myself, but I claim everything for these two servants of Baha-O-Llah.

During the last eleven years, through the channel of 'The New History Society, the name and fame of the Cause of Baha-O-Llah have penetrated to the four corners of the earth. By means of public meetings, at which a succession of the intellectual and spiritual leaders of humanity (both Americans and distinguished visitors from abroad) have delivered their messages; through annual Prize Competitions on topics of world peace, world religion, world reconstruction, racial amity, etc.; through the publication of books and leaflets (some of which have been translated into 30 languages); through its monthly and quarterly organs respectively New History and The Children's Caravan; through 'The Caravan, a young people's movement, with more than 200 Chapters in 27 countries; through the holding of classes and numerous other methods, these two souls have rendered unparalleled services to the Cause of Baha-O-Llah.

The annals of Bahai history in the Western world contain few records of such personal dedication. Mr. and Mrs. Chanler have consecrated everything—their name, their house, their possessions and, last but not least, their privacy to hold aloft the sacred name of Baha-O-Llah and to make his teachings better known to young and old in the continents of Africa, Asia, Europe, Australia, New Zealand, South and Central America, Canada, Mexico and the Islands of the Seas. Seldom has such a missionary work been undertaken; seldom has it been formulated and carried into execution with such enthusiasm, energy, forethought and utter disregard to personal comfort and rest.

Their Reward

And now comes recognition from the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada! But, before I mention this recognition, let me state that during the last eleven years this body of men and women have set themselves to oppose the work of The New History Society, to attribute to its founders and members all sorts of unworthy motives; to publish in Bahai News articles of a most crude character and to countenance stories and rumors that have no foundation in fact and no relation to reality. In taking this attitude and in systematically following a course of enmity and persecution, the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada have been free and untrammelled; one may assert that they have used (or in my opinion have abused) their constitutional right of free press, free speech and free assembly. I am the last man to blame them for what they have written! Praise be to God that in these United States the citizens are free to relieve themselves of their opinions about any one, be he a humble laborer, a political leader or a one-time friend.

But, all I have to state here is this: For eleven years Mr. and Mrs. Chanler have kept a dignified silence; for eleven years they have never, on the platform nor in print, met these attacks, and for eleven years, serene and undisturbed, they have heeded the advice of the Great Teacher by meeting evil with good.

Serene and undisturbed! I am probably exaggerating a little, for there were times when the darts of the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada and the Local Assembly of New York did hurt; yet one glance backward to the martyrdoms of the early Babis and Bahais who suffered at the hands of the enemies of freedom and progress was sufficient to restore their equanimity and their confidence.

This radiant acquiescence would unquestionably have continued for the rest of their lives had the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada confined themselves to periodic insinuations in Bahai News and to the setting afloat of their fanciful stories and rumors; but something happened that has made the writing of this book imperative.

In 1939, The New History Society exhibited its works and literature in Science and Education Building at the New York World's Fair, and during these months an idea came to the mind of Mrs. Frederick Allen, one of the first Bahais in this country, who had been called Berthalin by Abdul Baha and who has used this name ever since. The idea was that it would be a valuable service to the Cause if, after the closing of the Fair, our exhibit could be transported to the city. After some consultation, it was decided to take this step as a purely temporary activity, and on November 7th, 1939, Bahai Bookshop was opened at 828 Lexington Avenue, a lease having been signed for the duration of six months. I admit that we were fully conscious that, in all probability, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada would resent this further heralding of the Bahai name and teachings. However, we were prepared, as in the past, to meet opposition in silence.

Then—

On December 5, 1939, the postman delivered the following letter to Bahai Bookshop:

(Letterhead of)

December 5, 1939.

By registered mail to Mrs. Julie Chanler,
Bahai Bookshop,
828 Lexington Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Madam:

We are instructed by our client, National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, to communicate with you with reference to your unauthorized use of the trademark BAHAI in the trade name BAHAI BOOKSHOP, and on books, leaflets and advertisements which are not published by our client.

The word BAHAI has been used for about forty years by our client and its predecessors as a trademark for magazines, printed books, and other publications, and is registered in the United States Patent Office in the name of our client, registration No. 245,271. The word BAHAI is substantially the same as the registered trademark BAHAI, and your use of the former in the ways we have mentioned constitutes trademark infringement and unfair competition.

Probably you were not informed as to the trademark situation and it will not be necessary for our client to do more than bring the facts to your attention. In order to comply with the formalities, however, we must and do demand on behalf of National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada that you discontinue immediately the use of the word BAHAI in the name under which you are conducting a book shop, and upon books and other publications not published by our client, and we hereby notify you that upon your failure to do so our client will hold you responsible for profits, damages and costs of litigation.

Will you please give the matter immediate consideration and advise us of your decision.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) Watson, Bristol, Johnson
& Leavenworth.

A few days after the receipt of this letter, Mrs. Chanler placed the matter in the hands of Mr. Fred J. Bechert, of the firm Mitchell & Bechert, and the following correspondence ensued.

Re: Bahai Book Shop

Gentlemen:

This is in reply to your letter of December 5th, receipt of which we acknowledged under date of December 12th.

We have conferred with Mrs. Chanler and examined a great deal of literature relating to the Bahai Cause. Through our investigation, we have learned that in about the year 1863 Mirza Hossain Ali, a Persian nobleman, felt that he was inspired by God and that it was his duty to bring a message of light and glory to a harassed world. He adopted as a spiritual name "Baha-U-Llah". This name was to signify the "light" or "glory" of God. Prior to 1863, there were followers of the Bab and the individual followers were known as Babis. The Babis later became followers of Baha-U-Llah, who carried on the cause, and the followers of Baha-U-Llah became known as Bahais. Long prior to the year 1900, the word "Bahai" had become a well known descriptive word to identify a follower of Baha-

U-Llah in precisely the same way as "Christian" would describe a follower of Christ.

It is our opinion, therefore, and we have so advised Mrs. Chanler, that Bahai, long prior to the year 1900, became and now is a word of common speech necessary for use in aptly describing a follower of Baha-U-Llah. In our opinion, therefore, the word "Bahai" cannot legally be exclusively appropriated by your client.

Mrs. Chanler advises us that she is a Bahai, and that her Bahai Book Shop specializes in Bahai books, pamphlets, and literature in general for the dissemination of the Bahai teachings.

It is our understanding that Mrs. Chanler, far from competing unfairly with your client, is engaged in the work of furthering and spreading the Bahai cause, which, we take it, is also the purpose and effort of your client.

Yours very truly,

B/S

Mitchell & Bechert.

Re: Bahai Bookshop

Messrs. Mitchell & Bechert,
420 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

We are in receipt of your letter of December 21 in answer to ours of December 5.

You state that in your opinion the word Bahai "is a word of common speech necessary for use in aptly describing a follower of Baha-U-Llah." You do not state, however, that the word is descriptive of the goods on which our client uses it as a trademark, namely, magazines, printed books, and other publications, and it is obvious that such is not the case. The use of this word by your client on publications not published by our client and in the trade name Bahai Bookshop constitutes trademark infringement and unfair competition.

Moreover, the use by your client of the trade name Bahai Bookshop is a misrepresentation and a deceptive use because it gives the erroneous impression that the book shop is operated or sponsored by our client, the official Bahai religious organization, and the use of the name Bahai Bookshop without our client's authority and consent also infringes our client's property right in the name Bahai.

We believe you may want to reconsider your opinion in this matter, and request that you do so.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) Watson, Bristol, Johnson
& Leavenworth.

Re: Bahai Book Shop

Gentlemen:

This is in reply to your letter of December 22, 1939.

We regret that our letter of December 21st did not make our client's position entirely clear.

It is our opinion that "Bahai" is a descriptive word for aptly describing a follower of the Bahai teachings and, furthermore, that the word "Bahai", whether or not used as a trade-mark, if it is applied on Bahai literature is descriptive of that literature. If your client is in the general publishing business and applies the word "Bahai" to books and periodicals having nothing to do with Bahai teachings, then the mark would not be descriptive of such books and periodicals.

Our client uses the word "Bahai" in the title of its Bahai Bookshop in a descriptive sense to identify it as a book shop specializing in Bahai literature.

Our client denies that the use of the trade name "Bahai Bookshop" is either a misrepresentation or a deceptive use. As stated, the Bahai Bookshop represents that it specializes in Bahai literature and, as a matter of fact, Mrs. Chanler is herself a Bahai.

Our client further denies that the use of the trade name "Bahai Bookshop" gives any erroneous impression that the shop is operated or sponsored by your client, since your client, in our judgment, has no exclusive right to the name "Bahai" to describe a follower of the Bahai teachings or to identify those teachings in book form or otherwise.

We must therefore repeat that, in our opinion, our client is not infringing any rights of your client and is not unfairly competing with your client.

Yours very truly,

Mitchell & Bechert.

Points Involved and My Reactions to Them

A partial study of the contents of the above correspondence between the two attorneys-at-law will reveal several interesting facts:

1. The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada have made a trademark of the name Bahai.
2. According to the text of application filed March 10, 1928, Serial No. 262,923 the Bahai Organization is a corporation.
3. The word Bahai is a trademark as actually used by applicant upon goods, and requests that the same be registered in the United States Patent Office. . . . The trade-mark has been continuously used and applied to said goods in applicant's business since 1900.
4. The goods or merchandise that the applicant sells and which are protected by a trade-mark are the words of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha.
5. Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha lived in prison, suffered and gave their teachings free for the religious unification of mankind in order that, in 1928, these spiritual heavenly teachings be monopolized, and sold under trade-mark to an unsuspecting public as so much goods, similar to Blue Sunoco, G. Washington coffee, Twenty Mule Team Boraxo or the new, blended with Havana, White Owl Cigar (it's milder)!
6. The members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, like their expanding sister monopolists, are reaching out to stifle all unfair competition, holding Bahai Bookshop responsible for profits to which, incidentally, they are welcome if they are willing to meet the losses as well.

7. The Bahai organization is not a religion, nor a spiritual renaissance, nor the spirit of the age, but is a full-fledged corporation which, while it engages itself in marketing the principles of Baha-O-Llah for the establishment of Universal Peace, through its various branches in the United States, Canada and in other parts of the world, has protected these goods by taking out a trade-mark on the very name which more than twenty thousand Persian men and women claimed at the price of their lives. This is the first instance in the history of religion where the privilege of calling oneself a follower of a certain Prophet, were he Buddha or Christ, or Mohaminad or any other, has been involved with the interests of a trust or corporation.

What, for instance would have happened to Christianity if, added to the difficulties of establishing a new religion, the early Christians had had to contend with property rights on the name and teachings that they were ready to die for? It is certain that such a liability would have stifled the movement in its infancy and that, before the passing of a hundred years, the words of Jesus would have been heard of no more. The Cause of Baha-O-Llah is no different. Strong as it is, commercial interests and the lust for power are stronger yet if allowed to operate unopposed; and this new-born child, the hope of the ages, will unquestionably cease to breathe if its neck continues to be weighted with the steel links of an international chain store.

Back to The New History Society

General membership in The New History Society is free. Sustaining membership consists simply of subscription to our monthly magazine, New History. The society is composed of a band of volunteers and free souls who have come together with the desire to help in the formation of the new history of the world and to promulgate the constructive and universal principles of Baha-O-Allah. These men and women are not tied to any formula. They are the children of the New Age and the heralds of the New Civilization.

More than 99 per cent of all expenses of The New History Society and its manifold activities have, during the past eleven years, been paid quietly and unassumingly by Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler.

Bahai News

The Feb. 1940 issue of Bahai News on page 3, in an article signed by the National Spiritual Assembly under the title of Vigor and Spiritual Health of the Community, directs its attack, without mentioning any name, to Mr. and Mrs. Chanler, The New History Society and Bahai Bookshop. We quote:

The believers in all lands are under the supreme favor of guidance from on High. They strive to uphold, day by day, ideals and principles which relate to their own development and the illumination and harmony of mankind. But on the other hand, to aid the endeavors of those who outwardly claim allegiance but secretly try to destroy the Divine Edifice through enmity to its leader, would manifestly be the most grievous of errors.

Historically such disloyalty, synchronizing with the expansion of the Faith, had its appearance when some who were professedly loyal to the Bab, disobeyed His Covenant by refusing to accept Baha'u'llah as the expected One of the Beyan. They were urged on by a sordid ambition which brought them ignominy, oblivion and loss. Later the same condition became apparent after the ascension of Baha'u'llah when a few corrupt people violated His solemn Covenant by refusing to accept its Center, Abdu'l-Baha. Again, a diminishing few, urged on by vaulting ambition and an obvious desire to organize within the Cause a group that would circle around themselves, have refused to acknowledge the station of our beloved Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, and the New World Order of administration called into being by the Will of Abdu'l-Baha.

Under the authority of the Guardian, the time has now come to act against these "insidious adversaries" who have even gone so far as to flout the Beloved's Will and Testament, the very pillar of our unity, by claiming the right to use the term "Baha'i" to designate their personal activities. The matter is therefore being taken to the courts, and as soon as possible their excuses will be made a matter of public record. It will be seen whether the present enemies of the Faith can succeed any better than those enemies who have preceded them: Subhi-Ezel, Mohamet Ali, Kheirella and their like, whose denial of the Truth became historic facts beyond recall.

In connection with this legal action, we have this message from Shoghi Effendi in his cablegram of January 23: "Praying victory similar (to the) one recently won (over) Covenant-breakers (in) Holy Land be achieved by American believers over insidious adversaries (in) City (of the) Covenant."

For Bahais Only

Before answering some of the accusations contained in the above extract, I will point out one peculiar aspect of Bahai News. Every copy, in recent times, carries on its front page the inscription: For Bahais Only. Why for Bahais only, if the Bahai Cause is intended for the whole world? Why for Bahais only, if there is nothing to hide? Why for Bahais only, if this periodical is a credit to those who prepare it? Abdul Baha on many occasions said that in the Bahai Cause there is no secret doctrine, and that there should be no secret society nor secret meetings. He never thought of specifying the point that there should be no secret publication: For men only, For members of the Klan only, For Bahais Only.

Referring to Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and the members of The New History Society, the article states that a diminishing few urged by vaulting ambition and an obvious desire to organize within the cause a group that would circle around themselves. . . . At this point, I am close to becoming profane, but I will continue to hold the reins of my patience as far as I am able. The above statement is a mendacious falsehood, and the fraudulency of it is as evident to those who wrote it as it is to those of whom it was written.

Vaulting ambition! My soul! A man and woman giving their hearts, minds and all that they possess in this world to spread an unwanted, though much-needed, cause!

Vaulting ambition! Two persons bidding farewell to their associates and friends to champion a movement that had been dragged, by its votaries, to the level of a narrow sect!

Vaulting ambition! What did Mr. and Mrs. Chanler have to gain! They had everything to lose. Yet in spite of all kinds of obstacles, laid by their fellow Bahais and others, they arose with such power and self-sacrifice to spread the Cause of Baha-O-Ilah that it is difficult to measure or comprehend the height and depth of their love and devotion.

I praise heaven that I was allowed the privilege of assisting them in their disinterested enterprise; and so, I doubt not, do those who have held by them through thick and thin and who thus have exposed themselves to this dishonest attack.

Insidious adversaries! The insidious adversaries are those who hold office in the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. They are the ones who, through their legalistic verbiage, have stopped the circulation of the blood of life through the arteries of mankind; they are the ones who have banished love from their midst and enthroned the Veiled Hatred which is more dreadful than the unveiled one; they are the ones who have spread the pall of subtle fear and suspicion over the Bahai Community, exiling confidence and self-respect; they are the ones who, through political manipulations before and during annual Bahai Conventions, are re-elected to the same offices year after year—thus, keeping a stranglehold on the activities of the Cause and directing those activities according to their own good-pleasure.

The founders of The New History Society never, during the eleven years of the existence of the movement, have tried to organize within the Cause a group that would circle around themselves. Those who are within the Bahai administrative structure have been emasculated to the point where they are not worth organizing; and then, The New History Society is not an organization. It sees the result of these tactics, and it remembers that the Bahai Cause was not intended to be an organization.

The New History Society has marched across the longitude and latitude of the earth, sowing the seeds of the creative words of Baha-O-Llah without let or hindrance, and it has not withheld those who love organization to follow organization. In other words: Let the dead bury the dead!

The writer of the article in Bahai News reaches the height of his slanderous vilification when he likens Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and their Bahai friends to those enemies that preceded them: Subhi-Ezel, Mohamet Ali, Kheirella and their like. God Almighty! Is it possible that a human mind could have framed this sentence! Is it conceivable that a community, calling itself Bahai, can allow it to go unchallenged!

I address the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, and ask: How did you dare, in the presence of Baha-O-Llah, to print such blasphemies upon the pages of Bahai News? Who drew up this article, and how did it come about that you put your signature to it?

This you call Bahai News! It is a yellow sheet, a scandalous germ carrier! No wonder that it is For Bahais Only!

Construction of the Word "Baha-O-Llah"

Baha-O-Llah is a compound Arabic word consisting of Baha and Allah, literally meaning the light or the glory of God. Baha is an ordinary Arabic word which has been used in the literature and poetry of Arabia for innumerable centuries, and, of course, the word Allah is as ancient as Arabia itself. The word Baha is so well established that, when the Arabic translators of the Old Testament came to certain passages in that book, they rendered the words glory of God as Baha-O-Llah, and the glory of Carmel as the Baha of Carmel. See Isaiah, Chapter 35, verse 2; likewise Isaiah, Chapter 40, verse 5; where the glory of Carmel is translated into the Baha of Carmel, and the glory of our Lord is rendered into the Baha of our Lord. This can be verified by reference to any Arabic translation of the Old Testament.

From this point of view, any Arab, knowing nothing of the Bahai Cause, can open a shop under the name: Bahai Foodshop or Bahai Drug Store or Bahai Bookshop, because the words light and glory are current words in his language and he is at liberty to use them as have been his ancestors for centuries past.

Historical Origin of the Name Bahai

The Bahai Cause, as the movement is known today, was inaugurated in 1844 by Mirza Ali Mohammad, who adopted the title of the Bab, an Arabic word meaning gate, by which he implied that the gate to a new civilization was opened wide. A follower of his became known as a Babi, the addition of the letter i signifying in Persian being of, or adhering to. Just as a native of the city of Tabriz is called Tabrizi or a native of Esphahan is called Esphahani, so an adherent of the Bab was called Babi.

When Mirza Hossein Ali, a disciple of the Bab, realized that he was inspired by God and that he must bring the message of light and glory to a harassed world, he adopted the title of Baha-O-Llah, by which he implied that the age of darkness, superstition, prejudice and ignorance was about to pass away and that a new era of understanding, harmony and union was dawning. The spiritual power of Baha-O-Llah was so tremendous that the majority of the Babis at once recognized in him the fulfillment of the prophecies of the Bab, which were to the effect that after him a yet greater personality would arise and take leadership. Therefore, these disciples gave their allegiance to Baha (Baha-O-Llah often in his writings refers to himself simply as Baha) and automatically they became Bahais. Likewise, the Babi Movement, from this time on, more and more became known as the Bahai Movement.

The Bahai Cause Is Not an Organization

Many years ago, when the Bahai Cause was guided by Abdul Baha, the great son of Baha-O-Llah, it was taught as a free, non-sectarian Revelation, its door open to all mankind.

The earlier Bahai booklets, now out of circulation but still to be found in the Public Library of New York, 5th Ave. and 42nd Street, carried a significant statement made by Abdul Baha. This statement may be found in a booklet entitled No. 9, which was widely circulated in former years.

Now, this statement was so significant and far-reaching in its implications that it was continuously referred to by the Bahais in their speeches and writings; and today there are many yet alive who, on numerous occasions, have heard Abdul Baha himself repeat it. Let us listen to the Master as he spoke:

The Bahai Movement is not an organization. You cannot organize the Bahai Movement. The Bahai Movement is the spirit of the age. It is the essence of all the highest ideals of this century. The Bahai Cause is an inclusive movement. The teachings of all religions and societies are found here. Christians, Jews, Buddhists, Mohammadans, Zoroastrians, Theosophists, Freemasons, Spiritualists, etc., find their highest aims in this Cause, Socialists and philosophers find their theories fully developed in this movement.

Mr. Horace Holley

Mr. Horace Holley learned of the Cause during the lifetime of the Master; after a meeting with Abdul Baha in Switzerland and a deep study of the teachings, he applied himself to the service of this nascent movement. His writings, work of those early years, present the Bahai Cause in a masterful and moving manner, and his later monumental tome Bahai Scriptures, published by Brentano's in 1923 (at present out of circulation), is an invaluable compilation. Likewise, the successive year books, entitled The Bahai World, prepared under his direction, and containing a wealth of interesting material to be found nowhere else, bear witness to his remarkable editorial talents.

Since the departure from this life of Abdul Baha in 1921, Mr. Horace Holley has been the most dominant and outspoken champion of the Bahai Administration; step by step, he has developed and refined this organism to the point where he now holds in his hand the threads of all the activities of the Cause in the East and in the West. Since 1921, with the exception of a single year, if my memory serves me right, he has been elected year after year as the all-powerful secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. I can call to mind but a single other instance where the occupant of so unpretentious an office as that of secretary maintained supreme and undisputed sway over the minds and lives of his community. This was in the case of Joseph Stalin, who also heads a movement which likewise is supposed to stand for social reform, and who, at the very pinnacle of power, retained the modest title of Secretary of the Communist Party.

Mr. Horace Holley is a most efficient organizer; he has been, and still is, the editor of various Bahai publications and as such he charts and canalizes the mental and spiritual life of the Bahai Community. As an influential member of the Bahai Reviewing Committee, he censors the writings of the Bahais and sees to it that no liberal or anti-organizational ideas penetrate the minds of the members of the various committees. In the exercise of this function, he always has the right and apt quotations, gathered here and there from the writings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, (writings which had been given out by these Great Teachers during an approximate period of sixty-five years and which applied to every condition imaginable, both universal and local) and that is enough to prevent any objection or discussion. Under such circumstances, thought is paralyzed and no one dares to follow Baha-O-Llah's injunction, ever repeated by Abdul Baha: Independent Investigation of Truth.

Going back to the early years, we find a book, entitled: Bahai—The Spirit of the Age, written by Mr. Horace Holley and published by Brentano's in 1921. Abdul Baha was still in our midst and, although the forces of organization were gathering and the thin clouds of recurrent ecclesiasticism were becoming visible on the horizon of the Bahai Cause, these were not ominous. Mr. Horace Holley was slightly affected, but he was as yet a free soul—the charm and vision of Abdul Baha still held sway over his writings, as can be seen in the introduction to the above-mentioned book where he gives six remarkable interpretations of the word Bahai. Let us for a moment commune with the departed spirit of Mr. Horace Holley:—

The new translation of an ancient classic contains one very significant change. A prophetic passage formerly interpreted "the end of the world" reads now "the end of the age."

In this sense, the world has indeed come to an end in our day—the foundations of a new age, a new civilization, a new science and a new faith have visibly been laid. The inspiration of this new age, for many people in all parts of the world, has one source, one password, one mystery: the name Bahai.

The word Bahai is like a jewel with many facets, a fountain with many pitchers, a mansion with many rooms.

For some, it means a set of principles necessary for the peace of the world, for economic stability, for the true progress of the sciences and the arts.

For others, Bahai means the privilege of belonging to an active movement already spread throughout the United States, Canada, Europe and large portions of the East; a movement spreading the ideals of fellowship and service irrespective of race, creed, nationality and class.

Still others feel in the word Bahai the reality, the consummation of the Sermon on the Mount, the return of the Divine Love for the purpose of raising mankind from its animal condition to the level of conscious spirituality.

Behind this word for many there stands also a glorious Presence, a Divine Being whose title this word is: The Glory of God. These persons feel this Presence as the controlling force behind every event of this time. Thus is Bahai the cause of a new spirit of reverence and devotion, written as it is upon a Bible, a World Bible, revealed in cosmic utterances which gather together those who seem to be a nucleus of the future spiritual race.

Still others, having heard Abdul Baha during his travels through Europe and America immediately preceding the War, see the word Bahai in terms of his wisdom, his graciousness, his untiring efforts to awaken the slumbering soul to realize the opportunities and responsibilities of life in this age.

Behind this word Bahai, finally, there is one of the most astonishing chapters History has ever had occasion to record. From its beginnings in the glorious Bahi martyrdoms which occurred in Persia only about eighty years ago; to that forty-year exile and imprisonment suffered by Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, with seventy faithful followers; witnessing then the renaissance of the Holy Land as the "Mount of Revelation," and arriving at the present hour with Abdul Baha's unique mission made fruitful by the commencement of work on the Bahai Temple at Chicago, by the deeper comprehension of the meaning of this Cause awakened by the nationwide journey of the "Great Teacher," Jenabe Fazel Mazandarani, and the rapid spread of the Bahai Message throughout the East—the historic importance of these events can only be judged at some later date, when from this seed the fruitful tree shall have grown to its maturity.

This was in 1921.

Seven years have rolled into the lap of eternity.

The curtain is lifted on 1928.

The stage is set!

There is our old friend Mr. Horace Holley, urbane, subtle, conscious of his powers—the arbiter and controller of the destiny of the Bahai Organization and Bahai Communities throughout the world. Yes, yes, he has done a good job! With evident satisfaction he displays some papers. What are they? Let us approach and examine them. Our attention is caught by one paper—is riveted on it. We read:

Registered Aug. 7, 1928

Trade-Mark 254,271

United States Patent Office

National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada of New York, N. Y.

Application filed March 10, 1928. Serial No. 262,923.

B A H A ' I STATEMENT

To the Commissioner of Patents:

National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, a common-law corporation, organized and operated under declaration of trust and doing business at . . .

As we read and re-read the statement, we are lost in a sea of amazement. We rub our eyes, we fidget, we feel restless; we wonder whether all this is not a nightmare—impossible, incredible. We stagger, and search in our consciousness for an explanation; then, completely baffled, we look up into the face of Mr. Horace Holley. Maybe he will tell us what this means! He smiles, triumphantly pointing to the signature, and we read:

National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada

by HORACE HOLLEY,
Secretary.

And as we turn our eyes from this document, we glimpse Mr. Horace Holley's fingers still tenderly patting his own signature!

Well, friends! It is accomplished!

There is a stake on the source of the Bahai Cause and its owner-proprietor is the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada.

The password given to mankind by Baha-O-Llah, to be used for the regeneration of nations, is in the possession of the Bahai administrators.

No one on the face of the earth can fathom the mystery latent in the name Bahai except these interpreters of the law, these esteemed members of the all-powerful Bahai hierarchy.

The jewel with many facets is boxed and locked, and the key is in the velvet pocket of Mr. Horace Holley.

A concrete wall is raised around the fountain with many pitchers. Who cares? Let the world die of thirst.

The door of the mansion with many rooms is closed! What if the children of God knock and knock! What if they perish from punishing cold and hunger; I, Mr. Horace Holley; we, the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada; we who follow the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, we, we, we are living in the mansion of Baha-O-Llah; we partake of his delectable food and roam in his spiritual garden.

The set of principles necessary for the peace of the world, for economic stability, for the true progress of sciences and arts are registered and trade-marked, and woe unto those who dare to speak or write on these subjects!

The remedy given by the Great Physician for the healing of the sick body of the world has been made up into a patent medicine, and no one is allowed to avail himself of its restorative powers except by permission of these parochial pharmacologists.

We, the members of the Bahai Organization, have a priority right on the ideals of fellowship and service irrespective of race, creed, nationality and class, and those who put these principles into practice are our insidious enemies.

Let the whole world know that we are the custodians of the reality, the consummation of the Sermon on the Mount. It is, of course, true that the Apostles of Christ did not copyright the Sermon on the Mount; but, in those days, America was as yet undiscovered and there was no Commissioner of Patents in Jerusalem. It is likewise true that the later Christians did not copyright the Sermon on the Mount, but in our opinion, some of them might have had the foresight to do it, thus preventing its circulation throughout the world except through authorized channels. Man lives and learns! This word Bahai is the reality, the consummation of the Sermon on the Mount, and the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada are heirs to it; they possess it, they have seignioral rights over it.

Let us go back again to the early years, just for a breath of fresh air! In another part of the already-mentioned book, Bahai—the Spirit of the Age, Mr. Horace Holley writes as follows on pages 27-28:—

The slightest appreciation of this Revelation, however, leads one to realize that the spirit of the age cannot be thus conveniently confined. The slight Bahai Organization which exists is, in comparison with the Revelation itself, only as body in comparison to soul. Obviously, the cosmically conscious person of today cannot accept any arbitrary limiting classification. The basic principle of Abdul Baha's teaching is: This is the century of spiritual Illumination. Its basic application is: Investigate Truth, Promote Peace, Proclaim the Oneness of Mankind.

these words of Abdul Baha: The Bahai Movement is not an organization. You cannot organize the Bahai Movement . . . The Bahai Movement is the spirit of this age.—Abdul Baha.

The above masterful statement of Mr. Horace Holley was the expression of his faith in the Bahai Cause in 1921. It happens to be the expression of my faith in 1941, with one exception. He refers to slight Bahai Organization. Apparently, in spite of the clear statement of Abdul Baha that you cannot organize the Bahai Movement, he and his associates had already introduced a slight organization and then, with the departure of the Master, the steam-roller began to move, gaining momentum year by year—until now . . . (Additional material regarding the Bahai movement, as taught in former years, and the early appearance of orthodoxy and organizational ideas is given in a supplement at the end of this chapter, under the heading: The Building of Bahai Organization.)

My Faith

The founders of the religions of mankind, including the Bahai Cause, never intended their teachings to be cornered by a group, a church, a synagogue, a mosque, a temple or an administration. The burden of their message was the abolition of the religious hierarchies of their times. They preached simplicity of faith and the abrogation of all ritual and credal distinctions; but, invariably and without exception, the followers of the Masters fell into the same ditch, one by one.

Baha-O-Llah wished his movement to be inclusive; it was supposed to serve as a golden thread on which the spiritual jewels of all religions were to be strung. He did not want to establish a new religion, to form another organization. He did not plan to forge another chain, to fabricate another creed, to build another jail.

I was born in a Bahai family; the home of my uncle, in which I was reared from the age of three months, was surrounded by the enemies of our Faith. In time, our house was pillaged and we were forced to leave Persia. Since my boyhood I have been a wanderer, a dervish, a vagabond. I own nothing, I possess no property, I have no bank account. The source of my wealth is my adoration for Baha-O-Llah; the capital of my life is my devotion to Abdul Baha and this capital, no one, mark well, no one, no matter how protected, and no group, no matter how well organized, and no system, no matter how efficiently administered, can lessen or curtail.

I served my master Abdul Baha for eight years in America and Canada, in Europe, Egypt and Palestine. I also served, and served well, the Bahais throughout the world, including those who today have the arrogance and insolence to classify me as an enemy. I have no apologies to offer to these self-styled Bahais. They cannot hurt me. My bones and my flesh are composed of the love of Abdul Baha, and through my veins and arteries the blood of the Bahai Cause runs red. I make no claim for myself; I possess no title and hold no position. I am but a thrall at the Threshold of my Master; and this servitude, pure and simple, is my claim to life and immortality.

I know that Baha-O-Llah is the protector of his own Cause. He guards over the treasures of his teachings. He does not need a board of trustees to administer his principles nor to dispense his faith. His arms are outstretched over the wide universe and his spirit penetrates all things. Baha-O-Llah is my portion; organization is the portion of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. I am satisfied with my portion; I hope that they are satisfied with theirs!

Yes, I and thousands of others have inherited the universal, all-inclusive teachings of Baha-O-Llah and we proudly bear his name. These teachings and this name are available to all who wish to use them, and Baha-O-Llah, from the Kingdom, smiles upon these children of his and is glad.

These children of Baha, who are dedicated to his Cause, are like candles of guidance and wisdom which will burn but the brighter, surrounded as they are with a mesmeric gloom exorcised over the horizon by the waving of wands and the incantations of administrative soothsayers and magicians. The soft, lambent rays of these excommunicated souls will, in time, banish the darkness of the Abra-cadabra and Mumbo-jumbo, chaunted by weird sorcerers, cabalistic necromancers, sanctimonious Shamans, puritan witch-hunters, figure-flinger Cagliostros and fee-faw-fum medicine-men.

Unique Distinction of the Bahai Cause

The Bahai Cause, like all the great religions, contains a set of moral and ethical ideals for the spiritualizing of the life of mankind; but, added to this and unlike other religions, Baha-O-Llah has given us clear and distinct principles for the radical improvement of the social, economic, political and educational conditions of our civilization. In other words, the Founder of the Baháí Cause was not only a prophet, preaching and reiterating the absolute moral concepts of former dispensations, but was also an inspired statesman.

We know that the major changes in our world have been brought about through the application of the three following methods:

1st. Spiritual education. This has been the method of all the prophets, including Baha-O-Llah. The introduction of ballot box and of voting does not belong to this category of teaching.

2nd. Recurrent violent and bloody revolutions.

3rd. Non-violent revolutions and change, through the adoption of the democratic way: ballot box and vote.

The spiritual genius of Baha-O-Llah emphasized the first method; rejected the second and accepted the third, recognizing its supreme value in our modern world.

When we read his writings and those of his son, Abdul Baha, this point comes out very clearly. For instance, in regard to the exercise of our political rights, through voting, Abdul Baha says:

Thou hast asked regarding the political affairs. In the United States it is necessary that the citizens shall take part in elections. This is a necessary matter and no excuse from it is possible. . . . As the government of America is a republican form of government, it is necessary that all the citizens shall take part in the affairs of the Republic.

—From the Book: "Tablets of Abdul Baha

3. Recognized Bahais must not vote in any election based upon a party system.
4. Recognized Bahais must abstain from association with movements advocating social changes that presume partisan political action.
5. Recognized Bahais who speak on Bahai platforms must abstain from making any critical statements about any particular government or national policy.
6. Every Local Bahai Center must be responsible for the carrying out of the above laws by the Bahais in their respective communities. Local membership must include only the names of those who faithfully obey these regulations.
7. Recognized Bahais must not retain or apply for membership in any church or religious group.
8. Bahais failing to give unreserved obedience to the above regulations and to numerous others which are constantly legislated, and month after month spread on the pages of Bahai News by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, are expelled or excommunicated from the Cause, and the Bahais are not permitted to associate with these expelled or excommunicated ones, regardless of friendship, no matter of how long standing nor of the depth of their affection or love.

In the light of the above rules, it is not difficult to picture the kind of society that would be ours if the Bahai community becomes widespread under the aegis of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. Any dictator who might arise in this country, of whatsoever political hue, red, brown, black or yellow, would take to his heart and cherish these deaf, dumb and blind subjects, utterly servile and subservient, who would never oppose him nor resist his most cruel laws or indeed his slightest whim. The citizenry of these proud United States would become a race of automata, a chain-gang; and our fair democracy would have been converted into a nightmare, more gruesome and frightful than could be imagined by any H. G. Wells in his most despondent mood. All this, in case the affairs of this country are influenced according to the ideology of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada.

The Alternative

My personal opinion is that if some effectual means be not presently adopted to disperse this sacrosanct hierarchy, to nullify its power and destroy its authority, it will ere long reduce the Bahai Cause to the status of a sect, seeing that it has now waxed so exceedingly puffed up with pride as to attack anyone who, before the face of his Maker, calls himself a Bahai. If a method be not devised to check the inordinate ambitions of these administrators of the Bahai Cause, they will, for the establishment of their own un-American, un-democratic ideology, so limit the spiritual potency of the words of Baha-O-Llah that the effect of these words on the hearts of men will be reduced to a whisper.

There are, indeed, men and women within the Bahai Organization, who had the privilege of listening to Abdul Baha and who are fully aware of the changed atmosphere and of the freezing of all spiritual life; but the continuous droning of the black wings of organization and the undulations of the Administrative Python have paralyzed and incapacitated them.

Bandar-log, said the voice of Kaa, at last (according to Kipling), Can ye stir foot or hand without my orders? Speak!

Without thy order, we cannot stir foot or hand, O Kaa! Good! Come all one pace nearer to me.

The lines of the monkeys swayed forward, helplessly.

Nearer! hissed Kaa, and they all moved again.

Even so has the incorporated Kaa made soft, oozy triangles that melted into five sided figures and coiled mounds, never resting, never hurrying, while his fascinated audience, fearful of excommunication, have listened with rapt attention to every note of his low humming song.

Excommunicated from what? Is the earth indeed flat that they can be pushed off its surface? Is the dominion of Baha-O-Llah so small that it can be reserved for a handful of respectable tenants? Let these people awake and realize that humanity is encompassed with the vitalizing breezes of the New Day which refresh and bring joy to all who have love in their hearts!

When this knowledge dawns upon their consciousness, they will once and forever cast away the shackles of slavery and subserviency, and claiming again the Universal Teachings of Baha-O-Llah, will take their places in the vanguard of freedom and progress, crying out:

as if for the first time.

On the other hand, if this group is left to continue in its course of every day devising a new lock, of forging a new chain, of fashioning a new whip for application on the fair body of the Cause, then, I swear by the Almighty that Baha-O-Llah himself will arise in his Supreme Power and shatter these fetters to a thousand pieces, thus freeing his Message and setting it again to flow, like a tumultuous cyclone, through the wide avenues of life!

What Is the Bahai Cause?

The Bahai Cause is a free spiritual Revelation. Baha-O-Llah, as its Founder, prayed that all men may partake of the inestimable blessings of his Message. This Message, in its essence, belongs to humanity, and no individual, no group of individuals, no church, no state, no organization, no administration can lay an exclusive claim to it. It cannot be trade-marked, and it cannot be patented.

The song of the nightingale and the perfume of the rose defy the authority of a monopolistic junta.

The rays of the stars cannot be harnessed to the throb-throb of a powerhouse.

The words of God are independent of the sponsorship of a corporation.

The wind of the heavens bloweth where it listeth. It has neither a trade-name nor a trade-mark. It does not belong to a trade-union. It does not lend itself to trading, for it has no trading-post; nor can it be discovered on the card-files of a trade-school. It is nameless and tradeless. Its traces are lost in the cerulean sky and its traditions go back to the foundation of creation.

The Bahai Cause is a summons to freedom in the realm of spirit. It is a clarion-call for the emancipation of all men from the limitations of the past. It is a lordly invitation to join in the march of the New Civilization.

The Sea of Truth

Like children of a day, we stand in awe and wonder before the boundless sea of the Cause of Baha-O-Llah, and we fill our small pitchers and are glad that God has made us witness to His measureless ocean of Truth. We pass by. Age after age, cycle after cycle, the children of other times and other climes shall stand before the same sea. They also fill their pitchers and pass by. The procession continues, yes, my dear Bahai friends, yes, my dear Bahai administrators, the procession continues on and on, century after century, throughout the eternity of time and space, until all the pitchers of all the children as yet asleep on the lap of God are filled to overflowing, yet the sea, ah me, the sea—the limitless sea of the Truth of Baha-O-Llah—will still be there, untouched and undisturbed, mirroring on its marmorial surface the effulgence of the sun of Truth stationed at the meridian of its glory, and pouring its rays upon a world, the similitude of which cannot be realized by any living soul today.

In the light of the above explanation we dimly, very dimly understand the meaning of the words of Abdul Baha: The Bahai Cause is the Spirit of the Age.

Let us then close this chapter with his words which to me are words of truth:—

Attach your hearts to Baha-O-Llah. He is the eternal Glory of God. Then from day to day, you will become more enlightened; day by day your power will increase; day by day your work will become more universal, and day by day your horizon will broaden, until in the end it will embrace the universe.

THE BUILDING OF BAHAI ORGANIZATION

Abdul Baha's Definition of What is a Bahai?

When asked on one occasion: "What is a Bahai?" Abdul Baha replied: "To be a Bahai means to love all the world; to love humanity and try to serve it; to work for universal peace and universal brotherhood." On another occasion he defined a Bahai as "one endowed with the perfections of man in activity." In one of his London talks he said that a man may be a Bahai even if he has never heard the name of Baha-O-Llah. He added: "The man who lives the life according to the teachings of Baha-O-Llah is already a Bahai. On the other hand, a man may call himself a Bahai for fifty years, and if he does not live the life he is not a Bahai. An ugly man may call himself handsome, but he deceives no one."

—From the Book Baha-U-Llah and the New Era by J. E. Esselmont, Published by Brentano's, New York.

(Mr. Esselmont spent two months and a half as the guest of Abdul Baha in Haifa in the winter of 1919-20. His book is well written and one of the few that is still current and distributed by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada.)

The late Mr. Myron H. Phelps, one of the early American pilgrims to Acca, writes in 1903:

The characteristic of Abbas Effendi, (Abdul Baha), regarded as a religious leader, which is at once the most striking, the most attractive, and the most impressive, is his generous and tolerant liberality. It is disappointing to find that narrowness and intolerance have already shown themselves in the teachings of some of his followers—a perversion and degradation of true religion which is seen to be an almost inevitable tendency of human nature in all ages of the world, and which most religions have suffered in the hands of their adherents. The chief glory of Bahaism is that its true spirit, as exemplified in its Great Apostle, is utterly free from it.

—From the book Abbas Effendi, His Life and Teachings by Myron H. Phelps, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, N. Y., 1903.

Mr. Charles Mason Remey, Bahai teacher and world traveler, writes in 1912:

The method of Bahai teaching is constructive, in every sense . . . argument and dispute have no place in this cause. . .

In order to combat evil the soul should be filled with love and truth. Fear, together with all its attending destructive forces, disappears in the presence of faith and assurance. . . .

Having no organization, no ritual, or priesthood after the manner of other religions, the Bahais are opposing the work of no other religious bodies. It is a worldwide movement, the spirit of which is working unhindered and unbound by confines and barriers of sect and ism. The Bahais see and recognize truth and spiritual beauty wherever found, and through this attitude of love and tolerance for all, they find at every hand, among the people of other religious bodies, the opportunity of sharing the spirit of their faith. . . .

Often people inquire whether affiliation with the Bahai Cause necessitates the giving up of church membership. The advice is always that no human or religious relations should be severed, but that these relations should become as avenues for giving forth the message and the spirit of the Bahai faith. People having church relations continue to mingle with church people. . . .

—From the book The Bahai Movement by Mr. Charles Mason Remey published by J. D. Milans and Sons, Washington, D. C., 1912. Mr. Remey is one of the earliest and most distinguished Bahai teachers and writers, and one who met Abdul Baha in person and received these principles from its fountain head.

The above extracts from a most interesting chapter of his book show clearly and most truly the underlying ideals of tolerance and universality that inspired him and others to labor for the Cause of Baha-O-Llah.

The late Mr. Alfred W. Martin, of the Ethical Culture Society, an admirer of the Bahai Cause, writes in 1926:

It is the crowning glory of the Bahai Movement that while depreciating sectarianism in its preaching, it has faithfully practiced what it preached by refraining from becoming itself a sect. Far from endeavoring to convert all outside its fellowship to such doctrines as are generally held by the members—whether of “theism,” or of “revelation,” or of “intuition” as a criterion of truth—it has assiduously sought to help men and women of all persuasions to realize the highest ideals of religion. Nothing could be more foreign to the spirit of this movement or further from its purpose than the attempt to displace all existing religions by itself. It frowns upon the notion that any one of the existing great religions will ever triumph over all the rest. And, far from bidding any one sever his connection with the religion he has inherited or adopted, the Bahai Movement bids him cling to it, so long as reason and conscience sanction his allegiance. Thus in the best sense of the word it is a missionary movement. Its representatives do not attempt to impose any beliefs upon others, whether by argument or by bribery; rather do they seek to put beliefs that have illumined their own lives within the reach of those who feel they need illumination. No, not a sect, not a part of humanity cut off from all the rest, living for itself and aiming to convert all the rest into material for its own growth; no, not that, but a leaven, causing spiritual fermentation in all religions, quickening them with the spirit of catholicity and fraternalism—such I take it is the essence of the Bahai Movement.

Clearly, then, we are dealing with a fellowship, an influence, a leaven, a movement that fights shy of sectarian enthusiasms, that abhors the formation of a close corporation with exclusive privileges, for that has been a greater obstruction to brotherhood than either kingly ambition or commercial greed. This movement has no priesthood, no college, no ecclesiastical hierarchy, but, on the contrary, is conspicuous for its distrust of organization, constitutions, by-laws, and other familiar fetters of the western world. But I see foreboding signs, I hear disquieting rumors of a tendency among some within this movement to have it crystallized within a sectarian mold, to have it stand explicitly for a certain set of theological ideas, and then make this the test of fellowship. No more serious or fateful calamity could befall this movement than to have it relegated to the limbo of sectarianism. Let it hold fast to its distrust of organization . . . and not only will there lie before it an ever increasing field of usefulness but, forfeiting none of its beneficent power, it will go on from strength to strength in the fulfillment of its invaluable and indispensable mission.

CHAPTER VI

THE DECISION

ALLEN B. MCDANIEL, HORACE HOLLEY, ROY C. WILHELM, DOROTHY BAKER, AMELIA COLLINS, LOUIS GREGORY, LEROY C. IOAS, HARLAN OBER and SIEGFRIED SCHOPFLOCHER, as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, and THE SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY OF THE BAHAI'S OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, a religious corporation, Plaintiffs, against

MIRZA AHMAD SOHRAB AND JULIE CHANLER, Defendants.

The Morning of April 1st 1941

On April 1st, I as usual left my room at an early hour and, after a walk through Central Park, arrived at the office at 8:30. Presently Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, my partner in the work of The New History Society, took her place on the opposite side of the desk and we both set ourselves to examining our mail.

At 9:30 the telephone rang. In routine fashion, I lifted up the receiver: "Hello!"

GORDON S. P. KLEEBERG
Kleeberg & Greenwald, Counsellors at Law.

"Mrs. Chanler, please!" It was a masculine voice.

"Who is calling?"

"This is Greenwald, of Kleeberg & Greenwald."

With a slight tremor of excitement, I pushed the telephone over to Mrs. Chanler and narrowly watched her as she took up the conversation.

"No!" A smile had broken over her face. "Is it really true? . . . Really?" . . . Her eyes sought mine and she whispered Allah-O-Abha!; then she continued: "Naturally, we'll come down. . . . How could it be any trouble? . . . Haven't we been waiting for this news long enough? . . . Yes, in twenty minutes, and thank you a thousand times."

She put down the receiver and remained silent for a moment. I waited. Finally: "The Court has decided in our favor." Her eyes were shining; mine were already wet with tears. Across the desk, our hands met and gripped each other and I broke out: "Thank God! Baha-O-Llah has freed his Cause!" Meanwhile our secretary, Miss Lilyan Tannen, had stopped her work to listen. No one knew better than Miss Tannen the various stages in the proceedings which had led to this outcome. Hadn't she been sitting in that very place sixteen months before, when we had been served with papers; and, during the long course of litigation, hadn't she felt, as had all our friends, that there couldn't be any other decision? Just the same, confidence and certainty are vastly different. We knew it then; and we were three very happy people on that morning of April 1st, 1941.

Before leaving the house, we shared our news with Mr. Chanler who was very delighted, although he insisted on taking it as a matter of course; then, merrily we started off

New York Law Journal

NO. 7 NEW YORK, TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1941 FORTY-THREE PAGES PRICE

BY MR. JUSTICE VALENTE.

McDaniel v. Mirza Ahmad Sohrab

—This is a motion for judgment on the pleadings, dismissing the amended complaint as supplemented by the bills of particulars as insufficient in law. ¶The individual plaintiffs sue as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada. The Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is of the City of New York, a religious corporation, is a coplaintiff. ¶The complaint alleges that the name "Baha'i" denotes a religion identified with the name of the founder "Baha." The plaintiffs claim to be the authorized representatives of all of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada. They allege that they are publishing books and other publications which teach Baha'i religion. They charge that the defendants, who were members prior to April 5, 1929, of the Baha'i Congregation of the City of New York, have been conducting, without the authority of plaintiffs, meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings and other activities, and announcing and advertising the same as Baha'i meetings, lectures, classes, &c." They complain that the defendants have been giving these meetings, lectures, &c., a Baha'i appearance and atmosphere by teaching, in connection therewith, a religion described as the Baha'i religion and that they have created an erroneous impression that they are connected with and authorized to represent the Baha'i religion and to solicit contributions therefor. In addition, plaintiffs complain of the opening of a book shop by the defendants under the name of "Bahai Book Shop" and of the listing of the shop in the telephone directory under that name, immediately over the name of "Baha'i Center," which represents the listing of plaintiffs' New York office and book shop. ¶In the court's opinion the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion. The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities. No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified with or affiliated with the meetings, lectures, &c., and book shop of the plaintiffs. Defendants have the absolute right to practice Baha'ism, to conduct meetings, collect funds and sell literature in connection therewith, and to conduct a book shop under the title "Bahai Book Shop." ¶The bills of particulars furnished by the plaintiffs admit that the allegations, that the defendants created the erroneous impression that they were connected with the plaintiffs and led the public to believe that their book shop was connected with the plaintiffs, were not based upon any acts of the defendants other than their conducting meetings, lectures, classes and other activities under the name of "Bahai" and their operation of a book shop under that name: listed in the telephone directory immediately above the name of plaintiffs' book shop. The position of the listing is, of course, due to the fact that the telephone directory is arranged alphabetically, so that the name "Bahai Book Shop" naturally precedes the name "Baha'i Center." ¶The motion to dismiss the amended complaint is granted, with leave to serve a further amended complaint within ten days from the service of a copy of this order, with notice of entry. Order signed.

TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1941

down Lexington Avenue where, adepts at the subway as we are, we took the wrong line, and emerged at Times Square instead of at the Grand Central. We put this slip down to pardonable bewilderment and did our best to catch up for lost time, arriving a little breathless at the offices of Kleeberg & Greenwald, Counsellors at Law, 300 Madison Avenue, at exactly quarter past ten. Mr. Greenwald, who had argued the case in court, was awaiting us and he, most sympathetically, spread before our eyes the New York Law Journal of that morning which carried the decision handed down by Justice Louis A. Valente in the Supreme Court, New York, on the suit brought by the Bahai Administration against ourselves. While we were reading the clear-cut findings of the Judge, Mr. Kleeberg looked in and we had the opportunity of thanking our two lawyers who were so well qualified to handle a case of this unusual type; and all the time we were conscious of the fact that we were living a momentous hour—one never to be forgotten in the records of Bahai history.

On the way back, Mrs. Chanler and I, still in a state of pardonable bewilderment, lost each other and we returned by different routes.

The Complaint

On December 5, 1939, Allen B. McDaniel, Horace Holley, Roy C. Wilhelm, Dorothy Baker, Amelia Collins, Louis Gregory, Leroy C. Ioas, Harlan Ober and Siegfried Schopflocher, as the nine members of the National Spiritual Assembly and the Trustees of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, together with the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York, a religious corporation, brought a lawsuit against Mrs. Chanler and myself. The primary object of this proceeding was to prevent us from using the word Bahá'í in connection with a Book Shop and to restrain us and the group formed under the name of The New History Society from holding any meetings in the name of the Bahai Cause or for the purpose of teaching the principles of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha. This action was based on the grounds that the National Spiritual Assembly had registered the word Bahai as a trade-mark in the United States Patent Office, Washington, D. C.

The Complaint, served on April 25th; the Amended Complaint, presented on June 7th; the Bill of Particulars, produced on August 27th; the Supplemental Bill of Particulars, added on October 30th, and the final Memorandum, submitted to the Court on December 27, 1940, by an array of attorneys, namely: Watson, Bristol, Johnson and Leavenworth of 6 East 45th St., New York, display a shifting of attitude very perplexing to the student of these documents. The lawsuit started out on the basis of the trade-mark held on the word Bahá'í, but this definite claim was dropped in the Amended Complaint and in all subsequent Papers. The same process of elimination on other claims is followed, more or less regularly, in the series of briefs, showing that the plaintiffs were laboring under confusion of thought and purpose. Baseless assertions and fantastic allegations were advanced as facts; but no proofs were offered. The officers of the National Spiritual Assembly and of the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York, who were intimately acquainted with the questions involved, were able to swear the following before Notary Publics: I have read the foregoing Complaint (or Amended Complaint) and know the contents thereof, and the same is true of my own knowledge except as to the matters therein stated to be alleged upon information and belief, and as to those matters I believe it to be true; yet hundreds of New York's public, knowing the situation but slightly, would have been willing to go on record, stating that some of these charges were obviously not true. At any rate, according to the Court no facts were ever produced and no good cause of action was ever advanced.

As one studies these documents, one comes to the realization that the plaintiffs are obsessed with a single thought and purpose, namely: that Baha-O-Llah came to earth to form an organization and that his teachings are to be monopolized by them. This line of argument, like the ominous undertone of a Greek tragedy, runs throughout all their demands. They believe that our unlawful public teaching of the Bahai Cause is trespassing upon their rights and privileges and works to their damage and injury; and they consider that, if we are permitted to continue in these unlawful acts, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada and the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York will suffer irreparable injury.

Spiritual and Material Monopoly

To illustrate this point I will quote one from among their many demands of the Court, which is embodied in the Amended Complaint:—

WHEREFORE plaintiffs demand judgment as follows:

(1) That the defendants and each of them, their agents, servants, employees, associates, and each of them be enjoined and restrained, during the pendency of this action and thereafter perpetually.

a. From using, or participating directly or indirectly in the use of, the word Baha'i, or any word deceptively similar thereto, as the name or a part of the name of any meeting, lecture, class or social gathering or as the name or title or a part of the name or title of any book, magazine, or other publication, or as the name or a part of the name under which any book shop or other business is conducted.

b. From representing in any way that either of the defendants is connected with or authorized to represent the plaintiffs or the Baha'i religion or Cause.

c. From soliciting or receiving any form of financial contribution to the Baha'i religion or Cause.

(2) That the defendants and each of them be directed to account for, and pay over to the plaintiffs, the sums received by the defendants, the profits realized by the defendants and the damages suffered by the plaintiffs as the result of the wrongful acts herein alleged, together with plaintiffs' costs herein.

(3) That plaintiffs have such other and further relief as may be equitable.

Here, we have a clear example of both spiritual and material monopoly. The plaintiffs were determined to deprive us (and humanity at large) of claiming to be followers of Baha-O-Llah; they wished to close the doors of our meetings, to scatter our members and friends, to silence our voices, to haul down our flag, and then to receive, as balm for their feelings, whatever contributions we had received and whatever profits we had made, together with further relief as may be equitable.

Off the Record

At this point, I will make a statement which was not included in our defense before the court: The New History Society is not a commercial organization; it is not even a practical organization; neither Mrs. Chanler nor myself are fitted by temperament to conduct a movement based on the material support of its membership or the public. This is a weakness on our part of which I am not proud, but it is a fact, nevertheless. During the eleven years of the existence of The New History Society and the ten years of the existence of The Caravan (its affiliated youth movement), Mr. and Mrs. Chanler have poured in their money freely, joyously, as grist to the mill of their endeavor. Small contributions to the work came in now and then, from our members, some books were sold and the proceeds added to the budget, but ninety-nine and three-quarters percent of the total expended on the maintenance of the work came from the one source—Mr. and Mrs. Chanler. Everybody knows this; and yet the plaintiffs claim that we have made profits, and diverted to ourselves contributions to the Bahai Cause which otherwise would have been received by them. All these allegations were under oath. Here, one cannot help wondering at the mental processes which make such claims and oaths possible.

The fact that we never did make money or profits was not made use of in our defense before the Court. Instead, our lawyers claimed for us the right to collect funds for Bahai work, and this claim was granted in the decision.

So, the Court did not confer upon the plaintiffs a spiritual and material monopoly on the Bahai Teachings: the Cause, for which we are ready to sacrifice our lives, was not taken away from us, nor were our possessions (incidentally, mine are nil) confiscated under the guise of profits, damages, cost of litigation and further relief as may be equitable.

Complete Assurance

A most incomprehensible aspect of the design of the National Spiritual Assembly was utter confidence in the justice of its plan and complete assurance of victory.

One reason for this apparent confidence was, I suspect, the small weight which its members placed on the guarantee of religious liberty in this country as set forth in the Bill of Rights, together with a minimizing of the effect which this law of tolerance had had on the consciousness of the American people. Even if they were aware of the implications of this principle, they, in all probability, imagined that it could be brushed aside in their case by reason of the authority of the Guardian; and here we come to the basis of their assurance. Believing as they do in the infallibility of Shoghi Effendi, and having pinned all their faith on the validity of his judgment and the efficacy of his prayers, the cabled messages sent by him in this connection constituted their safeguard.

JACOB GREENWALD
Kleeberg & Greenwald, Counsellors at Law

Here are the texts of the cablegrams:—

Received December 13, 1939,

Praying (for) success (of) legal measures taken by Assembly.

Received January 18, 1940,

Sleepless vigilance (to) ward off subtle attacks (of) enemies (is) first prerequisite (to) sound unfoldment (of the) process (of the) enterprise already operating.

Received January 23, 1940,

Praying victory similar (to the) one recently won (over) covenant-breakers (in) Holy Land be achieved by American believers over insidious adversaries (in) City of (the) Covenant (i. e., New York).

(The above three cablegrams are quoted in the Bill of Particulars in order to prove the fact that the suit had been brought with the approval and authorization of Shoghi Effendi.)

Further, in a letter written from Haifa, Palestine, on April 15th and published in Bahai News, June 1940, the Guardian has this to say about Mrs. Chanler and myself:

The subtle and contemptible machinations by which the puny adversaries of the Faith, jealous of its consolidating power and perturbed by the compelling evidences of its conspicuous victories, have sought to challenge the validity and misrepresent the character of the Administrative Order embedded in its teachings, have galvanized the swelling army of its defenders to arise and arraign the usurpers of their sacred rights and to defend the long-standing strongholds of the institutions of their Faith in their home country.

I don't feel that I can make comment on the above paragraph other than to address myself to the adjective puny, which is a quaint word of early English flavor. In looking it up, I find that it signifies imperfectly developed, pigmy, shrimp, small fry. Now, I know that Mrs. Chalker, in her modesty, would accept all these terms as descriptive of her, in her service to the Cause, but neither she nor I agree to them in regard to our worth as opponents to the system which thinks to be the unique repository of the Word of God in this day. Probably, the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada give us credit for being adversaries (in a purely legal way), at least, worthy of their steel.

Reasons for Bringing Suit

Shortly after the institution of legal proceedings, the National Spiritual Assembly explains its reasons for bringing action against us, stating that this step represents a culmination of one aspect of the evolution of the Faith. I do think that they were right in this respect.

Under the authority of the Guardian, the time has now come to act against these "insidious adversaries" who have even gone so far as to flout the Beloved's Will and Testament, the very pillar of our unity, by claiming the right to use the term Baha'i to designate their personal activities.

The matter is therefore being taken to the courts, and as soon as possible their excuses will be made a matter of public record. It will be seen whether the present enemies of the Faith can succeed any better than those enemies who have preceded them. (Signed) National Spiritual Assembly. Bahai News, Feb. 1940, No. 133

The decision to take legal action for the protection of the Sacred right of the Baha'i community represents a culmination of one aspect of the evolution of the Faith in recent years which the newer believers have had little occasion to consider or understand. To the older Baha'is, however, the preservation of the basis of the unity and integrity of the community is a matter vital to faith and inseparable from the experience of loyalty and service to the Cause. For they have witnessed actual efforts to deny the validity of Abdu'l-Baha's mission and question the authority of His station. They have realized vividly and poignantly how the very existence of the Faith depends on loyalty to whosoever has received appointment from the Manifestation. They have experienced the necessity of gathering their forces in order to assert the truth and preserve the community from destruction. Such an experience is forever unforgettable, for it means that conscious choice has been made between light and darkness in the spiritual world. . . .

The occasion for the legal action is definite and clear: the claim on the part of non-Baha'is that there are no qualifications of faith in this Cause, but any one is a Baha'i who asserts that he is; and that there is no criterion by which to distinguish between authentic Baha'i literature and literature which some one assumes is Baha'i; and that there is no basis nor foundation in the Revelation of Baha'u'llah for the Baha'i community, with its institutions, its functions and its collective powers and responsibilities grounded in authentic Books and Tablets. In brief, the situation which has arisen is that persons who formerly were believers but who withdrew from the Cause have denied the authority of the Master's Will and Testament. On no other grounds than denial of that mighty Testament can their actions be understood. No compromise is possible. The Baha'i community will assert the truth, and the issue can be left to God. The Will and Testament itself is a victory over those who violated the Covenant in the Master's lifetime, and the Will and Testament invokes divine wrath upon all who seek to destroy what He sacrificed His entire life and being to build.

From Annual Reports—National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, 1939-1940.

Actions taken at the meeting of the National Assembly held immediately prior to the Convention include authorizations for continuance of Temple work . . . and approval of the brief prepared by the attorney in connection with the legal suit against the parties misusing the name Baha'i.

The friends are urged to give their careful attention to the passages in which the Guardian refers to the nature of attacks against the Master and His Will and Testament appearing on pages 89 and 90 of the World Order of Baha'u'llah. Here we find the clearest statement in the writings for discussion of the New History publication dated April, 1940, with new believers and with those attracted to the Faith who have not yet gained the background of understanding and experience to discern the hollowness of any argument and claim based upon the failure to accept the Will and Testament of Abdu'l-Baha. The matter will soon come to trial, and the friends can rest assured that the true nature of the Baha'i Faith and of its Administrative Order will be established in accordance with the power and scope of the written and authentic Teachings.

Significance of Justice Valente's Decision

The decision handed down in the Supreme Court of New York by Justice Louis A. Valente on April 1, 1941, is an epoch-making document for, although it refers specifically to the Bahai Administration and The New History Society, its contents have universal application. Eloquent-ly and definitely, Judge Valente has reaffirmed the validity of the Bill of Rights. In the case under review, he denies to the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada and the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York a monopoly on the word Bahai, thus constituting, in the name of the latest revealed religion, a charter of freedom which shall stand as long as this nation retains the character conferred upon it by its founders. I think that will be always—in spite of the perils that menace liberty in these sad times.

Thus, from now on, any sincere seeker after truth, who has realized his highest aspirations in the Bahai Cause, can term himself a follower of Baha-O-Llah and use his name without let or hindrance. No one can molest him or try to undermine his service in the movement.

With this decision, the Cause of the Most Great Prisoner of Acca, which, even as he, was always free in spite of appearances, has broken through the walls of material confinement, and emerged as a spirit, a leaven, a consciousness—a gift, free and untrammelled, offered by God to every man on earth. Affairs are dependent upon means, said Baha-O-Llah. Through this decision of Judge Valente, the Bahai Cause has been reconferred upon mankind.

Not of Our Own Choosing

Now that the case has been argued before the Supreme Court of New York and a decision arrived at, let it be remembered, as this incident takes its place in the annals of Bahai history, that Mrs. Chanler and I did not seek this lawsuit nor was it instituted by us. The differences of opinion between the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada together with the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York and ourselves, were brought before the public and inserted in legal records through no desire on our part. It was a test placed in our path. We faced it with some diffidence, albeit, light-heartedly; and surmounted it with a sigh of relief and a deep sense of gratitude.

A Victory for All

The minister of a New York church strikes a universal note in a letter to us:—

I feel that this is a victory for us all, since it involves the great principle of freedom of religion. Imagine any group arrogantly claiming a monopoly in this great field!

The Editor of a publication in Chicago, Ill., touches on the same theme:—

We rejoice with you at the recent ruling of the Court, for while we see it as a victory giving you further freedom, we recognize that your case involved many more groups and individuals than your own.

The science editor of a New York daily expresses himself as follows:—

I know that the winning of the suit will remove the last shred of hesitation, and that you will launch new efforts for man's enlightenment.

From a lecturer and writer in Chicago comes this comment:—

My most sincere congratulations. I am proud that you had a judge with sufficient wisdom and width of vision to give such a fair judgment.

A Bahai of long standing writes:—

It is not only a triumph and vindication . . . but the great victory for us all is to know that the principles of our beloved Cause are also vindicated and able to function in the future, free of the dogmatic domination of a few fanatics.

A recognized Bahai sends us a few lines:—

Just received the good news concerning Justice Valente's decision. I could hardly hold back my tears.

SUPREME COURT JUSTICE LOUIS A. VAENTE

Decision Rendered by Justice Valente

THE AMENDED COMPLAINTS, SUPPLEMENTED BY BILLS OF PARTICULARS, ARE DISMISSED AS INSUFFICIENT IN LAW.

Statements made by plaintiffs

1. The individual plaintiffs sue, as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. The Spiritual Assembly of Bahais of the City of New York, a religious corporation, is a co-plaintiff.

The complaint alleges that the name Baha'i denotes a religion identified with the name of the founder Baha.

2. The plaintiffs claim to be the authorized representatives of all of the Bahais of the United States and Canada.

3. They allege that they are publishing books and other publications which teach Bahai religion.

4. They charge that the defendants, who were members prior to April 5, 1929, of the Bahai Congregation of the City of New York, have been conducting, without the authority of plaintiffs, meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings and other activities, and announcing and advertising the same as Bahai meetings, lectures, classes, etc.

5. They complain that the defendants have been giving these meetings, lectures, etc., a Bahai appearance and atmosphere by teaching, in connection therewith, a religion described as the Bahai religion and that they have created an erroneous impression that they are connected with and authorized to represent the Bahai religion and to solicit contributions therefor.

6. In addition, plaintiffs complain of the opening of a book shop by the defendants under the name of "Bahai Book Shop" and of the listing of the shop in the telephone directory under the name, immediately over the name of "Baha'i Center" which represents the listing of plaintiffs' New York office and book shop.

The Court's Opinion:

1. In the Court's opinion, the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion.

2. The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities.

3. No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified with or affiliated with the meetings, lectures, etc., and book shop of the plaintiffs.

The Five Freedoms

4. (a) Defendants have the absolute right to practice Bahaism,
- (b) to conduct meetings,
- (c) to collect funds,
- (d) to sell literature in connection therewith,
and
- (e) to conduct a book shop under the title of "Bahai Book Shop."

5. The bills of particulars furnished by the plaintiffs, stating that the defendants created the erroneous impression that they were connected with the plaintiffs and led the public to believe that their book shop was connected with the plaintiffs, were not based upon any acts of the defendants other than their conducting meetings, lectures, classes and other activities under the name of Bahai and their operation of a book shop under that name listed in the telephone directory immediately above the name of the plaintiff's book shop.

6. The position of the listing is, of course, due to the fact that the telephone directory is arranged alphabetically, so that the name "Bahai Book Shop" naturally precedes the name "Baha'i Center."

7. The motion to dismiss the amended complaint is granted, with leave to serve a further amended complaint within ten days from the service of a copy of this order, with notice of entry.

Order Signed.

The Most Important Point

Although, in its original Complaint, the National Spiritual Assembly asserted that it was the authorized representative of all the Bahais in the United States and Canada, this claim was denied by our attorneys in their first Memorandum, and their denial was sustained by the Court. Justice Valente ruled that the plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion. The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities.

This is the most important point in question; for, henceforth the National Spiritual Assembly cannot claim, as it has up to this time, that it is the sole representative of all the Bahais in the land. There are now, and will be in increasing numbers, Bahais who would not think it appropriate to be represented by the National Spiritual Assembly, and whom the National Spiritual Assembly would not think it appropriate to represent. The laws of this nation will be the practical guarantee of such Bahais, who will turn their hearts to God in the service of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, without benefit of clergy.

A Matter of A. B. C.

A subject, which for a whole year has puzzled those interested in the case from this end, has been the strange claim by the plaintiffs, that we caused the name Bahai Book Shop to be listed in the telephone directory of the Borough of Manhattan, New York City, directly over the name Bahai Center. This assertion seemed to imply that we had used undue influence with the compilers of this volume, or else that we had selected the appellation Book Shop quite arbitrarily, and for the simple purpose of listing ourselves according to the dictation of our fancy. They apparently overlooked the fact that we actually were selling books, and that it would have been unfitting to name our shop, let us say: Bahai Delicatessen or Bahai Dental Supplies, which naming would have placed us under the letter D, and below Bahai Center, but would not have described the contents of the shop.

At the same time, the queerest part of this charge is that, study the telephone book as you will, you can find no listing of Bahai Center. The headquarters of the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the City of New York goes under the title Bahai Assembly, and so it appears in the telephone book. Consequently, Bahai Book Shop was, from the beginning, and still is listed in its proper place among the B's, following the A's. This mistake, which was included in the original Complaint, was pointed out by our lawyers in their first Memorandum, yet, for reasons which seem inexplicable, the error was repeated in all the subsequent legal papers coming from the plaintiffs, so that the Court had to deal with it in its decision.

In the Memorandum of our attorneys the subject was explained as follows:—

Before closing, however, we should like to point out with regard to the complaint, that defendants listed "Bahai Bookshop" in the telephone directory over the name of "Baha'i Center;" that not only had they an absolute right to do this, but that as a matter of actual fact, the complaint is in error, for in the telephone book, there is no "Baha'i Center." What we do find is "Baha'i Assembly"; and this appears above and not below "Bahai Bookshop." So that it is not even possible to contend that defendants adopted their title with any view of having it placed before plaintiffs' listing in the telephone book. Assuming the fact of paragraph 16 (referring to the Amended Complaint of the plaintiffs), it is absurd to contend that there was anything deliberate about the listing, for obviously "Bahai Bookshop" would come in no other place than just before "Bahai Center," if alphabetical arrangement is to be preserved.

This matter is a detail and far from important, yet it indicates a type of careless thinking and planning which is unbecoming at all times, and especially so in a court of law. The National Spiritual Assembly sets itself up to represent the conscience and the mind of its followers in all affairs, great and small; therefore, an instance of glaring inefficiency such as this is less excusable in this body than it would be in persons of more modest claim. We see a picture of the poor Bahais, who had been instructed by Abdul Baha to avoid all lawsuits, being catapulted into the courts, under a leadership which did not even know the name of its own headquarters and was too listless to check on it when its error was pointed out.

Not a Religion

In studying the Complaint, the Amended Complaint, the Bill of Particulars, the Supplemental Bill of Particulars and the final Memorandum, one comes to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are solely preoccupied with the consolidation of their privileges as a corporation. They are deeply concerned over the possible diversion from them of contributions and the making, by others, of profits which might have accrued to their budget. They enlarge on the subjects of unfair competition, pecuniary advantages and injury to business, and let loose shafts of accusation on charges of trespassing. It is clear that the Bahai Administration is not a religion, but a great corporation, having more than one hundred subsidiary corporations operating in various parts of the United States and Canada. Before the Court, it announces that it is the trustee and custodian of a variety of properties, including a temple under construction at Wilmette, Illinois, upon which more than a million dollars has been expended, to date. Likewise, there is a trust fund under its control as well as a publishing concern. All these material advantages are possessed by the Bahai Administration, and no competition shall be allowed in the Bahai name and teachings which are the source of its wealth! No, the Bahai Administration is not a religion. The Bahai Cause, from which it derives, was such; but that was long ago. The members of the National Spiritual Assembly, doubtless, feel a warming of the heart, at times, when memories become vivid again, but these emotions must be discouraged and minimized because a New Order has been established in the movement—an order that is altogether different!

Cases in Point?

In attempting to prove their rights of monopoly on the Bahai Cause, the National Spiritual Assembly and the Spiritual Assembly of New York cited a number of cases, in most of which the courts had decided in favor of the complainants whose rights had been trespassed upon. In listing them here, I raise the question as to whether or not these instances are applicable to a religious theme.

American Fire P. Bureau v. Rockwood S. Co.

Rosenblum v. Manufacturers Trust Co.

Lewis v. City of Lockport.

Society of the War of 1812 v. Society of the War of 1812 in the State of New York.

Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks v. Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

Thaddeus Davids Co. v. Davids Manufacturing Co.

Waterman Co. v. Modern Pen Co.

Westphal v. Westphal World's Best Corporation.

In this case, New York Courts enjoined Paul Westphal from using the name of Westphal in any way whatsoever on hair tonic.

Dupont Cellophane Co. v. Waxed Products Co.

In this case, the disagreement between the two companies was on the word "cellophane."

Bayer Co. v. United Drug Co.

In this case, the reason for the lawsuit was the word "aspirin."

Kellogg Co. v. National Biscuit Co.

In this case, the cause of contention was the word "Shredded Wheat."

Long's Hat Stores Corporation v. Long's Clothes, Inc.

In this case, one company sold hats; another company by the same name, "Long" sold clothes. There was a disagreement over the name "Long."

Tiffany & Co. v. Tiffany Productions Inc.

In this case, a firm of jewelers—Tiffany & Co.—was granted an injunction restraining a Motion Picture Producing Co. — Tiffany Production Inc. — from using the word "Tiffany" in its advertisement.

Wall v. Rolls-Royce of America.

In this case, an automobile Co. obtained an injunction against Wall for using the name "Rolls-Royce" on Radio tubes.

Vogue Co. v. Thompson-Hudson Co.

In this case, the publisher of a magazine obtained an injunction against use on hats of the so-called "Vogue-girl" trade-mark.

To Which Category?

Now, I venture to ask:—Does the Bahai Cause parallel the Society of the War of 1812; or is it in direct line with the Heroes of 1844?

Is the Bahai Cause similar to a bottle of aspirin, manufactured by either Bayer Co. or United Drug Co., which drives away headache or neuralgia as fast as you want it; or is it the Divine Remedy for the healing of nations?

Is the Bahai Cause like unto a package of Shredded Wheat, tempting and nutritious; or is it the Bread of Life that has come down from heaven?

Is the Bahai Cause comparable to an emporium stocked with suits and hats; a show-window for the display of jewels; a factory for the production of motor cars, or a news-stand heaped with fashion magazines, embellished with the glamorous trade-mark, Vogue Girl?

Where shall we place the Bahai Cause?

Has it properties such as hair tonic, some of which, (according to Gabriel Heater) cause luxuriant hair to grow on a tired scalp; or is it the Truth that vitalizes and sustains the minds of men?

Is it like a piece of cellophane, covering and preserving a package of Lucky Strike cigarettes; or is it, in itself the Preserved Tablet on which the fingers of the Almighty have traced eternal words?

Are its goods in the nature of Waterman Fountain Pens or Modern Fountain Pens; or is its treasure the Supreme Pen of Baha-O-Ilah, from which the gems of wisdom and utterance, and the arts of the contingent beings have appeared and become manifest?

In which of these two departments of enterprise can the Bahai Cause be classified? Kleeberg & Greenwald, our attorneys, expressed themselves on this point in their Memorandum before the Court:—

Most respectfully, we submit that all the cases cited by plaintiffs are immaterial and beside the point.

The Thought of Abdul Baha

In the Defendants' Memorandum, Kleeberg & Greenwald stated:—

Accordingly, plaintiffs, however magnificent and extensive their organization, have no greater claim than defendants, to dominate, supervise or control the Baha'i faith, practices or name. Since defendants are not of their organization, they have no right whatsoever to dominate, supervise or control them. Since religious freedom is a corner-stone of our libertarian concept and fundamental laws, they have no right to say whether defendants are Baha'is or are not Baha'is, nor whether defendants may or may not call themselves Baha'is, nor whether defendants may or may not practice Baha'ism. These questions are not for the plaintiffs . . . The individual and his conscience are supreme in this field.

As was said in City of Cincinnati vs. Minor:

Let the state not only keep its own hands off but let it also see to it that religious sects keep their hands off each other. Let religious doctrine have a fair field, and a free, intellectual, moral and spiritual conflict . . . Among the many forms of stating this truth . . . to my mind it is nowhere more fairly and beautifully set forth than in our own constitution . . . It is the true republican doctrine . . . It means that a man's right to his own religious convictions, and to impart them to his own children, and his and their right to engage, in conformity thereto, in harmless acts of worship toward the Almighty, are as sacred in the eye of the law as his rights of person or property . . . And although in the minority, he shall be protected in the full and unrestricted enjoyment thereof . . . Constitutions are enacted for the very purpose of protecting the weak against the strong; the few against the many.

And so, on the basis of the above presentation, Justice Louis A. Valente decided to protect the weak against the strong, the few against the many. In so doing, he encircled the Cause of Baha-O-Llah with the protective arm of the United States of America, re-affirming the thought of Abdul Baha, expressed before the Central Congregational Church in Brooklyn, N. Y. on June 15, 1912:—

Just as in the world of politics there is need for free thought, likewise in the world of religion there should be the right of unrestricted individual belief. Consider what a vast difference exists between modern democracy and the old forms of despotism. Under an autocratic government the opinions of men are not free, and development is stifled whereas in democracy, because thought and speech are not restricted the greatest progress is witnessed. It is likewise true in the world of religion. When freedom of conscience, liberty of thought and right of speech prevail, that is to say, when every man according to his own idealization may give expression to his beliefs, development and growth are inevitable.

Monopoly on Name Denied to Baha'i Group

Can't Keep Religion From Rivals, Court Rules, Dismissing Complaint

In a decision handed down in the Supreme Court today Justice A. Valente ruled that he could not grant a monopoly of the name of a religion. He also held that he couldn't stop anyone from practicing a religion merely because the organized practitioners of the religion objected.

The decision delighted Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanled, the society woman who has been a leader of a group of Baha'i followers in New York and a sponsor of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, a Persian poet, who inspired her to take up the work.

'Erroneous Impression.'

Justice Valente's decision dismissed a complaint brought against Mr. Sohrab and his group, which was a little formal organization, by the organized Baha'is, who sued as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada in the Spiritual Assembly of Baha's of the City of New York.

The organized Baha'is complained that the unorganized Baha'is were giving an erroneous impression that they were authoritative Baha'is by conducting what purported to be Baha's meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings, etc., by soliciting contributions with use of the Baha'i name and by listing the Baha'i Book Shop in the telephone book directory over the name of the Baha'i Center, which is the office and book shop of the organized Baha'is.

Equal Rights Upheld.

"In the court's opinion," said Justice Valente, "the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion.

"The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities. No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified with the meetings, lectures, etc., and the book shop of the plaintiffs.

Listing Doesn't Enter.

"Defendants have the absolute right to practice Baha'ism, to conduct meetings, collect funds and sell literature in connection therewith, and to conduct a book shop under the title 'Baha'i Book Shop.'"

As far as the listing of the book shop in the telephone directory was concerned, the justice said, that was merely an alphabetical and not a legal matter, for it was a well accepted fact that the letter "B" preceded the letter "C" in the alphabet and therefore the telephone company was quite right in listing the "Baha'i Book Shop" ahead of the "Baha'i Center."

Court Rules Against Monopoly Of the Name of Any Religion

Justice Valente Rejects Suit of Organized Baha'is Against Baha'i Group Headed by Persian Poet; Says Purported Members Can Practice Faith

Justice Louis A. Valente ruled yesterday in Supreme Court that no one had a right to monopolize the name of a religion and that followers of a religion could not be restrained from practicing their beliefs because of the objections of organized practitioners of the same faith.

Justice Valente's decision dismissed a complaint brought by organized Baha'is, who brought suit as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the United States and Canada, and members of the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is in New York, against Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, Persian poet, who is director of the New History Society, and his group.

The organized Baha'is contended that they were the truly authorized followers of Baha-O-Llah, Persian prophet who founded an order nearly a century ago with international peace as its principal aim. They asserted that Mr. Sohrab's group was conveying an erroneous impression to the public by conducting meetings, lectures and other activities in a bona fide Baha'i setting and soliciting contributions as organized Baha'is.

Moreover, the so-called authorized Baha'is complained that the others opened a book store under the name of Bahai (without the apostrophe) Book Shop, and that the listing of the shop in the telephone directory was immediately over that of the Baha'i Center, the office and book shop of the organized Baha'is.

Justice Valente held, however, that "in the court's opinion, the complaint fails to state a good cause of action."

"The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion," his opinion continued. "The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures and other activities.

"No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified or affiliated with the meetings, lectures and book shop of the plaintiff."

Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, wife of the former Lieutenant Governor of New York under Charles Evans Hughes, and founder and sponsor of the New History Society, said last night that Justice Valente's decision "upholds our guarantee of religious freedom." Mrs. Chanler formed the society after she broke with the organized Baha'is twelve years ago.

"Mr. Sohrab and I started our group after we parted from the other Baha'is on good terms," Mrs. Chanler explained. "We broke away because we felt that they were limiting the movement. But time was short and we felt that the world should hear the principles laid down by Baha-O-Llah."

Mrs. Chanler expanded on her theme, saying that according to the teachings of Baha-O-Llah, "there shouldn't be any organization." However, she added, "Americans love organizations, and little by little the teachings of Baha-O-Llah were being restricted to a choice few." Baha-O-Llah, she said, espoused the principle of "unity pervading all things."

Mrs. Chanler also explained that the organized Baha'is took out a trademark on the name "Baha'i," but that she felt that Baha'is "should not be restricted by a trademark."

The organized Baha'is have ten days to serve an amended complaint.

CHAPTER VII

THE NAME

The Incommunicable Name

The Prophets of every religion have turned to the Name, as constituting the chalice of Divinity on this plane. Whether the Name was Brahman or Ahura Mazda, Jehovah, the Father or Allah, it was held by the faithful as the ineffable Mystery and the awesome approach to the Most High.

In Judaism, the four consonants, variously written, IHVH, JHVH, YHWH represented the Supreme Being. Each one of these letters was a treasure-house of significance and, when put together, they formed and were referred to as the incommunicable Name. The actual pronunciation of the four mysterious consonants was never freely transmitted, and its esoteric meaning was imparted by the teacher only to qualified disciples. Likewise, during the reading of the Old Testament, the Name was automatically substituted by the word Adonai, another Hebrew appellation for God.

The Mishnah so severely prohibits the public utterance of the four consonants or Tetragrammaton that the pronouncer of it risked exclusion from a portion of the world to come. Consequently, in the early Hebrew religion, substitutes, other than Adonai, for the incommunicable Name became current. Magam, meaning Place, was used; also Merciful, and the Holy One.

The Name of God, associated as it was with the being of God, held transforming powers. The Prophet, who had attained miraculous vision and knowledge, was called Master of the Name; while in the older sacred literature of the East, God is Himself referred to as the Name. The Name was the corner-stone of the Hebrew Faith and of Hebrew morality. To do an act for the sake of the Name was to serve without ulterior thought of self-profit; similarly, it was a practice to set slaves at liberty in the Name of Freedom—thus from earliest times, selflessness and freedom were taught as the two essential attributes of the being of God.

The Prophets not only emphasized the sanctity of the Name, but called on the people to pattern themselves on the Power that was back of the Name. Hence, we have the text:—

Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy. (Leviticus, Ch. 19, Verse 2.) This injunction had for meaning: Seek to imitate God, be like God. As he is gracious and merciful, so be thou.

Therefore, it was man's highest duty to honor the Name and to reflect it in his life; on the other hand, any word or act of irreverence toward the Name was held as the most heinous of sins. It was commonly stated that men whose conduct belied their professions were the profaners of the Name, and that the hypocrites must be exposed because they profaned the Name.

The saints of ancient days realized, through their own intuition, that there were two aspects of sin—the one personal, the other communal. He, who offended in regard to the Name, sinned, not only against his own conscience, which was the personal sin, but against the public conscience, which was the communal sin. Therefore, from every standpoint, regard for the Name was synonymous with the nobility of individual and group.

The Complete Name

From a mystical point of view, the name Baha embodies the mysteries of spiritual life; it is the heaven of revelation, the blue expanse of which is studded with the bright stars of knowledge and significance; it is the ocean of divinity, in the depth of which wait the priceless pearls of universal instruction. Baha, which word is to be found in the ancient Scriptures, implying Light or Glory, is the last name in the succession of the Most Holy Names. Including within itself the power of those which have gone before, it is the Alpha and Omega of creation. The letters of the written word and the vibrations of the spoken word—Baha—symbolize the Nameless and the Unknown God whose altar in Athens, with its well-known inscription, was found and witnessed by St. Paul.

In numerical value, the name Baha, according to the Arabic Science of numerology, is 9; 9 being the final digit, the greatest and most complete number. The units end at 9; therefore 9 is the total which includes all other numbers. Likewise, in the dispensation of Baha, we have the complete revelation which includes all other revelations.

As a personality, Baha-O-Llah is the outward manifestation of the glory of the Supreme Being. He is the Focus of the spiritual ideals of past and present and the clear mirror, reflecting the rays of the luminary of Reality. His many titles afford us a key as to his great mission. He was referred to as the Blessed Beauty, the Ancient Beauty, the Blessed Perfection, the Manifestation, the Desired One of all Nations, the Sun of Truth, all of which mean one and the same thing: We have in him the universal and cosmic interpreter of the Spirit of God in this age.

Thus, the names Baha and Baha-O-Llah and, to an even greater extent, the sacred invocation Ya Baha-El-Abha! signify, to an ever-increasing number of men and women in all parts of the world, certain definite and transcendental concepts, certain moral and cultural values, which are within reach of mankind—these concepts foreshadowing a synthesis of the religious aspirations and scientific findings of the Prophets and pioneers of the race. They do not belong to one nation nor to one group; but are legacies of the Supreme Being to all nations and to all groups.

The Treasure Ineffable

As we look back and study the Great Religions, one by one, we realize that, in all of them, the Name was held holy. The true followers considered it as the divine Talisman, the highest Point, the Treasure ineffable. Their minds and hearts turned to the Name as pilgrims approach a shrine. It was the best Gift of God proffered to the best in man, and available to rich and poor, to wise and foolish, to saint and sinner. Even the beasts of the forest and the birds of the heavens, in their own ways, vibrated to the Name. All the roads led to the fountain of the Name, and all the wayfarers had the privilege of refreshing themselves at its cool margin.

A Desecration Without Parallel

While individuals, here and there, through ignorance or for various motives, have profaned the Name; while, with the passing of time, religious hierarchies have, in its regard, developed systems which led to misuse and abuse; it was left to the Bahai Administration to go on record, in cold blood and in the youth of the movement, with an official act of desecration applying to the latest Name.

On August 7, 1928, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada registered the word Bahai—the name of the Cause brought to earth by Baha-O-Llah—as a trade-mark for business purposes.

On August 28, 1934, this same body took out a trade-mark on the symbol, Ya Baha-El-Abha—the Most Great Name, the Supreme Invocation.

Thus, a desecration without parallel and the culmination of crime in the annals of religion was perpetrated by the leaders of the Bahai Administration, without qualm and without regret. In this Twentieth Century, those who considered themselves to be the Vice-Gerents of the Most High registered the Name of Him they claim to serve, as a trade-mark that has been continuously used and applied to . . . goods.

A Charge of Poaching

The Bahai authorities, having raided the Kingdom of Baha and carried off the Name; having built high fences around it, displaying placards inscribed with the words: Private Property, No Trespassing! Verboten!, continued for nearly twelve years, and thought to continue forever in legalized ownership of illegal booty. They had noted, it is true, that their assumption of monopoly was ignored by some, but, feeling that their intrenchment was impregnable, they did not take this fact over-seriously; nevertheless, the day came, when it was considered advisable to bring the matter to an issue, once and for all. Consequently, the persons in question were hailed to court on a charge of poaching.

The first communication sent by the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly to Mrs. Chanler, and dated December 5th, 1939, was in the nature of a warning. It read:—

Probably you were not informed as to the trademark situation and it will not be necessary for our client to do more than bring the facts to your attention. In order to comply with the formalities, however, we must and do demand on behalf of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada that you discontinue immediately the use of the word Bahai . . . and we hereby notify you that upon your failure to do so our client will hold you responsible for profits, damages and costs of litigation. Will you please give the matter immediate consideration and advise us of your decision.

In this manner, and out of a clear sky, was the proposition put up to us: Would we, or would we not defend the Name of Baha-O-Llah? Naturally, we did not hesitate; and, without loss of time, our case was placed in the hands of Michtell & Bechert, Trade-mark Lawyers, of 420 Lexington Ave., New York. In their preliminary answer to the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly, Mitchell & Bechert stated plainly:—

It is our opinion . . . that Bahai, long prior to the year 1900, became and now is a word of common speech necessary for use in aptly describing a follower of Baha-O-Llah. In our opinion, therefore, the word "Bahai" cannot legally be exclusively appropriated by your client.

Again, Mitchell & Bechert wrote:—

It is our opinion that "Bahai" is a descriptive word for aptly describing a follower of the Bahai teachings and furthermore, that the word "Bahai" . . . if it is applied on Bahai literature is descriptive of that literature. . . . We must therefore repeat that, in our opinion, our client is not infringing any rights of your client and is not unfairly competing with your client.

The preliminary skirmishes in the shape of correspondence lasted almost five months and finally it became clear that no amount of logical reasoning could induce the National Spiritual Assembly to withdraw the suit. Then, on April 25, 1940, Mrs. Chanler and I were served with the original complaint—an elaborate document consisting of 12 pages.

The Papers having been officially served, we entered on the second stage of the lawsuit. There was no withdrawal in sight. We faced a real battle; for the forces of opposition were gathering their strength to strike, and strike hard. To the first and single charge—the unlawful use of the word Bahai—other charges, too numerous to catalogue, were presently added, and we realized that this was a fight to the finish and there was to be no turning to the left nor to the right until a final decision had been reached. Therefore Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and I held a conference with Mr. Robert C. Bechert to map out our future plans.

Inasmuch as the case, in the light of the actual Complaint, had branched out from the domain of the trade-mark into a larger field involving the fundamental rights of religious freedom, Mr. Bechert advised us to call into consultation the firm of Kleberg & Greenwald, Counselors-at-law; and at our first meeting with these attorneys, it became evident that the defense of the Cause was in expert hands. From that day on, the combined legal, intellectual and spiritual resources of Mitchell & Bechert and Kleberg & Greenwald were directed to the upholding of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, i.e.:—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Going back to the claim of the National Spiritual Assembly that it held an exclusive trade-mark on the name Bahai, Kleberg & Greenwald, in their first Memorandum, made the following wise declaration:—

It is important to observe however . . . that the word "Baha'i" is the title of a religious group, of a religion and of a follower of that religion. It is like the words Christian, Jew, Mohammdan, Protestant, Methodist, Catholic, Christian Scientist or any one of hundreds of similar designations. When used upon the magazines and printed books of the plaintiffs, it is descriptive of the contents of those magazines and printed books. It states positively and eloquently in effect: "The within publication is a discourse upon the Baha'i faith or some phase or incident of it." . . . Precisely for this reason, the word Baha'i was not susceptible of registration and cannot be the object of private appropriation. . . . Obviously, in view of what we have said . . . the plaintiffs are not the only ones who may issue Baha'i literature. The defendants may do that. Anyone in the world may.

HON. LEWIS STUYVESANT CHANLER

To speak of a publication as being a Baha'i publication, is to give no hint as to its source. . . . A re-examination of all of the authorities cited and referred to in this point, will show that the fact that the plaintiffs have succeeded in registering the word Baha'i as their trademark, does not help them at all, since the word was not susceptible of private appropriation, since it belonged in the public domain in the first place, being the name of a religion and lastly, since it is descriptive of the material upon which it is used, it could not be registered, and if it was registered, the registration was meaningless.

An Abandoned Claim

After the masterly Memorandum containing the above statement had been submitted to the Court, and the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly had had a chance to digest its contents, they no doubt felt that the monopoly, so far as the trade-mark on the word Bahai was concerned, could not be maintained, and it is probable that they, then and there, persuaded the members of the National Spiritual Assembly to abandon this claim. However that may be, the Amended Complaint, which shortly followed and was presented long before the case came up before Justice Valente, was devoid of all reference to the trade-mark on the word Bahai.

Thus, The New History Society won its first battle out of court; and the name Bahai, after an imprisonment of nearly twelve years in a registration dungeon, passed into the open—free to make its permanent abode in the hearts and lives of all who hold it in love and reverence.

In their final Memorandum presented to the Supreme Court, Kleeberg & Greenwald refer, in passing, to the abandoned claim.

In their original complaint, as a separate cause of action, they (The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada) sought to enjoin the use of the word Baha'i, in connection with defendants' literature by claiming that they had registered in the United States Patent Office, the trade-mark "Baha'i."

In the Amended complaint, this claim is abandoned. And for good reason.

The above slight reference to the question of trade-mark on the name Bahai, which had originally been the object of the lawsuit, must have made our opponents feel somewhat uncomfortable; for, having relinquished their claim, they did not wish to be even reminded of it. Suddenly, the subject had become taboo; and although the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly replied to our own attorneys in a measured legalistic manner, they seemed to question the good taste of dragging this skeleton out of the closet in the presence of the august tribunal.

This is my own psychological deduction, so I shall quote the actual words spoken in this reference by the attorneys of the National Spiritual Assembly in their Memorandum delivered before Justice Valente:—

It is true as defendants state that the original complaint pleaded registration and infringement of the word Baha'i as a trade-mark . . . but no such question is raised by the amended complaint.

In this remarkable manner did the claim of trade-mark on the word Bahai go by default!

Misrepresentation

An interesting sidelight is contained in a Report of Mr. Martin T. Fisher of Washington, D. C., who made an exhaustive investigation of the trade-mark on the word Baha'i. The Report, which is dated December 8, 1939, includes the following extracts:—

Re: "Baha'i" Trade-Mark Registration No. 245,271.

Trade-Mark registration 245,271 is for the word "Bahai." The mark was registered under the 1905 Act as a non-descriptive mark on August 7, 1928. It was registered by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada of New York, New York, a common law corporation. The goods covered by the registration are magazines and printed books. Use of the mark is claimed since 1900. . . .

The mark was registered in 1928. I talked with one of the Examiners in the Trade-Mark Division about the situation and he said that there is considerable doubt whether, under the present practice, the mark would be registered. Probably the Examiner who allowed the mark in 1928 did not know that there was such a thing as a Bahai religion. He said that under the present practice, it probably would not be registered because descriptive. Furthermore, if the founder of the religion is named Baha, it could not be registered under 1905 Act. . . .

Certainly the use of the name "Bahai Book Store" on a book store is not infringement of the registration, because a book store, first of all, is not an article of merchandise, and even if it was, it is merchandise of different descriptive properties from the goods covered by the registration, namely magazines and printed books.

In substantiation of the point that the word is merely descriptive, I call your attention to Webster's New International Dictionary, 1925 Edition, in the "Addenda" in the first part of the dictionary, under "Bahai" there appears this:—

"A member of the sect of the Babis consisting of the adherents of Baha (Mirza Hussain Ali, 1817-1892), entitled "Baha'u'llah" or "the Splendor of God" . . . Baha in 1863 declared himself the supreme prophet of the sect, and became its recognized head."

In making a close study of the application for trade-mark on the word Bahai, one finds in it no reference to religion; it simply is a commercial enterprise doing business at the old stand. The Commissioner of Patents is given to understand that the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada is a common-law corporation, organized and operated under declaration of trust and doing business at . . . and that it has adopted and used the trade-mark . . . on magazines and printed books . . . and presents herewith five specimens showing the trade-mark as actually used by applicant upon the goods. . . . The trade-mark has been continually used and applied to said goods in applicant's business since 1900. The trade-mark is applied or affixed to the goods by printing the same thereon.

Now, I believe that no one can deny the assumption that the members of the National Spiritual Assembly, when they applied in 1928 for registration of the word Baha'i, knew the elementary truth that the Bahai Cause is a religion and that the word Baha'i is descriptive, and therefore not registerable. Then why, in the face of this knowledge, did they permit themselves to go ahead with their plan? One sentence in Mr. Martin Fisher's Report sheds a flood of light on this point. He says:—

Probably the Examiner who allowed the mark in 1928 did not know that there was such a thing as a Bahai religion.

We can imagine the Examiner thinking that Bahai was an exotic Oriental word, concocted, after some research on the part of these American merchants in order to label their goods and wares. This is current procedure in the business world; yet, by no stretch of imagination can we invest the members of the National Spiritual Assembly with the same innocence regarding the point involved. Then, why did they allow themselves to perpetrate the unethical act of concealing from the Commissioner of the United States Patent Office the fact that the word Bahai was derived from the name Baha, and that Baha was a person, and more, that he was the founder of a Universal Religion? The answer is of course plain. In such case, they would have been refused the trade-mark!

Victory on Three Counts

The proceedings brought by the National Spiritual Assembly against Mrs. Chanler and myself can be divided into two parts:

1. The original Complaint, which was instituted on the grounds of trade-mark on the word Bahai.

This claim was dropped; it went by default and, to all intents and purposes, the stigma of trade-mark has been lifted from the word Bahai.

2. The Amended Complaint, which applied to the teaching of the Bahai Cause, to holding meetings in the Bahai name, to publishing and distributing Bahai literature and to the collecting of money for the movement, etc.

This complaint came up before the Court and was set aside as invalid.

Thus, a victory was gained right down the line; and this victory included a third count which, although never mentioned or referred to in any complaint or in any brief, is closely involved with the whole proceeding. This third count is on the MOST GREAT NAME.

The Most Great Name

When, in 1934, the National Spiritual Assembly registered the symbol, Ya Baha-El-Abha as a trade-mark, it perpetrated a sacrilege too awful to contemplate. This phrase, in Arabic lettering, which has come down through the ages, and which was specified by Baha-O-Illah as constituting the highest vibration in all language, represents to the Bahai mind the ultimate degree of sanctity. The Bahai who, in his rapt moments, pronounces the MOST GREAT NAME, realizes that he is penetrating to the realm of Divinity. He enters the Holy of Holies and, in so doing, he leaves behind the shoes of mortal considerations. The very angels might fear to tread in the sanctuary of the MOST GREAT NAME, but he who draws near in love and detachment may pronounce these syllables to the healing of his soul.

In speaking of the MOST GREAT NAME, Baha-O-Llah tells us to relinquish all else; for this word, per se, is our supreme possession. He says:—

In this day, neither knowledge nor art, neither wealth nor honor will enrich you. Cast them aside, and turn toward the MOST GREAT NAME, by which the Psalms, the holy Pages and this Book are sponsored.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, Pages 76-77.

Again, Baha-O-Llah tells us that in this Day God has conferred upon humanity the treasure ineffable, once hidden and now revealed by himself:—

O peoples of the world! The Ancient King has sent the MOST GREAT NAME, and has given to men the glad-tidings of this Manifestation, which, once hidden in the world, and conserved among the protected treasures, is now revealed by the Supreme Pen upon the pages of God.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 98.

In referring to this celestial invocation, Abdul Baha said:—

In this century of the latter times Baha-U-Llah has appeared and so resuscitated spirits that they have manifested powers more than human. Thousands of

GERMAN BAHAI CHILDREN
Group taken with Abdul Baha in Stuttgart in 1913.

His followers have given their lives and while under the sword, shedding their blood, they have proclaimed:—

Often, in the watches of the night, I have heard the voice of Abdul Baha sounding out the MOST GREAT NAME, Ya Baha-El-Abha, over and over again; and my spirit would be caught up by the rhythm of those accents and the power of those tones, and spun toward the Garden of Reality. I have waited at those garden gates, while my Master walked therein among the roses and hyacinths of significance; and I have remembered.

The Sign of the Cross

It might be useful to pause here, in an attempt to realize what has been done; and, in order to get a quicker reaction, we will make a parallel of the most sacred symbol in a given religion. Let us choose Christianity.

From earliest times, the followers of Jesus have held to the Sign of the Cross. This sign typifies, in conjunction: sacrifice and redemption. It is the emblem of the little personal calvary, sanctified through the great universal Calvary; it is the vision of mercy and promise, glorifying the path that leads toward the Kingdom of Heaven.

The tiny shrine by the hillside, the simple chapel in the village street, the magnificent cathedral on the square of the metropolis carry the Sign of the Cross. The poor man and the rich man, the sinner and the saint, fix their eyes on the Cross. The gesture of the Cross is made on the newborn infant and over the sick-bed of him who prepares for his eternal rest. The Cross hangs on the rosary and, when the beads of prayer and life are told, the suppliant, severed from the bonds of earth, presses his lips to the Cross.

Shall we continue our effort to make a parallel? Is it possible to imagine a registration in the United States Patent Office, or in the Patent Office of Rome or of any other locality, on the Sign of the Cross? Can we conceive of any group of hierarchs holding this symbol as a trade-mark to be used upon goods in the pursuance of business? No! The task is beyond us. We cannot think of the unimaginable, nor imagine the unthinkable. We are just where we started off—paralyzed before an actuality, the implications of which stagger the mind.

A Trade-Mark on Goods and Wares

The symbol of the MOST GREAT NAME was registered in the United States Patent Office on August 28, 1934, by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, as a trade-mark . . . actually used by applicant upon goods, with serial No. 316,444 (see The Bahai World, Vol. VI, 1934-1936, page 350). It was registered in the Dominion of Canada, by the Canadian Assembly, as an Arabic symbol on January 4, 1935, with serial No. 165,527. The registration in Canada on the word Bahai, of same date, carries the serial No. 165,526 (see The Bahai World, Vol. VI, 1934-1936, pages 351-357).

In the applications, presented to the Commissioner of Patents of the Dominion of Canada, it is stated that the applicants have used the said mark . . . ("Baha'i" or the "Arabic symbol") on wares ordinarily and commercially described by the applicants as periodical literature and printed books. . . . The applicants are commercially concerned with wares ordinarily and commercially described as. . . . They were and are entitled to adopt and use the mark in Canada in association with the wares which they have used.

At a time when they were well under way toward completion of this campaign of trade-mark on the word Baha'i and on the holiest of all symbols, Ya Baha-El-Abha, both in the United States and in Canada, the members of the National Spiritual Assembly prepared to herald these glorious achievements to the Bahai world, and receive the approbation of their followers. Let us listen to the proclamation:—

The friends will be happy to learn that the use of this Symbol is now legally protected for proper Baha'i use under the trade-mark registration recently made by the National Spiritual Assembly through the U. S. Patent Office.

And again:—

The Symbol of the Greatest Name is now legally protected for proper use under trade-mark registration recently made by the National Assembly through the United States Patent Office. Action has also been taken to obtain similar protection in Canada. . . . The word "Baha'i" was legally protected several years ago.

—Bahai News, No. 91, April 1935, page 9.

In this manner was the incommunicable Name stolen from the temple and set up in the market place. This invocation, the last sound to issue from the throats of the martyrs, this beatific vision, this hallowed call, this clysian aspiration, this supernal chant, this omnipotent orison, this majestic paeon, this redemptive breathing, this voice of conscience, this creative prayer, this angelic adoration—this Ya Baha-El-Abha which has come down through the ages, was indexed, card-filed and catalogued by order of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada as a trade-mark to be applied to goods in pursuance of business. No words are strong enough, in this regard; no tears are warm enough; no blush is deep enough! The supreme sacrilege has been committed and inscribed on the record—and the record stands.

Hence, the trade-mark on the symbol of the MOST GREAT NAME, the application for which was signed by Mr. Horace Holley, Secretary, constitutes the rock-bottom of infidelity in the annals of the Bahai Administration. No further act, however black, can rival this one. The National Spiritual Assembly has a clear running—it can only move upward, after this!

CHAPTER VIII

THE APPEAL

The American Ideal

The American ideal of religious liberty as embodied in the Bill of Rights has, during one hundred and sixty-five years, shone like a brilliant star on the horizon of our cultural and intellectual institutions. It has inspired the leaders of men in the council chambers of the nation, in the courts of law and in the Halls of Congress.

Daniel Webster, champion of freedom for whites and blacks long before the Civil War, spoke often and passionately on the subject of religious and civil liberty. He said:—

If the true spark of religious and civil liberty is kindled, it will burn. Human agency cannot extinguish it. Like the earth's central fire, it may be smothered for a time; the ocean may overwhelm it; the mountains may press it down; but its inherent and unconquerable force will heave both the ocean and the land, and at some time or other, in some place or other, the volcano will break out and flame up to heaven.

President Roosevelt, in his epochal speech before Congress, delivered in January 1941, propounded his Four Freedoms as follows:—

In future days, which we seek to make secure, we look forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms.

The first is freedom of speech and expression—everywhere in the world.

The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world.

The third is freedom from want, which, translated into world terms, means economic understanding which will secure to every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants—everywhere in the world.

Fourth is freedom from fear, which, translated into world terms, means world-wide reduction of armaments, to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbor—anywhere in the world.

That is no vision of a distant millennium. It is a definite basis for the kind of a world attainable in our time and generation. That kind of world is the very antithesis of the so-called New Order tyranny which the dictators seek to create with the crash of a bomb. To that new order we oppose the greater conception—moral order.

Freedom of worship, this most cherished ideal of the founders of the Republic, was brought again to the forefront of public discussion when Mr. Sumner Welles, Acting Secretary of State, issued a Statement to the country in regard to the fundamental policy of the United States government. It was published in the New York Times of June 24th. Mr. Welles said in part:—

This government often has stated, and in many of his public statements the President has declared, that the United States maintains that freedom to worship God as their conscience dictates is the great and fundamental right of all people. . . . To the people of the United States this and other principles and doctrines of communistic dictatorship are as intolerable and as alien to their beliefs as are the principles and doctrines of Nazi dictatorship. Neither kind of imposed overlordship can have, or will have, any support or any sway in the mode of life, or in the system of government of American people.

Turning to the educational field, let us now listen to Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, President of Columbia University, New York, as he spoke at Commencement Day on June 3rd, 1941:—

Are we, then, of this twentieth century and of this still free and independent land, to lose heart and to yield to the despair which is becoming so widespread in countries other than ours? Not for one moment will we yield our faith or our courage! We may well repeat once more the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Most governments have been based on the denial of the equal rights of men; ours began by affirming those rights. We made the experiment, and the fruit is before us. Look at it—think of it!" However dark the skies may seem now, however violent and apparently irresistible are the savage attacks being made with barbarous brutality upon innocent women and children and non-combatant men, upon hospitals and institutions for the care of the aged and dependent, upon cathedrals and churches, upon libraries and galleries of the world's art, upon classic monuments which record the architectural achievements of centuries—we must not despair. Our spirit of faith in the ultimate rule of the moral ideal and in the permanent establishment of liberty of thought, of speech, of worship and of government will not, and must not, be permitted to weaken or to lose control of our mind and our action.

This ideal of religious liberty, so firmly established in the American mind and in the American way of life, is here to stay so long as our democracy endures; and should any individual or group of individuals, native or foreign, no matter how mighty or resourceful, scheme to minimize its influence and bedim its glory—the entire population of the nation would rise as one man and, like a giant cyclone, crush and scatter that sinister force into a thousand, nay into a million, pieces. Verily, the people of the United States can be counted upon to protect their chosen, their hard-won and most cherished principle—liberty.

When, in the Supreme Court of New York, Justice Louis A. Valente dismissed the Amended Complaint of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, brought against Mrs. Chanler and myself, as insufficient in law and laid down the decision that the plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion, he simply implemented once more the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights, together with the wise utterances of Daniel Webster, President Roosevelt, the Acting Secretary of State, the President of the Columbia University and of a host of statesmen, educators and leaders of thought, past and present.

Nevertheless, the Bahai authorities could not or would not decipher the bold handwriting on the walls of our American institutions, so they carried the case to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, taking exception to each and every part of Justice Valente's decision. They asked that:—

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed and the motion for judgment on the pleadings denied with costs to appellants.

For Consumption Abroad and at Home

The National Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada has two faces—liberal and orthodox; democratic and totalitarian; and these faces are mirrored on the pages of their twin publications, entitled World Order and Bahai News. The former, which is intended for the public, reflects broad modern ideas; the latter, published for Bahais Only, presents articles and news designed to bolster up and maintain a despotic and illogical system. The material in both magazines is edited by the same hand.

Let us glance at the opening paragraph in a leading editorial, entitled The Universal and the Sectarian, which appeared in the May, 1941 issue of World Order; and as we read, we might try to realize that this article was signed by the National Spiritual Assembly at the very time it was bringing suit against us for holding Bahai meetings. I, myself, think that it is a splendid bit of writing, and believe that if Mr. Greenwald had seen it in time, he might have been inspired by it to a yet higher pitch of liberality, if that were humanly possible. Here is the extract:—

Religious controversy, it has been said, is not a quality of America. Here, for the first time in history, a great and varied population has been assured freedom of conscience and the individual right to worship God according to any practice not contravening the moral code or attacking the authority of the civil state. Here, likewise, such opportunity has, until recent years at least, been offered for material advancement that most of the social energy has spent itself in effort to achieve personal fulfillment. The climate of tolerance and the season of fruitfulness are not conducive to the rancor of theological struggle.

Here we see that, while the National Spiritual Assembly asserts that religious controversy is not a quality of America, it allows itself the very un-American action of dragging its fellow-believers into the law-courts over nothing more nor less than a religious controversy. While it states that in this country a varied population has been assured freedom of conscience and the individual right to worship God according to any practice, it exerts itself to deprive the members of The New History Society and all liberal Bahais of this very individual right to worship God according to their convictions and beliefs. While it speaks of the climate of tolerance, it disseminates among its communities the poison of theological controversy and, without mercy or let-up, persecutes the liberal elements within its own ranks. But then, this piece of writing is for the public, while the actual doctrines of the Bahai Administration may be studied by the elect within the pages of the Bahai News.

Complexes

It is true that the National Spiritual Assembly, once in a while before its own membership, pretends to value the assets conferred by these United States. In a letter dated February 15, 1941, and addressed to Bahai Friends, it questions mournfully:—

In our favored country we are still in possession of our freedom, our possessions, our liberty of thought—how long will they last?

Indeed, not long if this institution has its way! The present day Bahai organization is the model upon which an alleged world order is to be fashioned; and what a world order it will be, judging from the pattern! The individual is not allowed to use his conscience, but must adhere to the rulings of his superiors without regard to modern social issues or humanitarian inclinations; above all, without regard to the Bahai teachings. Under these conditions, the better elements in the group are forced to maintain a painful silence, leaving the conduct of affairs to those of less sensitive fibre. It is largely for this reason that the Bahais keep themselves aloof from current affairs. They function on a basis that is untenable; consequently, they cannot look the world eye to eye. I have heard more than one of their leaders speaking on public platforms in Geneva, Switzerland, at times when that city was the hub of advanced thought, and these outstanding Bahais could not bring themselves to the point of pronouncing the name of Baha-O-Llah. Why this? Simply because the Bahai Administration has produced a complex among its advocates. The Guardian himself never ventures into the public.

Efficiency!

After April 1st, 1941, on which date Justice Valente had handed down his decision on our case, I immediately arranged for the making of a photostat which showed the court decision according to the New York Law Journal, together with newspaper articles from two metropolitan dailies. Copies of this photostat were mailed on April 5th to all the Bahais on our list throughout the United States and Canada. I, then, applied myself to the writing of an article setting forth the facts involved in this court procedure. This article appeared in the May issue of New History and was distributed throughout the country about April 18th.

Now, it happened that the Bahai Convention opened in Chicago on April 24th and the Annual Report, 1940-1941, published by the National Spiritual Assembly for this occasion, was circulated among the delegates and others attending the Convention. It is interesting to study the section of this report appearing on page 2, which deals with the lawsuit, the more so when it is borne in mind that many of the Bahais who read it were already fully informed, by means of the photostat page and New History, on the outcome of the case. We wonder what these persons thought of the sentence: At the moment of writing this report, the fundamental issues involved have not been determined by the court. If these Bahai readers took this statement on its face value, we hope, at least, that they gave us credit for efficiency and reliable editing, in comparison with the cumbersome Bahai Administration which with all its fanfare about organization; with the vast sums expended on the greasing of its machinery; with its impressive secretariat, a building on the Temple grounds at Wilmette, Ill., going under the name: Haziratu'l-Quds or Island of Paradise, was yet unable to present to the delegates at its convention an up-to-date report. Be that as it may, we will now examine the statement on the lawsuit:—

2. The National Assembly, representing the American Baha'i community, is engaged in a legal action before the Supreme Court of the State of New York for the purpose of preventing the public misuse of the name "Baha'i" in connection with activities under conditions which represent a clear betrayal of the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha, repudiation of His station as Center of Baha'u'llah's text, the definite disobedience to Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Faith, as well as to the recognized administrative institutions of the Faith in America. At the moment of writing this report, the fundamental issues involved have not been determined by the court. The Baha'i issues and principles, however, are truths which stand steadfast beyond compromise or corruption in the souls of the followers of Baha'u'llah . . .

No human being can alter or pervert or exploit a revealed truth. The realm of Revelation is raised high above the reach of hostile human influence. The issue in these cases is not one in which a Divine Faith subjects its vital truths to decision by any court. . . . But the community of believers at any given time represents many different stages of development, and the hostility of the betrayer and the foe comes as a necessary and helpful test of the individual believer's understanding and firmness. That is all, except for the further consideration that the Faith acquires public influence and esteem through the dramatization of its vital principles under onslaught or denial.

The Dear Old Fox

In the study of the above piece of writing, one sentence strikes us forcibly. It reads as follows:—The issue in these cases is not one in which a Divine Faith subjects its vital truths to decision by any court.

Here a sneaking suspicion creeps into the mind. Could it be that we underestimated the efficiency of our opponent in having presented to the Convention a report that was way behind the times? It is possible that the Bahai authorities did not wish the lawsuit which had miscarried to be discussed on the floor of the Convention; they may have decided that it were far better to leave the whole thing in the air, at the same time putting out the thought that a court decision was, after all, of no importance. I do not like to be crassly obvious, but here I cannot help recalling the dear old fox who would have found the grapes very palatable, indeed, if only he could have set his teeth into them. Yes! If Justice Valente's decision had been in favor of our opponents, it is more than probable that the Administration would have lifted his words to an altitude close to Baha-O-Llah's own and himself to the station of sainthood.

In a mimeographed copy of the Financial Report of the Bahai Administration for the year ending February 28, 1941, we find, included in the list of expenses, the sum of $5,914.24 paid for legal services. Now, as the legal procedure against us has continued since that time, a second hearing having taken place before the Appellate Division the following June, we surmise that another item of $19,000, bracketed for contingent and unforeseen items (Bahai News, May 1941) may be drawn upon for legal services to be rendered later. A good deal of money is entailed here; money contributed by sincere Bahais who doubtless were under the impression that the whole unpleasant business was worthwhile. Actually, I consider it inappropriate for a plaintiff to turn up his nose at law courts. No one invited him there; certainly not the poor defendant who was jostled out of the mild tenor of daily life to meet his good pleasure. In our case, however, the Guardian of the Bahai Cause seems to place the agitation that was stirred up at our door, for, incorporated in a cablegram dated April 23rd which was addressed to the 33rd Annual Bahai Convention, we find the following:—

Scornful (of the) agitation stirred up by (their) adversaries, (the) breakers (of the) Covenant; the resolute upholders (of the) Divine Plan will, indeed cannot but, persist (in their) ordained task (to) propagate (the) flame, enlarge (the) administrative limits, (and) strike deeper roots (of the) world-encircling, world-redeeming Faith (of) Baha-U-Llah.

My opinion is that, at whatsoever door the agitation may justly be laid, a law court is at no time a fit place for controversy among the followers of Abdul Baha.

Appeal to a Higher Court

The friends are informed that with the Guardian's approval an appeal has been taken on the decision made by a judge of the New York Supreme Court on April 1st and the matter is therefore still in process of settlement.

—Bahai News, May 1941, page 6.

In the above statement, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada apprised their communities of the fact that the lawsuit which had been brought against Mrs. Chanler and myself had failed in its purpose, and that the decision of Justice Valente was being contested.

The legal season was now drawing to an end and there were many cases on the calendar; consequently it was a question as to whether or not ours would come up before the Court adjourned for the summer. It looked pretty doubtful, but both Mrs. Chanler and I hoped that the matter would be disposed of this spring; also we were interested in hearing the argument, as an experience, for we had been absent when the case was tried for the first time before Justice Valente. We therefore watched the calendar as our name crept toward the top, and on Thursday, June 5th, Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and I entered the Court House of the Appellate Division, First Department, Supreme Court, New York, on Madison Square at 25th Street. It was the closing day.

As we stood in the lobby, our attorney, Mr. Kleeberg, joined us and handed me the list of cases. I counted them; there were eighteen, ours being the eighth. It looked as if ours would not be reached, as the court sits from two to six P.M. and the sessions end promptly; so, Mr. Kleeberg wished us happy holidays and, leaving us in the hands of Mr. Greenwald, went back to his office.

We slipped into the court room and seated ourselves at the side. A case was in process of being argued and, by a strange coincidence, it happened to be one in which the City of New York was plaintiff, being represented by the Corporation Counsel, William C. Chanler; so our time of waiting was very well spent. Mr. Chanler had the unexpected pleasure of listening to an argument delivered by his son and all of us had the privilege of being present at a very interesting and important hearing, which, incidentally, consumed two hours.

When the case was disposed of, we realized that ours could not possibly come up in the short time remaining before six o'clock; and then the Presiding Judge made an unprecedented announcement. He said that an hour's recess would be allowed for dinner, after which the Court would hold an evening session. This decision came as a bombshell to the ears of the tired attorneys who had been waiting about all the afternoon on the chance of being called; but, needless to say, it delighted our trio of Bahai defendants. We were not to be disappointed after all and, as the lawyers filed out of the court room and gathered in groups in the lobby, we joined Mr. Greenwald who was distinctly in need of consolation at the prospect of having to argue a case after dinner.

It was at this time that Mr. Ellis W. Leavenworth, counsel for the National Spiritual Assembly passed by, and Mr. Greenwald, acting in true Bahai spirit, called him over. Then, Mr. Leavenworth, himself responding in like Bahai spirit, shook hands with all of us and we had the opportunity of exchanging a few words with our opponent, just before the battle. We appreciated this little incident and found that the plaintiff's lawyer had a very charming personality, seeming to be of the calibre that was accustomed to winning cases—not considering this one, of course. It is a fact that lawyers are very much like cooks: They cannot produce a satisfactory result if you have nothing but dry bones and bitter herbs in your market basket.

A walk in the rain to a near-by cafeteria, a little relaxation over coffee and sandwiches, and the hour's recess was over. We returned to the classical, but compact little building of the Appellate Division and took our places in the discreetly lighted court room. From the walls on either side of the benches and behind them, the faces of former Justices looked down, from within their gilt frames; while raised on a dais before us were the five Justices who, either by a majority vote or unanimously, were to decide for or against us in this case that was all important in our eyes. During the arguments that preceded ours, I examined their features, from left to right: the Honorables Edward S. Dore, Alfred H. Townley, Francis Martin, Presiding Justice, Edward J. Glennon and Joseph M. Callahan, and was deep in this psychological study when, at exactly 8:15 o'clock, the Presiding Justice proclaimed: Allen B. McDaniel versus Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, and I came to myself with a start.

Responding to this summons Mr. Leavenworth, counsel for the National Spiritual Assembly, rose to his feet and opened his argument. He stated that the Bahai Cause originated in Persia, having been founded by Baha-O-Llah (here a wave of emotion passed over me, for it was the first time, to my knowledge, that this name had been pronounced in an occidental court room); he then went on to say that the Cause was little known in America, and that he, himself, had heard of it for the first time when the case was placed in his hands.

Continuing, Mr. Leavenworth said that the subject of religious freedom had been much accentuated by the defense; actually, Justice Valente had rendered his decision on this ground, while as a matter of fact, this issue was not involved.

Here, Justice Dore leaned forward and asked: Is not this case a question of religion, at least in part?

No, your Honor! Mr. Leavenworth answered, It is purely commercial.

Completely nonplussed, I turned toward Mrs. Chanler to see her reaction. Her eyes were opened wide. Neither of us could believe our ears; but, we had another shock coming, for, at that moment, Mr. Leavenworth was asserting that his clients had never objected to our use of the word Bahai.

Mrs. Chanler and I settled back in our chairs. This evidently was to be a Comedy of Errors, and we might as well take it as such; also, we realized that the material upon which Justice Valente had based his opinion was actually in the hands of the Court.

The Bahai case afforded a period of relaxation in this session of unusual length. As soon as the word had been pronounced, all those present dropped the business attitude; the judges bent forward, some of the spectators tittered and many faces bore smiles. When the Master's name was mentioned, Justice Townley recollected that Abdul Baha had visited this country in 1915. While we made a mental correction of 1912, his associate judges looked at him quizzically and asked a few questions in undertones. Thus, the whole proceeding was carried out in comparatively informal vein, although the Court gave minute attention to the points presented.

When Mr. Leavenworth referred to the long-standing establishment of the Bahai organization in this country and said that the existence of the Bahai Bookshop led to misunderstanding, Justice Dore asked of our attorney:—Why then do you not write under the name of your society or bookshop: "Not connected with the Bahai Assembly."

Here, like a shot out of a gun, Mr. Greenwald flashed back: Why shouldn't they write under the name of the National Spiritual Assembly: "Not connected with The New History Society or the Bahai Bookshop." At this, Judge Townley remarked that it seemed to him that the names of the two groups were already well defined: the one functioning under the name Bahai Assembly, and the other under Bahai Bookshop.

In his argument, Mr. Greenwald emphasized the fact that the case, actually was nothing but religious; that it involved the fundamental principle of religious liberty; that Baha-O-Llah was the founder of a religion and a Bahai is one who follows his teachings; therefore, that the name was descriptive and could not be appropriated by any group or by any individual. He continued to speak along these lines, finally quoting Justice Valente's decision which held that the defendants, as Bahais, have the absolute right to practice Bahaism, to hold meetings, to publish books and receive contributions for their religious activities; for all these functions are the inalienable rights of every religious group. Then, he mentioned the fact that one of the two defendants was secretary to Abdul Baha up to two years before the latter's departure from this life. It was here that Justice Townley surprised everyone by showing that he also knew something about Abdul Baha.

Mr. Leavenworth and Mr. Greenwald took but ten minutes each to present their cases; consequently, the claims of both sides were offered in a sketchy fashion. It is to be remembered, however, that the full texts of the series of complaints and of the defense, in printed form, had already been submitted to the Court, to be studied at its leisure.

HON. ALFRED H. TOWNLEY

Justice of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

Somersaults and other Agilities

A most striking point in the new brief presented to the Appellate Division by the National Spiritual Assembly is the assertion that this body had never attempted to prevent Mrs. Chanler and me from using the word Bahai; in fact, the plaintiffs concede that we are entitled to the use of the word. The new brief states:—

It is not the use of the word Baha'i but the manner of use that is the grounds of complaint. Defendants are entitled to make lawful use of the word, but have no right to use it as an instrument of deception. Nor is any question of religious freedom involved. Defendants are not charged with practicing Baha'ism. No question is raised as to what is or is not the true Bahai religion.

The above is a prestidigitatorial somersault; it is a complete reversal of that which was claimed by the plaintiffs in their original and Amended Complaints. A comparison between the documents presented to Justice Valente and the brief prepared for the Appellate Division makes us marvel at the bland manner in which the National Assembly travels from the north pole of error to the south pole of truth and vice versa without the slightest display of embarrassment. Let us place the following clause taken from the latest brief:—

Defendants are entitled to make lawful use of the word (Bahai) side by side with an extract taken from an earlier brief:—

That the defendants and each of them, their agents, servants, employees, associates and each of them, be enjoined and restrained, during the pendency of this action, and thereafter perpetually:

From using, or participating directly or indirectly in the use of, the word Baha'i, or any word deceptively similar thereto, as the name or a part of the name of any meeting, lecture, class or social gathering, or as the name or title or a part of the name or title of any book, magazine, or other publication, or as the name or a part of the name under which any bookshop or other business is conducted.

Kleeberg & Greenwald, in their answering argument, point out the somersault that was being made by the National Spiritual Assembly, who in . . . their brief say with some emphasis that plaintiffs claim no monopoly of the word "Baha'i," and no question of religious freedom is involved. The former of the two questions is novel, constitutes a recession from a position taken in the court below and, we respectfully submit, belied by the language and the purport of the amended complaint. The latter of the two assertions, we take firm and somewhat indignant exception to.

This litigation does involve nothing else than religious freedom and the remarks of Mr. Justice Valente that "plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion" and "defendants have the absolute right to practice Baha'ism" are well justified.

Of what were the members of the National Spiritual Assembly really thinking when they made this sudden reversal; or did they think at all? Could they have imagined that the Justices of the Appellate Division would be taken in by their innocent attitude and decide in their favor without reading the contents of their Amended Complaint, in which the sacrilegious claim of ownership over the word Bahai had been made? At any rate, Kleeberg & Greenwald were little impressed by the display of agility that was taking place. With stern gesture, they halted the performers, as it were in mid-air, stating:—

Whatever plaintiffs may say in their brief about religious freedom not being involved here, we respectfully submit that the clear objective of their cause of action is the restraining of defendants from the practice of their faith. It is an attempt to compel defendants to recognize and yield to plaintiffs' authority and organization. And it is an arrogant attempt.

To succeed, plaintiffs must force facts into the molds of legal formulae. If they succeed in this, they succeed in consolidating their powers, in foisting their unwelcome paternity upon defendants, and incidentally their followers who, attending their lectures, etc., and reading their literature, may be assumed to also be Baha'is (the Baha'i membership of The New History Society, whom defendants represent). That they have not succeeded in meeting legal formulae, we will demonstrate. . . . Whatever may have been plaintiffs' contention in the court below, it is clear that at least now, belatedly, they concede that plaintiffs claim no monopoly of the word "Baha'i." Indeed, it is inconceivable that any other position could have been taken by plaintiffs for the name of a religion is clearly in the public domain.

As can be seen in the above passage, our attorneys, more than any others, have divined the sinister motive of the National Spiritual Assembly, screened as it was under much backing and filling. They have unmasked a deep-laid scheme, the purport of which was none other than to shape their monopolistic demands into legal formulae, thus inscribing their unjust pretensions on the statute books, for all time to come. We owe a deep debt of gratitude to Kleeberg & Greenwald for their powers of penetration as well as for their gift of expression, for they have brought to light a plot which, had it been successful, would have totally nullified the objects and aims of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha.

In the course of the proceeding, a point was made of lawful use of the word Bahai, the plaintiffs asserting that:—

The fact that the name of a religion is a part of the language and open to public use does not give defendants the right to make deceptive use of it.

Here, Kleeberg & Greenwald answered:—

It is incidentally a complete retreat from the position taken in the complaint and in the court below where they asserted their right to ban absolutely the use of the word "Baha'i" by any one other than themselves or those acting under their authority.

In closing their argument the members of the National Spiritual Assembly cast their last die in the gamble for the retention of some sort of authority and power over The New History Society. On bended knee, figuratively speaking, they prayed to the Appellate Division to grant them something, no matter what—just a tiny something, in order to save their faces before the Bahai world! They were even willing—wonder of wonders! to concede to us the use of the name Bahai—but with a reservation, if they could receive some kind of relief to which they felt entitled! They ask:—

Although plaintiffs pray for an unconditional injunction as is customary in such cases, the relief to which plaintiffs are entitled is measured by plaintiffs' right to prevent deception. If it is possible for the defendants to use the name Bahai in a way that does not cause deception, they are entitled to do so.

It is here that our attorney draws the sword of righteous indignation and in words that shall echo and re-echo through the corridors of time cries out:—

But are not plaintiffs being too smug and patronizing toward defendants? What greater right have they to say how defendants shall use the word "Bahai" than defendants have to say how plaintiffs shall use the word "Bahai"?

Actually it is not Funny

It was stated by the plaintiffs that the case brought against us was purely commercial; therefore, on this ground, our right to accept contributions toward our work in the Cause was contested. The fact that we never did receive contributions for Bahai purposes and never asked for such; that the tiny sums which were given to us were added to the Caravan Foundation Fund (an account reserved, untouched, for a club-house in the far-flung future) or else were donations toward our competitions and the exhibit at the World's Fair, were not taken into consideration. We took in payments for subscriptions to our magazine New History and The Children's Caravan, for books, and again, for war-relief societies. Our Caravan Hall, where admission fees are paid to our dances, is still deeply in the red—all these things were not weighed by our opponents; naturally, they did not know of them in detail. However, the plaintiffs, under oath, charge that:—

Upon information and belief, defendants have solicited and received payments of money as contributions to the Bahai religion or cause at numerous times which are unknown to the plaintiffs, and such payments were solicited by each of the defendants personally.

I should think that the phrase: at numerous times which are unknown to the plaintiffs, would bring a smile to the face of a waxen image. If our sins (if sins they be) are known only to ourselves, why accuse us of them in court? The outcome of this charge was the same as that of all the other charges: it fell to the ground because it was totally unsubstantiated. All this is funny, in a sense; and yet actually, it is not funny that those who signed this document should so lend themselves to deception and untruth.

Priority

A most striking assertion made by the National Spiritual Assembly in its brief before the Appellate Division dealt with the subject of priority: Because this body and its predecessors have existed for more than forty consecutive years, administering the affairs of the Bahai community, acting as the custodians of multifarious Bahai properties, incorporating the Bahai Assemblies, publishing books and magazines and holding meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings and other activities—therefore, this priority in the field of service entitled the plaintiffs to an exclusive right over the Bahai Cause.

Now I, personally, do not believe in priority. The vineyard of the Lord is extensive; and the Lord wants the ground tilled. There is a parable in the New Testament in which the eleventh hour workers were rewarded even as the first; and some complained: Saying, these last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day. And the Lord answered: Take that thine is, and go thy way. I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. (St. Matthew, Chapter 20, Verses 12 and 14.)

Naturally, I deny the validity of priority as such, but I will now set forth a few claims of my own in contradistinction to those made by the National Spiritual Assembly on the basis of their forty years of executive work:—

I am by birth a Persian, of the same nationality as the Bab, Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha; of the same nationality as the Babi and Bahai heroes, saints and martyrs.

My grandmother, as a girl, saw the Bab in her native city of Esphahan, and talked with him. She became one of his followers, and later brought up her family in the Faith.

Our house in Esphahan became the center and meeting-ground for all the Bahais in those parts. Here, my noble uncle Haji Sayyed Zeinel-Abedin, poet, philosopher and teacher, presided over a group of devoted enthusiasts, which held together in the midst of danger.

Finally our house was attacked and pillaged by the mob, led by the Mohammedan clergy. As a child, I suffered the indignities of the bastinado, and had the honor of shedding a few drops of blood for the Cause.

For eight years, as secretary and interpreter, I served Abdul Baha in the East and in the West. I also served his followers. Long before many of the present members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada and their predecessors had even heard the name of the Cause, I was working to the best of my ability along the lines laid out for me by my Master.

These are my credentials, and I believe that Abdul Baha would endorse them; yet after all, personal credentials or group credentials are of small account when one considers the vast significance of the Cause.

Long before the Spiritual Assembly of New York City was turned into a religious corporation in 1932; before the word Bahai was trademarked in 1928; before the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada wrote its Constitution and By-laws in 1926; before the Tablets of the Divine Plan were unveiled in New York in 1918; before the foundations of the Temple were laid in Wilmette, Ill., in 1912; before the Bahai Authorities became trustees of properties and valuable holdings; before the Bahai Cause was established as a political organization, weighted down by parliamentary rules and procedures; before the Bahai Groups had become conscious of their existence and inaugurated their annual Conventions in 1907-08; before the present Bahai Spiritual Assemblies in various cities of the United States were evolved out of small working Committees during the period, 1894-1906; before the Bahai Movement was introduced to America at the World Congress of Religions, in 1893; even before the emergence of Bahai Communities in Iran, Syria, Palestine, Iraq and other countries of Asia, from 1844 on—long before all these happenings, the Bahai Cause lived and vibrated in the hearts of the Bab Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha.

Indeed, prior to the appearance in Iran of this mighty trio, the ideals of the Bahai Cause had shone forth from the minds of Mohammad, Jesus, Moses, Confucius, Laotze, Buddha, Zoroaster and the Rishis of India; even as they had shimmered and twinkled in the consciousness of saints, seers, poets and philosophers, back through the ages.

We follow the clue, penetrating yet further into the abyss of time: Long before these Prophets, Avatars and Manifestations had been incarnated on this globe, the Bahai Cause, as a Cosmic Energy, was moving and flashing in illimitable space.

The Bahai Cause was publici juris long before the foundations of the world were laid; long before the creation of the heavens and the earth; even at the time when God said: Let there be light, and there was light, and God saw the light (Baha) and the light was good!

And now in this year of 1941 the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada have claimed a priority of more than forty years' standing on the Light of the World—the Cause of Baha-O-Llah!

The Decision

In concluding its brief before the Appellate Division, the National Spiritual Assembly demanded that:—

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed and the motion for judgment on the pleadings denied with costs to the appellants.

Kleeberg and Greenwald closed with:—

Lastly, it is respectfully submitted that the order and judgment appealed from should be affirmed with costs.

The case was argued before the Justices of the Appellate Division on June 5th. On June 19th, the New York Law Journal carried the brief but significant notice:—

McDaniel et al., v. Sohrab, &c., res—Judgment and order unanimously affirmed, with costs. No opinion. Order filed.

In journalistic language, according to the New York World-Telegram of the same day, this meant that:—

BAHA'I IS PLACED IN PUBLIC DOMAIN

The Appellate Division today unanimously upheld the ruling of a Supreme Court Justice that no one could monopolize the name of a religion.

The Herald-Tribune on June 20th head-lined its article with:—

Closing words in the address of Rabindranath Tagore, given on December 7, 1930, before The New History Society:—

In the human world the great truth of unity was also at first realized as a power residing in the community, comprehending and transcending all individuals. This mysterious power according to the primitive people was magical, and they symbolized it in their totems and tried to invoke and propitiate it with their magical rites.

This was the first great discovery of man—the mysterious spirit of unity which was beyond the bounds of quantity that can be measured, and this is religion. But, as I have already suggested, religion in its first appearance had the aspect of power, which, though it gave unity to the tribe itself, created a strong division outside of it; for power is exclusive, and the tribe claimed its God as the source of all powers for its own benefit.

So long as God remained as thus divided, religion became cruel and terribly unjust, creating more mischief in this world than any passion that is criminal. Even today, when God is no longer believed to be specially belonging to the tribe, he is fenced in by secretarianism which gives rise to a fierce spirit of dissension and egotistical boastfulness. Truth, when tortured and mutilated, becomes more heinous than untruth; and therefore, when unbelievers bring proofs of the harm that religion has done to man we cannot but remain silent.

It is the mission of all great Prophets to see that religion, which is to give us spiritual emancipation, should not itself be made a fetter to immure our souls in a dungeon of dogma and formalism, giving rise to sectarian vanity that obscures our vision of the spiritual unity of man.

The first Prophet whom we know in the history of man was Zoroaster, who preached God as the universal truth of unity, the eternal source of goodness and love; and it is significant that on the same soil of Persia, which gave birth to him, arose the other great Prophet of the modern age, Baha-O-Llah, who also preached God as profoundly one, in all races, tribes and sects, the true worship of whom consists in service that has reason for its guide, and goodness and love for its inner motive principle.

We are here tonight to offer our homage to Baha-O-Llah. He is the latest Prophet to come out of Asia. His life is certainly a glorious record of unflinching human search after truth; and his message is of great importance for the progress of civilization. It makes me happy indeed to see that The New History Society is doing such splendid work for the propagation of the message of Baha-O-Llah.

right to monopolize the name of a religion and that followers of a religion cannot be restrained from practicing their beliefs because of the objections of organized practitioners of the same faith.

Thus was the opinion of Justice Valente, of the Supreme Court, New York County, unanimously affirmed by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court; and, to repeat the well-chosen words of the World-Telegram:

BAHA'I IS PLACED IN PUBLIC DOMAIN.

SUPPLEMENT

Pen Pictures

As this book goes to press, two publications are brought to my attention: the one a pamphlet dated April, 1941, put out by The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, entitled The Bahai Case against Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, and the other, Bahai News of October, 1941.

This literature is well suited for analysis and would have been examined in detail had time allowed; however, I believe that in some cases comments are superfluous. Therefore, I content myself with taking a short extract from each publication and placing these side by side to serve as portraits of the two personalities who acted as defendants in the legal proceedings initiated by the Bahai Administration in 1939 and brought to a conclusion in 1941.

Pen Picture of Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, drawn by The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada

After quoting from the reply sent by Mrs. Chanler's attorneys to the attorneys of The National Spiritual Assembly at the very outset of the legal proceedings, the writer of the pamphlet continues:

Read as an ordinary letter from a lawyer engaged to handle a legal problem for a client, this communication would indicate that this attorney, after making a serious study of the Baha'i literature and teachings, had advised his client that by his interpretation she is within her rights to use the word "Baha'i" in connection with any book or pamphlet which she, claiming to be herself a Baha'i, thinks is helpful to her conception of the Baha'i Cause. That is, technical questions being involved, Mrs. Chanler consults an attorney and accepts his opinion and acts upon it. But when we bear in mind the simple fact that all questions of Baha'i right or wrong, as to knowledge, faith or action, can be determined only by reference to the Baha'i teachings themselves or to the appointed Interpreters of these teachings, this recourse to an agency outside the Faith for a vindication of an attitude taken in defiance of the Baha'i teachings and Baha'i administrative bodies, as well as in denial of both Abdul'l-Baha and Shoghi Effendi, successively the sole Interpreter of the Baha'i literature, means that Mrs. Chanler, needing a weapon for attacking and wounding the sacred unity of the Faith of Baha'u'llah, seeks her sharpened blade in the realm of a legality developed for dealing with questions of property and neither intended nor adapted to realize and apply the spiritual truths of a revealed religion. As the persecutors of the Babis and the early Buha'is in Iran seized torch, sword, rope and gun to inflict injury upon the innocent bodies of their victims, so now we have a similar motive and instinct expressed, however, in conformity with very different social conditions.

Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahai Cause.*

And now more particularly concerning the prime mover of this latest agitation, which, whatever its immediate consequences, will sooner or later come to be regarded as merely one more of those ugly and abortive attempts designed to undermine the foundation, and obscure the purpose, of the Administrative Order of the Faith of Baha'u'llah. Obscure in his origin, ambitious of leadership, untaught by the lesson of such as have erred before him, odious in the hopes he nurses, contemptible in the methods he pursues, shameless in his deliberate distortions of truth he has long since ceased to believe in, ludicrous in his present isolation and helplessness, wounded and exasperated by the downfall which his own folly has precipitated, he, the latest protagonist of a spurious cause, cannot but in the end be subjected, as remorselessly as his infamous predecessors, to the fate which they invariably have suffered.

Dear Mrs Chanler:

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your very kind letter dated Dec. 24th 1928. He was very glad to hear that Mr. Sodrah - a very good service in New York in the way of public speaking. He surely knows the Cause very well, being for such a long time with the Master, translating his letters & talks to those who have been with the Beloved during his life. Time should feel the responsibility they bear & do their utmost in shouldering it. Especially those who were, we may say, nurtured by him. Shoghi Effendi hopes that all this work that he is doing will more & more bring him into an active participation with his friends for his services in the way of

Appellate Court Rejects Baha'i Petition on Name

Affirms Refusal to Restrict Use of Sect's Designation

The Appellate Division affirmed unanimously yesterday a previous Supreme Court ruling that no one has a right to monopolize the name of a religion and that followers of a religion can not be restrained from practicing their beliefs because of the objections of organized practitioners of the same faith.

The Assembly and seven trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada and the Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of New York brought action originally in Supreme Court in an effort to enjoin Mirza Ahmad Schrab, Persian poet and director of the New History Society, and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, wife of the former Lieutenant Governor of New York, founder of the society, from using the word Baha'i in connection with the sales of books, and in meetings or classes. Mr. Schrab and Mrs. Chanler also operate a book store under the name of Bahai Book Shop, at 828 Lexington Avenue.

Mrs. Chanler formed the New History Society after she broke with the so-called authorized Baha'is twelve years ago. The Baha'i religion was founded nearly a century ago by Baha-O-Llah, a Persian prophet, with international peace as its principal aim. Justice Louis A. Valente dismissed the original complaint in Supreme Court.

Baha'i Is Placed In Public Domain

The Appellate Division today unanimously upheld the ruling of a Supreme Court justice that no one could monopolize the name of a religion.

Without handing down an opinion, the division indorsed the action of Justice Louis A. Valente in dismissing a complaint made by the National Spiritual Assembly and others against Mirza Ahmad Sohrab and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, society woman, who are doing business under the name of the Baha'i Book Shop, 828 Lexington Ave.

The assembly and seven trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, and the Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of this city sought to restrain the defendants from using the word Baha'i in their business. Justice Valente held that the plaintiffs "have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion."

CHAPTER IX

BAHAI CREED MAKES ITS BOW

Creed Builders

None of the Founders of the Great Religions were creed-builders. They taught principles of spiritual life, morality and ethics. Their whole being was suffused with the rays of the Sun of Reality and they summoned all men to band together in the service of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Creeds and articles of faith were formulated by succeeding generations of theologians, men who had lost the vision of the Prophets and were wandering in the waste desert of metaphysical speculations. This is what happened to Christianity. It is happening to the Bahai Cause today—with only a difference of terminology: The Bahai theologians call themselves Administrators.

During a brief period of three years, as he travelled from town to town, from village to village, Christ taught certain spiritual maxims and simple rules for the conduct of life. He never expected that those maxims and rules would become the foundation of mighty, theological institutions nor foresaw that, for ages, the minds of his followers would be occupied with the creation, and obsessed with the enforcement, of dogmas, articles of faith and creeds. Thus, within the span of two centuries, a catechist at Rome produced the famous outline of the Apostles' Creed, which undoubtedly lies at the root of all the similar creeds which flowered into a thousand branches at various church Councils and Synods. Here is the form of this Old Roman Creed—the fountain-head of all Christian theology, the starting-point of all strifes, divisions and sects, and the origin of all orthodoxies, heresies and ecclesiastical anathemas.

The Old Roman Creed

- I. 1. I believe in God, Father Almighty;
- II. 2. and in Christ, His only son, our Lord,
3. who was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary.
4. Crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried.
5. The third day He rose from the dead.
6. He ascended into heaven.
7. Sitteth at the right hand of the Father,

Precautions Taken by the Founders

It was too much to expect that the Bahai Cause would be immune to this process of stratification, but both Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha did their very best to avoid such a calamity. Through continuous explanations, they made vivid this danger in order that the Bahai Movement might be fore-armed and protected from the errors of the previous religions. They were most emphatic on the points that this Cause is universal and all-inclusive; that it does not lend itself to the creation of an hierarchial order; that its fundamental basis is unity and not ecclesiastical distinctions; that it is essentially a spiritual fellowship and not a sectarian corporation with exclusive privileges; that its charter is freedom from worldly and material constitutions, and that its greatness depends upon non-crystallization and open portals.

The Breath of God is diffused throughout the world, asserted Baha-O-Llah. (Bahai Scriptures, page 98.)

The Fragrances of the Merciful have spread their sweet odors over all beings. (Bahai Scriptures, page 106.)

Good Character and Universal Service

It behooveth the people of El-Abha to assist the Lord through their utterance, and to preach unto the world through their deeds and good morals. The effect of deeds is greater than the effect of words (Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 41).

In this Day the hosts which assist the Cause are (good) deeds and (good) morals (Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 26).

O people of Baha! Adorn your temples with the mantle of trustworthiness and integrity; then assist your Lord with the hosts of (good) deeds and morals (Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 119).

O people of God! Be not occupied with yourselves.

Be intent on the betterment of the world and the training of nations. The betterment of the world can be accomplished through pure and excellent deeds and well-approved and agreeable conduct. The helper of the Cause is Deeds and its assistant is Good Character (Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 25).

The above shows the emphasis that Baha-O-Llah placed on conduct, and on activity in the path of God. Morality and not creeds; deeds and not words; service and not articles of faith.

Following in the footsteps of his Father, Abdul Baha accentuated the importance of appreciation for all men, and of love and service without compromise and without distinctions. Pointing to the disciples of the Christ as the supreme archetypes of free and untrammelled teachers, he advised the Bahais:

With hearts set aglow by the fire of the love of God and souls refreshed by the food of the Heavenly Spirit, you must go forth as the disciples, nineteen hundred years ago, quickening the hearts of men by the call of Glad-Tidings; the light of God in your faces; severed from everything save God (Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. 1, page 6).

Therefore, we must make no distinctions between individual members of the human family. We must not consider any soul as barren or deprived (Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. 1, page 12).

What is a Bahai? To be a Bahai simply means to love all the world; to love humanity and try to serve it; to work for universal peace and universal brotherhood (Baha-O-Llah and the New Era, page 90).

Declaration of Trust and By-Laws

It took almost two centuries for Christian theologians to formulate The Old Roman Creed and thus insert in the pure Faith a yard-stick and a bludgeon. In this instance, however, it took only a few years for Bahai theologians, under the more modern title of Bahai Administrators, to set up The Bahai Creed which, reducing the Cause from spirit to matter, has already become more authoritative and binding than all the teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha.

On Monday, November 28, 1921, at 1:30 A. M., in Haifa, Palestine, Abdul Baha ascended to the life beyond.

On May 27, 1927, Shoghi Effendi, in a letter to the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, acknowledges the receipt of the Declaration of Trust, and in another letter dated October 18th, of the same year, he states: I have read and re-read most carefully the final draft of the By-Laws. (Bahai Administration, pages 124 and 132).

Thus, within the narrow limits of less than six years after the departure of Abdul Baha, a few American Bahais wrote the Declaration of Trust and By-Laws, submitted them to Shoghi Effendi and received his sanction. In this manner, the young Cause, so lately deprived of its great Protector, was, without loss of time, shoved into an institution—a mere waif, the latest one to enter the dark edifice of Religious Organization. No starving Oliver Twist, symbol of maltreated childhood, holding out his plate and asking for more, is pitiful to a greater extent than is the pallid Bahai Cause as it pants for breath under the cold stare of its inflexible trustees.

20, 1934, under the auspices
Platform group, from left to right:—Dr. H. T. Mazumdar, Slade) spiritual daughter of Mahatma Gandhi, on October of The New History Society.

Mirabehn, M. A. Sohrab and Hon. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler,

When this instrument of tyranny was mailed to Shoghi Effendi he, unfortunately, did not see it as a terrible weapon wherewith to stultify the Cause that had been confided to his keeping, and so he gave it his blessing and placed on it his seal of approval.

Here are his exact words in a letter dated May 27, 1927:

The Declaration of Trust, the provisions of which you have so splendidly conceived and formulated with such assiduous care, marks yet another milestone on the road of progress along which you are patiently and determinedly advancing. Clear and concise in its wording, sound in principle and complete in its affirmations of the fundamentals of Bahai administration, it stands in its final form as a worthy and faithful exposition of the constitutional basis of Bahai communities in every land, foreshadowing the final emergence of the world Bahai Commonwealth of the future. This document, when correlated and combined with the set of by-laws which I trust are soon forthcoming, will serve as a pattern to every National Bahai Assembly, be it in the East or in the West. . . .

I eagerly await the receipt of the complete set of the contemplated by-laws, the purpose of which should be to supplement the provisions, clarify the purpose; and explain more fully the working of the principle underlying the above-mentioned Declaration (Bahai Administration, pages 124-125)..

Having received the By-Laws, Shoghi Effendi writes again in his letter dated October 18, 1927:

. . . I have read and re-read most carefully the final draft of the By-Laws drawn up by that highly-talented, much-loved servant of Baha-U-Llah, Mountfort Mills, and feel I have nothing substantial to add to this first and very creditable attempt at codifying the principles of general Bahai administration. I heartily and unhesitatingly commend it to the earnest perusal of, and its loyal adoption by, every National Bahai Spiritual Assembly, whether constituted in the East or in the West. I would ask you particularly to send copies of the text of this document of fundamental importance accompanied by copies of the Declaration of Trust and the text of the Indenture of Trust, to every existing National Spiritual Assembly, with my insistent request to study the provisions, comprehend its implications, and endeavor to incorporate it, to the extent that their own circumstances permit, within the framework of their own national activities. . . .

I would specifically remind you that, in the text of the said By-Laws, which to the outside world represents the expression of the aspirations, the motives and objects that animate the collective responsibilities of Bahai Fellowship, due emphasis should not be placed only on the concentrated authority, the rights, the privileges and prerogatives enjoyed by the elected national representatives of the believers, but that special stress be laid also on their responsibilities as willing ministers, faithful stewards and loyal trustees to those who have chosen them. (Bahai Administration, pages 132-133.)

The Bahai Creed according to the National Spiritual Assembly

And now let us examine the Bahai Creed which is contained in the Declaration of Trust and By-Laws of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada:

The Bahais of the United States and Canada . . . shall consist of all persons . . . who are recognized by the National Spiritual Assembly as having fulfilled the requirements of voting membership in a local Bahai Community. To become a voting member of a Bahai Community a person shall

- a. Be a resident of the locality defined by the area of jurisdiction of the local Spiritual Assembly, as provided by Article VII, Section 12, of this instrument.
- b. Have attained the age of 21 years.
- c. Have established to the satisfaction of the local Spiritual Assembly, subject to the approval of the National Assembly, that he possesses the qualifications of Bahai faith and practice required under the following standard:

Full recognition of the station of the Forerunner (the Bab), the Author (Baha-U-Llah) and Abdul Baha the True Exemplar of the Bahai Cause; unreserved acceptance of, and submission to, whatever has been revealed by their pen;

Loyal and steadfast adherence to every clause of Abdul Baha's sacred Will; and close association with the spirit as well as the form of present-day Bahai administration throughout the world. (Bahai Administration, page 146.)

The above articles of Bahai Creed and Confession demonstrate that, notwithstanding the warnings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, their Cause is today as handicapped and circumscribed as are any of the institutionalized religions; at the same time it must be realized that, while the organizations of the former religions are laden with the sanctity and tradition of antiquity, the organization of the Bahai Cause has none of those hallmarks and is only a pseudo-imitation of those hoary and superannuated institutions.

Early Days in Bahai Administration

In order to corroborate my claim that, from the very start, overlordship was apparent in the Spiritual Assemblies, I will give extracts from a letter, (which is one among countless others on the same subject), written to me in 1923 by one who today is very close to the top of the administrative ladder. Although, in these articles, I am documenting the quotations used, in this case, for obvious reasons, I refrain from including the name of my correspondent. The letter follows:—

The people in the West live in a different world from their brothers and sisters in the East. This is due to the natural instinct of the overshadowing group soul. We must try to eliminate cliques and be more universally detached. As it is, we mostly travel in herds like sheep. How I wish I might have a heart to heart talk with you about these Spiritual Assemblies. There is a frightful lot of organization in this Cause which is supposed to be free from all such things, and democratic. I believe the trouble between the American believers is due to the manner in which the Spiritual Assemblies function. They carry things with a very high hand and mostly, instead of representing the group in each Assembly they sit and make laws without any consideration of the souls whom they are supposed to represent. . . . This is the day of deeds not words; but it seems very difficult to convince some of the dead leaves. . . . They have gotten used to blowing around the tree of life, and they do nothing but blow. . . . Everything was in awful shape after Mrs. — got through with the first meeting. I just sat down and refused to work under the arrangements as laid down by the Assembly of Nine. . . . Do write me about this matter and don't start in telling me about Obedience and the absolute Control of said Assemblies. We are all sick of being reminded, every time we have a suggestion to make which did not originate in the minds of the Spiritual Nine, that we must leave that to the decision of the Spiritual Assembly.

Bahai Obscurantism

These articles of the Bahai Creed are the harbingers to an era of obscurantism in this glorious movement. They are compounded of bigotry in all its gruesome forms and pave the way to moral darkness. 'This desire for concentrated authority is in direct opposition to inquiry and enlightenment. It is a mediaevalizing tendency. In the Middle Ages we had dry scholasticism; in the Bahai Cause we have arid administrative legalism. The Bahai Administration is the progeny of religious intolerance, obviously injurious to spiritual freedom and ethical emancipation. The Articles of Creed as quoted are implements of torture in the hands of a Bahai Administrative Obscurantist. According to his standard, the Bahai Cause is to be run, not by the fresh springs of inspiration, but by the elixir distilled from the withered flowers of administrative theology.

The Bahai Obscurantists have deified the Bab, Baha-Ollah and Abdul Baha, but they have crucified their Cause.

The impulse to Bahai Obscurantism, or to any other form of obscurantism, arises from a deeply rooted, if not an inherent, tendency in human nature to distrust free inquiry. This tendency becomes aggravated when it operates in the sphere of religion. An uneasy suspicion of knowledge and its results; a dislike for a liberal and inquisitive mind, and a feeling of fear in regard to independent investigation of truth as for something not wholly good for any one—these sentiments have contributed to the evolution of Bahai Obscurantism, which is the herald of professional or class exclusiveness in the Cause as exemplified by the National Spiritual Assembly, and the local assemblies. Thus considered, it is the weakness of a select body which, I hope, and believe, stands in no relation to the common conscience of the rank and file of the Bahai communities.

One observes the distortion of truth on the part of the Bahai Obscurantists by their unwholesome preference for that which is secondary and derivative, as contrasted with that which is primary and fundamental; by their leanings toward the accretions and embellishments of administration, as contrasted with the sources of inspiration; toward the peculiarities of theories and creeds, as contrasted with the Bahai obligations which are universally binding.

The dislike of the sophisticated, intellectualized Americans, like some of the Bahai administrators, for those common, simple, universal realities of the Bahai Cause, which are the very soul of this movement, has taken practical effect in the substitution of mechanistic, legalistic, administrative and organized authority for the seeing eye and illumined heart—and the result has been a gradual diminishing of reliance on the spiritual teachings of the Cause and a total absence of enthusiasm on its behalf.

However, it is not an idle word to say that, while Obscurantism has entrenched itself in the Bahai Cause, a strong reaction has, at the same time, been provoked against this entrenchment. This is not a negative reaction, not merely a sense of dissatisfaction, a state of unrest, but a positive anxiety and sense of responsibility, coupled with wistful remembrance of better days.

'The Clay-pieces of the World

Therefore, in the spirit of those to whom the teachings of Abdul Baha are ever alive, I will recall the admonitions of the Master regarding verbal confessions, acknowledgments, literal faith and external relations.

In this cycle of Baha-O-Llah, verbal confessions and acknowledgments, literal faith and certainty and external relations are of no avail. Nay, rather, the beloved of God and the maid-servants of the Merciful must manifest such attributes and ethical conduct as to embody and personify the teachings of Baha-O-Llah. They must promulgate the law of the Kingdom with deeds and not words.

Thus may they become the quintessence of being, the signs of the Kingdom of God and the standards of the Supreme Concourse.

—Bahai News, later renamed Star of the West,
Vol. 1, No. 4, May 17, 1910, pages 8-9.

Further, in regard to appellation and encumbrances, Baha-O-Llah says:

This Cause has crossed the gulf of words, and pitched its tent on the shores of the Sea of Detachment.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 58.

And again, from Baha-O-Llah, the call to serenity and the reminder that the purely material is not formidable:

Oh men! Why fear, and whom do you dread? These clay-pieces of the world shall be disintegrated by a slight moisture.

—Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 23.

CHAPTER X

BEGINNINGS OF THE BAHAI ORGANIZATION

The Ancient Path

The Bahai Cause is a Renaissance of the spirit and the appearance of a vital energy, pouring its divine potencies into the affairs of men. It is:

that which was revealed from the source of Majesty, through the tongue of power and strength, through the prophets of the past. We have taken of its essences and clothed it with the garment of brevity (Baha-O-Llah—Hidden Words page 1).

The Bahai Cause is a summons to unity on the material and spiritual planes:—

By sending you the prophets and in revealing the books, it was intended that men should attain unto the knowledge of God and become united and agreed (Baha-O-Llah—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 10).

Abdul Baha was asked: What is the essence of the Bahai message? He answered:

The Bahai message is a call to religious unity and not an invitation to a new religion, not a new path to immortality. God forbid! It is the ancient path cleared of the debris of imaginations and superstitions of men, of the debris of strife and misunderstanding, and is again made a clear path to the sincere seeker, that he may enter therein in assurance and find that the word of God is one word, though the speakers were many. (From a Booklet No. 9, published under the supervision of the American National Spiritual Assembly).

When a seeker wrote to him, asking practically the same question, he replied:

The Cause of Baha-U-Llah is the same as the Cause of Christ. It is the same temple and the same foundation. Both of these are spiritual springtimes, and seasons of the soul-refreshing awakening and the cause of the renovation of the life of mankind. The spring of this year is the same as the spring of last year. The origins and ends are the same. The sun of today is the sun of yesterday. In the coming of Christ, the divine teachings were given in accordance with the infancy of the human race. The teachings of Baha-U-Llah have the same basic principles, but are according to the stage of the maturity of the world and the requirements of this illumined age. (Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. III, page 535.)

Concerning the work that the Bahais are commanded to do, Abdul Baha said:—

We are commanded to quicken the souls, to train the characters, to illumine the realm of man, to guide all the inhabitants of the earth, to create concord and unity among all men and to lead the world of humanity to the fountain of the everlasting Glory. The reformation of one Empire is not our aim; nay rather we invoke God that all the regions of the world be reformed and cultivated, the republics of men become the manifestors of the bounty of the most glorious Lord, the East and the West be brought nearer together . . . in brief, all the nations and peoples of the world become as one soul and one spirit, in order that strife and warfare be entirely removed and rancor and hostility disappear, so that all become as the waves of one ocean, the drops of one sea, the flowers of one rose-garden, the trees of one orchard, the grains of one harvest and the plants of one meadow. (Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. III, page 490.)

Thus, it is evident that the Bahai Cause is a system of spiritual ethics and divine morality made imminent and compelling by the mighty personalities of Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha. This practical aspect of the movement becomes apparent as we read these words:—

To be no cause of grief to any one.

To be kind to all people and to love them with a pure spirit.

To look always at the good and not at the bad. If a man has ten good qualities and one bad one, look at the ten and forget the one. And if a man has ten bad qualities and one good one, to look at the one and forget the ten.

To be as one soul in many bodies; for the more we love each other, the nearer we shall be to God.

—Words of Abdul Baha from a booklet No. 9, published under the supervision of the American National Spiritual Assembly.

No Organization for the Bahai Cause

The Bahai Cause is not in opposition to any religion, nor is it a movement to organize the spiritual susceptibilities of men. It offers us the Scriptures of the World's Faiths but, at the same time, it reminds us that the religions that have grown around these Holy Words must be purified of the man-made paraphernalia which cloak and obscure them. If we throw away the shell—organization—at the very core we shall find the kernel—Love—in all its splendor and simplicity—and that Love will make us free!

Throughout his life, Abdul Baha was most emphatic on this subject: No organization, no ecclesiasticism and theology, no limitations and restrictions in the Bahai Cause. On this tree, all the birds are invited to build their nests and raise their broods. Toward this heaven, they all can soar and flood the earth with their golden songs. In order to engrave the vital principle of non-organization upon the minds of the Bahais, East and West, North and South, Abdul Baha often spoke on this subject, with power and authority:—

The Bahai Movement is not an organization. You cannot organize the Bahai Movement. The Bahai Movement is the spirit of the age. It is the essence of all the highest ideals of this century. The Bahai Cause is an inclusive movement. The teachings of all religions and societies are found here. Christians, Jews, Buddhists, Mohammedans, Zoroastrians, Theosophists, Freemasons, Spiritualists, etc., find their highest aims in this Cause. Socialists and philosophers find their theories fully developed in this movement.

—From a booklet No. 9.

A Desire to Organize

The above clear and emphatic words of Abdul Baha were used in the course of public addresses as one of the most characteristic teachings of the Cause. They were quoted over and over again in numerous articles and sundry publications. Abdul Baha had sounded the clarion-call: No Organization in the Bahai Cause; and the echo of this order reverberated through the corridors of the minds and spirits, for a time—and then it died away.

Let us then acknowledge the fact that the very tissue of the Occidental nature is interpenetrated with the belief that organization is the basis of every successful undertaking, whether material or spiritual. Consequently, quite a large number of the early American Bahais found it difficult to reconcile themselves to Abdul Baha's views on the matter; yet, the magnetic personality of the Master held them in a trance, his utterances overawed them and they repeated his teachings, trying to convince themselves that they believed in them. All the while, however, doubts and objections were rising in their hearts: How, and by what mysterious methods could the Bahai Cause establish itself in the Western world without the prop of organization? Not comprehending the A.B.C. of a free spiritual movement, they did not have sufficient confidence to sincerely try out the plan in order to see whether or not it would work.

First Organized Unit

The impulse on the American continent to organize the Bahai Cause manifested itself as far back as 1900-03, when reports reached this country of the first Mashreq-Ul-Azkar (Bahai Temple of Worship) erected in Ishkabad, Russia. At this time, the members of a Spiritual Committee in Chicago requested Abdul Baha to grant them permission to construct the second Mashreq-Ul-Azkar in the United States.

Baha-O-Llah in the Book of Aqdas had left this instruction:—

O concourse of creation! O people of God! Construct homes or houses in the most beautiful fashion possible, in every city, in every land, in the name of the Lord of religions. Adorn them with that which becometh them, not with pictures or paintings. Then commemorate thy Lord, the Merciful, the Clement, in spirit and fragrance. Verily, by His mention, by this commemoration, the breasts shall be dilated, the eyes illumined, the hearts gladdened; and thus shall you pray to the orient of praises, in the Mashreq-Ul-Azkar.

Here then was a problem. How could an unorganized spiritual group build a Temple? This was quite a legitimate question, possibly a difficult one to answer; yet, it would have been wise to find out how, and by what methods the Temple at Ishkabad had been built. Possibly the right solution lay there. At any rate, on November 26, 1907, the first Convention was called; it was attended by nine delegates, and they assembled the rudiments of the machinery to be used, had the news broadcast throughout the country and arranged for the reception of contributions from various Bahai groups and individuals.

The second Convention which met on March 22nd and 23rd, 1909, was attended by 36 delegates, and a more thorough and elaborate business foundation was laid. It resulted in the appearance of full power and authority to provide ways and means for the erection of the Mashreq-Ul-Azkar. A constitution was presented and adopted, and the first executive board of Bahai Temple Unity composed of nine members was elected and authorized by the Convention to close and complete the purchase of the land, recommended by the first Convention. (Read Brief History of the Mashreq-Ul-Azkar in America by Mrs. Corinne True, Star of the West, Vol. VI, June 24, 1916, No. 6, page 52.)

The Constitution adopted at the second Convention, under the name of The Bahai Temple Unity, is a very simple document. It consists of a short preamble and ten brief articles, and it has no By-laws. It is democratic in that: the powers of this Unity shall abide in the several Bahai Assemblies (Article 4). It opens with the statement: He is God—the way Abdul Baha commenced his letters to his correspondents, and this unusual, Oriental manner of starting an American constitution is proof enough to me that its framers were single-purposed and sincere, and that it was composed in a sweet informal atmosphere of spiritual spontaneity. As described in the preamble, its only aim was to build the Bahai Temple:—

We, the Bahai Assemblies of North America, in unity convened at the City of Chicago, to the end that we may advance the Cause of God in this Western hemisphere by the founding and erection of a Temple with service accessories dedicated to His Holy Name, and devoted in His love to the service of mankind, do hereby adopt the following Constitution:

Article I: We acknowledge God as the source and preserver of our Unity, revealed to us through the Manifestation of His Glory in Baha-U-Llah in this day, and declared by the beloved Servant of God and man, Abdul Baha.

—(Read Star of the West, Vol. IV, August 1, 1913, No. 8, page 140).

For seven years the Bahai Temple Unity labored, held annual conventions, published literature, collected funds, increased its powers and waxed strong under the above Constitution.

The 12th Annual Mashreq-Ul-Azkar Convention was held in New York, April 26-29, 1920. The Star of the West, Vol. XI, September 27, 1920, No. 11, gives us a Report of this Convention and, in the course of this Report the Constitution and By-laws of the Bahai Temple Unity is published for the second time. Here we find the preamble and the ten articles practically unchanged, except for a few words added here and there, but Five brand new Articles on By-laws have been added. Through them, we glimpse a gathering of the forces of organization and receive the impression that something new and slightly alarming is under way.

It remains a tragic commentary on the undeveloped nature of the American Bahais that the institution of the Mashreq-Ul-Azkar (literally: the dawning-place of the mentionings of God), the erection of which was intended to create centers of divine emotions, actually became the mainspring for the organizing of a spiritual cause and was the origin of the reduction of this movement to the status of an ecclesiastical order.

A Sublime Record

At this point in my narrative, I will retrace my steps to the year 1911, when Mr. Horace Holley visited Abdul Baha in Switzerland. The impressions which he received on this occasion were later published in a Booklet entitled, A Pilgrimage to Thonon. Now, I lived with Abdul Baha for eight years; I have written extensively on his personality and on his teachings, and have read practically everything that has been recorded about him by those who came in contact with him, but I have yet to find any description of a meeting with the Master that matches this one in sublimity of feeling and expression. Let us then read the words of Mr. Horace Holley as he wrote them on September 3, 1911, in Quattro Torri, Sienna. He has a beautiful message for us, which will do us a great deal of good if we can sense it as he, himself, did at the time:—

The Hotel du Parc lies in the midst of sweeping lawns. Groups of people were walking quietly about under the trees or seated at small tables in the open air. An orchestra played from a near-by pavilion. My wife caught sight of M. Dreyfus conversing with others, and pressed my arm. I looked up quickly. M. Dreyfus had recognized us at the same time, and as the party rose I saw among them a stately old man, robed in a cream-coloured gown, his white hair and beard shining in the sun. He displayed a beauty of stature, an inevitable harmony of attitude and dress I had never seen nor thought of in men. Without having ever visualized the Master, I knew that this was he. My whole body underwent a shock. My heart leaped, my knees weakened, a thrill of acute, receptive feeling flowed from head to foot. I seemed to have turned into some most sensitive sense-organ, as if eyes and ears were not enough for this sublime impression. In every part of me I stood aware of Abdu'l Baha's presence. From sheer happiness I wanted to cry—it seemed the most suitable form of self-expression at my command. While my own personality was flowing away; even while I exhibited a state of complete humility, a new being not my own assumed its place. A glory, as it were, from the summits of human nature poured into me, and I was conscious of a most intense impulse to admire. In Abdu'l Baha I felt the awful presence of Baha'u'llah, and as my thoughts returned to activity I realized that I had thus drawn as near as man now may to pure Spirit and pure Being. This wonderful experience came to me beyond my own volition. I had entered the Master's presence and become the servant of a higher will for its own purpose. Even my memory of that temporary change of being bears strange authority over me. I know what men can become; and that single over-charged moment, shining out from the dark mountain mass of all past time, reflects like a mirror I can turn upon all circumstances to consider their worth by an intelligence purer than my own.

After what seemed a cycle of existence, this state passed with a deep sigh, and I advanced to accept Abdu'l Baha's hearty welcome.

Today, as Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, Mr. Horace Holley is the chief exponent and custodian of the Bahai Administration. More than any person, living or dead, he is responsible for the existence of this institution in which he lives and moves and has his being; yet this same man has known the life of the spirit better than most of us. In my opinion, he was close to a mystic. I wish that he had not let this state pass with a deep sigh.

Early Services

A later book of Mr. Horace Holley, written in Paris and published in 1913 by Sigwick and Jackson Ltd., London, is entitled The Modern Social Religion. A copy was sent to Abdul Baha in the East. I distinctly remember the occasion when this book was received. The Master was sitting in a rose-garden, where he was accustomed to spend the cool of the day, dictating letters addressed to his friends. A package was brought; I opened it and placed the volume in his hands. He examined it, turning over a few pages and recalling the while, in very affectionate terms, Mr. Holley's visit to him in Thonon. Then, he asked me to translate the first chapter, which was headed The Outlook. With closed eyes he listened, and, when I had ended he smiled and said: Khaily-Khoub! Khaily-Khoub! Marhaba! Marhaba! (Well done! Well done! Bravo! Bravo!). Then, he dictated a Tablet of appreciation to the author. This Tablet, with a brief review of the book is published in the Star of the West, Vol. IV, December 31, 1913, No. 16, page 273.

The next time we come across Mr. Horace Holley is at the 9th Mashreq-ul-Azkar Convention held in Boston, Mass., April 29th to May 2nd, 1917. Among the speakers were Mr. Horace Holley. . . . He had come to the United States, and was associating with the Bahais and taking his preliminary steps in the service of the Cause. I do not find his name listed among the delegates and therefore must conclude that he attended the Convention merely as a visitor and as the distinguished author of A Pilgrimage to Thonon and The Modern Social Religion.

The Star of the West, Vol. VIII, August 20, 1917, No. 9, presents a varied and interesting Report of the Convention including extracts from the speeches. Page 118 is devoted to Mr. Horace Holley's address on the subject of The Oneness of Mankind. It is a scholarly talk, the keynote of which is struck on a very high plane. Undoubtedly, it impressed the delegates as it later impressed me when I read it. Mr. Holley began:—

We live today in an organized, developed society, among the accumulated resources of the past. The youthful mind, feeling its own solitary weakness in the presence of so much authority and power, tends to discredit its own resources and its own power, and early becomes susceptible to the all-pervading influences of materialism. For, in the broad view of things, materialism is simply the preponderance of external influences over the innate quality of the individual spiritual life. The ordinary mind, therefore, learns to develop its imitative, memorizing qualities at the expense of its creative, independent attributes. It locates authority in institutions, and traditional customs and beliefs rather than in spiritual impulse. In all activities, however, the creative work is done by minds which use accumulated knowledge, tradition and customs as fuel to their own vision. Without such minds in art, science, politics and philosophy—to say nothing of religion—the world would rapidly become stagnant, the slave of material doctrines. The vision of the few keeps alive the faith that the ultimate authority is really invested in the individual soul, for every new advance, every improvement, comes from some soul's independent activity. The spirit creates all things, and without spiritual activity thoughts decay. . . .

These noble thoughts expressing with such irrefutable logic, that the ultimate authority is really invested in the individual soul and that every new advance, every new improvement, comes from some soul's independent activity, convinced a number of liberal Bahais that they had found in Mr. Horace Holley a protagonist of the liberty of conscience, one who would help them extricate the Cause from the fetters that were fast accumulating about it. Mr. Horace Holley was living in New York, and, although engaged in business, he little by little had become active in the Cause, beginning to write interesting studies on the Bahai teachings; these were periodically published in the Star of the West (see The Writings of Baha-U-Llah by Horace Holley, Star of the West, Vol. 13, August 1922, No. 5, page 105 and The Spirit of Abdul Baha, in two parts, in Vol. 13, No. 6 and 7).

Wire Pulling

The fifteenth Annual Bahai Convention was held in the Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, during April, 1923. A full account of it appears in the Star of the West, Vol. 14, No. 3, June 1923, pages 64-82. As is usual, a chief duty of the delegates was the election of the members of the National Spiritual Assembly for the coming year, and around this election a plot was hatched, in which I took part together with Janabe Fazel Mazandrani and Prof. M. R. Shirazi. Naturally we, three itinerant Bahai teachers, had no political inclinations, but in this one instance we had set our hearts on a certain personality which we felt would be an inestimable asset on the National Board, and although we had not taken our chosen candidate into our confidence, we allowed ourselves to pull every string at our disposal in order to bring his name before the delegates.

How well I remember those days, and the fervor that animated me! Now, I was speaking with groups around lunch or dinner tables, again I was sitting behind closed doors in committee rooms until the wee hours of the morning. I stressed our need for an unorthodox and liberal influence in the Cause; I asserted my conviction that our chosen candidate was the man that we had been waiting for, and, in order to prove that my estimate of him was correct, on all occasions I carried his writings with me. Through the reading of certain passages in this, my campaign literature, tears were brought to the eyes of many a delegate.

In this way, we prepared the ground for the election, and finally, in the open meeting, I took my place on the platform with the other speakers.

After seventeen years, I do not remember what I said at that hour or how long I spoke, but thanks to the Report published in the Star of the West I can quote a paragraph concerning my address, which evidently was given in true Oriental style:—

Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, in a talk . . . gave a picturesque description of what he thought the new National Assembly, soon to be elected, should be. It should be like a rose, exhaling perfume; like a star, shedding lustre; like a rain-laden cloud, with life-giving moisture; like a nightingale, sweetly singing; like a well in the oasis of the desert, refreshing the thirsty; like a shady tree, protecting man and beast; like pearls and diamonds, decorating the necks of all humanity; like a searchlight, illuminating the dark places and pointing the goal.

As I read the above words, spread before my eyes in cold, black ink, I see myself as I was then, eager, emotional, an optimist of the most incurable type, and perhaps a convincing one as the record seems to show; for the result of the election was the appointment to office of our chosen candidate—Mr. Horace Holley. Here is the list as printed on the record:—

The Convention after mature deliberation elected the following as the National Spiritual Assembly for the ensuing year: William H. Randall, Alfred E. Lunt, Horace Holley, Roy C. Wilhelm, Louis G. Gregory, Mrs. Corinne True, Mrs. Ella G. Cooper, Mrs. Agnes S. Parsons, Charles Mason Remey.

Consequences

The consequences of this action are a matter of Bahai history. Mr. Horace Holley became a permanent member of the National Spiritual Assembly; in the seventeen Conventions that have followed, he has been re-elected annually, being chosen as Secretary for practically all of this period.

Thus, a Persian trio, Janabe Fazel Mazandrani, Prof. M. R. Shirazi and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab presented Mr. Horace Holley to the Bahai world. Of the three, Prof.

Shirazi has passed from this mortal life; Janabe Fazel is far removed from us in Teheran, and as for Mirza Ahmad Sohrab—well, he pleads guilty before the bar of public opinion and Bahai opinion for having helped to the seat of absolute power a man who has seen fit to alter the Bahai consciousness to a degree which no mind is keen enough to measure and no heart sensitive enough to sufficiently deplore.

The tendency toward organization had, from the very beginning, existed among the American Bahais, but it remained for Mr. Holley to develop it, to officialize it, to make it obligatory and to place the details of Bahai housekeeping (and not very good housekeeping at that) on a level with the Teachings of the Revelator of the Modern Age.

A Social Order for Free Beings

In explanation of my action, I would like to refer to Mr. Holley's book, The Modern Social Religion, approved by Abdul Baha, which book I carried with me for many years and from which I drew much confidence and inspiration. As I write, my old copy, well marked, is beside me on the desk. I will here quote some of the passages which at the time I loved and depended on and which, in the light of later developments, I now think very striking.

On page 171, Mr. Horace Holley writes:—

Since Baha-O-Llah's death in 1892, Abdul Baha, the perfect Bahai, has not only personified Bahaism as the new relationship of man to society, as well as its emphasis of the Christian relationship of man to God, but he has effectively spread the Bahai message through Asia, Europe and America. It is difficult to realize at first how this could be done by a prisoner without money, political influence or an ecclesiastical organization.

Then Mr. Holley goes on in a masterful fashion, pointing out the spiritual methods that Abdul Baha used in the promotion of the Cause, and demonstrating that it is possible to serve the Cause without an ecclesiastical organization. Again, on page 188:—

If Bahaism represented any such tendency toward disruption and division, it would be no more than another sect struggling for existence and survival in the merciless jungle of society; but its purpose and method of operation combine to render further disintegration impossible. Its purpose is to effect the complete ultimate reconciliation of every existing social fragment, both religious and political, and its method of operation consists in taking its stand within the institution, not outside, and pointing out the true road of development along which the institution, by its own doctrines, if religious, or responsibility, if political, is committed to go. It is, therefore, not hostile to any creed, sect or nation; but is hostile only to that fatal prejudice, bigotry and blindness which prevents creeds, sects and nations from realizing the purpose of their own origin. Bahaism is not the enemy of any Church, for its ideals of human unity and co-operation places its hostages in every race, Church and nation on earth.

On page 189:—

To the Christian, accordingly, the Bahai teaching brings an obligation to remain within the Church and to obey more fully, not less fully, the Gospel of Christ. . . . The existing religious situation attempts to confine eternal forces to narrow social areas; but Bahaism breaks down the frontiers that cut off one area from another.

On page 191:—

Self-expression, accordingly, represents the supreme obligation and privilege; and God has not given His precious marble of opportunity to the Michael Angelo alone. Life offers every personality the means of beautiful expression, in noble conduct, great thought, or inspiring art. In this individual potentiality and impulse toward self-expression, all men are created free and equal. It is not too much to aver that the greater the mind and spirit, the greater the tendency to respect and admire other personalities, however they may be rated by the world; and the inability to recognize a transcendent and incomparable possibility in every person, must be accepted as the stigma of spiritual insufficiency. Those distinctions, classifications, and judgments which separate society into unsympathetic fragments, proceed from the intellect alone; but intellect itself, when enlightened and vitalized by spirit, gladly perceives and adores the personality latent within all. Upon the individual, then, Bahaism enjoins his spiritual development as the purpose, and hence the supreme obligation of life. For Baha-O-Llah, also, came not to destroy but to fulfill.

On page 194:—

Bahaism is equally explicit concerning the relationship of the individual to society . . . he must bring new enthusiasm and faith to every necessary or constructive relationship, and to existing responsibilities bring a deeper vision of their significance. He must not withdraw from present religious organizations, but reinterpret their function in the light of evolution, endeavor to vitalize their activity, and remove the prejudice and ignorance walling them off from the social unity. . . . He must labor to unite minor organizations in order to make them effective, and to transfer the circumference of social consciousness from the city to the province, the province to the state, the state to the continent, and from the continent to the world.

To render himself effective, he must study the social problem through the most advanced ideas of science, economics and government; and no duty is so important for the believer as to create for his own mind a living, passionate, social ideal—a picture of the divine civilization described by Baha-O-Llah—and Abdul Baha—toward which his purpose may direct its activity and from which his will may be strengthened and revived.

To sum up what I have termed its morality for institutions, Bahaism teaches that the prosperity and permanence of any religious or political organization is not the end for our personal loyalty; that we should be indifferent to the welfare of mere institutions, creeds, stone walls and iron conventions; but that our most vigorous and devoted loyalty belongs to the cause of humanity as represented by the needs of every environment.

And the last quotation from page 206:—

Bahaism desires a new social order in which the development of spiritualized men and women shall be the primary purpose; not supermen whose nature is essentially hostile to the many, but that order of free beings representing our own ideals achieved in daily life and common things. To such an order we already potentially belong, and the highest human fellowship the earth will ever contain will not be otherwise than our own kind, released and inspired by participation in a co-operative society.

On the basis of the above Bahai principles, to which I subscribed then and which I still support, Mr. Horace Holley was elected to the National Spiritual Assembly in 1923. Should he, however, advocate this same teaching in 1942, it is certain that he would not be re-elected to office; nay, rather I have no doubt but that Shoghi Effendi himself, as Guardian of the Cause, would expel him for disseminating doctrines that are totally at variance with the standards of present-day Bahai Administration.

We live and learn, and sometimes we live and forget; so, I would like to close this chapter by repeating the words of Mr. Horace Holley that we should be indifferent to the welfare of mere institutions : . . that our most vigorous and devoted loyalty belongs to the cause of humanity as represented (note well the elasticity of the sentiment) by the needs of every environment.

CHAPTER XI

DEVELOPMENT OF THE BAHAI ORGANIZATION

The Divine Plan

During World War I, while all communications between Palestine and the outside world were cut off, Abdul Baha was not inactive. As a patriarch, he guided the affairs of the communities in Haifa, Acca and Tiberias, supervised extensive works of agriculture through which the monster of starvation was kept under control, and last, but far from least, revealed the mighty document known as the Divine Plan. It was as messenger of the Master that, shortly after the close of hostilities, I sailed for the United States bearing with me these incomparable Tablets.

Map of Bahai Unity

The Tablets were unveiled at the Eleventh Bahai Convention in New York, from April 26th to April 30th, 1919, unfolding a new conception for the promotion of the Bahai principles around the earth. Among the different committees that prepared the program of the Convention, that of Publicity was naturally one of the most important. Mr. Horace Holley served on this committee and, doubtless, his imagination was stirred, as was that of everybody, by the dramatic Tablets of Abdul Baha. Consequently, on February 15, 1921, he circulated among the Bahais a mimeographed pamphlet of twelve pages, entitled: Map of Bahai Unity in North America. The following description was incorporated therein: Mutualizing the efforts of believers throughout Canada and the United States to fulfill the principles as set forth by Abdul Baha in the Divine Plan.

Now, it would have been inappropriate to distrust an innocent map which was to mutualize (a nice word, by the way!) the efforts of the believers. The truth is that I fell into the trap. Who knew the significance of the Divine Plan better than I? Abdul Baha had dictated it to me, word by word; he had, on numerous occasions, discussed its contents with me, and I had kept notes in my diary of all that he had said; more than that, at his command I had committed to memory all those Tablets, so that in case the originals should either be confiscated at the frontiers or else lost during my long journey from Palestine to the United States, I would be in a position to reproduce them in their entirety after my landing in New York. With book in hand, he often had made me recite them to him from beginning to end, checking mistakes, correcting lapses of memory, until every sentence shone like a jewel in the chamber of my mind.

Well, that is a story in itself, but the point is that I would have welcomed any map that had power to put in motion the plan of Abdul Baha. Consequently, Mr. Holley's map fascinated me, and I was especially pleased because the booklet was headed with Abdul Baha's classic remark: The Bahai Cause is not an Organization.

The article later continues:—

Heeding the words of Abdul Baha, that the Bahai

SEYYED ASSADOLLAH, disciple of Baha-O-Llah, itinerant Bahai teacher, and travelling companion of Abdul Baha during the latter's visit to the United States.

Movement is not an organization, but on the contrary the Spirit of Organization, the Map is based not upon the factor of authority but upon that of the various services which the Divine Plan calls upon all the friends of God to perform. These services are analyzed in the form they have been performed in the past, and no new elements have been introduced except such as more closely knit together the different Assemblies, and the different National Committees in one active fellowship

Two Mystifying Points

Even in 1921, two points in this map mystified me.

FIRST: If the Bahai Movement is not an organization, how could it be the spirit of organization? If a glass be not full, how can it be the spirit of fullness? If a shoe be not comfortable, how can it be the spirit of comfort? If a statesman be not liberal, how can he be the spirit of liberalism? This argument seemed like sophistry, but the mass of the Bahais, and this includes myself, were very simple folk, ready to approve anything that promised to further the interests of the Cause they loved so much.

SECOND: The assurance that the Map is based not upon the factor of authority. Here, I sensed something foreign, but could not place my finger on it. The Map and its charts on page 4 gave unmistakable evidences of a concentration of authority in the various agencies that were to be set up; but inasmuch as this authority was rather well concealed, one could not very well yield oneself up to suspicion.

Be that as it may, I now consider this Map of Bahai Unity in North America, drawn up and elaborated by Mr.

MIRZA ABUL FAZL, Dean of the University of Hakim-Hashem in Teheran, Persia, in 1873. Disciple of Baha-O-Llah; Bahai historian and philosopher; author of The Bahai Proofs, and greatest of Bahai teachers.

Horace Holley, as a most important contributory document to the unification and vocalization of the reactionary desires of those whose aim it was to listen for the thunder of external authority rather than to the still small voice, and who placed the resourcefulness of the material mind above the effulgent rays of the heavenly consciousness.

The Bahais of the United States and Canada had by this time, by means of successive conventions, organized their material resources for the building of a Temple of stone in Chicago, as Mr. Horace Holley aptly describes it in his Map of Bahai Unity in North America. On the other hand, the Temple of hearts (which also is Mr. Holley's term) was left free and unorganized. Then lo and behold! Mr. Holley suddenly burst upon the scene with a proposed working model for the regimentation of that very Temple of hearts, even as we already have a model to guide us in building the Temple of stone, and we, all trustingly, offered our poor hearts, (which were soon to sustain the equivalent of finger-printing and card filing) thereby relinquishing our Bahai birthright. Where there is no vision the people perish!

I hope that I will be excused if I take the liberty of paraphrasing the 11th and 12th verses of I Kings, Chapter XIX, with application to the subject at hand:

And Abdul Baha said: Go forth, and stand upon the mount before the Word. And, behold, the Divine Plan passed by; and a great and strong wind (Bahai organization) rent the mountains and broke in pieces the rocks before the Divine Plan, but the Divine Plan was not in the wind: and after the wind, an earthquake (Map of Bahai Unity in North America); but the Divine Plan was not in the earthquake. And after the earthquake, a fire (Bahai Administration); but the Divine Plan was not in the fire; and after the fire, a still small voice. And it was so: the Divine Plan with its multitude of stars was still shining!

I will now recapitulate, and summarize the steps on which depended

The Evolution of the Bahai Organization

FIRST: On March 22nd and 23rd, 1909, an organization was formed under the name of The Bahai Temple Unity. A simple constitution having ten brief articles and no By-laws was adopted. In print, it took less than a page of the Star of the West.

SECOND: On April 26, 1920, the same constitution, with the addition of a few words here and there and five Articles on By-laws, was adopted for the second time. It still carried the title, The Bahai Temple Unity and in print, it takes a little less than two pages of the Star of the West. The object of the Bahai Temple Unity, armed with its two Constitutions, was the building of a Temple of stone.

THIRD: On February 15, 1921, Mr. Horace Holley promulgated the Map of Bahai Unity in North America, or the organization of the Temple of hearts, which was the counterpart of the Constitutions of the Temple of stone. In mimeograph form it takes 12 pages, 8½ by 11 size, to outline the Map.

FOURTH: On May 2, 1926, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada (note: no longer The Bahai Temple Unity), composed of nine persons: establish a Trust as hereinafter set forth, hereby declare that from this date the powers, responsibilities, rights, privileges and obligations . . . shall be exercised, administered and carried on by the above-named National Spiritual Assembly and their duly qualified successors under this Declaration of Trust. It selects for itself the designation of Trustees of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. The spirituality that one could somehow feel in the two previous constitutions is utterly missing in this portentous and formidable Declaration of Trust. It is an ice-bound, juridical document. Its articles are like hailstones that pierce and cut into the heart of the reader; its phrases are so wind-laden that they transform the balmy atmosphere of the Paradise of Abha into the frigid immensities of Nova Zembla; it is the apotheosis of an inflexible organization, the hypostasis of the machine; it is the Bastille of Paris, the Tower of London and the Concentration Camp of the Third Reich all rolled into one, and striking terror into the soul of a most hardy champion of freedom of conscience! This Document of Declaration of Trust consists of thirteen printed pages, nine pages of which are devoted to the enumeration of 12 Articles of By-laws, some running into 12 and 13 Sections (Bahai Administration, pages 141-153).

The Framers of the Declaration of Trust

The above declaration of Trust and By-laws is the Magna Charta of the present-day Bahai Administration. Therefore, it is important to try to discover its original framers. A close study of the letters of Shoghi Effendi gives us some very interesting clues. Our preliminary finding is that this document was prepared in two sections. The first is called Declaration of Trust; the second, By-Laws of the National Spiritual Assembly.

We are able to dispose of the second section very quickly, for Shoghi Effendi, himself, in his letter written from Haifa, Palestine, on October 18, 1927, acknowledges that it was: drawn up by that highly-talented, much-beloved servant of Baha-U-Idah, Mountfort Mills. So, it is quite evident that an American attorney wrote the By-laws. There can be no doubt about that. It is the brainchild of a single person, and is fully endorsed by Shoghi Effendi.

In seeking the framer or framers of the Declaration of Trust, our task is a little more difficult. We are therefore entitled to guess, and I hope that the reader will allow me a margin of error which I will be glad to fill in with any corrections.

At the very start, let us clearly understand that Mr. Horace Holley, as Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly, is the main official channel of communication between Shoghi Effendi and the American and Canadian Bahais. Shoghi Effendi writes occasional letters to individuals through his secretary, but wide and indiscriminate correspondence with him is definitely discouraged, and even the local assemblies and national committees are forbidden to mail their letters directly to the Guardian, but must send them through the National Spiritual Assembly (See Bahai Procedure, Section II, Sheet 20).

This close supervision of correspondence between Shoghi Effendi and the Bahais gives the National Spiritual Assembly paramount censorial rights and privileges. As secretary, Mr. Holley writes all the letters that are sent to Shoghi Effendi on behalf of the National Spiritual Assembly; likewise, Shoghi Effendi's letters to the Assembly are received first by him. The Guardian holds Mr. Holley in high esteem as is shown by his letters to the National Spiritual Assembly, some of which are contained in Bahai Administration, published on November 30, 1927. These communications usually open with a phrase expressing appreciation of Mr. Holley, such as: The letters which our able and devoted Mr. Horace Holley has addressed in your behalf. Or, the three communications . . . which I have received from that indefatigable servant of Baha-U-Llah, my esteemed spiritual brother Mr. Holley, have given me great satisfaction and have cheered and sustained me in my work. Or, I have perused your recent communication dated . . . and signed on your behalf by your vigilant and capable secretary; or again: The first printed issue of the National Spiritual Assembly's News Letter prepared and signed on behalf of the Assembly by its able secretary stands as a bright and eloquent testimony of his thoroughness, his industry, his conspicuous ability, his undoubted sacrifice.

I have quoted the above to show the confidence in Mr. Holley that is expressed by the Guardian, and now I come to my point, namely: to try to identify the author of the Declaration of Trust of the Bahai Administration. My personal belief is that it was written by Mr. Horace Holley, either alone or else with the assistance of a very few close associates, and possibly of a jurist or two for the legal phrasing of its contents. At any rate, Mr. Horace Holley had a part in its composition and a very conspicuous one; of that I have no doubt.

That my guess may not be far from the truth is shown in the text of Shoghi Effendi's letter written on the receipt of the Declaration of Trust and dated May 27, 1927. He says: The Declaration of Trust, the provisions of which you have so splendidly conceived, and formulated with such assiduous care, marks yet another milestone on the road of progress along which you are patiently and determinedly advancing. The letter, of course, is addressed to the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, but one wonders who is this you that conceived and formulated the Declaration of Trust? Is it a singular or a collective you? Yet, of one thing we are sure: It is an American you and not a Persian you. Like the By-laws, it was originated and given currency in these United States; and the point that I want to establish and which I believe is already proven beyond a shadow of doubt, is that the Declaration of Trust and By-laws originated in the brain of an American, or in the brains of Americans and that the Bab, Baha-O-Llah and Abdal Baha had nothing to do with it.

Essential Uniformity

Somehow or other, through a process that I could never understand, Shoghi Effendi, from the very beginning, was attracted to this Declaration of Trust and By-laws and, in time, he came to consider it as the handiwork of God. So enamored with it was he that he caused the formation of National Spiritual Assemblies in Egypt, Persia, India, Iraq, England, Australia, etc.—East and West—with the injunction that all must adopt this very Declaration of Trust and By-laws as principles of their own Bahai Administration. In this manner, he has introduced into the bubbling, effervescent, joyous and free Bahai Cause such a deadening uniformity that one cannot find its like even in the antiquated and dying religions. Here is the order of the Guardian in regard to the Egyptian Bahais:

I have insisted that the provisions of their constitution should, in all its details, conform to the text of the Declaration of Trust and By-laws which you have established, endeavoring thereby to preserve the uniformity which I feel is essential in all Bahai National Constitutions. I would like, in this connection to request of you, what I have already intimated to them, that whatever amendments you may decide to introduce in the text of the Declaration and By-laws, should be duly communicated to me, that I may take the necessary steps for the introduction of similar changes in the text of all other National Bahai Constitutions.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 11.

I can well imagine the state of mind of the Eastern Bahais, who are accustomed to soar in the boundless atmosphere of love and spirituality, when they were presented with this harsh and legalistic Constitution and told that they must adopt it, in all its details, without the least allowance being made for their own mode of thought and life; together with the further requirement that, whenever their American masters chose to introduce any amendments to this Constitution, they, the poor, dumb, Oriental Bahais, must slavishly add the same amendments to their own copies, whether applicable or not. I can picture the consternation and disquietude that gripped the souls of those tried and true Bahais when they received this document and were asked to sign on the dotted line.

These spiritual stalwarts of Baha-O-Llah, these brilliant scholars of Abdul Baha, who had cast a commotion through the pillars of the earth by their subtle philosophical thinking and daring example, were treated as regiments of robots to be moved hither and thither by the legislations of a few shrewd American benchers, neat-handed pleaders and deft draftsmen. They were no longer expected to think or to retain a single idea in their minds. With the acceptance of the Declaration of Trust and By-laws concocted in the United States, their subjection and vassalage was sealed from everlasting to everlasting by the order from Shoghi Effendi that: no departure from these cardinal and clearly enunciated principles, embodied and preserved in Bahai National and local constitutions . . . can under any circumstances be tolerated. (The Advent of Divine Justice, page 52.)

Divine Origin

It took the Christians several centuries to deprive Jesus of the dignity of normal birth and foist super-human parentage upon him, but it took the Bahais only the twinkling of an eye to discount the material origin of the Administration and to set it up as divinely conceived. Let us note the words of Shoghi Effendi:

A word should now be said regarding the theory on which this Administrative Order is based and the principle that must govern the operation of its chief institutions. It would be utterly misleading to attempt a comparison between this unique, this divinely-conceived order and any of the diverse systems which the minds of men, at various periods of their history, have contrived for the government of human institutions.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 152.

Thus, divine origin was conferred upon the Administration, but it seems that this was not sufficiently specific. A more definite source should be pointed to and this was found in no less a person than Baha-O-Llah himself. Shoghi Effendi declares:—

Let no one, while this system is still in its infancy, misconceive its character, belittle its significance or misrepresent its purpose. The bedrock on which this Administrative Order is founded is God's immutable Purpose for mankind in this day. The Source from which it derives its inspiration is no less than Baha-U-Llah Himself. Its shield and defender are the embattled hosts of the Abha Kingdom. Its seed is the blood of no less than 20,000 martyrs who have offered up their lives that it may be born and flourish.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 156.

I myself cannot help wondering what the poor martyrs would have thought, if they had known that they were giving up their lives for an American corporation instead of for a Persian Cause!

Even as he had claimed divine origin for the Declaration of Trust and By-laws of the Administration, Shoghi Effendi gives a high station to its framers. He writes:—

Few, if any, I venture to assert, among these privileged framers and custodians of the constitution of the Faith of Baha-U-Llah are even dimly aware of the preponderating role which the North American continent is destined to play in the future orientation of their world-embracing Cause. Nor does any appreciable number among them seem sufficiently conscious of the decisive influence which they already exercise in the direction and management of its affairs.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 53.

Having to the best of my ability shown the origin, growth and development of the Bahai Organization, which record will not, I hope, embitter nor discourage us, I will return to the life-imparting words of Abdul Baha, which are addressed to all:—

Be ye not seated and silent! Diffuse the glad-tidings of the Kingdom far and wide to the ears, promulgate the Word of God . . . that is, arise ye with such qualities and attributes that ye may continually bestow life to the body of the world, and nurse the infants of the universe up to the station of maturity and perfection. Enkindle with all your might in every meeting the light of the love of God, gladden and cheer every heart with the utmost loving-kindness, show forth your love to the strangers just as you show forth to your relations. If a soul is seeking to quarrel, ask ye for reconciliation; if he blame ye, praise (him); if he give you a deadly poison, bestow ye an all-healing antidote; if he createth death, administer ye eternal life; if he becometh a thorn, change ye into roses and hyacinths. Perchance, through such deeds and words, this darkened world will become illuminated, this terrestrial universe will become transformed into a heavenly realm, and this satanic prison become a divine court; warfare and bloodshed be annihilated, and love and faithfulness hoist the tent of unity upon the apex of the world.

EIGHT COMPETITIONS OF THE NEW HISTORY SOCIETY

Conscious of the approaching storm that was threatening our civilization during the fateful Thirties, The New History Society felt impelled to spread throughout the world, as far as was possible, the principles which must form the basis of a New Society. Therefore, from the year 1931 on through 1939, its main activity consisted in the conducting of eight Annual Prize Competitions, offered successively to the youth of the five continents and the inhabitants of the world on various international topics. By this means, the knowledge of the Bahai Cause and its principles was actually disseminated in all avenues of life in practically every country, and an unprecedented volume of correspondence was initiated with thousands of inquirers in every part of the earth.

The labor involved in the undertaking was great and, as it was largely contributed, this went far toward lessening the total cost. Nevertheless, the expenses of the Seven Regional Competitions together with the World Competition passed the figure of One Hundred Thousand Dollars, this including the First, Second, Third and Special Prizes, the translating and printing of the Conditions and of leaflets in eleven languages, the mailing, secretarial work and other items.

The originals of all the Papers submitted by the contestants in the eight Competitions were bound in 75 large volumes and placed in the library of The New History Society. These have been and still are available to the students of human thought and to those who are interested in learning of the ideas which were uppermost in the minds of the youth of the world as well as of its elders during the crucial years—1931-1939.

The Competitions offered, year by year, were on the following subjects:—

FIRST COMPETITION

Offered to the Youth of the United States of America, in 1931.

Subject: How Can the Colleges Promote World Peace?

* * *

SECOND COMPETITION

Offered to the Youth of Europe, in 1932.

Subject: How Can the Youth of the Universities and Schools Contribute to the Realization of a United States of the World?

THIRD COMPETITION

Offered to the Youth of South and Central America, Mexico, the West Indies and adjacent Islands, in 1933.

Subject: How Can the Youth of the Universities and Professional Schools Contribute to the Reconstruction of the Human Commonwealth?

* * *

FOURTH COMPETITION

Offered to the Youth of Asia, in 1934.

Subject: How Can Youth Contribute to the Realization of a Universal Religion?

* * *

FIFTH COMPETITION

Offered to the Youth of Africa, Australia, Canada and New Zealand, in 1935.

Subject: How Can Youth Develop Co-operative and Harmonious Relations Among the Races of the Earth?

* * *

SIXTH COMPETITION

Offered to the Population of the World, in 1936-1937.

Subject: How Can the People of the World Achieve Universal Disarmament?

* * *

SEVENTH COMPETITION

Offered to the People of the United States and its Outlying Possessions and Territories, in 1938.

Subject: How Can Cultural and Social Values of Racial Minorities in the United States and its Outlying Possessions and Territories be Adjusted and Harmonized?

* * *

EIGHTH COMPETITION

Offered to the Visitors at the New York World's Fair and the Inhabitants of the United States and Canada, 1939.

Subject: What Influence Would a Bible of Mankind Exert on the World of Tomorrow?

CHAPTER XII

ESTABLISHMENT OF BAHAI ADMINISTRATION

A Great Asset

Abdul Baha said: The Bahai Cause is not an organization; and, because this rule made of the movement something altogether new in the world of religion, something provocative and fascinating, the Bahais took it up with enthusiasm and featured it on all occasions.

Now, it was a good advertising phrase too; the public liked it, and the intelligentsia looked upon the Cause with favor on account of this very principle. Everybody, therefore, who was at all familiar with the Bahai Teachings, became accustomed to stress the point and to consider it as a great asset.

Unexpected Opportunities

Time passed; the World War, with separation from the Master even through correspondence, gave the Bahai leaders unexpected opportunities to leave their imprint on the affairs of the Cause. They were not without ideas of their own, and so they began to set these forth in articles. In one instance, the services of Mr. Charles Mason Remey were called for, and his statement written at the request of several friends appears in the Star of the West, Vol. 12, No. 9, August 20, 1921, under the title Bahai Organization. The author of this commentary begins cautiously, not so much disputing the authenticity of the words of Abdul Baha: The Bahai Cause can never be organized, but, stating that: from one short excerpt from the holy words, separated from its context, erroneous meanings may be obtained. In this, however, Mr. Remey is wrong, because Abdul Baha's statement on the non-organization of the Bahai Cause consists of a compact closely-knit paragraph, one phrase leading to another.

Again, Mr. Remey writes:—

Some of the friends of the Bahai Cause have been a little confused regarding the organization of the holy Cause because of the wide circulation of some words, to the effect that this Cause should never be organized—thus some have imagined that no form of Bahai organization should exist. Now of late, we are informed by pilgrims returning to their homes from Palestine that Abdul Baha has explained that these words, circulated to the effect that the Cause should never be organized, give an impression very different from the reality of his teachings.

Mr. Remey refers to a little confusion among some of the friends. Here, he underestimates, for there was a big confusion; and not only that, there was a mortal struggle going on among all the friends regarding this, which was considered a fundamental issue: Spiritual Liberty versus Ecclesiastical Authority.

A more official attempt to defeat the forces of liberalism in the Cause was made a little later when the National Spiritual Assembly appointed a committee of three to prepare and submit a Report on Bahai Organization. This document, which bears close reading, is published in the Star of the West, Vol. XIII, No. 12, March 1923, page 323. It opens:—

Organization in the Bahai Movement rests upon the sure foundation of the Word of God.

and later in the same document:—

At Haifa, Syria, in 1920, the following question was asked Abdul Baha by some American pilgrims:—

“It is misleading, is it not, to say that the Bahai Cause cannot be organized?” Abdul Baha replied: “How is it possible that there should be no organization?”

The so-called pilgrims who put the above question must have been a group of tricky and astute lawyers, very much like the Pharisees who tried to catch Jesus with the question: Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar?; but even the Pharisees did not make use of the suggestive negative, saying. It is not lawful, is it, to give tribute to Caesar? At any rate, this informal oral answer to the pilgrim's question was made full use of, and by the time that Abdul Baha had departed from this life, affairs were shaping themselves according to American standards.

What's in a Name?

The officials now began to soft-pedal the phrase: The Bahai Cause is not an organization, and to remove it, little by little, from conspicuous places in their literature; yet, to their discomfiture, the words remained engraven on the minds of the people. What was to be done? The leaders wondered and then, possibly remembering Juliet's desire for a Romeo who would not be called Romeo, repeated to themselves her words, or others to the same effect: What's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet, and presto, the answer was found! The Bahai Cause was not an organization, but it could well be the spirit of organization under another name. Names were numerous; and so the fond parents picked out a word, perhaps from the dictionary, called in their friends and a little christening party was held at which the organization became the Administration.

The first issue of Bahai News to be reserved for the affairs of the Administration made its appearance in December, 1924; and from then on this publication, more or less regularly, printed editorials on Bahai Administration and its principles. One of the most subtle moves was made as far back as 1927 when a writer, in an editorial, tried to identify administrative success with moral success. Quite a clever bit of propaganda! He says:—

Because in the Bahai Faith this perfect correspondence exists between spiritual and social laws, let us ever bear in mind that administrative success, for Bahais, is identical with moral success.

—Bahai News, May 1927, Special Number.

Thus, the campaign developed, increasing in momentum and presently all reports, programs, lectures, publicity, radio broadcasts, annual Conventions, youth activities, membership, elections became colored with expressions becoming to the Administration; until finally in 1928, a book containing the early letters of Shoghi Effendi was published under the title Bahai Administration. This book, with the authority back of it, crystallized the plan and made the name permanent.

Consolidation

The process of educating the Bahais in the laws of the Administration continued year by year, without let or hindrance. Bahai News, January, 1930, No. 37, carries a front page editorial on Bahai Administration. It states that, at a recent meeting, the National Spiritual Assembly voted to request the local Assemblies to arrange classes for the study of Bahai Administration, and that the character of Bahai Administration is such that its full power and significance can only be manifest when the believers are not only thoroughly informed, but imbued with its power. The writer goes on to explain in detail why there was no administration in the days of Abdul Baha and then in a very few significant lines gives himself away:—

The years since November 28, 1921 (the day of the departure of Abdul Baha) have, consequently, been largely devoted to the elimination of any non-Bahai views which might exist and to our re-education in Bahai Administration by the Guardian.

Only the old Bahais can appreciate what the writer means by the elimination of any non-Bahai views. It was no gentle elimination, but actually a Hitlerian purge conducted with full present-day Nazi efficiency. And as to re-education! That is where the give-away comes in; for in that period, which the writer frankly designates as dating from the departure of the Master, the poor simple Bahais were educated along totally different lines from those which they knew and loved, and which they believed to be the Cause.

In the course of time, Bahai Administration by Shoghi

Effendi became a textbook, a sacred scripture to be read in meetings and at Conventions, and to be studied in classes.

The special value of Bahai Administration, the need of training in it and its exercise in a way that will keep all the people of a community busy received much emphasis from the delegates in conference.

—Bahai News, May 1931, No. 52.

Its precepts had to be followed by all the Local Bahai Communities:

Permit no circumstance, however grievous, to lead you astray from the firm highway of the administrative order. In your local communities follow its precepts.

—Bahai News, May 1932, No. 62, page 6.

To determine whether a soul was qualified for Bahai membership, the laws of Administration had to be consulted like a book of oracle. At various Conventions, this subject was brought up and much time was consumed in such momentous discussion:—

A great many delegates spoke of the grave responsibility which rests upon Local Spiritual Assemblies in determining whether or not a soul is qualified for Bahai Membership, and here again the importance of careful study of Bahai Administration was stressed.

In Bahai News, November, 1933, No. 79, page 10, the Guardian reminds the friends, more fully than before, that the cardinal principle of the Bahai Administration is the supreme and unchallengeable authority of the National Spiritual Assembly in national affairs.

The root principle of Bahai Administration is the undisputed authority of America's supreme administrative body. No departure from this established tenet is contemplated and it must be maintained unreservedly (Bahai News, November, 1933, No. 79).

Shoghi Effendi has certainly invested the National Spiritual Assembly with undreamed-of dictatorial power and autocratic control over all the affairs of the Cause in North America.

Nothing can be clearer than the following quotations:—

Haifa, May 19, 1934. As to the problem which has arisen in connection with the News Letter published and circulated by the Boston Assembly, the Guardian has already written about it to your National Spiritual Assembly, expressing the view that under no circumstances should any local Assembly be given the right to criticize and much less oppose, the policy duly adopted and approved by the National Spiritual Assembly. It is his hope that henceforth the problem of the relationship between the National Spiritual Assembly and the local Assemblies in matters of this nature will, in the light of his instructions, be carefully understood by individuals and Assemblies alike.

Haifa, June 11, 1934. The Guardian wishes me to again affirm his view that the authority of the National Spiritual Assembly is undivided and unchallengeable in all matters pertaining to the administration of the Faith throughout the United States and Canada, and that, therefore, the obedience of individual Bahais, delegates, groups and Assemblies to that authority is imperative and should be wholehearted and unqualified. He is convinced that the unreserved acceptance and complete application of this vital provision of the Administration is essential to the maintenance of the highest degree of unity among the believers, and is indispensable to the effective working of the administrative machinery of the Faith in every country.

As though all the above instructions through his secretary were not sufficiently lucid, Shoghi Effendi writes the following in his own hand:—

I wish to re-affirm, in clear and categorical language, the principle already enunciated upholding the supreme authority of the National Assembly in all matters that affect the interests of the Faith in that land. There can be no conflict of authority, no duality under any form or circumstances in any sphere of Bahai jurisdiction, whether local, national or international.

Here then, in plain language, we have nine Hitlers, or nine Mussolinis, or nine Stalins, all rolled into one; or probably we have a few of each species, combining their authority over, not 80 million Germans and more than 100 million conquered peoples, 45 million Italians and 175 million Russians, but over the conscience and activities of 2584 plain, simple, folksy, democratic Americans. With such paraphernalia to hold them in order, these American Bahais must indeed be the most unruly and rebellious people on the face of the earth!

Religious Isolation

Is the Bahai Cause, under the Administration, a progressive religious movement?

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha taught their followers to associate with the devotees of all religions. This we know; but the Bahai Administration demands that the Bahais renounce their membership in other religious organizations, for: to be a Bahai and at the same time accept membership in another religious body is an act of contradiction that no sincere and logically-minded person can possibly accept. Thus, spiritual fellowship with other faiths is prohibited and the imparting by the Bahais of the universal religious conceptions of Baha-O-Llah, in the congregations of which they were part, is an act of disobedience.

In an article under the title: Membership in other Organizations published in Bahai News, No. 134, March, 1940, we read the following:—

The National Spiritual Assembly asks the friends to give careful and prayerful thought about their connection with non-Bahai Organizations, and endeavor, each for himself, to make any adjustment necessary in order to consolidate his spiritual and social life in the New World Order of Baha-U-Llah. For as the Guardian has instructed in recent years, it is not merely ecclesiastical or political organizations from which Bahais are to withdraw, but also any other type of organization whose aim and influence are incompatible with the nature of the Faith.

(For further reference read: Association with the World Fellowship of Faiths, Bahai News, No. 76, August, 1933; Membership in Non-Bahai Association, Bahai News, No. 93, July, 1935; Concerning Membership in Non-Bahai Religious Organizations, Bahai News, No. 98, March, 1936; Membership in Other Organizations, Bahai Procedure, Section One, Sheet 7; and Concerning Membership in Non-Bahai Religious Organizations, Bahai Procedure, Section One, Sheets 8, 9, 10, 11.)

Abdul Baha told his followers that the Bahai Cause was not a new religion, and that it was their mission to carry the leaven of tolerance into all circles, thus little by little, demolishing sectarian lines of demarcation; yet the Administration has adopted a policy of complete RELIGIOUS ISOLATION, raising such iron-clad frontiers around their constituents that none of them can overstep them or presume to adhere to the injunction of Baha-O-Llah: Associate with the people of all religions with joy and fragrance.

Social Isolation

Is the Bahai Cause under the Administration a progressive social movement?

It is most evident from the writings of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly that their organization has nothing to do with civic, national or international affairs. The Bahais are warned over and over again not to affiliate themselves with any political parties; not to run for any political offices nor to cast their votes for the election of candidates when these candidates are nominated by two parties. (Read The World Order of Baha-U-Llah by Shoghi Effendi, pages 64 and 153; "The Non-Political Character of the Bahai Cause," Bahai News, No. 69, December, 1932; "Non-Political Character of the Bahai Faith", Bahai News, No. 80, January, 1934, and "The Non-Political Character of the Bahai Faith," Bahai Procedure, Section One, Sheet 13.)

Thus, it is clear that the Bahai Administration commands its followers to refrain from associating themselves, whether by word or deed, with the political pursuits of their respective nations, with the politics of their governments and the schemes and programs of parties, yet, at the same time it claims leadership in the New World Order that is to be, as can be judged from its monthly publication appearing under the name World Order and from Shoghi Effendi's book entitled The World Order. Now, there never can be a World Order unless the fundamentals of world politics are changed, and if the Bahais hold themselves aloof from national and international politics, they not only will forego leadership in the New World Order, but will have no share in it whatsoever. They can reiterate their assertions, they can even trade-mark the name World Order (which they have done, see Bahai World, 1936-1938, Vol. VII, pages 415-416) and possibly follow it up with lawsuits as they did in connection with their trade-mark on the name Bahai, but when the great reconstruction takes shape, this will be owing to those who have worked for it and taken enormous risks for it, and not to those who have discreetly kept under cover while the mighty struggle was going on. (Incidentally, I cannot refrain from remarking that Mr. H. G. Wells in his publication of 1940, entitled The New World Order has come very close to infringement on the property rights held by the Bahai Administration on the words World Order, for, in the litigation brought against Mrs. Chanler and myself, this body requested that we be enjoined from using the name of their trade-mark Bahai or any word deceptively similar thereto!)

Added to its program of exclusiveness toward any and all political activities, the Administration prevents its followers from affiliation with any movements or societies, the policies of which are not in strict conformity with the tenets of the Faith. This exclusion act was made as watertight as possible, for it is evident that no societies come up to this requirement; consequently, the Bahais are prevented from taking part in any and all the progressive movements that are operative today.

In this manner has the Administration adopted a policy of SOCIAL ISOLATION, impossible to reconcile with the contents of most of the addresses delivered by Abdul Baha in Europe and America, for these deal with the abolition of political boundaries, the eradication of social limitations, the ensuring of the economic prosperity of mankind and the establishment of a new commonwealth of humanity based on freedom, justice and peace. And again, as our minds dwell on the Teachings, now so completely obscured, we come with a shock on the words of Baha-O-Llah: Oh people . . . be intent on the betterment of the world and the training of nations.

Divine Politics

I have, in this article, used the word constituents, which is an unusual term to be connected with a religious organization, but the fact of the matter is that, while the Administration takes no part in national politics, it is in itself a thorough-going political institution.

The Bahai Administration is composed of less than a hundred local Assemblies, scattered throughout the United States and Canada, having a total membership amounting to 2584 persons. (The World Almanac, 1941, page 859.) It holds Annual Conventions, which are attended by delegates from the local Assemblies who elect nine persons to serve for the coming year on the National Spiritual Assembly, which body, in turn, nominates all the committees and is the paramount authority of the Cause in North America. The authority of this body is superseded only by the Guardian, operating from Palestine.

In 1938 and 1939 the second and third books of Shoghi Effendi were published under the titles: The World Order of Baha-U-Llah and The Advent of Divine Justice; and, with the appearance of this literature, the Administration was brought out of the human realm and raised to a station, incomparable, unassailable and divine.

Shoghi Effendi says:

It should be remembered by every follower of the Cause that the system of Bahai Administration is not an innovation imposed arbitrarily upon the Bahais of the world since the Master's passing, but derives its authority from the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 5.

Again, delving further in history, he claims that:—

In the blood of the unnumbered martyrs of Persia lay the seed of the Divinely-appointed administration which, though transplanted from its native soil, is now budding out, under your loving care, into a new order, destined to overshadow all mankind.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 52.

Now, with sledge-hammer blows, Shoghi Effendi pushes forward, and presently the Administration has passed all bounds of human frailties and become infallible:—

Out of the pangs of anguish which His bereaved followers have suffered, amid the heat and dust which the attacks launched by a sleepless enemy had precipitated, the Administration of Baha-U-Llah's invincible Faith was born. The potent energies released through the ascension of the centre of His Covenant crystallized into this supreme, this infallible Organ, for the accomplishment of a Divine Purpose.

—World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 89.

Again:—

The Administrative Order which ever since Abdu'l Baha's ascension has evolved and is taking shape under our very eyes in no fewer than forty countries of the world, may be considered as the framework of the Will itself, the inviolable stronghold wherein this new-born child is being nurtured and developed. This Administrative Order, as it expands and consolidates itself, will no doubt manifest the potentialities and reveal the full implications of this momentous Document . . . It will, as its component parts, its organic institutions, begin to function with efficiency and vigor, assert its claim and demonstrate its capacity to be regarded not only as the nucleus but the very pattern of the New World Order destined to embrace in the fullness of time the whole of mankind.

studendous claims being put forward for this Administration, although the author on page 91 of the same volume had conceded that it was born in the United States. He now says:—

The Bahai Commonwealth of the future, of which this vast Administrative Order is the sole frame-work, is, both in theory and practice, not only unique in the entire history of political institutions, but can find no parallel in the annals of any of the world's recognized religious systems . . . This new-born Administrative Order incorporates within its structure certain elements which are to be found in each of the three recognized forms of secular government, without being in any sense a mere replica of any one of them, and without introducing within its machinery any of the objectionable features which they inherently possess.

—The World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 152.

It would have been an interesting experience if one could have looked upon the glowing faces of the American framers of the Constitution and By-laws of the Administration when they read the above encomium about their brain-child!

An Unparalleled Order

There is one point on which I profoundly disagree with Shoghi Effendi, namely, in his interpretation that, in time, this Administration will develop into the House of Justice mentioned by Baha-O-Llah in the book of Aqdas. These two institutions, the one functioning at present, while the other still in the womb of futurity, are as dissimilar as are night and day. A bitter tree will not yield sweet fruits; the buzzing of a cricket will never evolve into the song of the nightingale, and a totally exclusive and reactionary system cannot develop into a world government—the dream of all liberals.

Baha-O-Llah (in the book of Aqdas) advises the members of the House of Justice:—

to regard themselves as trustees and representatives of God in the created world . . . and strive to fulfill for the good of the public the trust placed in them for the sake of God, as though they were managing their own affairs and choosing that which is best.

Here Shoghi Effendi draws the conclusion that:— the Administrative Order of the Faith of Baha-U-Llah must in no wise be regarded as purely democratic in character inasmuch as the basic assumption which requires all democracies to depend fundamentally upon getting their mandate from the people is altogether lacking in this Dispensation.

—The World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 153.

Why? To my mind, the argument is untenable. The fact that the members of the future House of Justice must regard themselves as trustees and representatives of God in the created world, should not, and must not exclude them from considering themselves, at one and the same time, the elected representatives of men, devoted to the interests of their constituents.

Shoghi Effendi further elucidates:—

In the conduct of the administrative affairs of the Faith, in the enactment of the legislation necessary to supplement the laws of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, the members of the Universal House of Justice, it should be borne in mind, are not, as Baha-U-Llah's utterances clearly imply, responsible to those whom they represent, nor are they allowed to be governed by the feelings, the general opinion, and even the convictions of the mass of the faithful, or of those who directly elect them. They are to follow in a prayerful attitude the dictates and promptings of their conscience . . . "God will verily inspire them with whatsoever He willeth," is Baha-U-Llah's incontrovertible assurance. They, and not the body of those who either directly or indirectly elect them, have thus been made the recipients of the divine guidance.

—The World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 153.

This is the building up of a theocratic order, so intransigent, so frightful, that nothing hitherto imagined can match it. Shoghi Effendi is indeed correct in saying that his system is unique and has no parallel in all the annals of history!

In Italics

An integral part of an organization is funds and fund raising, and from this dreary aspect of concerted effort the Bahai Administration is not exempt; in fact, the National Spiritual Assembly has so accentuated the subject of contributions that money ranks alongside of authority as the second feature in italics of the Cause as it stands today.

A Plan of Unified Action drawn up by the National Spiritual Assembly and submitted in December, 1925, to the Bahai community of the United States and Canada had for object the raising of an average yearly amount of $150,000. This Plan was approved by the Guardian in the following cablegram, dated January, 1926:—

Congratulate National Assembly on Plan. Noble in conception, sound in method, forceful in its appeal. Fully endorse it. Commend it to every declared believer. Shoghi.

As later events showed, it was most difficult to raise this annual religious taxation and the Plan would have failed, had it not been for the flooding of the country with high pressure appeals, cables, letters, bulletins, articles and especial calls. Shoghi Effendi writes:—

We must continually repeat, appeal and urge them to realize afresh the vital urgency of the task before them.

Again he says:—

It is my earnest hope and prayer that the friends will more universally, substantially and regularly contribute to this Plan.

Again:—

I would be grieved to learn that any believer would ever attempt to support an activity that lies outside the province of the Plan, and would neglect thereby his sacred obligation toward the Budget.

January, 1928, No. 21.

By means of such calls, the Bahais nobly rose to the occasion, and the obligations of the Plan have been substantially fulfilled.

It must be remembered that the Administration has set itself to the almost superhuman task of building a magnificent Temple in the vicinity of Chicago, which, up to this time, has cost more than a million dollars, and that this tremendous obligation necessarily dominates its horizon. Added to this are the very large expenses involved in the maintenance of the National Spiritual Assembly, amounting to $35,000 annually, (which sum does not include the expenses of any local assemblies), together with a lesser amount (small in the past, but increasing lately) which is expended on teaching. I personally consider that the huge sum of money raised yearly from just a handful of men and women represents a miracle of devotion and self-sacrifice which it would be almost impossible to parallel. It certainly is a commentary on the love which the Cause inspires in the hearts of the people. On the other hand, the continuous drive for money, which feature is never absent from the Guardian's letters, acts as a depressant on the minds of all. Here is a sample of the Guardian's appeal: Contributions to this Fund constitute in addition a practical and effective way whereby each believer can test the measure and character of his faith.

From this state of affairs, a conclusion may here be drawn and it is this: Everybody who accepts the Faith at the hands of the Administration places himself or herself under the severe obligation of contributing funds to the movement, while those who acquire the Teachings through other channels undergo no taxation whatsoever. It is evident that the Administration, having in mind the dream of world dominion (which dream seems to include one of universal taxation), would consider such independent individuals or groups as a menace to its plan for temporal power, and this undoubtedly explains, in part, the disfavor in which The New History Society is held. However that may be, I believe that a great Cause, such as that conferred upon humanity by Baha-O-Allah, would do well to accept the words of Christ as its standard for contributions: Freely you have received, freely give. I admit that, in such case, the monetary harvest would be smaller, but something else would be gained—something that is important also.

My Object

I have herein outlined the circumstances which led to the founding, development and establishment of the Bahai Administration, an institution which by this time has so identified itself with the Cause that the large majority of Bahais feel that this universal movement, born in Persia, is unauthentic without the trade-mark: Made in the United States. Like an octopus, this sinister organism has wound itself about its victim, while the faithful, ever obedient to authority and power, stifle whatsoever instincts of responsibility that yet remain in their hearts. Now, I do not flatter myself with the hope of making even a dent on the consciousness of those who follow the Administration; such is not my object in writing this book. I merely wish to set down, as a record for the future, a few notes of historic importance, believing that no one else is possessed of the knowledge, the documentation and the will to do so.

In addition, I am inserting the views of an individual who loves the Cause devotedly and who believes that he understands, in some measure, the liberal and lofty intentions of Abdul Baha. Perhaps, some day, when mankind has learned much through suffering, a few scholars will look through these pages and gain a new impression of the movement. But, this is for the future and what the future holds, no man knows. At present, we can only be sincere and do our utmost, leaving the rest to God and to His Destiny, the plans of which cannot be forestalled.

Unheeded Words

Wishing to close this chapter on a high note and yet hold to the general subject that has been treated, I find that I can do no better than quote the words of Shoghi Effendi himself:—

The call of Baha-U-Llah is primarily directed against all forms of provincialism, all insularities and prejudices. If long-cherished ideals and time-honored institutions, if certain social assumptions and religious formulae have ceased to promote the welfare of the generality of mankind, if they no longer minister to the needs of a continually evolving humanity, let them be swept away and relegated to the limbo of obsolescent and forgotten doctrines. Why should these, in a world subject to the immutable law of change and decay, be exempt from the deterioration that must needs overtake every human institution? For legal standards, political and economic theories are solely designed to safeguard the interests of humanity as a whole, and not humanity to be crucified for the preservation of the integrity of any particular law or doctrine.

--World Order of Baha-U-Llah, page 42.

It is to be regretted that this phase of the Guardian's recommendations has not been taken seriously; had it been so, I would not have had occasion to write this book.

CHAPTER XIII

ADMINISTRATIVE FRILLS AND FURBELOWS

Early Misgivings

In 1926, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada promulgated: Declaration of Trust and By-Laws of the National Spiritual Assembly, incorporating the Bahai Cause and assuming an alleged proprietorship and trusteeship over this universal movement. Unfortunately Shoghi Effendi, as the Guardian, approved every step thus taken, although there have been instances when he warned his representatives against concentrating too much on the less important aspects of the movement. As early as 1924, he held up the finger of caution:

But let us be on our guard . . . lest too much concern in that which is secondary in importance, and too long a preoccupation with the details of our affairs and activities, make us neglectful of the most essential, the most urgent of all our obligations, namely, to bury our cares and teach the Cause.

—Bahai Administration, page 37.

That the warnings of Shoghi Effendi were justified and that the National Spiritual Assembly itself came to realize the fact that a sense of anxiety and unrest existed among its members is evidenced by the following admission on its part:—

There seems to be a growing feeling among a relatively few of the believers that the Administration of the Cause in America is developing into a hard and inflexible machine and that there is a tendency to restrict individual effort and stifle individual initiative and enterprise.

—Bahai News, No. 77, Sept. 1933.

Under the present order of Bahai organization, the National Spiritual Assembly is the supreme authority (Bahai News, No. 63, June 1932); all the local assemblies are to adhere to its dicta, while the people must obey the local assemblies. (Bahai News, No. 62, May 1932.) At one time, however, it seems that the National Spiritual Assembly, in its turn, felt that Shoghi Effendi's standard was a little uncompromising, for it states: It is evident that if the Guardian's standard is too rigidly applied a community will be choked and stifled . . . for some months the members of the National Assembly have given special thought to this subject. . . .

Administrative Structure Takes Shape

Membership: The considerations involved in joining the Bahai Organization are so complicated and detailed that Shoghi Effendi states: I cannot in this connection emphasize too strongly the supreme necessity for the exercise of the utmost discretion, caution and tact (Bahai News, No. 65, August 1932, page 3) and the Bahai News, in numerous issues, again and again comes back to the subject. One of the suggestions advanced is to make the applicant sign a blank which sets forth the exact qualifications required; another is to lay down a definite period of time—for ex- ample, a year, before an assembly can act upon an application after it is received. For those who are interested in partially understanding the complications attendant upon the acceptance of a new member, I suggest the study of a long article from which I have just quoted and also the four Sections of Bahai Procedure issued by Bahai Publishing Committee, 1937.

Minority rights: A distinctly dictatorial touch is applied to the deliberations of the Bahai council: the teachings recognize no minority rights whatever within the body of an Assembly. Every decision made by a Spiritual Assembly is binding upon each and all its members alike, whatever their personal views (Bahai News, No. 87, Sept. 1934, page 3) and, There is no place in Bahai Administration for minority action or reports. How often have we heard in Assemblies' deliberations the expressed wish of one or more members to be recorded as voting in opposition to the action of the majority. Such an expressed wish manifests the ego of our human nature. (Bahai News, No. 77, Sept. 1933, page 2.)

Infallibility of the Assembly: Although the members of the National Spiritual Assembly are elected annually by the representatives of the Bahai Assemblies of the United States and Canada in convention assembled, and owe their continuation in office to those electors, it is asserted: that the Spiritual Assembly is not a body created by the believers, even though by their votes at elections they determine its membership. . . . A spiritual Assembly rests upon sanctions higher than that of the voting community. Its functions and powers are unalterable. The responsibility of its members is not to the electorate but to the higher authority resident in the Cause. (Bahai News, No. 87, Sept. 1934, page 2.) Infallibility is actually attached to the National Spiritual Assembly in the following words of the Guardian: The potent energies released through the ascension of the Center of His Covenant (Abdul Baha) crystallized into this supreme, this infallible Organ for the accomplishment of a Divine Purpose. (World Order of Baha-O-Ilah by Shoghi Effendi, page 89.)

Teaching: Now, in regard to teaching: to achieve complete success, every teacher should work directly under the supervision and recognition of his or her Spiritual Assembly. (Bahai News, No. 64, July 1932, page 3.) One definition of a qualified teacher is a Bahai who adheres implicitly to the Bahai Administration and is in accord with the National Spiritual Assembly and with the local Spiritual Assembly of the Bahai Community to which he belongs. (Bahai News, No. 49, March 1931, page 6.)

Twenty Lessons in Bahai Administration

Inasmuch as the teaching of the accumulated rules and laws of the National Spiritual Assembly became the be-all and end-all of the Bahai Organization, it was decided to issue a booklet in mimeograph form entitled Twenty Lessons in Bahai Administration. This was prepared by the Study Outline Committee, approved by the Bahai Reviewing Committee in 1935 and distributed by Bahai Publishing Committee, P. O. Box 348, Grand Central Annex, New York, N. Y. This booklet contains twenty lessons, and the student, under the direction of an approved teacher, is supposed to study one lesson a week—in a period approximately measured at five months. This amazing document, in itself, is a convincing proof that the glorious teachings of Baha-O-Ilah and Abdul Baha are totally forgotten. Indeed, not one trace of them is left. Here is a supreme tragedy, a cause for lamentation and an occasion for mourning! The Bahai Faith is buried under the debris of these regulations—all of which tend to obscure, in the consciousness of the student, the pure and majestic conception of the Cause which is his by right. Imagine spending five months filling one's mind and heart with such childish, legalistic twiddle-dum and twiddle-dee! Then, having waded through these muddy waters and stagnant pools, the student is expected to answer a number of questions, some of which are reproduced herewith:—

Test Questions

What is the foundation of the Bahai Administrative Order and what is the watchword?

Why does the authority in the Bahai Administrative Order command complete allegiance?

Discuss the balance between the final authority of the National Assembly and the purely consultative function of the National Convention.

Discuss the jurisdiction, duties and powers of the National Spiritual Assembly.

What position has the National Assembly taken regarding acting as administrator of estates or as guardian for children, and also regarding gifts of property?

In what matters does the Guardian declare the authority of the National Spiritual Assembly to be "undivided and unchallengeable"?

Exhibition of Mail, held at the Headquarters of The New History the World Competition, printed in eleven languages, to the Society in October, 1936, on the eve of posting the Conditions of five continents and the Islands of the Seas.

See page 344

How would you answer an inquiry as to how a Guardian differs from a Pope?

In what respect does the Universal House of Justice differ from the House of Cardinals?

What is the residential qualification for a voting believer?

What are the more fundamental qualifications for voting believers?

Note the distinction between believers and those who consider themselves Bahais but do not accept the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha.

Are people who accept the Cause with reservations to consider themselves Bahais?

Under what conditions may a believer be removed from the voting list of a Bahai Community? What body makes the final decision?

Discuss the function of the Local Spiritual Assembly in passing upon the qualifications of a new believer.

What standard exists for legal incorporation of a local Spiritual Assembly?

Does a Local Spiritual Assembly have the authority to criticize a policy duly adopted by the National Spiritual Assembly?

What is the function of Bahai News and to whom should it be given?

Are the Nineteen Day Feasts open to non-believers?

What is the practice about securing credentials when visiting other Bahai Communities?

What is the rule about admitting Orientals to Bahai Communities?

What is the relation of the National Assembly to institutions outside the Bahai Organization?

With what kind of groups may Bahais associate themselves and what kind are they not to join?

What reasons do you see for the stand taken against adherence to a political party?

What are Shoghi Effendi's instructions concerning church membership?

Why are contributions to the Bahai Fund a measure of the faith of a believer?

Problems in Bahai Administration

His ability having been tested by the above questions and many more, the student is now up for a second gruelling examination, this time on Problems in Bahai Administration (a section incorporated in The Booklet of Twenty Lessons). In order to study these enigmas with befitting attention, one runs the risk of losing either one's reason or one's sense of humor—probably both. What have such childish fancies to do with the Cause of Baha-O-Llah, the aim of which is the spiritual regeneration of the world and the glorification of mankind? However, my readers may be more expert at puzzles than I am (it is likely that some of them are adepts at the Prof. Quiz radio hour), so I will give them the chance to solve some of them. Here they are:—

Mr. S. finds that he could visit a number of communities in connection with a business trip and is qualified to contribute toward meeting programs or to help in any teaching projects. What steps should he take (a) before leaving home and (b) in introducing himself to each new Local Assembly?

Mrs. A., a member of the New York Baha'i community, expects to spend the winter in Miami and would like to join in their community activities. What steps should be taken toward this end before she leaves home? If Mrs. A. neglects this step before making contact with the Miami Baha'is, what should the Miami Spiritual Assembly do about it?

Miss G. is trying gradually to interest a group of her friends in the Baha'i Faith through informal discussion of general subjects from the Baha'i point of view. Other Baha'is criticize her for working alone in the teaching project. Which attitude do you think Shoghi Effendi would approve of? What should be the relationship of Miss G. and the Local Spiritual Assembly in her project?

Mrs. X. is an old believer whose faith centers around her personal experiences with Abdul Baha and she understands neither the authority of Shoghi Effendi nor the significance of Baha'i Administration. What could the Local Assembly do to help her make that necessary transition? What is the difference between Mrs. X.'s position and that of a person who actively opposes Shoghi Effendi and Baha'i Administration?

Mr. E. has always been an active Democrat in his city and neither wants to break his connection with the Democratic party nor understands why he should do so. What arguments would you use to convince him that as a Baha'i he must give up all political affiliations? What would be the result if he refuses to see the point and accepts election to a government office of some kind?

Miss A. has attended four Baha'i meetings and is much attracted to the teachings. An over-enthusiastic believer asks her if she would like to join the Baha'is and takes her to the next nineteen day feast. In how many ways did the believer show her ignorance of Baha'i administration? How should the Local Spiritual Assembly handle this delicate situation?

Mr. X. has been attending Baha'i meetings occasionally for ten years and has just expressed a desire to associate himself with the Baha'is. Does this fact necessarily mean that he is qualified to become a voting member of the community? How should you ascertain his eligibility?

A member of a community interests individuals in the Baha'i Faith and contributes regularly but does not attend Nineteen-Day Feasts or other meetings. How should the Spiritual Assembly handle this problem?

The above portentous problems on Bahai Administration (which I admit are baffling to my type of mentality) carry me back to my childhood days when my teacher used to present to the class certain oral and written exercises, on which I spent hours, but from which I seldom came out victorious. With pain and anguish I still remember some of them. For instance:—

A cellar is 15 ft. long and 12 ft. wide. What is the area of the floor? If the cellar is 8 ft. deep, how many cubic feet does it contain?

A kite string was broken, and four parts were saved. The first part of the string was $75\frac{1}{4}$ ft. long, the second part $127\frac{1}{4}$ ft., the third part 261 ft., and the fourth part $891\frac{1}{4}$ ft. Allowing 1 ft. for tying, how long was the string when all four were tied together?

Van ready to leave for U. S. Post Office on October 7, 1936. Members of staff and volunteers who prepared 75,000 pieces of mail for World Competition.

The main difference between the problems of the arithmetic book and those of the Bahai Administration is that with the former we can find a definite solution while answers to the latter, even though satisfactory to the examiners, may still remain questionable to many an earnest mind.

While reading this remarkable booklet, and selecting a few Questions for use in this article, I was trying in all fairness to discover a relationship, no matter how remote, between this literature and the Cause of Baha-O-Llah. Does the faith of an individual who has responded to the Bahai Revelation really and truly depend upon a mastery of these questions? And supposing an inquirer, in all enthusiasm, takes up this course of instruction and comes through it with flying colors, has he at the end gained an understanding which will be of use to him in promulgating the fundamental principles of the Cause? Has he become a more illumined servant of the world of humanity? Was it to him that Baha-O-Llah spoke: Be the deliverer of the Cause of God in such wise that through thine utterances, the tree will be set on fire? (Baha-O-Llah—Bahai Scriptures, p. 193.) Is he able to destroy the abodes of neglect by the hands of power and composure, and build the chambers of knowledge in the hearts? (Baha-O-Llah—Bahai Scriptures, p. 98.) Is he fitted to take possession of the cities of hearts by the swords of wisdom and of explanation? (Baha-O-Llah—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, p. 43.) Has he gained wings that he may Walk above the world by the power of the Greatest Name and see the secrets of Pre-Existence and know that which none knew of? (Baha-O-Llah—Bahai Scriptures, p. 193.) Is he now like a well-cultivated garden wherein the roses and varie- gated flowers of heaven are growing in fragrance and beauty? (Abdul Baha—Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. I, p. 21.) Can he honestly claim that he is now in a better position to become a breath of life, a banner of salvation and a manifest sign . . . a lamp of reconciliation and peace, a standard of love and attraction, a star of guidance among mankind? (Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. III, p. 712.)

I may be mistaken, but in my estimation these Twenty Lessons in Bahai Administration are like unto a mirage which has the show of water. The thirsty ones make abundant efforts in their search, but, when reaching it, remain deprived and portionless. Or . . . like unto the image of a loved one which is destitute of life and soul. When the lover reaches it, he finds it of no worth and value, and finds no gain save great pain and despondency. (Baha-O-Llah—Bahai Scriptures, p. 224.)

Regarding the student of these Twenty Lessons in Bahai Administration, ambitious as he undoubtedly is, and sincere in his purpose, I make bold to offer a graphic and most striking utterance of the Revelator himself:—

Ye are in likeness as a bird, which with all joy and fragrance soars in the utmost security in the cheerful air of the Praised One; then in the imaginary hope of grains, it inclines toward the mud and water of the earth, and with all eagerness, besmeurs itself with mud and mire; and when it attempts to re-ascend, it finds itself unable and a captive, forasmuch as wings besmeared with water and clay are not capable of flight. At that time, that bird of the exalted heaven finds itself a dweller in the mortal earth.

CHAPTER XIV

THE DOUBLE MASK

The Bill of Rights

Immediately following the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, on September 17, 1789, a number of safeguarding amendments were drawn up, and, when the First Congress met at its initial session in the City of New York, on September 25th, of the same year, it was voted to submit these to the States for ratification. The Amendments, 12 in number, were properly called: A Bill of Rights; ten of them were ratified within the next two years.

The First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the most important and far-reaching, reads as follows:—

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

The greatness of the United States and the intrinsic superiority of its civilization to all others lies within these twenty-six simple words. I venture to assert that no other sentence has exercised such epoch-making influence over the destiny of any nation, ancient or modern. These twenty-six words are the origin of the religious, cultural, scientific, industrial, economic and literary progress of the nation.

It is claimed that language is not expected to convey all the delicate shades of meaning or the inner states of mind, but, inasmuch as facts must be described in some way, words are used—always with a latent consciousness of their inadequacy. However, regarding these twenty-six immortal words, no such apology is appropriate, for like giant searchlights they have guided and are guiding the lost mariners on the tempestuous sea of thought to the course of enlightenment and the harbor of universal tolerance.

Freedom in Truth

Since the dawn of Christianity, men have been taught by Church and State: Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free (St. John 8:32). Nevertheless, the brand of truth that was dogmatically taught by these institutions did not make them free, but rather enslaved their minds, and tortured and murdered their bodies. Man was told that he was created in the image of God and that he shared in the divine nature, but the Great Model was banished from human society and imprisoned in civic dungeons, while poor humanity was set to imitate the satanic model and develop its lower nature. Liberty, as a religious experience, was unknown except to a few daring thinkers, and the exercise of conscience was a transgression to be frowned upon by the law-abiding.

Now, for over a hundred and fifty years the United States has put into practice the words of its First Amendment, and during that time a civilization has applied itself to the truth and has sought to know it.

Had it not been for the First Amendment in the Bill of Rights we, in all probability, would have a different story to tell regarding the promotion of the Bahai Cause in the United States since its introduction at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago, in 1893.

Baha-O-Llah was a champion of religious liberty, an apostle of intellectual freedom and the advocate of man's emancipation from the fetters of dogmas and creeds. His teachings inaugurated an era of human brotherhood on a logical foundation, and made a royal circle of universal understanding among the religions, nations and races. Consequently, the Bahai Cause stands for equality, and this equality of course can have no meaning except equal rights for all; nor can there be a functioning of equal rights unless the individual is allowed liberty to act according to his best judgment and the dictates of his conscience.

Baha-O-Llah calls upon his disciples to arise and banish religious intolerance from the face of the earth, in order that the era of universal freedom may set in. He says:—

Gird up the loins of endeavor, so that perchance religious dissension and strife may, through your efforts, be reduced to nothingness among the inhabitants of the world. Arise for the love of God and man in this important Cause.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, p. 11.

Spiritual Hospitality

The late Prof. Edward G. Browne, Orientalist of Cambridge University, England, visited Acca, Palestine, in 1890 and had the privilege of several interviews with Baha-O-Llah. At their first meeting, the founder of the Bahai Cause addressed him thus:—

We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment. . . . That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this?

—Introduction to a Traveller's Narrative, page xl.

The purpose of Baha-O-Illah, as expressed in the above utterance, is more and more becoming justified in these United States, for through the power of the First Amendment, a spiritual hospitality has been established, and religions, sects and denominations, instead of shunning and antagonizing one another, live side by side, associate and are as brothers—thus the ground is prepared for the realization of the One Faith. Indeed, we see before our eyes a miracle of transformation; sons of men, having come from the four corners of the earth, are strengthening amongst themselves the bonds of affection and unity, and year by year minimizing diversity of religion until, in God's own appointed time, they shall turn in complete harmony and concord, to the Divine Horizon that encircles them all. Toward this beloved land of opportunity all the races of the world have wended their way. Englishmen and Frenchmen, Italians and Germans, Poles and Swedes, Palestinians and Persians, Chinese and Japanese, Africans and Syrians, Turks and Arabs—all are here in these United States. Differences of race are not yet annulled and it may be a long, long time before they are definitely placed in the discard, but we have taken the preliminary steps toward that end; we are not hostile to one another; we meet in the market-place and often in the churches; we work side by side, study from the same textbooks, read the same magazines and newspapers, travel east and west, north and south, without passports or customs barriers; and we broadcast our grievances, and listen to the music and messages of our multi-colored, multi-farious brothers and sisters as the radio brings them to us by day and by night. More than all, we have come to value the cultures and noble qualities that characterize the races, and appreciate the contributions of each one to the spiritual, artistic, scientific and economic structure that is America.

Yes, we have learned to know one another very well, and to have respect for one another's ideals and convictions; and, as the years roll on, we are becoming aware of the fact that the salvation of mankind lies in religious, intellectual, social, national, international and interracial cooperation. Even now, through her own example, America can teach this lesson of cooperation to the rest of the world.

No! Differences of race are not annulled, but they do not play havoc in our national life; they hardly disturb the smooth workings of our national economy. For the present, we are moderately satisfied with the results that have come out of the laboratory of our interracial experiences. A working example of unity has been set up. It is not perfect, far from it; but it operates and is better than anything that has been attempted elsewhere. Or I might ask: Has it ever been attempted elsewhere? Doubtless, as we continue to learn the lessons of universal cooperation and apply them to the actual and concrete problems of our life, differences of race will be annulled, for such is the injunction of Baha-O-Llah—his wish for us as we strive and struggle in our ever-evolving civilization! And then—not now—can we exclaim with him: What harm is there in this? and the answer will come, out of our own experience: Nothing at all! Nothing at all!

Baha-O-Llah says:—

I declare by the Sun of Truth that the light of understanding renders the horizon brilliant and luminous.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 11.

And he makes his mission very clear as he speaks again:—

O people of the earth! My only aim has been to suppress disputes among the religions of the world and enmity among the nations, so that all, happy and free, may occupy themselves with their own interests.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 26.

The first part of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States established the right to religious freedom; the second part established the right to freedom of speech and of the press. This one sentence put an end to enmity among the nations that had adopted this country as their home; for, their rights of worship and of expressing their ideas and hopes in speech and press being protected, there remained no reason for any misunderstanding or altercation. Through these constitutional protections, they could, happy and free, occupy themselves with their own interests.

In the words of Baha-O-Llah which I have repeatedly quoted throughout the preceding paragraphs, we plainly see that the supreme mission of this Prophet has been to confer upon the population of the entire earth the inalienable rights of liberty of religion, of speech and of the press. Evidently, emancipation of mind and spirit is a fundamental doctrine of the Bahai Cause, even as it is an elementary law of the United States. It originates in the liberation of a moral personality, working towards the Highest Good—the Supreme Concourse, or in Christian terminology, the Kingdom of Heaven.

Reformation

Abdul Baha visited the United States in 1912, where in speech after speech he referred to the problem under discussion. He felt that the entire conception of man in regard to civilization must be reformed; that, inasmuch as the sciences and arts were subject to change, even so the laws of morality and religion must undergo a thorough transformation and be brought up to the level of the spiritual consciousness of God, universal, all-embracing, free—so that man himself may become a reflector of the Divine Radiance. In a speech delivered before the New Thought Forum, Boston, Mass., on August 25th, 1912, he said:—

Day by day, the world attains a new bounty. In this radiant century, neither the old customs nor the old sciences, crafts, laws and regulations have remained. The old political principles are undergoing change and a new body-politic is in process of formation. Nevertheless, some whose thoughts are congealed and whose souls are bereft of the light of the Sun of Reality seek to arrest this development in the world of the minds of men. Is this possible?

In the unmistakable and universal re-formation we are witnessing, when outer conditions of humanity are receiving such impetus, when human life is assuming a new aspect, when sciences are stimulated afresh, inventions and discoveries increasing, civic laws undergoing change and moralities evidencing uplift and betterment, is it possible that spiritual impulses and influences should not be renewed and reformed? Naturally, new spiritual thoughts and inclinations must also become manifest. If spirituality be not renewed, what fruits come from mere physical reformation? For instance, the body of man may improve, the quality of bone and sinew may advance, the hand may develop, other limbs and members may increase in excellence, but if the mind fails to develop, of what use is the rest? The important factor in human improvement is the mind. In the world of the mind there must needs be development and improvement. There must be re-formation in the kingdom of the human spirit, otherwise no result will be attained from betterment of the mere physical structure.

In this new year, new fruits must be forthcoming, for that is the provision and intention of spiritual re-formation. The renewal of the leaf is fruitless. From the re-formation of bark, or branch, no fruit will come forth. The renewal of verdure produces nothing. If there be no renewal of fruit from the tree, of what avail is the re-formation of bark, blossom, branch and trunk? For a fruitless tree is of no special value. Similarly, of what avail is the re-formation of physical conditions, unless they are concomitant with spiritual re-formation? For the essential reality is the spirit, the foundation basis is the spirit, the life of man is due to the spirit, the happiness, the radiance, the glory of man—all are due to the spirit; and if in the spirit no re-formation takes place, there will be no result to human existence.

Therefore, we must strive with life and heart that the material and physical world may be re-formed, human perception become keener, the merciful effulgence manifest and the radiance of reality shine. Then the star of love shall appear and the world of humanity become illumined. The purpose is that the world of existence is dependent for its progress upon re-formation; otherwise it will be as dead. Consider, if a new springtime failed to appear, what would be the effect upon this globe, the earth? Undoubtedly it would become desolate and life extinct. The earth has need of an annual coming of spring. It is necessary that a new bounty should be forthcoming. If it comes not, life would be effaced. In the same way the world of spirit needs new life, the world of mind necessitates new development, the world of souls a new bounty, the world of morality a re-formation, the world of divine effulgence ever new bestowals. Were it not for this replenishment, the life of the world would become effaced and extinguished. If this room is not ventilated and the air freshened, respiration will cease after a length of time. If no rain falls, all life organisms will perish. If new light does not shine, the darkness of death will envelop the earth. If a new springtime does not arrive, life upon this globe will be obliterated.

Therefore, thoughts must be lofty and ideals uplifted in order that the world of humanity may become assisted in new conditions of reform. When this re-formation affects every degree, then will come the very "Day of the Lord" of which all the prophets have spoken. That is the Day wherein the whole world will be regenerated. Consider: are the laws of past ages applicable to present human conditions? Evidently they are not. For example, the laws of former centuries sanctioned despotic forms of government. Are the laws of despotic control fitted for present-day conditions? How could they be applied to solve the questions surrounding modern nations? Similarly, we ask, would the status of ancient thought, the crudeness of arts and crafts, the insufficiency of scientific attainment serve us today? Would the agricultural methods of the ancients suffice in the twentieth century? Transportation in the former ages was restricted to conveyance by animals. How would it provide for human needs today? If modes of transportation had not been re-formed, the teeming millions now upon the earth would die of starvation. Without the railway and the fast-going steamship, the world of the present day would be as dead. How could great cities such as New York and London subsist if dependent upon ancient means of conveyance? It is also true of other things which have been re-formed in proportion to the needs of the present time. Had they not been re-formed, man could not find subsistence.

If these material tendencies are in such need of re-formation, how much greater the need in the world of the human spirit, the world of human thought, perception, virtues and bounties! Is it possible that that need has remained stationary while the world has been advancing in every other condition and direction? It is impossible.

Abdul Baha—The Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, pages 272, 273, 274.

In the preceding pages, I have presented ample proofs that the Bahai Cause, as a religious and cultural re-formation, is free from the bondage of any and all the limitations that in the past have impeded the progress of thought; that it aims not only at the moral but also at the practical emancipation of man; that it looks to the fulfillment of the glorious liberty of the children of God (Romans 8:21). Baha-O-Llah and his son, Abdul Baha, are the two great Apostles of Freedom. Their message is addressed to freemen and slaves alike; to freemen to lead the children of God into the Land of Promise; to slaves to throw off the shackles of serfdom and assert their heritage to the Kingdom. The Bahai Cause summons all men to a glorious enterprise, and in turn it offers itself to all men as a way to Truth, liberty and universal service.

A Case in Point

Abdul Baha said that there are some men who seek to arrest this development in the world of the minds of men, and one cannot but consider that the lawsuit, brought by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada against Mrs. Chanler and myself, in which the court was requested to restrain us from the unlawful act of teaching the Bahai Religion, is a case in point. The Papers were signed by a battery of four lawyers, and I cannot but wonder whether any one of them had ever read the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, wherein the people are guaranteed the free exercise of their religions. Attention to this simple phrase, from this most famous document, would undoubtedly have convinced them that the words unlawful act were unwisely chosen.

This strange Complaint continues:—

(a) From using, or participating directly or indirectly in the use of, the word Baha'i or any word deceptively similar thereto, as the name or a part of the name of any meeting, lecture, class or social gathering, or as the name or title or a part of the name or title of any book, magazine, or other publication, or as the name or a part of the name under which any book shop or other business is conducted.

Now, I take it for granted that the judges of our courts know the contents of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights and that they would not under any circumstances restrain the citizens of these United States from the exercise of their religious beliefs. Therefore, the request of the National Spiritual Assembly that an unconstitutional judgment be rendered, preventing us, our employees and our associates from using or participating in the name of our Faith, during the pendency of the lawsuit and thereafter perpetually, is so fantastic and so incredible that I cannot find words to describe such arrogant naiveté.

Perpetually!

What is the actual significance of the word perpetually? Perpetual means continuous, incessant, interminable; also everlasting and eternal. Now, as we all are subject to death, it is evident that the members of the National Spiritual Assembly intended the Court to carry its rulings into the life-hereafter, so that, in the very Kingdom of God we may be prevented from gathering together in the name of our Master and uttering the word Bahai or any syllable thereof, or any word similar thereto, either directly or indirectly.

Likewise, this august body doubtless intended the long arm of present day justice to stretch out into the future affairs of the nation and prevent our children and grandchildren, and the children and grandchildren of our agents, servants, employees and associates unto the third and fourth generation, nay, unto the hundredth generation, throughout all ages and cycles—in other words perpetually—from using the word Bahai as the name or a part of the name of any meeting, lecture, class or social gathering.

I am a writer and lecturer, and frankly I enjoy my work. I speak and write on the Bahai Cause and on a number of other subjects, and I know that the Bill of Rights has given me and all other American citizens

1. Liberty of Religion,
2. Liberty of Speech,
3. Liberty of the Press.

Thus, in the three particular domains in which I specialize, I have been accorded complete freedom of expression, and neither the National Spiritual Assembly nor the Courts of the United States can take these privileges away from me or from any other.

According to Hitler's policy makers, the Nazi regime of dictatorship is set at one thousand years; but, to the National Spiritual Assembly such a period is but a short and fleeting moment. Its vision is far more grandiose; indeed, it envisaged a perpetual dictatorship to be imposed on every aspect of spiritual life, backed by the laws of the United States.

Probation

Simply out of curiosity and with the utmost goodwill, I would like to ask a question of the members of the National Spiritual Assembly. How did they expect the Courts of New York to carry out their demand? Did they suggest that a corps of marshals and detectives shadow Mrs. Chanler, myself and our agents, servants, employees, associates and each of them by day and by night, ready, as soon as they hear the word Bahai, to swoop down upon us and drag us to the police department? Would such precautions, and the expense to the city involved therein, be justified in the eyes of the Mayor?

If so, I will proceed with another inquiry. Are we really such desperados that we should be subjected to minute and incessant supervision? Do we belong to the class of malefactors of wealth, known as economic royalists, or are we Fifth Columnists, ready at any moment to do our part in handing over the country to other dictatorships which have already arrived? Actually what is the color of our guilt? Is it perhaps red?

If we have trespassed on anyone's property; if we have disrupted the peace of the community; if we have committed arson; if we have embezzled the funds of a business or society; if we have pillaged, plundered, rifled and sacked the private possessions of our neighbors; if we have smuggled forbidden goods through the customs house; in brief, if we have violated any of the laws of these United States, we would be more than willing to stand before the bar of justice and receive adequate and ample sentence of fine or jail, or think ourselves lucky if we should get off on probation, perpetual or otherwise.

Yet, the while I ask these questions, I know very well that our supposed sins are far greater than these, and more serious: We do not surrender our religious liberty nor submit to the corporate and ecclesiastical authority of the National Spiritual Assembly. We turn to Baha-O-Llah without asking permission. We carry the name of Abdul Baha in our hearts and on our lips. We spread the ideals of peace and brotherhood as taught by these, our beloved Masters. We hold meetings and deliver lectures on spiritual subjects relative to the Bahai Cause. We write and publish leaflets, pamphlets and books on the Bahai Movement. Yes, we perpetrate all these actions, in love, happiness and freedom; we have stepped out into the open spaces of service, unmindful of obligations imposed on us to remain on perpetual parole and on perpetual probation; and these crimes have been committed in broad daylight, unblushingly and with no tremors of fear. Indeed, we are fully aware of the fact that few Bahais would have acted as we have.

Justice

Now, it is probable (and this is the pity of it) that the members of the National Spiritual Assembly believed that, in this legal action, they were just to the Cause and just to us, and it is not for me to question their ideal of justice.

Nevertheless, I venture to quote the ideal of justice as tendered to us by Baha-O-Llah. It is to be found in the Hidden Words:—

Justice is loved above all. Neglect it not, if thou desirest Me. By it thou wilt be strengthened to perceive things with thine own eyes and not by the eyes of men, to know them by thine own knowledge and not by the knowledge of any in the world. Meditate on this—how thou oughtest to be. Justice is of My bounty to thee and of My providence over thee; therefore, keep it ever before thy sight.

Janus

We have all read of Janus, an ancient Roman Deity, primarily god of gates and doors—hence of all beginnings. Our month of January was named after him. In the Forum, the shrine of Janus was equipped with double doors, symbolizing the quality of this personage who was represented as having two faces, looking opposite ways.

Now, after a close study of the actions of the National Spiritual Assembly, I have come to the conclusion that this body is a replica of that ancient god, for it looks upon the world through two masks, one turned toward the East and the other toward the West.

First:(a) On the one hand, the literature put out by the Bahai Administration is replete with references to present-day persecutions undergone by the Bahais in Persia and other parts of the East, on account of the absence of religious liberty in those countries. In numerous letters, Shoghi Effendi describes most vividly the injustices heaped upon the followers of the Faith, who have thus been denied freedom of expression. He requests the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada who, as Westerners, have received the inestimable benefits of religious toleration and freedom (Bahai Administration, page 124), to give publicity to the unbridled barbarism existent in Persia.

(b) On the other hand, this same National Spiritual Assembly, with the sanction of Shoghi Effendi, has been making every effort to abolish religious liberty within the country where it functions. As a final step, it instituted legal proceedings to prevent the meeting of Bahai groups which do not operate under its own supervision. The explanation offered is: the protection of the sacred rights of the Bahai Community (Annual Reports of the National Spiritual Assembly 1939-1940, page 2).

Now, it is a fact that the Persians, in denying religious liberty to the Bahais, also bear in mind the protection of the sacred rights of the Islamic Community. It is for this reason that they enforce restrictions upon a minority such as the Bahais, and the reason is considered valid by the Hierarchy and the State likewise. It is to be noted that, in this instance, the sanction of the State constitutes the only difference between the two examples; for, in our country, the State holds itself aloof from such matters. A Shrine in Bagdad

Second: A certain property in Iraq has, for many years, been an object of litigation between the Bahais and the Mohammedan Community.

When, after his exile from Persia in 1852, Baha-O-Llah arrived in Bagdad, he established himself and his family in a group of dwelling-houses belonging to one of his disciples, which houses he later acquired. Here he lived for eleven years until a second exile drove him on to Adrianople.

Now, Baha-O-Llah had never revealed his ownership of these dwelling-houses, which to all appearances remained the property of the disciple; but, after his departure they continued vacant, owing to the sacred character which the long residence of the Prophet had imposed upon them.

So, for many years, the Bahais watched over this property very quietly, concealing from the authorities the importance that they attached to it, for religious persecution was rampant in those days.

Matters remained in this condition until, with the establishment of the British Mandate, liberty of conscience and religion, proclaimed in the Covenant of the League of Nations, was confirmed in Iraq by the Treaty of 1922 with Great Britain, and later by the Organic Law of Iraq. Then, taking advantage of a security and freedom which they had never before known, the Bahais, under the direction of Shoghi Effendi, set about to putting into repair these dwellings, which, the Guardian describes, to outward seeming, appeared only as a cluster of humble and decrepit buildings lost amid the obscure and tortuous lanes of old Bagdad.

Presently, the Bahais tried to take possession of the houses, and it was at this juncture that definite opposition set in. The case was carried from court to court with no decision in favor of the Bahais until, through the efforts of the Bahai Assembly of Bagdad with the assistance of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, Mr. Mountfort Mills, a lawyer and a most prominent Bahai, was enabled to bring the question before the Permanent Mandates Commission held in Geneva, Switzerland, from October 26th to November 13, 1928. The conclusion was as follows: The Permanent Mandates Commission, recognizing the justice of the complaint made by the Bahai Spiritual Assembly of Bagdad, has recommended to the Council of the League such action as it thinks proper to redress the wrong suffered by the petitioners.

I regret that I do not find any record in the literature of the Bahai Administration that is in my possession whether the Council of the League made any recommendation regarding the actual return of the property to the Bahais; or whether the return was ever accomplished. I certainly hope so.

Inconsistency

My object in giving the details of this transaction is to show that, in support of their claims, the Bahai Community repeatedly appealed to the principle of the liberty of conscience and religion contained in the Treaty of 1922 between Iraq and Great Britain (Article III) and in the Organic Law of Iraq (Article XIII) as also to Article 22 (1) of the League Covenant. The principle of liberty of conscience and religion seems very important to the National Spiritual Assembly in its dealings with the East, and it turns to the Courts of that land to enforce its application; but this same body, in its dealings with the West, applies to the Courts of the United States to prevent the application of the same principle. Here is the DOUBLE MASK, in full use!

Again, I can picture the Janus-faced lock, which history describes to us. It was one that could be opened by two keys on opposite sides of the door. Now, the National Spiritual Assembly turns the key, opening toward Bagdad and pours reproaches upon the officials of that city because, in their dealings with the Bahais, they do not put into practice the principle of liberty of conscience and religion as embodied in their Organic Law. Then, this same Assembly turns the key opening toward New York and pours reproaches, even more vehement, upon a group of Bahais in The New History Society, because they have allowed themselves to put into practice the principle of the liberty of conscience and religion as taught by Baha-O'llah and Abdul Baha, and as embodied in the Bill of Rights.

*But whereunto shall I liken this generation? . . .
For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil.*

The Son of man came eating and drinking and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners.

Ban on Literature

Third: The Government of Iran, in furtherance of its nationalistic policy, had placed a ban on the entry and circulation of Bahai literature throughout the country. In 1932, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, following instructions from Shoghi Effendi, addressed a petition to His Imperial Majesty the Shah on the subject of lifting this ban, and entrusted this petition to its personal representative, Mrs. Keith Ransom-Kehler.

In this document, thus forwarded to the ruler of Persia, the National Spiritual Assembly considered how widely spread throughout America and especially among the Bahais, is the appreciation of the notable reforms which have been made in Persia as the result of your Majesty's Administration of Affairs in that land. It also referred to the importance of the spiritual ties, through the reverence of the believers in both countries for the enlightened religious teachings of Baha-O-Llah; and finally stated: The appointment of a representative, to journey to Teheran for the purpose of presenting in person the petition of this Assembly, will make it evident to your Majesty how profoundly the American Bahais are moved by their inability to communicate fully with their fellow-religionists in Persia by reason of the Postal regulations still prohibiting the entry of Bahai books and magazines published in the United States and Canada.

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler did not meet the Shah, but was received by the Prime Minister in August 1932 and was given the assurance that the ban on Bahai literature would be lifted. This announcement produced extraordinary rejoicing throughout the Bahai world and the National Spiritual Assembly released news of victory to the press. A long cable was sent to the Prime Minister expressing gratitude for the removal of the ban, and this message was brought to the attention of the Persian Minister in Washington, D. C. Likewise, A statement to the American press was also issued, reporting that Mrs. Ransom-Kehler had received firm assurance from the Court Minister that the postal regulations under which Bahai literature had been confiscated would be immediately annulled.

Then, within a very short time, and to the consternation of the Bahai community, it was realized that the ban had not been annulled. Here, Mrs. Ransom-Kehler again valiantly rose to the occasion; she made every effort to discover the reason for the change of attitude; she interviewed the Secretary charged with American affairs at the Foreign Office; she wrote passionate and glowing appeals to the Shah, to the President of the Parliament and to Cabinet Ministers, yet she was never able to penetrate the official veil. The Secretary at the Foreign Office told her that it was contrary to the Constitution of Persia to sanction any religion founded after Islam and, that consequently, Bahai literature must remain unrecognized. In a long letter to the Shah, Mrs. Ransom-Kehler spoke of the recent gracious action of your Majesty in asserting the power of religious freedom and opening the door to the amenities of international communication customary in modern times which was by us immediately communicated to all leading newspapers in the United States and Canada together with an expression of our grateful recognition of your Majesty's response to our petition. No answer to this letter was received.

The story is a long one. The matter was brought up for full discussion by the delegates at the 25th Bahai Convention held in Chicago in June 1933, and a resolution was adopted to take immediate action to bring about the cessation of the reported maltreatment of our Bahai brethren, to secure the entry of Bahai literature and to restore the constitutional provision for the printing and circulation of Bahai literature within Persia. An elaborate report was drawn up and presented to the Persian Minister in Washington by a Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly. It says in part:—

After entertaining the hope that the ancient land of Persia had been granted the high privilege of a regime based upon fearless justice, the very foundation of civilization, we cannot but deplore the survival from the past of indications that free intercourse on the part of American citizens with loyal citizens of Persia on matters of purely spiritual interest is prevented by regulations imposed by Persian authorities. The Bahais of America assert very frankly to your Excellency their unhappiness because of the fact that unfounded prejudice against the Bahais of Persia, whether emanating from atheistic or ecclesiastical sources, can in this day and age find sanction from authorities of the State. . . . The outcome of this representation will, we trust, enable the National Spiritual Assembly to inform the local Bahai communities that their determined desire to assist in removing the disabilities and maltreatment of their Persian brothers has been completely realized.

On Sept. 10, 1933, Mrs. Ransom-Kehler, still in Persia, sent the following announcement to the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada: Petition unanswered.

And on October 27, 1933, the Spiritual Assembly of Teheran cabled the sad news that Mrs. Ransom-Kehler had passed into the life beyond.

Thus, a very interesting and significant effort made by Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly, in trying to remove the ban placed on the entry and circulation of Bahai literature in Persia, came to an end.

Now, the point which I again wish to call to the attention of the reader is the contradictory attitude of the National Spiritual Assembly which, on the one hand, puts forward such a stupendous amount of time, energy and money to lift the ban on entry of Bahai literature in Persia, on the basis of the power of religious freedom and international communication customary in modern times; while, on the other hand, it spends a very appreciable amount of time, energy and money to place a ban on this same literature in the United States.

Can one reconcile these two diametrically opposite actions of the National Spiritual Assembly, or are its members endowed with two natures such as are amphibians, who have adapted themselves to live on land and in water, at one and the same time?

(For a detailed account of Mrs. Ransom-Kehler's trip to Iran and her effort to lift the ban on entry and circulation of Bahai literature in that country read Bahai News, No. 69, October 1932, p. 5, "Persian Government Removes Ban on entry of Bahai literature"; Bahai News, No. 80, January 1934, pp. 10-15, "The Unity of the East and West"; and Bahai Administration, pp. 109, 110.)

Relations with Society

To my mind, the major tenor of Bahai life is the process of the transmutation of authority into liberty; of tradition into freedom of thought and action; it is the ceaseless renovation of habits and customs and the incoming and outgoing of the spirit of truth to and from the heart of a Bahai. No individual or group should have dictatorial rights over other individuals or groups, and everyone should be allowed to function as a Bahai according to the dictates of his conscience.

In our striving after freedom of conscience and liberty, we have been accused by the National Spiritual Assembly of a tendency to break away from the divine government; of a destructive effort to atomize the distinctive teachings of the Cause; of planning to bring about dissolution of discipline and order. But the National Spiritual Assembly has lost sight of the important fact that a human Bahai personality must possess the moral privilege of expressing itself in thought and action, and that it is entitled, through divine right, to emancipation which in itself is the essence of discipline and the substratum of the divine order.

A moral Bahai personality has two aspects. The first is the universal aspect, which I call the religious or the spiritual, in virtue of which every Bahai ought to have complete and unchallenged right to idealistic and ethical self-expression. Here, freedom of conscience holds court with no rival; here, we enjoy liberty of thought, undivided and whole. Then, there is the individual aspect, to which I ascribe legal or state obligations. Here the individual Bahai, as a member of society, is called upon to observe the laws of the State and realize the fact that, although he is free to break any of these laws, he is at the same time liable to be haled into court and punished for his infractions.

Today, in the civilized world, there is no religious tribunal that can compel a man to appear before it on account of his so-called heresies or unbeliefs in the doctrines of the church. In the moral sphere, there is no judge to condemn a person. The religious authorities may excommunicate him, but such an act will not be legal in any state court and will simply be regarded as the decision of a group of ecclesiastical disciplinarians.

In brief, the relation subsisting between an individual Bahai and his group must be conditioned by the incontrovertible postulate that, as a moral personality, he shall have all rights to think and act spontaneously and consistently according to his own spiritual insight.

Our Standard

Abdul Baha has set up before us a very high and lofty standard. If I and my friends, as well as the members of the Bahai Administration, could live up to it, we would be distinguished by a brilliancy like unto the sun, and all misunderstandings would disappear in the twinkling of an eye. In such case, we would welcome a Bahai modernist as a sincere seeker after truth, and take to heart a Bahai traditionalist as a reverent follower of the law. We would exercise the grace of patience toward one another, for, although liberty is a great gift, charity is yet greater.

And now, let us listen to Abdul Baha as he sets up before our eyes his measure of the Bahai life:—

. . . you must conduct and deport yourselves in such a manner that you may stand out among other souls distinguished by a brilliancy like unto the sun. If any one of you enters a city, he must become the center of attraction, because of the sincerity, faithfulness, love, honesty, fidelity, truthfulness and loving-kindness of his disposition and nature toward all the inhabitants of the world, that the people of the city may all cry out: "This person is unquestionably a Bahai; for his manners, his behavior, his conduct, his morals, his nature and his disposition are of the attributes of the Bahais.

CHAPTER XV

THOUGHT-CONTROL

Independent Investigation

A fundamental law of religion and philosophy is freedom of inquiry and investigation, together with the inalienable right of each individual to express the result of his search without any external control or official supervision. Censorship as applied to the fruits of the spirit is the negation of the spirit itself. In the Baháí Cause, the obligation of free and independent research is basic and incontrovertible. Baha-O-Llah states:—

Should a servant desire to make the words, deeds and actions of other servants, learned or ignorant, the standard for knowing God and His Chosen Ones, he shall never enter the Rizwan of the Knowledge of the Lord of Might nor attain to the Fountains of the Knowledge and Wisdom of the King of Oneness; neither shall he reach the bourne of immortality nor partake of the Cup of Nearness and Good Pleasure.

In this way, the Founder of the Baháí Revelation has discounted reliance on the traditions and authorities of past and present, requiring from each student personal and rigorous application to the discovery of truth and to its enunciation. To make this individual responsibility still more binding, he declares in ringing tones:—

The Peerless Beloved says:
The Way of Freedom is opened!
Hasten ye!
The Fountain of Knowledge is gushing!
Drink ye!

—Baha-O-Llah, Bahai Scriptures, page 132.

Self-Reliance

On his visit to this country, Abdul Baha was asked: What is the greatest thing you have seen in America? and he answered: The greatest thing I have seen in America is its freedom.

—Star of the West, Vol. IV, No. 12, October 16, 1913, page 207.

In enumerating the fundamental teachings of his Father, the Master usually placed the principle of independent investigation of truth at the top of the list. He asserted that we must depend on our own reason and adhere to the outcome of our own investigation. The following quotation, which is one example chosen from hundreds of similar utterances, boldly illustrates this mighty truth:

God has given man the eye of investigation by which he may see and recognize truth. He has endowed man with ears that he may hear the message of reality and conferred upon him the gift of reason by which he may discover things for himself. This is his endowment and equipment for the investigation of reality. Man is not intended to see through the eyes of another, hear through another's ears nor comprehend with another's brain. . . . Therefore depend upon your own reason and judgment and adhere to the outcome of your own investigation; otherwise you will be utterly submerged in the sea of ignorance and deprived of all the bounties of God.

—Abdul Baha—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, page 287.

No progressive student of religion would deny the validity of the above assertions which are again to be found in Abdul Baha's remarkable sermon given on November 6, 1912, at the Universalist Church, in Washington, D. C.:—

Praise be to God! The standard of liberty is held aloft in this land. You enjoy political liberty; you enjoy liberty of thought and speech, religious liberty, racial and personal liberty. Surely this is worthy of appreciation and thanksgiving. . . . Liberalism is essential in this day; justness and equity toward all nations and people. Human attitudes must not be limited, for God is unlimited, and whosoever is the servant of the Threshold of God must likewise be free from limitations.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, page 384.

A Dramatic Change

This attitude of religious liberalism and freedom of conscience; this idealization of the liberty of thought and right of speech; this right of unrestricted individual belief came to an end with the departure of Abdul Baha from this life, in 1921. Immediately, a sudden and dramatic change of principle and policy was inaugurated, for Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahai Cause, in a letter dated March 5, 1922, created a censorship to be applied not only to all Bahai writings and books, but to all other matters as well. The right of supervision was placed in the hands of the members of the National Spiritual Assembly. Shoghi Effendi writes:—

Not only with regard to publication, but all matters without any exception whatsoever, regarding the interests of the Cause in that locality, individually or collectively, should be referred exclusively to the Spiritual Assembly in that locality, which shall decide upon it, unless it be a matter of National interest, in which case it shall be referred to the National body. With this National body also will rest the decision whether a given question is of local or national interest. . . . Large issues in such spiritual activities that affect the Cause in general in that land, such as the management of the Star of the West, and any periodical which the National Body may decide to be a Bahai Organ, the matter of publication, or reprinting Bahai literature and its distribution among the various assemblies, the means whereby the teaching campaign may be stimulated and maintained, . . . the matter of receiving Orientals and association with them, the care and maintenance of the precious film exhibiting a phase of the Master's sojourn in the United States of America as well as the original matrix and the records of His voice, and various other national spiritual activities, far from being under the exclusive jurisdiction of any local assembly or group of friends, must each be minutely and fully directed by a special board, elected by the National Body, constituted as a committee thereof, responsible to it and upon which the National Body shall exercise constant and general supervision.

—Bahai Administration, pages 23-24.

This desire to control the thoughts and actions of the Bahai community, this drive toward the centralization of authority, this creation of a board of censorship, this plan of bringing under the full jurisdiction of the National Spiritual Assembly all matters pertaining to the Bahai Cause is, to say the least, in strange and incomprehensible contrast to the broad tolerance and liberality of Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha.

Centralized Control

Just as Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha, over and over again in their writings, repeat their injunction regarding freedom of thought and liberty of speech, Shoghi Effendi misses not a single occasion to reiterate his ideas on the centralization of power in the hands of the National Spiritual Assembly.

In a subsequent letter dated March 12, 1923 (Bahai Administration, page 33), Shoghi Effendi feels that, inasmuch as the Bahai Cause is still in its infancy, all its publications need supervision. He does not realize the very evident fact that what this movement actually needs at this, its early stage, is freedom to grow and to develop its muscles, both intellectual and spiritual. It is too young and fragile to be placed under the rigid rules of disciplinarian nurses. In the same letter the Guardian refers to grave responsibilities to be assumed by the National Spiritual Assembly, namely: to exercise full authority over all local Assemblies; to direct the activities of friends; to guard vigilantly the Cause of God and control and supervise the affairs of the Movement in general. With such intensive control exercised over every department of the Residence of Mr. and Mrs. Chanler and Headquarters of

The New History Society.

Bahai Cause, the believers become mere automata, having no will of their own, no incentive and no initiative to start any original undertaking; for, they are at all times conscious that, at any moment, the heavy hand of the National Spiritual Assembly may fall upon them and destroy their labors.

The work of teaching the Cause, a bounden duty of every Bahai, is likewise placed under the authority of the National Spiritual Assembly, so that a teacher must follow, to the letter, exact and rigid prescriptions. He has no liberty of action, no leeway to express his own convictions. Always, he must accommodate himself to the regulations of the Teaching Committee. Shoghi Effendi states that authority must be centralized in the National Spiritual Assembly and power concentrated in the various local Assemblies. He seems to differentiate between authority and power. This definition may bewilder the uninitiated, but I feel sure that those who enjoy these prerogatives know the exact groove in which they fit.

In another letter dated April 9, 1923 (Bahai Administration, page 40), all publications must fall under the exclusive control of the National Spiritual Assembly. However, it seems that this control is not enough: a special committee shall minutely guide and judiciously scrutinize all information.

What a system! Apparently we are a lot of wayward children. Every word, spoken or written, must be scrutinized; every action must be controlled. We are, indeed, according to these extraordinary orders, as dead men in the hands of an undertaker. Why, in heaven's name, become Bahais? What benefits do we receive from this spiritual totalitarianism? Even the helots of Greece, the galley slaves of Rome, the serfs of the Middle Ages and the bondsmen of the Southern States had more freedom than have the Bahais who thus submit themselves to such parasitical dependency!

Censorship

The strict injunctions laid down by Shoghi Effendi in his letters, naturally, led the National Spiritual Assembly to create a Reviewing Committee. This Reviewing Committee or Board of Censorship is patterned on the church authorities of the Middle Ages whose function it was to suppress the expression of free thought. In spite of the fact that there were no official censors before the age of printing, the informal beginnings of the practice did exist among the ancients. Methods were rough and ready in those days. Socrates was condemned for blasphemy and for corrupting the morals of youth; so the cup of hemlock brought him to speedy account. In the Middle Ages, writers were chiefly ecclesiastics. When printing quickened the flow of books and growing culture widened the circle of authors, clerical influence arose to demand censorship in order to protect the tenets of the Church.

This clamor for the control of thought created the Catholic Index Librorum Prohibitorum—an institution and a body of rules for the proscription of pernicious literature. The Index, like the Reviewing Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly, constituted a positive ecclesiastical ordinance, based on the false assumption that free thought was dangerous.

As far back as the first centuries of Christianity, when ecclesiastical authority was still in its infancy, the apocryphal writings and certain other books were consigned to the flames.

Toward the close of the 15th century, the University of Cologne passed a measure which finally became the Imprimatur or preliminary censorship of books; it prescribed the examination of books before printing. The manuscripts which survived this ordeal carried the Imprimatur of the Board of Censors.

In similar manner the National Spiritual Assembly, in its legal action brought against me, had requested the Court to prevent my using the name Bahai, in connection with any publication, which teaches or purports to teach any Bahai religion, faith, cause, movement, system of thought or way of living; unless said publication shall be submitted to and approved by the Reviewing Committee of the plaintiff trustees or their successors, and there shall be printed on the title page the notice: "Approved by the Reviewing Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada."

Roman Catholic Imprimatur

About 1501 A. D., Pope Alexander VI forbade the printers of the dioceses of Cologne, Mainz, Trèves and Magdeburg, on pain of excommunication and fine, to print any book whatsoever without permission from the bishop. The prohibition of books, specified by name, began in 1520 through the bull of Leo X which condemned all the writings of Luther. In 1624, Clement VII ordered excommunication as the penalty for the reading of books which the Church considered heretical. This order remains unchanged to the present day. Likewise, even now it is necessary to have permission to print the Imprimatur of the Bishop on all books applying to religion or sciences. Excommunication is incurred by those who wittingly without permission read, keep, print or defend any books written by those whom the Church has designated as apostates and heretics, or the books directly condemned by the Pope. Excommunication is the penalty also for those who, without permission, print or cause to be printed the books of the Holy Scriptures or annotations or commentaries thereon. Thus were the laws of censorship created by the Church to suppress free expression of thought.

Now, I maintain that these were criminal acts committed against reason and spirit. If in any realm more than any other we need freedom, it is in the domain of religion. History has shown us that censorship may deprive a nation of its best leadings and inspirations.

Again, I assert that no man or body of men is wise enough or tolerant enough to be entrusted with power controlling the expression of thought, either in the Catholic Church or outside of it. The right of free speech and free press is the most precious possession of man, and there is no authority on the face of the earth which has the right to withhold it.

Bahai Imprimatur

Let us now turn our attention to the rules of Bahai Procedure as set forth by the National Spiritual Assembly for the guidance of its so-called Reviewing Committee.

In Bahai Procedure, Section 2, Sheet 25, we find an article entitled Review and Publication of Bahai Litera- ture by Local Assemblies. This article contains the result of the discussion on the subject of Bahai Publications by the National Spiritual Assembly.

The National Spiritual Assembly considers itself very liberal in not including in the list of publications, programs and bulletins printed by Local Assemblies. The Procedure continues:—

What the National Spiritual Assembly had in mind in adopting a general policy was the more formal publications represented by pamphlets and books. . . . The Guardian's instructions in Bahai Administration make it clear that all Bahai literature of a general character, that is aside from programs and bulletins, are to be reviewed by a Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly. This makes it evident that, as far as the review function is concerned, a Local Spiritual Assembly (apart from local teaching and publicity work) is subject to the general jurisdiction of the National Spiritual Assembly.

Another privilege given to a Local Spiritual Assembly is that it can publish a pamphlet (such as excerpts from the recognized writings) already approved by the Reviewing Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly. However, such a pamphlet must be distributed free of charge, for publishing Bahai literature for sale is vested solely in the Publishing Committee appointed by the National Spiritual Assembly. The article concludes by again generously allowing Local Spiritual Assemblies to print their programs without submitting them to the Reviewing Committee. Thus:—

Aside from evidently local matters, like programs, a Local Spiritual Assembly has no right of review or publication of Bahai literature, except in the one case that it may issue, as free literature, printed leaflets and pamphlets, containing material already in its entirety approved by the National Reviewing Committee and subsequently confirmed by action of the National Spiritual Assembly.

On Sheet 26 of Bahai Procedure, Section II, no Bahai is allowed to deliver a radio broadcast unless it is approved by the Local Assembly before delivery.

On Sheet 16 of Bahai Procedure, Section I, all literature, charts and other material used in Bahai teaching should be confined to that which has been approved by the Reviewing Committee or has the recorded sanction of the National Spiritual Assembly.

On Sheets 20-21 of Bahai Procedure, Section I, a compilation from the writings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha is subject to review by the Reviewing Committee in the same manner as are other Bahai works. The compiler should not conclude any arrangement with a non-Bahai publisher until the compilation has been officially approved, and if the compiler intends to print the compilation outside the Cause, the proposed arrangement is to be submitted to the National Spiritual Assembly through its Publishing Committee for approval. Over and above all these restrictions, the National Spiritual Assembly requests the compiler to assign to the Bahai Publishing Committee any copyright taken out on the publication of the book or pamphlet.

Having placed all kinds of iron fences around the Kingdom of Bahai thought, closing the Way of Freedom that

Baha-O-Llah had opened and sealing the Fountain of Knowledge which was intended to flood the earth with its salubrious waters, the legislator of the Reviewing Committee solemnly affirms:—

The purpose of this statement is to assure proper protection of the interests of the Bahai Faith, while providing sufficient freedom of action to individual believers under all circumstances.

Royal Largesse

In reading the above statement one cannot help wondering what are the particular interests of the Bahai Faith which need proper protection!

Does God and His Truth stand in need of the protecting arm of the National Spiritual Assembly? Can the creature indeed protect the Creator? Or, is it the people who are to be protected from contamination through the Love of God; and are we to combine in a union to bar the common run of humanity from access to the life-giving words of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha?

Yet, in regard to the clause which provides sufficient freedom to individual believers, probably, it is appropriate to offer a vote of thanks to the National Spiritual Assembly for this largesse on their part, so royally meted out. Sufficient freedom? Of course! It is a superfluity, even beyond our deserts. Why should we be grasping? As intellectual and spiritual bondsmen to the National Spiritual Assembly, we must accept our lowly station, and in all obsequiousness stoop to pick up the crumbs that fall from the table of our Administrative masters! Who are we, and what are we that we should dare to even think of more freedom? The members of the National Spiritual Assembly are all-wise, and they say that it is sufficient. So, sufficient it is and sufficient it must be! We should ask no questions. As model slaves, it is fitting that we obliterate ourselves before our superiors. We should pray that we be characterized with the qualities of meekness, deference, compliance and subserviency. We should, in all humility, present our allegiance to these shepherds who have assembled us under the overhanging rock of their salvation and who, in solicitude for us, have set aside appropriate and sufficient pasture-land, wherein we may graze and offer them our thanksgiving at dawn and at sunset.

A Divine Legacy

Just the same, there are some who cannot blot out the memory of the Bahai Cause as it was taught once upon a time and who, in spite of prevailing conditions, yet hold to the teachings of Baha-O-Llah and the universal expositions of them as dispensed by Abdul Baha. Man's reason contains a truth which has existed since the dawn of human history; his spirit is enveloped with a light which was enkindled by God at the very foundation of creation. This is no other than a divine legacy reserved for us by the Maker of the Universe. The Prophets appeared upon the earth to remind us of these preternatural truths, which so consistently have been defaced by spiritual charlatans and perverted by superstitious organizations. In our own times, Baha-O-Llah came to restore these lost truths through the free exercise of rational and celestial faculties; and now, while powerful influences, actually within the established Faiths, have arisen to assist mankind in this process of emancipation, the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, pitifully claiming to represent the foremost liberal element in religion, has formed another set of dogmas wherewith to throttle free thought and subvert the essential liberty of human expression in all its diversified manifestations. Censorship, in the social domain, is an outmoded tyranny; in the spiritual realm, it is unwholesome and impracticable. Censorship is not wanted anywhere, especially in the Bahai Cause; and if we allow it to retain the upper hand in the great movement that has been entrusted to us, we will set ourselves up before the world and in the face of history as false trustees, and as men and women unworthy and unfit to call ourselves Bahais.

We could not voice our vehement protest against the Reviewing Committee of the National Spiritual Assembly better than by quoting the words of Milton, who himself revolted against church censorship when serious objection was raised to parts of Paradise Lost. In his Areopagitica, a classic on tolerance of speech and thought, he said:—

Should ye set an oligarchy . . . over it (the Press) to bring a famine upon our minds again, we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel. When God shakes a Kingdom with strong and healthful commotions to a general reforming, it is not untrue that many sectaries and false teachers are then busiest in seducing; but yet more true it is that God then raises to His own work men of rare abilities, and more than common industry, not only to look back and revise what hath been taught heretofore, but to gain further and go on some new enlightened steps in the discovery of truth. He relies on the survival of the fittest in this sphere. . . . Let her (Truth) and Falsehood grapple: whoever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?

The Emergence of a New Race

In this summer of 1941, a meeting without parallel in sheer dramatic worth took place between the Prime Minister of England and the President of the United States. On a sea, alive with danger and under ominous skies, these two great personalities came face to face and drafted a Charter for the emancipation of the peoples of all nations. The Churchill-Roosevelt Eight Points, fruit of this dangerous excursion, stand as testimony to the awakened conscience of the leaders of the Anglo-Saxon race; and when, in his report to Congress on the meeting at sea, made on August 21st, 1941, Mr. Roosevelt added two more points, which he said were necessarily included, the Atlantic Charter was rounded out to full value. These two points, in the language of the President, read as follows:—

It is also unnecessary for me to point out that the declaration of principles includes of necessity the world need for freedom of religion and freedom of information. No society of the world organized under the announced principles could survive without these freedoms which are a part of the whole freedom for which we strive.

On the same day, the President sent a message to the National Convention of Young Democrats, meeting in Louisville, Kentucky, which was delivered to delegates from 48 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. In it, Mr. Roosevelt has this to say about the preservation of utmost freedom:—

I would be the last person to dispute or limit the right of every citizen to have his own opinion and express it, and I know you are with me as to the preservation of that utmost freedom.

This ideal of utmost freedom has been set forth by H. G. Wells in very concise terms. In his Declaration of the Rights of Man, he says:

Every man has a right to the utmost freedom of expression, discussion, association and worship.

—The Rotarian Magazine, September, 1941, page 9.

The leaders of the Bahai Administration in America have for years been carrying on an ideological flirtation with the totalitarian religious systems of the past, copying their methods and procedures, and manifesting the while a pride and satisfaction as if they had discovered an entirely new system. Nevertheless, the incomparable worth of Baha-O-Llah's genius lies in the fact that he has constructed for the children of this generation a spiritual fortress which shall protect the rights of man against the encroachment of all religious dictators, whether in the Bahai Administration or outside of it.

As Bahais, it is our duty to stand firm by the principles of the Cause; as citizens of a New World Order, we must proclaim the essential rights of men. New advocates of human dignity are raising their voices in every quarter of the globe; new champions of a United Humanity are waging war against blind and selfish interests. The ideals of a new civilization are being hammered on the anvil of high striving and bitter experience, and at last we behold the emergence of the New World, which can be effected only by the sons and daughters of an emancipated race.

PSYCHOSES

16. Fear

And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

CHAPTER XVI

FEAR

The Secret of Fearlessness

There is no fear in Bahai Philosophy. Its basic principles are the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. There are no secret doctrines in the Bahai Teaching. The chief premise of the Cause is association and collaboration among men and women of all races and all religions. It does not recognize any enemy, for it does not wage physical, intellectual or spiritual warfare against the children of God who are encircled by the hounties of a Merciful Father.

Fear—a persistent, all-pervading influence—poisoning mind and character, has no place in the Bahai vocabulary. Fear, a morbid enslavement, a paralysis of will and effort in anticipation of some actual or remote contingency, does not affect the Bahai attitude. A Bahai is not plagued with a fear-consciousness nor with a fear-complex; he does not allow his life to be guided by fear-impulse or fear-reaction. Not recognizing the existence of enmity, he does not harbor hatred toward any living creature; his life is an exemplification of love and affection for all mankind. Baha-O-Llah teaches his followers to overcome fear. He says:—

There is today a science which can eradicate fear. It must be taught from the earliest period of childhood and if it becomes popular, the very nature of man will be changed; for that which decreases fear increases courage. —Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, pages 25-26.

Abdul Baha had mastered the secret of fear-control; and this he demonstrated in his daily relations with his fellowmen. It consisted of the simple and yet mysterious lesson of non-recognition of enmity between souls and the inculcation of the ideal of friendship.

In order to impress this lesson on our minds he on one occasion declared:—

Baha-O-Llah has clearly said in his Tablets that if you have an enemy, consider him not as an enemy. Do not simply be long-suffering, nay rather, love him. Your treatment of him should be that which is becoming to lovers. Do not even say that he is your enemy. Do not see any enemies. Though he be your murderer, see no enemy. Look upon him with the eye of friendship. Be mindful that you do not consider him as an enemy and simply tolerate him, for that is but stratagem and hypocrisy. To consider a man your enemy and love him is hypocrisy. This is not becoming of any soul. You must behold him as a friend. You must treat him well. That is right.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol II, pages 261-262.

Baha-O-Llah, the Wise Physician, knew that more than often the spark of enmity and alienation is ignited through religious controversy and altercation; therefore, he exhorted his followers to discourse with the people in the language of love and affection.

He says:—

Oh people of Baha! Consort with all men with joy and fragrance. If you possess a word or principle, of which another is deprived, reveal and communicate it in the language of love and affection; if it is accepted and produces its effect, the end is obtained; if not, rather than torment your friend, leave him to himself and pray for him.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 12.

Again, he says:—

In the book of God, the Mighty, the Glorious, you are forbidden to dispute and to contend with one another. Cultivate that which will benefit you and the peoples of the earth likewise.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, pages 19-20.

Bahai Comradeship.

On December 2, 1912, three days before his departure from the United States, Abdul Baha, after a journey of nine months athwart this country, delivered a farewell address at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Edward J. Kinney in New York. In this talk he epitomized his ideal of non-recognition of enmity in the Bahai Cause and elucidated this important topic in such a clear and comprehensive manner that his words should serve as a manual of instruction for all time to come. They were as follows:—

These are the days of my farewell to you for I am sailing on the fifth of the month. . . . I must therefore give you my instructions and exhortations today, and these are none other than the teachings of Baha-U-Llah.

You must manifest complete love and affection toward all mankind. Do not exalt yourselves above others but consider all as your equals, recognizing them as the servants of one God. Know that God is compassionate toward all; therefore love all from the depths of your hearts, prefer all religionists before yourselves, be filled with love for every race and be kind toward the people of all nationalities. Never speak disparagingly of others but praise without distinction. Pollute not your tongues by speaking evil of another. Recognize your enemies as friends and consider those who wish you evil as the wishers of good. You must not see evil as evil and then compromise with your opinion, for to treat in a smooth, kindly way one whom you consider evil or an enemy, is hypocrisy and this is not worthy or allowable. You must consider your enemies as your friends, look upon your evil-wishers as your well-wishers and treat them accordingly. Act in such a way that your heart may be free from hatred. Let not your heart be offended with anyone. If some one commits an error and wrong toward you, you must instantly forgive him. Do not complain of others. Refrain from reprimanding them, and if you wish to give admonition or advice, let it be offered in such a way that it will not burden the bearer. Turn all your thoughts toward bringing joy to hearts. Beware! Beware! lest ye offend any heart. Assist the world of humanity as much as possible. Be the source of consolation to every sad one, assist every weak one, be helpful to every indigent one, care for every sick one, be the cause of glorification to every lowly one and shelter those who are overshadowed by fear.

In brief, let each one of you be as a lamp shining forth with the light of the virtues of the world of humanity. Be trustworthy, sincere, affectionate and replete with chastity. Be illumined, be spiritual, be divine, be glorious, be quickened of God, be a Baha'i.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, pages 448-449.

A Dangerous Doctrine

In considering the problem of fear, let us for a while study the writings of Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause, and see how he handles this vital subject. We will do this because the issue is one which cannot be ignored in this study of the present-day Bahai Movement.

The three published volumes of Shoghi Effendi are Baha'i Administration, The World Order of Baha'u'llah and The Advent of Divine Justice, which works consist of the letters which he has addressed to the National Spiritual Assembly in the course of the last 20 years. Now, I have read these three books and find that the words enemies and adversaries are greatly featured. Baha-O-Llah has said: Consort with all men with joy and fragrance, yet Shoghi Effendi, in his very first letter, dated January 21, 1922, written after his assumption of the guardianship, recommends the absolute shunning of whomsoever we feel to be an enemy of the Cause. (Bahai Administration, page 16.)

Now, I cannot bring myself to the point of believing that absolute shunning of whomsoever we feel to be the enemy of the Cause is a principle of Baha-O-Llah. Is every one going to let his feelings guide him in the matter? Can we not take for granted that frail human beings as we are, a great deal of personal caprice and spite may enter into our calculations as to who is the enemy of the Bahai Cause? This is a very dangerous doctrine, and yet one finds it in different forms throughout Shoghi Effendi's communications. He practically never mentions the names of the enemies or adversaries to whom he constantly refers. He simply creates ogres and bogey men, and fills the hearts of the Bahais with apprehension and fear. In this way, the fountain-head of free and open comradeship is dried up and the flowers of loving-kindness wither away.

Abdul Baha makes this point very plain when he says:—

Even as avoiding and shunning the company of people and being harsh with them are the sure means of filling them with fear, so are love, kindness, humility and gentleness the truest method of binding people's souls and attracting their hearts.

—The Mysterious Forces of Civilization, page 62.

Here, let us recall that Baha-O-Llah in the Tablet of the World states that in this Revelation brutal manners are changed into spiritual qualities; also that the four great barriers which kept the people of the world separate have been demolished by the Grace and Authority of the Word of God; one of the barriers referred to was shunning other nations. (Tablets of Baha'U'llah, page 31.)

Let us consider: Is not the so-called enemy, whom Shoghi Effendi commands us to shun absolutely, part and parcel of other nations, the same which Baha-O-Llah orders us not to shun?

I am not going to dwell on the troublous impression which these sections of Shoghi Effendi's letters have made on me, but will simply submit a few of them and leave it to the reader to judge whether or not I exaggerate.

To the attitude of goodwill, of forbearance and genuine kindness to all, must be added, however, constant but unprovocative vigilance, lest unrestricted association with the peoples of the world should enable the very few who have been definitely pronounced by the Master as injurious to the body of the Cause, to make a breach in the Movement. Not until, however, an unmistakable evidence should appear, manifestly revealing the evil motives of a certain individual or group of individuals, is it advisable to make the matter public. . . . In order, however, to insure fair and quick and vigorous action whenever such an evil activity is revealed and has been carefully ascertained, the best and only means would appear to be, for the careful observer, once he is assured of such an evil action, and has grown hopeless of the attitude of kindness and forbearance, to report it quietly to the Spiritual Assembly representative of the friends in that locality and submit the case to their earnest and full consideration. Should the majority of the members of that Assembly be conscientiously convinced of the case—and this being a national issue affecting the body of the friends in America—it should, only through the intermediary of that Assembly, be cautiously communicated to that greater body representing all the Assemblies in America, which will in its turn obtain all the available data from the local Assembly in question, study carefully the situation and reserve for itself the ultimate decision. It may, if it decides so, refer it to the Holy Land for further consideration and consultation.

—March 5, 1922, Baha'i Administration, pages 18-19.

This servant, after that grievous event and great calamity, the ascension of His Holiness Abdul Baha to the Abha Kingdom, has been so stricken with grief and pain and so entangled in the troubles (created) by the enemies of the Cause of God, that I consider that my presence here, at such a time and in such an atmosphere is not in accordance with the fulfilment of my important and sacred duties.

Acca, Palestine, Baha-O-Llah's final place of exile. From behind the walls of this "Most Great Prison", he wrote his immortal epistles to the kings and rulers of the world.

—May, 1922, Baha'i Administration, page 25.

The work of the noble Edifice that the mighty hands of the All-Wise Master has reared in this world can suffer no delay, nor can its foundations be made to totter, whatever the apparent obstacles its enemies in their impotent wrath and despair may throw in its way. We need not wait too long, for already from various quarters there comes the news that the awful promises of Abdul Baha regarding the Covenant-breakers have been strikingly fulfilled. But it behooves us not to dwell for a moment on these doomed and darkened efforts.

—December 16, 1922, Baha'i Administration, page 26.

From the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, the unnumbered servants of Baha-U-Llah, disdainful of the evil machinations of the enemies of His Cause, the breakers of His behests, have rallied to His Standard, and risen with one accord to carry on the great work He has entrusted to their charge.

—March 12, 1923, Baha'i Administration, page 29.

It is incumbent upon them to be vigilant and cautious, discreet and watchful, and protect at all times the Temple of the Cause from the dart of the mischief-maker and the onslaught of the enemy.

—March 12, 1923, Baha'i Administration, page 33.

The flames of sedition, so maliciously kindled in the past by those who have dared to flout His Will, are gone out forever, and the fondest hopes of these evil plotters are now abandoned, doomed never to revive. . . . And now, with the Cause purified and inwardly victorious, its principles vindicated, its enemies silenced and sunk in unspeakable misery, may we not, henceforth, direct all our efforts to collective action and constructive achievement, and in utter disregard of the flickerings of their fast-fading light, arise to carry out those urgent measures that will secure the outward and complete triumph of the Cause.

—November 14, 1923, Baha'i Administration, pages 44-45.

Who can question that His loved ones, both in the East and the West, notwithstanding the insidious strivings of the enemies of the Cause, have displayed a spirit of unshakable loyalty worthy of the highest praise?

—November 24, 1924, Baha'i Administration, page 59.

These challenging criticisms, whether or not dictated by malice, cannot but serve to galvanize the souls of its ardent supporters and to consolidate the ranks of its faithful promoters. They will purge the Faith from those pernicious elements whose continued association with the believers tends to discredit the fair name of the Cause, and to tarnish the purity of its spirit. We should welcome, therefore, not only the open attacks which its avowed enemies persistently launch against it, but should also view as a blessing in disguise every storm of mischief with which they who apostatize their faith or claim to be its faithful exponents assail it from time to time. Instead of undermining the Faith, such assaults, both from within and from without, reinforce its foundations and excite the intensity of its flame.

—March 21, 1930, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, page 15.

Let him (an upholder of the Cause) be aware that so soon as the full measure of the stupendous claim of the Faith of Baha'U'Llah comes to be recognized by those time-honored and powerful strongholds of orthodoxy, whose deliberate aim is to maintain their stranglehold over the thoughts and consciences of men, this infant Faith will have to contend with enemies more powerful and more insidious than the cruelest torture-mongers and the most fanatical clerics who have afflicted it in the past.

—March 21, 1930, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, page 17.

Many and powerful have been its enemies who, as soon as they discovered the evidences of the growing ascendancy of its declared supporters, have vied with one another in hurling at its face the vilest imputations and in pouring out upon the Object of its devotion the vials of their fiercest wrath.

—April 21, 1933, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, page 72.

In the prosecution of their task neither the whisperings of the treacherous nor the virulent attacks of their avowed enemies were allowed to deflect them from their high purpose or to undermine their faith in the sublimity of their calling.

The agitation provoked by him who in his incessant and sordid pursuit of earthly riches would have, but for Abdul Baha's warning, sullied the fair name of their Faith, had left them in the main undisturbed. Schooled by tribulation and secure within the stronghold of their fast evolving institutions they scorned his insinuations and by their unswerving loyalty were able to shatter his hopes. They refused to allow any consideration of the admitted prestige and past services of his father and of his associates to weaken their determination to ignore entirely the person whom Abdul Baha had so emphatically condemned.

The veiled attacks with which a handful of deluded enthusiasts subsequently sought in the pages of their periodical to check the growth and blight the prospects of an infant Administration had likewise failed to achieve their purpose.

The attitude which a besotted woman later on assumed, her ludicrous assertions, her boldness in flouting the Will of Abdul Baha and in challenging its authenticity and her attempts to subvert its principles were again powerless to produce the slightest breach in the ranks of its valiant upholders.

The treacherous schemes which the ambition of a perfidious and still more recent enemy has devised and through which he is still striving to deface Abdul Baha's noble handiwork and corrupt its administrative principles are being once more completely frustrated.

These intermittent and abortive attempts on the part of its assailants to force the surrender of the newly built stronghold of the Faith its defenders have from the very beginning utterly disdained. No matter how fierce the assaults of the enemy or skillful his stratagem they have refused to yield one jot or one tittle of their cherished convictions.

His insinuations and clamor they have consistently ignored. The motives which animated his actions, the methods he steadily pursued, the precarious privileges he seemed momentarily to enjoy they could not but despise.

Thriving for a time through the devices which their scheming minds had conceived and supported by the ephemeral advantages which fame, ability or fortune can confer, these notorious exponents of corruption and heresy have succeeded in protruding for a time their ugly features, only to sink, as rapidly as they had risen, into the mire of an ignominious end.

—April 21, 1933, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, pages 89-90.

These verities, if valiantly upheld and properly assimilated, will, I am convinced, powerfully reinforce the vigor of our spiritual life and greatly assist in counteracting the machinations of an implacable and vigilant enemy.

—1933, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, pages 99-100.

Numerous and powerful have been the forces that have schemed, both from within and from without, in lands both far and near, to quench its light and abolish its holy name. Some have apostatized from its principles and betrayed ignominiously its cause. Others have hurled against it the fiercest anathemas which the embittered leaders of any ecclesiastical institution are able to pronounce. Still others have heaped upon it the afflictions and humiliations which sovereign authority can alone, in the plenitude of its power, inflict.

The utmost its avowed and secret enemies could hope to achieve was to retard its growth and obscure momentarily its purpose. What they actually accomplished was to purge and purify its life, to stir it to still greater depths, to galvanize its soul, to prune its institutions, and cement its unity. A schism, a permanent cleavage in the vast body of its adherents, they could never create.

They who betrayed its cause, its lukewarm and faint-hearted supporters, withered away and dropped as dead leaves, powerless to cloud its radiance or to imperil its structure. Its most implacable adversaries, they who assailed it from without, were hurled from power, and, in the most astonishing fashion, met their doom.

—March 11, 1936, The World Order of Baha'U'Llah, pages 195-196.

Though the enemies which every acceleration in the progress of your mission must raise up be fierce, numerous, and unrelenting, yet the invisible Hosts which, if you persevere, must, as promised, rush forth to your aid, will, in the end, enable you to vanquish their hopes and annihilate their forces.

—Dec. 25, 1938, The Advent of Divine Justice, page 13.

Fear Complex

Through the publication and wide distribution of these instructions, the National Spiritual Assembly and its followers have come down with an acute attack of ecclesiastical goose-flesh and much energy is spent in locating these enemies and in unearthing their plots. Gossip becomes fact, and facts assume distorted proportions. Consequently, a chain of correspondence is established among the various Spiritual Assemblies, the object of which is to hunt down the enemies and expose them. Meanwhile, hatred is engendered and the spirit of tolerance, mercy and forgiveness is trampled underfoot.

Baha'i News, organ of the National Spiritual Assembly published month by month For Baha'is Only, communicates these sacred fears to all the Bahai Communities throughout the world. Here is one example:—

. . . Indeed contact with the different centers in Europe has proven beyond question the great need for the protection of the friends from the nefarious operations of those whom the Guardian and the National Spiritual Assembly have found to be disturbers of peace and disseminators of evil. Firmness and courage are required to deal with these situations so that they may be removed from any vestige of personal animus, and only emphasize the direct and positive laws of administration in the most dignified and helpful way. Had such wise methods been employed earlier, much of the confusion which it has taken nearly two years to undo might have been avoided. We are only beginning to glimpse the beauty and perfection of the system which must ultimately become the perfectly functioning medium for circulating general information.

—Bahai News, No. 62, page 14, May, 1932.

I am sure that Heinrich Himmler would describe the beauty and perfection of his own system of Gestapo in much the same manner.

The Years Have Brought Safety

In recalling the events which, since its inception, have taken place in the Cause, one cannot ignore the fact that enemies have played no small part in the history of the movement. The early Babis and Bahais were forced to contend with overwhelming odds, and thousands of them suffered martyrdom. Baha-O-Llah himself met with opposition, not only from without but from within, and to such a point that his very life was attempted by a blood-relative, with the result that he carried with him physical injury throughout his existence on this earth. Abdul Baha, for forty years a captive in Palestine, was under constant surveillance and at the mercy of traitors and spies. He was forced to recognize the existence of enemies and to take steps to protect the Cause from their plots, both open and secret. But, Shoghi Effendi has never been a prisoner. The rule of Nasiru'd Din Shah and of Sultan Abdul Hamid, under which the Cause quivered for so long a time, has, in Persia and Turkey, been replaced by progressive governments; while Palestine, the headquarters of the movement, enjoys the beneficent protectorship of England. The lives of the Bahais are safe, so is their property; and, if once in a while a Christian missionary writes an argument against the Bahai Faith, or, if a Bahai author sends a book to press without the sanction of the authorized publishing committee, or again, if a Bahai with an unassailable record chooses to associate with an old friend, the orders of the Assemblies notwithstanding, these actions do not constitute such danger to the Cause that the tenor of the Guardian's recommendations to his followers need be colored thereby. No! The risks in these days are very mild, to say the least, and it seems unnecessary to apply to them the terminology that might have been appropriate in former years.

What if Abdul Baha found it necessary, after long persecution, to read out of the Cause some individuals whom his infinite patience and loving-kindness could not placate! What if, in contemplating a House of Justice to be established in the distant future, he envisioned the possibility of the expulsion of recalcitrant members! Shall then an order of priests make of these facts a precedent, so that, henceforth and forever after, it shall feel at liberty to hold aloft the weapon of excommunication? No! I think that the least we can allow the Master is all sanction regarding what he did and what he did not do, and that our duty is to concern ourselves with his teachings and to practice them.

I had so much hoped that Shoghi Effendi, assuming leadership as he did at a time when all danger had passed, would have seen fit to discard and eliminate the fear-complex which has left so deep a mark on the Bahai mentality. With his training at the Universities of Beirut, Syria, and Cambridge, England, it would have seemed appropriate, and we had every reason to expect, that the hang-over of dread, resultant from an anguished past, would have been forcibly lifted from the minds of the Bahais the world over. And in regard to these United States, the Bahai citizens of which have always been afforded every right and privilege, what a pity it is to transplant from overseas, and graft on their consciousness, this seed of fear with its abundant and destructive harvest! Times have changed, no dagger is brandished before the Bahais; then why should they load their bodies and consume their strength with the weighty links of the medieval mailed shirt?

The Test of a Bahai

A recently received communication from the Guardian on the subject of enemies brings up, among other points, one which I consider to be most important. It is in reference to the Master's Will and Testament.

In the Bahai writings, we have a vast body of incomparable teachings which include universal principles for the regeneration of mankind; we also have the Will of Abdul Baha. Naturally, this latter document has its place in Bahai literature, and an important one; but, look at it as you will, it is only part of the great whole.

Now, the Bahai Administration has seen fit to feature the Will above and beyond everything that has been written and spoken by the Founders of the Cause. It is ever accentuated in publications, ever driven in upon the minds of the people with unremitting intensity. Nothing else matters; only the Will, the Will, the Will! The word has, by this time, been seared into the consciousness of the Bahais. It, and it alone, is the Cause.

Why so? Simply, for the reason that, in his Will, Abdul Baha made it incumbent upon his followers to render absolute obedience to the Guardian. The Master had his reasons for doing this: he trusted Shoghi Effendi to carry out his teachings, and he wished, at all hazards, to prevent a split in the movement. This is very clear; and, certainly, a foremost wish in the mind of every Bahai would be to adhere to the Master's instructions. For many years this was my own ardent wish; for, naturally, I have never doubted the authenticity of Abdul Baha's Will.

Yet, after all, the Will is not the Cause in toto; there are other injunctions, other teachings. We cannot forget the glorious Bahai education that has been made available to us, in order to cling desperately to this one point. The National Spiritual Assembly has its reasons for so bringing forward the Will. The Will says: Obey the Guardian! and the Guardian says: Obey the National Assembly! Therefore, the Will constitutes a sceptre of authority, a sceptre which, but too often, bears the aspect of a whip.

Unfortunately, it is not the National Spiritual Assembly alone which bears unflagging testimony to this feature in the Master's Will, for the Guardian himself gives to it supreme and unparalleled importance; and, as things stand today, an obedience to Shoghi Effendi, so abject as to entail all personal dignity, has become the test of a Bahai. Nothing else matters; nothing else is ever dwelt upon.

Abdul Baha said: If a man has ten good qualities and one bad one, look at the ten and forget the one; and if a man has ten bad qualities and one good one, look at the one, and forget the ten; yet, the Bahai authorities say: If a man has ten Bahai qualities and does not recognize the Guardian as the arbiter of his conscience, think only of this last failing and forget all the other qualities.

Now, I am not possessed of the courtier-psychology; I did not have it when I served the Master, and he did not exact it of me. He wanted us to be upright, sincere and self-reliant, and I have patterned myself on his conception of a man. I frankly admit, at this juncture, that there is nothing in my bearing of the Uriah Heep, and that I have small respect for that perennial type, so deftly portrayed by Charles Dickens.

Following is Shoghi Effendi's letter, written by his secretary, to which I have just referred:—

The material sent to him regarding the legal action taken against the New History Society, as well as copies of their monthly publication, have been received and the Guardian feels that Ahmad Sohrab is increasingly revealing his latent opposition to the spirit as well as the letter of the Master's Will and Testament. His references to excommunication flatly contradict the Master's own actions and attitude, of which he is personally fully aware, and are irreconcilable with some of the most emphatic and unmistakable injunctions of 'Abdu'l-Baha in His Will and Testament. His increasingly bold criticisms of the action taken by the Guardian amounts to a repudiation of the authority of the Guardianship, and is thus an open and flagrant violation of the Will establishing that authority. In fact the more he writes and the more he gives vent to his true feelings, and discloses his real attitude to what 'Abdu'l-Baha has regarded as absolutely essential to the unity, the integrity and protection of the Faith, the more will he clearly demonstrate his disloyalty to the Master whom he professes to uphold and defend. He is no doubt the most subtle, resourceful and indefatigable enemy the Faith has had in America, and the retribution he will in the end suffer will be correspondingly grievous and devastating. Every effort should be made by your Assembly to protect the new believers from the poison which he is trying to instill into their minds and souls, and to reinforce their confidence in his ultimate downfall and complete obliteration.

—Excerpts From Letter From the Guardian in Bahai News, No. 145, July 1941.

In the above description of myself, I am rather flattered at the word subtle, for it is a characteristic that I never thought I possessed. There is so much that I think and feel, now that the flood-gates of discussion have been opened, that I can do no more than explain and act upon my innermost convictions. However, I consider the adjectives resourceful and indefatigable as well chosen, for I have been trained by the most resourceful of all teachers and the most indefatigable of all leaders. Was I not, during eight years, a witness to the Master's unflagging enthusiasm, undeviating tenacity and world-shaking energy! He expected me to imitate these qualities in him, and I expected this course of action of myself.

In regard to being an enemy of the Faith, to this I definitely make objection; nor do I allow this statement to pass without making flat denial. If the upholding of the freedom of the Cause, is enmity to the Cause; if the teaching of the Bahai principles, is instilling poison into the minds of the hearers, then I assert, and without reserve, that Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha were enemies of the Cause, par excellence, and that their words were the essence of poison upon poison.

Finally, I note that the National Spiritual Assembly should exert every effort to reinforce the confidence of the Bahais in my ultimate downfall and complete obliteration. Here we have entered the realm of prophecy. It would seem that the people should be left free to believe in certain prophecies, or to ignore them, or to disbelieve in them, according to their choice and aptitudes; and I do question the advisability of taking steps to induce the Bahais to accept forecasts of the future, especially when these forecasts apply to the obliteration of any soul. Such efforts are not conducive to the healthy development of a community; they simply bring to mind the dark practices of the past, when so-called sorcerers applied themselves to inserting pins into the waxen bodies of dolls shaped to portray their enemies. This did not do any harm to the bodies and souls of the alleged enemies, but I believe that it did a lot of harm to the bodies and souls of those who inserted the pins.

Oriental Exclusion Act

In a letter dated June 8, 1919, written during the lifetime of Abdul Baha, Shoghi Effendi, after giving a glowing account of the Mashriqu'l Azkar at Ishkabad, Russia, as described by a pilgrim, mentions the Master's instructions regarding fellowship and association. The following is an extract from this early communication:—

When Abdul Baha inquired the condition and the association of the friends, it was intimated that, unlike the days gone by, the friends are intimately associating with all the people of every shade and opinion, of every sect and social standing. He said:— “Such is the way that must be adopted, for only through intimate association will the friends be able to teach and sow the seed in the heart of a seeker. The flower must be brought close and near in order to inhale its scent and fragrance.”

However, with his assumption of the guardianship, these ideas seem to have receded in the mind of Shoghi Effendi.

Although the Bahai Cause has appeared in the Orient and its cardinal principle is union and harmony between the inhabitants of East and West; although Baha-O-Llah openly declares. Oh people of the world! Ye are all the fruits of one tree and the leaves of one branch. Conduct yourselves with perfect love, friendship and understanding (Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 11); although Abdul Baha cries at the top of his voice: We must exercise the utmost love toward each other. We must be loving to all the people of the world. We must not consider any people, the people of Satan, but know and recognize all as the servants of the One God (Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. II, page 264); yet, for some obscure reason, Shoghi Effendi instructs the American Bahais not to receive Orientals in their midst—even Oriental Bahais are barred out unless they can produce proper credentials from the right authorities.

Here are the instructions written by Shoghi Effendi himself:—

I wish to add a few lines and remind you of the necessity of refusing to admit to your assembly, or associate with, any Oriental who does not have proper credentials from a recognized spiritual Assembly. No excuse whatever is acceptable. I am sure that a few are trying to cause mischief and bring about a split in the ranks of the believers in these days of stress, and the utmost caution should be exercised, lest these mischief-makers succeed in undermining the foundations of the Cause.

—Bahai News, No. 52, pages 4-5, May, 1931.

Regarding association with Oriental travelers and residents in the United States and Canada, I desire to emphasize afresh the vital necessity for the exercise in these days of the greatest vigilance and reserve, prudence and caution, on the part of the American believers in their dealings with them, either in an official or private capacity, whether in business transactions or for purely religious purposes. As the Movement grows in prestige, fame and influence, as the ambitions, malice and ill-will of strangers and enemies correspondingly wax greater, it becomes increasingly important for every individual and spiritual Assembly to be on their guard lest they fall innocent victims of the evil designs of the malevolent, the self-seeking and greedy.

The matter of receiving Orientals is left entirely in the hands of the National Spiritual Assembly, whose special committee for this purpose will have to investigate all the questions arising in this connection in future.

—Baha'i Administration, page 41.

In this manner, the entire Eastern Hemisphere, the home of Revelation, is looked askance by the Bahai community, and one thousand million Orientals automatically become suspect.

Additional instructions regarding the above subjects are to be found in Bahai News:

The National Spiritual Assembly feels that Oriental believers visiting America should transmit their credentials to the Secretary of the National Assembly, so that proper credentials may be issued by the National Assembly for their use while in America. If therefore, a Baha'i from the Orient should hereafter present his credentials to any local Assembly, that Assembly is requested to see that the credentials are transmitted.

—Bahai News, No. 131, page 7, November, 1939.

As regards those Persian or Oriental non-believers who become genuinely interested in the Cause in America, they can be admitted to study classes, but every care should be taken by the Assemblies to fully test their sincerity and the genuineness of their desire to join the Community before they are given the necessary facilities that will enable them eventually to be regarded as voting members of the faith.

—Bahai News, No. 118, page 2, August, 1938.

Thus, it is made most difficult for Eastern people of all faiths and creeds to come in contact with American Bahais and to learn of the Cause; and then to cap this gorgeous structure of exclusiveness and intolerance, a bar is made, preventing even the American Bahais, travelling from one city to another, from visiting local Assemblies or having a chat with individual believers, if these travellers happen to be unarmed with the proper credentials. Here is the fiat that proclaims this spiritual embargo to all the world:—

It has been voted to call attention once more to the fact that local Assemblies and individual believers should be careful in dealing with persons who claim to be Baha'is but have no proper credentials. This applies particularly to persons who come from other cities.

—Bahai News, No. 95, page 4, October, 1935.

Segregation! Thy name, indeed, is Bahai Organization!

Isolationists! Why not take a few leaves out of the text books of the Bahai Administration?

Irreconcilable Teachings

In bringing this chapter to a close, I venture to make the following comparison between the two points of view treated here; that of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha and that of Shoghi Effendi.

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha banish the spectre of fear and enmity; Shoghi Effendi evokes them.

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha teach association with all men; Shoghi Effendi commands the shunning of whomsoever we even feel to be an enemy.

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha throw wide open the gates of the Kingdom of Heaven; Shoghi Effendi closes them to a crack lest any mischief-makers enter the Temple of the Cause.

Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha were the embodiments of courtesy and affability; Shoghi Effendi departs considerably from the path of even ordinary good manners, as is exemplified by his term besotted woman which he applies to an honorable lady, a Bahai of more than twenty years' standing, whose conclusions on certain matters may be incorrect, but who is intelligent, sincere and self-sacrificing beyond all shadow of doubt. It was no less a person than Baha-O-Llah who said:—

I declare by God that the sword of civility is keener than blades of steel.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 23.

Baha-O-Llah tells his followers: If in the presence of the Manifestation, the evil in some one is apparent, you must not make opposition, only turn to God (Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 84); Shoghi Effendi, instead of renouncing opposition, is much taken up with the flames of sedition, the pernicious elements, the machinations of an implacable and vigilant enemy and the invading forces of schism. He, likewise, is catapulted into an idyllic rapture when he contemplates the awful doom that will overtake these notorious exponents of corruption and heresy who succeed in protruding for a time their ugly features only to sink, as rapidly as they had arisen, into the mire of an ignominious end. There is a sentence for you! One fitted to strike terror into the hearts of many so-called heretics, and at the same time to produce unctuous satisfaction in the innermost being of those who are trained to hunt them.

Thus, we can see that Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly throughout these years have built a segregated community—a community, the members of which are taught to suspect the motives and actions of the most innocent—an isolated, self-centered, self-satisfied community, living behind the iron walls of a prison which Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha thought to destroy. Tragic? Yes. Unexpected? Of course; and as the Father and Son, from the Supreme Horizon, watch this process of rebuilding the fortress of alienation and proscription which they themselves had dismantled, can you guess the thoughts that occur in their Minds, can you imagine the conversation that is going on between them? Can you?

CHAPTER XVII

EXCOMMUNICATION

An Ecclesiastical Law

Excommunication, as practiced by religious communities throughout the ages, is an ecclesiastical law adopted by the spiritual leaders of Judaism and Christianity, also Islam in modified form, to protect the faithful from contamination with those ideals and ideas that were considered harmful or heretical. Throughout the Middle Ages, the Roman Catholic Church resorted to this method in order to eject, and shut out from communion, those men and women who questioned her authority or her exclusive claim to salvation.

As an ecclesiastical law, whenever pronounced against a person or persons, it automatically deprived them of fellowship in things spiritual. The Roman Catholic Church perfected this engine of discipline and divided excommunication into two kinds: minor and major. Minor excommunication is separation or suspension from the sacraments. Major excommunication is absolute exclusion from the Church with all its rights and advantages and, in the case of very great offenders, even from social intercourse with the faithful.

In time, the church hierarchy created most rigorous methods of disciplinary constraint which culminated in the establishment of the Boards of Inquisition, which were empowered to excommunicate those found guilty of heresy, to imprison them and see to it that their houses were destroyed, their goods confiscated and their bodies burned at the stake.

These severe measures reduced the church government to a mere contrivance for exacting explicit obedience to a system of ecclesiastical enactments; thus turning religion, which had been intended to be the very essence of mercy and love, into a machine of injustice and hate.

The practice of excommunication, as developed from the theories of the Schoolmen, was as follows: first: to reclaim the believer from error of doctrine and if possible to save his soul; second: in case the first act of mercy were unsuccessful, to cut him off, as a withered branch, from the body of Christ and all participation in the benefits thereof. Penalties of various degrees were legislated and enforced upon dissenters from the Church's formulated standard of doctrine. One most efficacious invention, fitted to strike terror into the heart of any rebel, was excommunication by inch or excommunication by candle, where the period allowed for repentance depended on the life of a burning candle. If the candle had died out before the apostate had recanted, no restoration could be expected in this world or in the world to come, and even Christ would not act as a pleader on the judgment day for such an accursed soul.

Now, I deny the temporal and spiritual right of excommunication as exercised in the past by the ecclesiastical institutions; and I reject claims to the same prerogatives which are maintained today by those who hold themselves as the shepherds of the flocks. Long enough has religion been defaced by this inhuman contraption, operated by so-called holy men! Long enough have these far-from-holy-men manipulated the conscience of mankind through their demoniacal devices and, terming themselves the Vice-Gerents of the Most High, imposed their anti-spiritual and anti-social dogmas on a defenseless and innocent humanity!

The people of the world must awaken to the realization that God, who is the fountain-head of all blessings, was not, is not and will never be an excommunicator. He is no God of wrath and vengeance, but a God of understanding and compassion. All those who sat on the thrones of authority, expelling and anathematizing the dissenters, did not themselves know what faith meant and had no share in the truth that they pretended to promulgate.

The greatest service that could be rendered to religion is to lift from its brow the dark curse of excommunication and to demand, nay to insist, that this law be struck out from the creeds of all faiths. As long as it retains its place, even theoretically, in the Articles of the Confessions of various sects and denominations, the establishment of the principles of a Universal Religion and a Universal God will remain an impossibility. Therefore we, the people of the world, must eradicate from the pages of our spiritual consciousness the language of hate and denunciation, and obliterate from our religious books the rules of expulsion and anathema.

The Language of Love

It was certainly not an idle exhortation when Baha-O-Llah, from behind the prison walls of Acca, Palestine, announced that:—

The language of love is the touchstone of hearts and sustenance for the spirit; it is like unto the significances behind the words, and a horizon for the dawn of the Sun of Wisdom and Knowledge.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 12.

Baha-O-Llah's aim was to purify all religions from the defects of cursing, execration and excommunication. His plan was to change the surface of the earth into the Paradise of Our Lord the Merciful; and in order that his followers might arise for the accomplishment of this mighty task, he addressed them saying:—

O people of Baha! Ye are the dawning-places of the Love and day-springs of the Favor of God. Defile not the tongues with cursing and execrating any one.

—Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 130.

Again he admonished them:—

I sincerely hope that my friends will not be contaminated by the dust of lies, and that the exaggerated things which they hear will not affect their state, their condition, their saintliness nor their purity.

—Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, page 26.

The Bahais are therefore called upon, by the Revelator himself, to speak in the language of love and to protect themselves from the dust of lies; and the greatest lie of all the ages is that a compassionate God is the excommunicator of His own children or that He approves excommunication in His Name.

Baha-O-Llah, also says:—

The people of Baha must not refuse to discharge the reward of any one, and must respect possessors of talents; and they must not stain their tongues with slander (or evil words) like unto the former community (i.e. Islamites).

—Tablets of Baha-O-Llah, page 10.

The Language of Hate

In this connection I cannot help but think of the excommunication pronounced by Clement VI (1346) against Louis the Bavarian. It surpasses anything that I have read on this subject. Compared to it, a cup of hemlock is heavenly nectar and prussic acid a life-imparting remedy. Through these words you can hear the hiss of the serpent and the whistling of the slave driver's scourge. It is a gem in the literature of the Curse:—

Let him be damned in his going out and his coming in! The Lord strike him with madness and blindness and mental insanity; may the heavens empty upon him their thunderbolts, and the Wrath of the Omnipotent burn itself into him in the present and the future world! May the universe fight against him, and the earth open to swallow him up alive!

Small wonder that emperors, kings, princes and the peoples of Europe quaked before this awesome power! When I, for the first time, read this majestic curse, a tremor ran through my spine and my pulse boiled as though caught in fire.

Presently, however, I realized more plainly than before what Baha-O-Llah really meant when he commanded us: Defile not the tongues with cursing and execrating any one; and when I had controlled my horror and regained my poise I remembered that I must not let myself be contaminated by the dust of lies—for these are indeed blasphemy against God, the Father, and the Christ, His Son, who on the cross prayed for his enemies. They are blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, attendant upon all men.

A Vast Difference

In carrying this new principle of a non-cursing, non-execrating and non-excommunicating religion to its logical conclusion, Abdul Baha, while traveling in the United States, repeatedly spoke on the subject. In the course of a sermon delivered before the Congregation of All Souls Unitarian Church, New York, on July 14, 1912, he said:—

All humanity must be looked upon with love, kindness and respect, for what we behold in them are none other than the signs and traces of God Himself. All are evidences of God; therefore, how shall we be justified in debasing and belittling them, uttering anathema and preventing them from drawing near unto His mercy. This is ignorance and injustice, displeasing to God, for in His sight all are His servants.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. I, page 226.

What a vast difference between the above utterances of Abdul Baha and those of Thomas Aquinas—the father of the rationalization of theology in the Roman Catholic Church—who, relying on the authority of St. Augustine, asserted that:—

Heretics were not only to be separated from the Church by excommunication, but from the world by death. As falsifiers of coins are put to death, much more should they be put to death who are guilty of the more wicked act of corrupting the faith. The heretic, the Church delivers over to the secular tribunal to be put out of the world.

Heretic-Hunting

The Tribunal of Inquisition, established by Innocent III (1215), was intended to meet the peril of heresy and extirpate it. The heretics were compared to serpents concealing themselves in the grass, and princes were ordered to take an oath to support the Church in punishing them, and, on pain of forfeiting their dignities, to imprison them and confiscate their goods. Anyone who, in whatsoever way, supported heretics was himself excommunicated and denied his inheritance. Innocent III openly declared that even as treason was punished, so much more should punishments be meted out to those who committed the greater crime of blasphemy against God and His Son.

Abdul Baha must have been thinking on these and other such ungodly occurrences when on August 17, 1912, he spoke at Green Acre, Maine:—

From the beginning of human history down to the present time the various religions of the world have anathematized and accused each other of falsity. Each religion has considered the others bereft of the face of God, deprived of His mercy and in the direct line of divine wrath. Therefore, they have shunned each other most rigidly, exercising mutual animosity and rancour.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, page 259.

Universal Bounty

In the same speech, Abdul Baha develops this subject in a very striking and original manner:—

... How ignorant therefore the thought that God who created man, educated and nurtured him, surrounded him with all blessings, made the sun and all phenomenal existence for his benefit, bestowed upon him tenderness and kindness and then did not love him! This is palpable ignorance, for no matter to what religion a man belongs, even though he be an atheist or materialist, nevertheless God nurtures him, bestows his kindness and sheds upon him His light. How then can we believe God is wrathful and unloving? How can we even imagine this when as a matter of fact we are witnesses of the tenderness and mercy of God upon every hand? All about us we behold manifestations of the love of God. If therefore God be loving, what should we do? We have nothing else to do but to emulate Him. Just as God loves all and is kind to all, so must we really love and be kind to everybody. We must consider none bad, none worthy of detestation, no one as an enemy. We must love all; nay we must consider every one as related to us, for all are the servants of one God. All are under the instructions of one educator. We must strive day and night that love and amity may increase, that this bond of unity may be strengthened, that joy and happiness may more and more prevail, that in unity and solidarity, all mankind may gather beneath the shadow of God, that people may turn to God for their sustenance, finding in Him the life that is everlasting.

—Promulgation of Universal Peace,
Vol. II, page 261.

Inquisitorial Precepts

Let us contrast the above spiritual utterances of Abdul Baha with the writing of Pope Innocent III to the Inquisitorial Magistrates of Viterbo on the 25th of March, 1199:—

According to civil law, criminals convicted of treason are punished with death and their goods are confiscated; if even their children's lives are spared, it is simply out of pity. With how much more reason then should they who offend Jesus, the Son of the Lord God, by deserting the faith, be cut off from Christian communion and stripped of their goods, for it is infinitely more serious to offend against the Divine Majesty than to injure human majesty.

On another occasion the same Pope addressed the Princes of France:—

It is our wish that all the people take arms against the heretics whenever Brother Raynier and Brother Gui may deem advisable to give the command.

Bahai Administration Follows Suit

The few quotations from the writings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that their central aim was the abolition of all exclusive acts and of every sectarian tendency. This one all-embracing spirit distinguishes their cause from all the past religions.

Yet, alas, this limitation, this expulsion, this excommunication, which Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha entreated their followers to renounce and cast away, these evil spirits of a by-gone age, these gibbering goblins of a lost generation have been taken up by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada and incorporated in the fundamental laws of their ecclesiastical organization. The pity of it is that Shoghi Effendi falls in line with their medieval orthodoxy, with the result that today the Bahai world is witnessing religious persecution, heresy-hunting and excommunication according to standard pattern. In addition to this, the National Spiritual Assembly does not permit its recognized followers to join any organization, political or religious, and the Bahais are required to cancel any membership they may have in such bodies.

Thus, it seems to me that this is not at all the New World Order of Baha-O-Allah but the very old world order of intolerance, fanaticism, exclusion and spiritual isolation which Baha-O-Allah came to destroy. Thanks to the labor and ingenuity of the National Spiritual Assembly and Shoghi Effendi, these liabilities of the dark ages have been recaptured and embodied bag and baggage in this modern and one-time healthy movement.

Minor and Major Excommunication

According to its ruling, the National and Local Assemblies have the power to deprive a member of voting rights and suspend him from meetings and gatherings. These individuals are termed recalcitrant—not considered as expelled or excommunicated, but simply subsisting under a temporary ban.

This is very much like the Minor Excommunication in the Catholic Church; however, when the Guardian expels or excommunicates a person, this act has far-reaching spiritual implications affecting the very soul of that be- liever. This is, of course the Major Excommunication, similar to that in the Roman Church. The triumphant edict of excommunication is laid down in Bahai News, No. 134, March 1940, page 2.

Concerning your question as to the status of those individuals whom the local Assembly or the National Spiritual Assembly have considered it necessary to deprive of the voting right and to suspend from local meetings and gatherings; such action which local and National Assemblies have been empowered to take against such recalcitrant members, however justified and no matter how severe, should under no circumstance be considered as implying the complete expulsion of the individuals affected from the Cause. The suspension of voting and other administrative rights of an individual, always conditional and therefore temporary, can never have such far-reaching implications, since it constitutes merely an administrative sanction; whereas his expulsion or excommunication from the Faith, which can be effected by the Guardian alone, in his capacity as the supreme spiritual head of the Community, has far-reaching spiritual implications affecting the very soul of that believer. The former, as already stated, is an administrative sanction, whereas the latter is essentially spiritual, involving not only the particular relationship of a believer to his local or National Assembly, but his very spiritual existence in the Cause. It follows, therefore, that a believer can continue calling himself a Bahai even though he may cease to be a voting member of the Community. But in case he is excluded from the body of the Cause by an act of the Guardian he ceases to be a believer, and cannot possibly identify himself even nominally with the Faith.

Group taken with Abdul Baha in Paris, in 1913.

The above quotation is from a letter addressed to Mr. Harlan Ober, a member of the National Spiritual Assembly. To my mind it raises a few fundamental issues, the discussion of which will be of vital importance.

The letter is written by the Guardian through his secretary and is published in Bahai News with Shoghi Effendi's consent; therefore to all intents and purposes it has the same validity as if he had written it personally.

A Staggering Claim

Shoghi Effendi claims for himself a power that is staggering in its implication; he assumes a spiritual dictatorship which is predictable of catastrophic results as regards the future of the Bahai Cause. This is a brand of Fascism much as that which has placed Europe under the heels of dictators accountable to no one, and which thus reduces Bahai membership to the level of spiritual serfdom. The exercise of this power is the more dangerous because, once Shoghi Effendi, as the Guardian, is entrenched in it and the precedent has become well established, all the succeeding Guardians will be liable to follow suit, appropriating it as their natural and inherited right.

It is an axiomatic fact that there is no man who, before the face of his Maker, can arrogate unto himself the power of excommunicating any person whatsoever from the religion of God or of controlling the spiritual destiny of that person. If it is proven that Shoghi Effendi really claims and actually practices this unwarranted right, then I say with all solemnity that it is the bounden duty of the liberal Bahais throughout the world to wage a continuous and vigorous war against such an assumption on his part.

For ages, the Christian world was crimsoned with the blood of innocent men, women and children, because the Popes claimed and exercised the power of excommunicating the so-called heretics and apostates. No record is more ghastly, no account more gruesome than are the records and accounts of the Inquisition and the Autos-da-fe; the very names suggest the worst horrors—lighted torches, towering flames, fierce-eyed hangmen, burning bodies, to say nothing of the faces of those who watched these spectacles with fiendish glee or, to say the least, with acquiescence. Now, do we want to bring into the Bahai Cause these relics of barbarism, these inventions of the devil? One may legitimately argue that such conditions will never return to our world. Yet I answer: So long as a single man claims this power and the right to exercise it, and a subservient group yields to his authority, the potential danger of a return to the practices of the Middle Ages exists. Some day there may be an eruption like unto a silent volcano which, at unforeseen times, floods the countryside with its rivers of lava and covers the face of the heavens with its clouds of smoke.

No one ever dreamed that in our lifetime Europe would be saddled with Nazism and Fascism with their attendant ideologies of regimentation, intolerance and barbarism, yet the impossible has happened and here we are, facing this terror!

On the other hand, it is not difficult to picture the establishment of a type of spiritual cruelty which would not necessitate the burning of heretics at the stake. This is the 20th Century, in spite of the European nightmare, and it is probable that we will content ourselves with more refined methods of persecution. We are able to propagate, by subtle and civilized methods, rumors that in time will destroy the character of those whom we are pleased to point out as enemies. Just keep hammering at it, persistently, unremittingly, and, in time, men will be ready to call white black, and day night.

The Twin Swords

The Roman Catholic Church arrogated to herself the wielding of the spiritual sword; she draws the sword which of God she hath received, and the Princes of Europe were commanded to draw their temporal swords and support her in her doings. Another important chapter in the history of the Roman Catholic Church was the famous assertion of Boniface VIII (1302) that both swords were in the hands of the Pope. The Popes unsheathed these two swords and with their sharp blades struck at thousands. These acts of spiritual terrorism and devastation were the fruits of seeds sown in the early stages of Christianity, no doubt in some cases by sincere Christians whose sole aim it had been to protect the deposit of Faith handed down by the Apostles.

In Shoghi Effendi's letter, we find the statement: But in case he is excluded from the body of the Cause by an act of the Guardian he ceases to be a believer, and cannot possibly identify himself even nominally with the Faith. Being familiar with the development of the history of religions, we recognize in this statement the seed out of which will unquestionably grow the tree of a new Inquisition with its attendant cruelty and corruption. As you sow so shall you reap, is the universal law of nature—cause and effect—no one can escape it.

The very worst calamity that could befall the Bahai Cause is that its members should supinely accept the principle that Shoghi Effendi, in his capacity as the supreme spiritual head of the Community, has the power to expel or to excommunicate a believer and that this act has far-reaching spiritual implications affecting the very soul of that believer. Shoghi Effendi has no such power! His excommunication cannot affect even the soul of an amocba; how much less the soul of a believer in Baha-O-Llah! My faith in the Bahai Cause would indeed be very superficial, should I come to believe that any human being could, by a mere gesture or a few mesmeric words, take it away from me or from any one else. Every soul, in accepting the Bahai Cause, makes a covenant with Baha-O-Llah, and that Covenant, neither Shoghi Effendi nor the National or Local Assemblies can ever break. Its foundation is in the depths of consciousness, and God alone knows its dwelling-place.

Scriptural Authority

The Pope, as we have seen, in his capacity as the supreme head of the Community, had the power to expel or excommunicate a believer, and that act was supposed to have far-reaching spiritual implications affecting the very soul of that believer. Now, how did the Pope find grounds on which to assert this power? Those who chose to invest him with this prerogative had to search the New Testament in order to find a verse that would support such a claim. Well, they found it. Here is the verse:—

And I say also unto thee, that, thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven.

—St. Matthew, Chapter 16, Verses 18-19.

On the authority of these two verses the Roman Church built her universal, temporal and spiritual Empire!

Never, in the furthest stretch of his divine vision, could Christ have imagined the astounding repercussions of the above words, and if Peter, the humble fisherman, could have projected himself into coming centuries and witnessed what his so-called successors were perpetrating in his name, he would have opened his honest eyes in horror and disgust. Peter would have repudiated his successors, while it goes without saying that they, likewise, would have repudiated him, throwing him out of the Vatican as the reprobate Jew that he was.

The Doctrine of the Keys

From the very beginning, the doctrine of the keys was a topic of theological discussion, and for centuries controversy raged around this point. As an essential credo of the Church, it was related to the teaching which applied to the forgiveness of sin (John, Chapter 5: Verse 14 and Chapter 8: Verse 11). The Fathers wrote volumes of commentaries on this point, and indulged in varied and conflicting interpretations, all of which go to prove the supreme importance that was attached to this doctrine, necessary to discipline and fundamental for the maintenance of religious uniformity.

Thus, the Church of Rome held up Peter as the steward of the House of God on earth, who possessed the keys to all the heavenly mansions and had therefore the power to open or to shut. This gift of the power to open or to shut, to bind or to loose, to permit or to forbid, was in time assumed by Bishops and Popes and exercised under all circumstances. Later, the claim was regularized by the Fathers and Schoolmen in the interests of the Church Order and of a Ministry that had become increasingly sacerdotal. Ambrose, in particular, asserted that the Church had the keys in her own possession and enjoyed the sole power both to bind and to loose.

Externalizing the Word of God

The resemblance between the Roman Catholic Church and the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada affords another striking parallel: All the spiritual ideals of Christ, originally metaphoric and uttered in the flowery language of Eastern symbology, became hardened by the Western Church into dogmas, thus changing the spring of spirituality into the winter of formalism. This externalizing process gained momentum from age to age, as the forces of orthodoxy found themselves in control of the State. The belief in the divine right of the hierarchy and the duty of imposing submission to it by force became the cardinal principle of the Church, with the result that a suffocating darkness descended upon the nations. The method which the successors of Peter adopted was not to loose the souls on earth but to bind them; it was one of violence, not of persuasion. The Church rested her rule on the sword rather than on the Cross. Thus, the primitive Christianity of the East was transformed into the elaborate and ritualistic Catholicism of the West with its vast jungle of rules, culminating in its official slogan: No salvation without the Church.

As a result of the doctrine of excommunication propounded by Shoghi Effendi and upheld by the National Spiritual Assembly, the Bahai Cause has taken up all the characteristics of the Church of Rome and, unless this doctrine is publicly repudiated, it will be subject to the same spiritual diseases, with gradual corruption and disintegration.

Contradictory Estimates

The claim made by Shoghi Effendi, regarding his right, in his capacity as the supreme spiritual head, to excommunicate the believers from the Faith, totally and fundamentally differs from a previous estimate of himself, written by him in the World Order of Baha-U-Llah. This estimate was published in 1934, while the new role which he now assumes was given out in 1939. There is quite a gap between the two statements and a distinct change of principle. In the earlier one, he does not think that he is a co-sharer with Abdul Baha; he can never claim to be a perfect exemplar of the teachings of Baha-U-Llah or the stainless mirror that reflects His light; he forbids the believers to pray to him, to seek his benediction or even to celebrate his birthday. He feels that he can exercise the right and perform the obligation imposed upon him as the Guardian and yet remain infinitely inferior to both Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha in rank, and different in nature.

Here are his words:—

The Guardian of the Faith must not under any circumstances . . . be exalted to the rank that will make him a co-sharer with Abdul Baha in the unique position which the Center of the Covenant occupies—much less to the station exclusively ordained for the Manifestation of God. So grave a departure from the established tenets of our Faith is nothing short of open blasphemy. . . .

No Guardian of the Faith, I feel it my solemn duty to place on record, can ever claim to be the perfect exemplar of the teachings of Baha-U-Llah or the stainless mirror that reflects His light. . . . In the light of this truth to pray to the Guardian of the Faith, to address him as lord and master, to designate him as his holiness, to seek his benediction, to celebrate his birthday, or to commemorate any event associated with his life would be tantamount to a departure from those established truths that are enshrined within our beloved Faith.

pages 150, 151.

Naturally, I am fully aware of the fact that by this time many believers in the organization have, in contradiction to the above statement, deified Shoghi Effendi. It is known that they look upon him as a reincarnation of the spirit of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha and that they have bedecked his shoulders with the mantle of infallibility.

This strange belief, wholly at variance with Shoghi Effendi's earlier concept of himself, is taught but orally from mouth to mouth, yet traces of it can be detected in some of the pronouncements of the National Spiritual Assembly and the reports of its various committees.

The Black Plague

The doctrine of excommunication, appropriated by Shoghi Effendi, is peculiarly the weapon of the Dark Ages of intolerance and ignorance. No other dogma is so distinctly the creation of an irreligious era. It is the black plague in the realm of the mind; it is religious assassination and spiritual murder; it is an abomination unto the Lord of Mercy and Truth. The spiritual and cultural manifestations of the Renaissance as well as the courage and sacrifice of thousands of lovers of freedom contributed to wrest (to all intents and purposes) the power of excommunication from the hands of the Roman Catholic Church and to establish in Europe and America the age of the liberty of Religion. Does it then seem credible that Shoghi Effendi is so unmindful of the history of the past that he has brought himself to believe that he can bring back into the Western world the doctrine of excommunication? Are the members of the National Spiritual Assembly so blind to the significant events in the United States during the last hundred and fifty years that they hope to succeed in establishing on these shores a religious tribunal, with authority to expel from the Cause those believers whom they are unable to brow-beat into submission? The following significant words of Baha-O-Llah are applicable to this subject:—

O people of Baha! The possessor of the Name says: Meditate upon these events that ye may really break the idols of superstitions and imaginations.

—Bahai Scriptures, page 230.

A Worthwhile Excommunication

If the Bahai Cause aspires to spread its teachings far and wide and gain the respect and devotion of mankind, now or in the future, it must purge itself of all the religious limitations of the past. It must submit to a process of complete self-purification and then dedicate itself to the progressive, spiritual, social and intellectual interests of our fellowmen.

The doctrine of excommunication has not one good thing in its favor. It has set men against men and class against class. It has made the leaders of religions suspicious and revengeful, leaving behind an accursed memory. It is beyond my comprehension why Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of a Universal Movement, wishes to revive this practically lifeless corpse and so inflict a mortal injury upon the Cause!

In the face of this overriding danger, which is embodied in Shoghi Effendi's claim that as the supreme head of the Cause he has the power to excommunicate or expel the believers, thereby depriving them of their spiritual heritage, no other choice is left to me but to sound the alarm. I have been impelled by motives beyond my control to present this problem before the Bahai world, before the public in general, and before the conscience of an awakening society which, little by little, is becoming aware of the mission of Baha-O-Llah.

Herewith I appeal to Shoghi Effendi, as the Guardian designated by the Master, to preserve the democracy of the Bahai Cause, to protect the vital dignity of man, to obliterate all the traces of negation, to herald the universality of the Message of Abdul Baha, and, in so doing, to expel expulsion and excommunicate excommunication. Such an excommunication would, indeed, be worthwhile!

A Little Bunch of Flowers

Before leaving this subject, I will recount a story, simple, human and very touching. It took place shortly after The New History Society had been cut from the Bahai Administration, at a time when I had suddenly become untouchable to my former Bahai companions. This intimate glimpse of a ship-wrecked life can serve as an example of what has occurred over the centuries, in instances without number.

One night, a few of us were gathered in Mrs. Chanler's house. It was late, and the household had retired, so, when a ring was heard at the front door, I went downstairs and answered it myself. No one was there but, at my feet, a little bunch of flowers was resting on the doormat. I picked it up and carried it to the library; and all of us knew that it was a message of love that could not be delivered in person.

A few evenings later, under exactly the same circumstances, we again heard a ring at the door and I went down to find one of our Bahai friends in the street. She had not run away this time. I brought her up to the library, and there we held her in our arms for a long time while she sobbed most pitifully; and all the while she was moaning: I have come home! I could not bear it any longer. I have come home!

The reunion was only a temporary one, for this Bahai sister of mine had a great veneration for the Guardian and she could not withstand his commands. So, for a while, she came and went, trying to reconcile her conception of the Cause with the dealings of the Administration. Sometimes she would pace the streets half the night in the hope that a speeding taxicab would put an end to her agony. Finally, when body and mind could endure no more, she passed between the doors of a hospital and disappeared from the sight of all who knew her.

Some years later, she returned to her family, and that fact is the last news that I have had of her. Probably, we will never meet again in this life, but she has left behind her a memory of spiritual loveliness and warm, human susceptibilities as poignant as any that I have, and, although the period of our separation is long, I can still sense the perfume of that little bunch of flowers that lay on the doormat.

Such is the harvest of excommunication—broken hearts, broken lives, shattered confidence! Does Shoghi Effendi really wish to deck the altar of the Bahai Cause with these gruesome trophies?

POLITICS AND THE BAHAI CAUSE

CHAPTER XVIII

BAHAIS AND PERSIAN POLITICS

A Marked Movement

From the year 1844, when the Bab declared his mission in Shiraz, up to the year 1909-10, the Babis, and the Bahais who succeeded them, lived under the autocratic rule of the Shahs of the Kadjar Dynasty; and, when in 1852 Baha-O-Llah was exiled to Turkey, he and those who accompanied him were subjected to another tyranny, that of the Ottoman Sultans.

In the dispensation of the Bab, his band of devoted followers met successive waves of persecution, during which thousands upon thousands were put to the sword by order of the Iranian government and the Islamic clergy. These blood-orgies were the result of loud and persistent accusations against the Babis, which were to the effect that this order planned to interfere with the political affairs of the nation and to overthrow the established order.

The encounters that took place between the small but fervent religious band and the armed forces of Iran make astounding reading. In several parts of the country, the Babis were attacked by the army and the populace, and were forced to take refuge in barracks where they were surrounded on all sides. Here, in many cases, protracted sieges set in, which, after months of heroic resistance, were terminated by promises of exemption and pardon which were never kept. When the exhausted Babis emerged from their refuge, they were massacred wholesale.

Precautionary Measures

Now, while these events were taking place, and in subsequent years when their recurrence was ever imminent, Baha-O-Llah from his place of exile strove to convey to the rulers of Iran and Turkey the fact that his people were, in no sense of the word, seditious; at the same time, he instructed the Bahais to concentrate on the improvement of their own characters and under no circumstances to engage in political pursuits. This step on the part of Baha-O-Llah was a most necessary one, for it prevented the wiping out of the entire movement. His stand was later adopted by Abdul Baha.

Baha-O-Llah Instructs the Bahais

The following words of Baha-O-Llah addressed to his followers very conclusively prove the point under discussion:—

Ye are forbidden sedition and strife in the books and epistles; and herein I desire nought save your exaltation and elevation, whereunto beareth witness the heaven and its stars, the sun and its radiance, the trees and their leaves, the seas and their waves and the earth and its treasures.

—A Traveller's Narrative, page 152.

This is what is intended by victory: Sedition hath never been nor is pleasing to God, and that which certain ignorant persons formerly wrought was never approved. If ye be slain for His good pleasure verily it is better for you than that ye should slay.

—A Traveller's Narrative, page 115.

The meaning of victory is not this, that any one should fight or strive with any one.

—A Traveller's Narrative, page 113.

Every one, then, who desireth victory must first subdue the city of his own heart with the sword of spiritual truth and of the Word.

—A Traveller's Narrative, page 114.

These lofty and definite statements of Baha-O-Llah induced the early Bahais to lay aside the more provocative attitude which had been held by the Babis and to turn their attention from the corrupt political systems of Iran and Turkey, which they were in no position to alter, to the spread of the teachings and the increase of their numbers. Thus in time they became a well-knit, disciplined minority, the model behavior of which had far-reaching influence.

Baha-O-Llah Pleads with the Shah

While Baha-O-Llah, on the one hand, was striving to restrain the dauntless Bahais from over-activity on dangerous terrain, he on the other hand laid their case before the Shah of Persia and did not hesitate to blame this sovereign in full for the part which he had taken in the long chapter of persecution.

Baha-O-Llah says:—

They have attacked a number of reformers of the world with the charge of seditiousness. As God liveth, these persons had and have no intent nor hope save the glory of the State and service to their nation! For God they spoke and for God they speak, and in the way of God do they journey.

—A Traveller's Narrative, pages 79-80.

It is twenty years and more that they (the Bahais) have been tormented by day and by night with the fierceness of the royal anger and that they have been cast each one into a different land by the blasts of the tempests of the king's wrath. How many children have been left fatherless! How many fathers have become childless! How many mothers have not dared, through fear and dread, to mourn over their slaughtered children!

—A Traveller's Narrative, pages 119-120.

And then Baha-O-Llah cries out from the depth of his heart:—

O King! The lamps of justice are extinguished and the fire of persecution is kindled on all sides, until that they have made my people captives.

—A Traveller's Narrative, page 139.

O King, I conjure thee by thy Lord the Merciful to regard His servants with the gaze of pitiful eyes, and to rule with justice in their midst, that God may award His Favor unto thee.

—Bahai Scriptures, page 69.

Verily those who surround thee, love thee for their own sakes, while this Servant loveth thee for thine own sake, nor doth He desire aught save that He may bring thee nigh unto the station of grace and turn thee unto the right hand of Justice.

—Bahai Scriptures, pages 70-71.

O God, this is a letter which I wish to send to the King; and Thou knowest that I have not desired aught of him save the display of his justice to Thy people, and the showing forth of his favors to the dwellers in Thy kingdom, and verily, for myself, I have not desired aught save what Thou desirest. . . . Help, O God, his Majesty the King, to execute Thy laws amongst Thy servants and to show forth Thy Justice amidst Thy creatures, that he may rule over this sect as he ruleth over those who are beside them. Verily Thou art the Potent, the Mighty, the Wise.

By God, I do not desire sedition, but the purification of God's servants from all that withholdeth them from approach to God.

—Bahai Scriptures, page 76.

We ask God . . . to assist the King in that which He liketh and approveth; and to help him unto that which shall bring him near to the Day-Spring of His Most Comely Names, that he may not shut his eyes to the wrong which he seeth, but may regard his subjects with the eye of favor and preserve them from violence. . . . And we ask Him to make thee a helper unto His religion and a regarder of His Justice, that thou mayest rule over His servants as thou rulest over those of thy kindred, and mayest choose for them what thou wouldst choose for thyself.

—Bahai Scriptures, page 80.

Baha-O-Llah Pleads with the Sultan

It is now the turn of the Sultan of Turkey to receive the reprimand of Baha-O-Llah:—

O, thou personage, who considerest thyself the greatest of all men, while looking upon the Divine Youth, (Baha-O-Llah) thinking him to be the lowest of men, yet through Him the eye of the Supreme Concourse is brightened. . . . From the beginning every one of the Manifestations of mercifulness . . . who have stepped forth from the Realm of Immortality . . . men like thee have considered those sanctified souls . . . upon whom the reformation of the world depends, as the people of strife and wrong-doers. Verily, their names (the deniers) are forgotten and ere long thy name will also be forgotten and thou shalt find thyself in great loss.

According to thy opinion, this Quickener of the world and its Peace-maker is culpable and seditious. What crime have the women, children and suffering babes committed, to merit thy wrath, oppression and hate? In every religion and community the children are considered innocent, nor does the Pen of Divine Command hold them responsible, yet the reign of thy tyranny and despotism has surrounded them. If thou art the follower of any religion or sect, read thou the Heavenly Books . . . so that thou mayest realize the irresponsibility of children . . . even those people who do not believe in God, have never committed such crimes. . . .

You have persecuted a number of souls who have shown no opposition in your country and who have instigated no revolution against the government; nay rather, days and nights they have been peacefully engaged in the mentioning of God. You have pillaged their properties and through your tyrannical acts, all they had was taken from them. . . .

Before God, a handful of dust is greater than your kingdom, sovereignty, glory and dominion, and should He desire, He would scatter you as the sand of the desert, and ere long his wrath shall overtake you, revolutions shall appear in your midst and your countries will be divided! Then you will weep and lament and nowhere will you find help or protection. . . .

Be ye watchful, for the wrath of God is prepared and ere long ye shall behold that which is descended from the Pen of Command. Have ye thought that your glory is everlasting, or did ye dream that your kingdom would remain forever? No, by the life of God! Your glory is not eternal, and our humiliation will not last. . . .

The point is this, that thou mayest raise thy head from the bed of negligence and become mindful and not oppose the servants of God without reason. Bear in mind that so far as power and strength remain in the body, thou shouldst remove persecutions from the oppressed ones. . . . Be just! Then turn to God, perchance He may forgive the sins thou hast committed in this ephemeral life . . . Through thy tyranny the Fire of Sinai flamed forth, the Spirit wept, and the hearts of the angels bled. . . .

Do not think that thou hast made this Youth powerless, or that thou hast conquered him. Thou art defeated by one of the servants but thou knowest it not. The worst and lowest of creatures rules over thee, that is, thy passion and desire . . . Thou art weak, and knowest it not.

—Baha-O-Llah in his tablet to Sultan of Turkey,
Bahai Scriptures, pages 81-88.

Abdul Baha Takes up the Defense

Writing in about 1874, Abdul Baha continued along the same lines, pointing out to the then Shah of Iran the fact that the Bahais were not a rebellious people; that they did not manifest any signs of sedition; that they were the loyal subjects of the king, and all that they required from the government was freedom of conscience, which he thought must be the established principle of monarchy. This is the way that Abdul Baha expresses himself:—

For thirty years there has been no rumour of disturbance or rebellion, nor any sign of sedition. Notwithstanding the duplication of adherents, and the increase and multiplication of this body, through many admonitions and encouragements to virtue this sect are all in the utmost repose and stability; they have made obedience their distinctive trait and in extreme submissiveness and subordination are the loyal subjects of the king.

On what lawful grounds can the government further molest them, or permit them to be slighted? Besides, this interference with the consciences and beliefs of peoples, and persecution of diverse denominations of men is . . . contrary to the established principles of monarchy.

Abdul Baha as well as Baha-O-Llah never condoned the injustices of the Shah, and, after exposing the enormities that had been committed against his followers, he asserts that one of the functions of government is to ensure freedom of conscience and tranquility of heart. He reminds the Shah that other countries did not become civilized, nor did they attain to high degrees of influence and power, until they had come to the point of dealing with all classes according to one standard. He then ends his dissertation with the significant remark: The common interest is complete equality.

Let us read his words:—

The true nature and real doctrine of this sect have now become evident and well known: all their writings and tracts have repeatedly and frequently fallen into our hands and are to be found preserved in the possession of the government. If they be perused, the actual truth and inward verity will become clear and apparent. These pages are entirely taken up with prohibitions of sedition, recommendations of upright conduct among mankind, obedience, submission, loyalty, conformity and acquisition of laudable qualities and encouragements to become endowed with praiseworthy accomplishments and characteristics. They have absolutely no reference to political questions, nor do they treat of that which could cause disturbance or sedition.

Under these circumstances a just government can find no excuse, and possesses no pretext for further persecuting this sect, except a claim to the right of interference in thought and conscience, which are the private possessions of the heart and soul.

And, as regards this matter, there has already been much interference, and countless efforts have been made. What blood has been shed! What heads have been hung up! Thousands of persons have been slain; thousands of women and children have become wanderers or captives; many are the buildings which have been ruined; and how many noble races and families have become headless and homeless! Yet nought has been effected and no advantage has been gained; no remedy has been discovered for this ill, nor any easy salve for this wound.

To ensure freedom of conscience and tranquillity of heart and soul is one of the duties and functions of government, and is in all ages the cause of progress in development and ascendancy over other lands. Other civilized countries acquired not this pre-eminence, nor attained unto these high degrees of influence and power, till such time as they put away the strife of sects out of their midst, and dealt with all classes according to one standard. All are one people, one nation, one species, one kind. The common interest is complete equality. —A Traveller's Narrative, pages 157-158.

The Bahais Hold to their Mission

Notwithstanding this aloof attitude from the corrupt autocratic systems of Iran and Turkey which had been adopted as a protective measure, we must not lose sight of the fact that the Bahais were far from indifferent to the social and political destiny of their native land. They did not stand on the sidelines, callous to injustices, but simply changed their tactics and worked along unprovocative constructive lines.

Abdul Baha, the incomparable statesman, had placed in their hands a mighty weapon, with which to fight the dark forces of political chicanery and corruption; and, through this means, his people gained unheralded victories in the highways and byways of society. What was this weapon? It simply was a book: The Mysterious Forces of Civilization, written anonymously by the Master himself.

As its name indicates, this work is a treatise on political philosophy, democracy and just government. It develops the theories of citizenship, national and international; it deals with civil and religious liberty, freedom of speech and other basic principles for a new world order. Written in eloquent Persian, it was circulated far and wide.

Like leaven, these ideas fermented in the minds of the young leaders and would-be reformers of Iran and Turkey. According to the judgment of a number of competent witnesses, the unobtrusive and persistent passing of this book from hand to hand contributed a decisive blow toward the downfall of the Iranian and Turkish monarchies, during the fateful years 1909-10. The fly-leaf bears the words: Written in Persian by an Eminent Bahai Philosopher.

The Mysterious Forces of Civilization, as translated into English by Johanna Dawud, became available to the western world through its first London edition in 1910. A reprint was made in 1918 by the Bahai Publishing Society of Chicago, Ill. I submit it, to the interested student, as a most consummate exposition of the kind of political philosophy that must inevitably be practiced in the world of today and the world of tomorrow, also as a manual for the organization of national and international government based on justice, truth and fair dealing. Likewise, I take the liberty of submitting it to the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, for a careful reading of this document will, to their possible amazement and I hope to their enlightenment, reveal the fact that Abdul Baha, unlike his grandson Shoghi Effendi, did not express his abhorrence of political affairs (Bahai News, July 1933, No. 75, Page 3) but rather, that he was the most able statesman our age has produced, and that he stands a model of political enterprise for those who wish to emulate him.

Restrictions Lifted

When the decadent autocracies of Iran and Turkey collapsed under the impact of democratic uprisings, a new era was inaugurated in those countries, and the Bahais found themselves at liberty to take their legitimate part in the establishment of a humanitarian society. It was at this time that Abdul Baha advised his followers to enter the domain of clean politics, enjoining them to purify the poisonous atmosphere that was still clinging to the minds of their contemporaries and to help lay the stable foundations of a fellowship of nations. There is no doubt but that the Bahais tackled the work with vigor and enthusiasm.

If the reader needs any evidence to prove the above assertion, I can do no better than quote a statement made by Abdul Baha in Boston, Mass., on July 23, 1912. It is in answer to questions put to him by some American friends who no doubt remembered his past instructions regarding the non-participation of the believers in politics.

Abdul Baha said:—

The injunction to Bahais has been this:—They must not engage in matters of politics which lead to corruption. They must have nothing to do with corruption or sedition, but should interest themselves in clean politics. In Persia, at the present time, the Bahais have no part in the movements which have terminated in corruption; but on the other hand a Bahai may be a politician of the right type; even ministers in Persia are Bahais. We have Governor-Generals who are Bahais and there are many other Bahais who take part in politics, but not in corruption. It is evident they must have nothing to do with seditious movements. For example, if the Americans should arise with the intention of reinstating despotism, the Bahais should take no part in it.

July 13, 1912.

The above statement of Abdul Baha demonstrates the pride which he took in the political achievements of his Iranian followers. We can, by reminding ourselves of certain rules and developments, appreciate more fully the significance of his words:—

(a) Up to 1909, his instructions to the Bahais in Iran regarding non-participation in political affairs was literally obeyed.

(b) Within the short space of four years from 1909, when the Iranian Revolution occurred and the despotic monarchy was overthrown, up to 1912, when Abdul Baha made the foregoing statement, there had appeared on the political scene of Iran Bahai Ministers, Bahai Governor-Generals and Bahai Statesmen who were wielding the sceptre of power, not for the purpose of filling their own purses, but for that of serving the best interests of their country, and in the most unselfish manner.

(c) Abdul Baha divided politics into two parts: clean politics and corrupt politics. The Bahais should interest themselves in the former and totally avoid the latter. This instruction applies to America as well as Persia, and to all other lands as well.

(d) A Bahai may be a statesman. This is to be desired.

So did Abdul Baha give to his native land, Iran, some very wise and able servants. The question is: how did he do it; how did he make such a transformation in men who, for over half a century, had been trained to rigidly avoid everything political? The whole answer lies in the meaning which he intended to convey, and which his followers read between the lines and grasped from the very beginning. When they were told not to participate in politics, they looked at one another, exchanged a few words, and went after their business, which was on the upward trend. Likewise, when the Shah of Iran and the Sultan of Turkey and their ministers read the words of Abdul Baha, they were very well satisfied and also went after their business—a business which was on the brink of failure. Finally, when the crash came, the Bahais stepped onto the scene, fully equipped for the work that was to be done.

The result of all this? Abdul Baha himself reported it to the American Bahais. Unfortunately, they had ears, but heard not; eyes, but saw not, and minds that did not comprehend.

Church and State

Abdul Baha did not believe in the centralization of governmental or religious authorities into vast monopolistic corporations. He denounced this tendency as directly leading to despotism. At the close of an address delivered at the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Ascension on Sunday morning, June 2, 1912, in New York City, he was asked the question:—

Is it not a fact that Universal Peace cannot be accomplished until there is political democracy in all the countries of the world?

Answer:—It is very evident that in the future of all the countries of the world, be they constitutional in government or Republican or Democratic in form, there shall be no centralization. The United States may be held up as the example of government in time to come, that is to say, each Province will be independent in itself but there will be a union concerning the interests of the various independent states . . . To cast aside centralization which promotes despotism is the exigency of the time.

—Star of the West, Vol. III, No. 10, page 27,
Sept. 8, 1912.

In studying the principle of non-centralization in government and progressive democracy, it would be well to examine the thoughts of H. G. Wells on the subject of legislation in a free world. In his Declaration of the Rights of Man, he says:—

In matters of cooperative and collective action, man must abide by the majority decisions ascertained by electoral methods which give effective expression to individual choice. All legislation must be subject to repeal. No treaties or contracts shall be made secretly in the name of the community. The fount of legislation in a free world is the whole people, and since life flows on constantly to new citizens, no generation can, in whole or in part, surrender or delegate this legislative power which is inalienably inherent in mankind.

—The Rotarian Magazine, September, 1941, page 9.

Separation of Religion and Politics

In the teachings of Abdul Baha, as in the constitutional laws of the United States, politics is separated from religion. Neither should interfere with the other, for each has definite and essential services to render to society. Nevertheless, Abdul Baha expects the officials of the government, no matter what position they may occupy, to be conscious of religion and of the spiritual values. Their souls must be vibrant with the love of God, their services to the nation must be actuated by noble impulses; at the same time, the internal problems of religion as such do not enter their domain.

Similarly, religious teachers should be conscious of social and democratic values, and must cooperate with the State. However, their duties lie along the lines of education, and their responsibilities are toward the unfortunate and the poor. They must hold to their mission and abstain from political plans and schemes. They should trust the officers of their government to perform their duties in the political domain, even as they are performing their own in the religious field. To make the above cardinal Bahai principle plain let us listen to Abdul Baha:—

At the same time religious interests should not be brought into politics. Religions should treat of morals; politics of material circumstances. Those in authority should occupy themselves with the lives of men; they should teach ideas of service, good morals and develop the habit of Justice. "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

April 9, 1912.

On another occasion the same thought is expressed in a slightly different way:—

In despotic Governments carried on by men without divine faith, where no fear of spiritual retribution exists, the execution of the laws is tyrannical and unjust. There is no greater prevention of oppression than these two sentiments, hope and fear. They have both political and spiritual consequences.

If Administrators of the law would take into consideration the spiritual consequences of their decisions, and follow the guidance of religion, they would be divine agents in the world of action, the representatives of God for those who are on earth, and they would defend, for the love of God, the interests of His servants as they would defend their own. If a Governor realizes his responsibility and fears to defy the Divine Law, his judgments will be just. Above all, if he believes that the consequences of his actions will follow him beyond his earthly life, and that "as he sows so must he reap," such a man will surely avoid injustice and tyranny.

Should an official, on the contrary, think that all responsibility for his actions must end with his earthly life, knowing and believing nothing of divine favors and a spiritual kingdom of joy, he will lack the incentive to just dealing, and the inspiration to destroy oppression and unrighteousness.

When a ruler knows that his judgments will be weighed in a balance by the Divine Judge, and that if he be not found wanting he will come into the Celestial Kingdom and that the light of the heavenly Bounty will shine upon him, then will he surely act with justice and equity. Behold how important it is that Ministers of State should be enlightened by Religion.

With political questions, the clergy, however, have nothing to do! Religious matters should not be confused with Politics in the present state of the world (for their interests are not identical).

Religion concerns matters of the heart, of the Spirit and of morals. Politics are occupied with the material things of life. Religious teachers should not invade the realm of politics; they should concern themselves with the spiritual education of the people; they should ever give good counsel to men, trying to serve God and humankind; they should endeavor to awaken spiritual aspiration, and strive to enlarge the understanding and knowledge of humanity, to improve morals, and to increase the love for justice. . . .

In Persia there are some amongst the important Ministers of State who are religious, who are exemplary, who worship God, and who fear to disobey His laws, who judge justly and rule their people with equity.

Other Governors there are in this land who have no fear before their eyes, who think not of the consequences of their actions, working for their own desires, and these have brought Persia into great trouble and difficulty.

Triumph of Democracy

In the era that is ahead of us, the development of governmental agencies along lines of Bahai thought is inevitable, but this must be orderly process of evolutionary laws. National adjustment through violence is a theory already discarded by the practical mind. It is true that even in these modern days, the powers of brute force and of Democracy are ranged against each other; yet so long as there is one man in the world who can think and plan democratically, he is of the future and stands head and shoulders above those who cannot. His eventual success is assured.

The great despotic empires of Sumeria, Egypt, Assyria, Persia, Greece and Rome have left a tradition of violence, war and destruction; and are now no more.

Through the struggle of the European nations, the Catholic Church, in the sixteenth century, lost its claim to worldly and spiritual universal sovereignty.

The American and French Revolutions form the watershed which divides the autocratic form of government from the slowly evolving nation-states. Broadly regarded, the history of modern government, until the declaration of the First World War in 1914, has been the history of a steady widening of the basis of democratic powers.

The arrival on the political arena of the Communist, Fascist and Nazi totalitarian regimes, each with its own dictatorial ideology, has once more thrown our world into a convulsive revolution, and the democratic system is being attacked on all sides by the forces of disruption and anarchy.

However, as a student of the Bahai Cause, I retain a deep and abiding faith in Democracy and am confident that although its ideal is being subjected to a severe test by the present crisis, it will, sooner or later, emerge from confinement and, purified by adversity and torture, establish itself in all lands as the universal principle. Strengthened and ennobled, it will maintain supremacy, not with cannon and poison gas, bombers and submarines, but with shining hopes, liberal measures and humanitarian accomplishments, the whole actuated by high responsibility toward every form and expression of life.

"DA" AND "NIET"—"JA" AND "NEIN"

Injunctions to Iran and Turkey Only

Although Baha-O-Llah and later on Abdul Baha had enjoined their followers in Iran and Turkey to abstain from political affairs, this was but a temporary concession to the despotic rulers of those countries, made for the protection of a small minority. It was a measure taken, one may say, under fire. A close study of the dates when these orders were issued reveal this fact very plainly. Abdul Baha never would have given nor did he ever give any such advice to democratic countries, for if he had done so, the Bahai Cause would have been stigmatized as pro-autocratic and anti-social. He never would have commanded, as does the present-day Bahai Administration, the American and Canadian believers to refrain from all legitimate political activities, which are essential to the welfare of their nations. He never would have commanded, as does the present-day Bahai Administration, the American and Canadian believers to forego their voting prerogatives, when it is a case of candidates running on the fundamentally democratic two (or more) Party systems. He never would have forbidden, as does the present-day Bahai Administration, the American and Canadian believers to participate in the civic and national duties of their fellow countrymen; nor would he have accompanied these unpatriotic requirements with threats of expulsion from the Bahai community.

Abdul Baha never would have done such things, and he never did them. On the contrary, he advised the Americans most emphatically to take an active part in the politics of their country, and he told them that they should under no circumstances deprive themselves of the inestimable privilege of the vote.

Injunctions to the United States

As far back as 1907, about the time that the Turkish Investigation Committee had arrived in Acca from Constantinople (this being before the overthrow of the Ottoman Empire) Abdul Baha wrote to Mr. Thornton Chase, a prominent believer of Chicago:—

Thou hast asked regarding the political affairs. In the United States it is necessary that the citizens shall take part in elections. This is a necessary matter and no excuse from it is possible. . . . As the government of America is a republican form of government, it is necessary that all the citizens shall take part in the elections of officers and take part in the affairs of the Republic.

—Tablets of Abdul Baha Abbas, Vol. II, pages 342-343, Published by Bahai Publishing Socitey, Chicago, Ill., 1915.

The above statement is so simple that even a sixth grade child could grasp its meaning, and one would naturally think that there would never be occasion to misunderstand it. In each sentence, Abdul Baha repeats the word necessary:—

It is necessary that the citizens shall take part in elections.

This is a necessary matter and no excuse from it is possible.

As the government of America is a republican form of government, it is necessary, that all the citizens shall take part in the affairs of the Republic.

Evidently, Abdul Baha was trying to make his meaning as clear as crystal; he was stating, in so many words, that, inasmuch as the government of the United States was a Republic and not an Oriental Monarchy, free American citizens could not be compared to the enslaved subjects of the Shadow of Allah nor to the obedient servants of the Holy Caliph. Therefore, it was necessary for all of them to take part in the affairs of the nation.

No statement could be set forth more concretely, and yet the Bahai Administration, through culpable misinterpretation, has set aside the above clear injunction of Abdul Baha to the American Bahais, and has incorporated in its fundamental laws and applied to the citizens of the United States and Canada the concessions (temporary at that) made to the defunct empires of Iran and Turkey.

If the above quoted Tablet of Abdul Baha is not sufficient to prove that the Master made a clear distinction between Despotism and Democracy, the following report of a conversation that took place between him and a pilgrim, during the year 1907, makes the matter still more plain. Here, it is again significant to point out the fact that this note was recorded during the very year when the Turkish Investigation Committee was in Acca to interrogate Abdul Baha and to examine his affairs. Abdul Baha's remark shows that, however dangerous the circumstances, he did not mince words when the question of a principle was involved.

Asked if it were ever right to rebel against an earthly ruler, Abdul Baha replied:—

Yes, if he deals unjustly and tyrannically with his people he forfeits the right to govern them.

—Notes taken by A. S. D., Acca, October 16, 1907
(In Compilation of the Holy Utterances of Baha-O'llah and Abdul Baha, page 69. Publication authorized by the tenth Annual Convention of the Bahais of America held in Chicago, April 29-30, 1918).

I accept the above report as authentic, because I myself, on countless occasions, have heard the Master make substantially the same statement.

Abdul Baha's Policy Set Aside

The foundation on which the present-day non-political character of the Bahai Cause is based are the writings of Shoghi Effendi and the declarations of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, published in Bahai News. These are our sources of authoritative information; so, in order to get an impartial and unbiased understanding of the subject, we must now explore the above documents and compare them with Abdul Baha's teachings, to the end that we may find out how far they agree and to what extent they resemble each other.

Back in March 1932, Shoghi Effendi, in writing to the beloved of God and the hand-maids of the Merciful throughout the United States and Canada, says:—

I feel it, therefore, incumbent upon me to stress, now that the time is ripe, the importance of an instruction which, at the present stage of the evolution of our Faith, should be increasingly emphasized, irrespective of its application to the East or to the West. And this principle is no other than that which involves the non-participation by the adherents of the Faith of Baha-U-Llah, whether in their individual capacities or collectively as local or national Assemblies, in any form of activity that might be interpreted, either directly or indirectly, as an interference in the political affairs of any particular government. Whether it be in the publications which they initiate and supervise; or in their official and public deliberations; or in the posts they occupy and the services they render; or in the communications they address to their fellow-disciples; or in their dealings with men of eminence and authority; or in their affiliations with kindred societies and organizations, it is, I am firmly convinced, their first and sacred obligation to abstain from any word or deed that might be construed as a violation of this vital principle.

This sweeping command of the Guardian was like a bomb-shell thrown into the midst of a peaceful community. In the estimation of practically every believer who was even superficially conversant with the Teachings, this order was in direct contradiction to the instructions of Abdul Baha, most especially to his statement written to Mr. Thornton Chase 25 years earlier.

Athwart the continent, the pot of controversy boiled, and questions such as these were asked on all sides: On what grounds could a non-American religious leader, from his almost cloistered headquarters, 5,000 miles away in Haifa, Palestine, take it upon himself to lay the command upon citizens of the United States and Canada that they abstain from taking part, either directly or indirectly, in the legitimate political obligations of their respective countries? Was not this action, in itself, a direct interference in the affairs of other nations? Did not these governments count on the co-operation of their citizens, and would they welcome a loyalty to a foreign power superimposed on the national loyalty? Why, and on what logical basis, should an American or a Canadian Bahai think that his first and sacred obligation was to abstain from any word or deed that might be construed as a violation of this vital principle of aloofness? Did not this principle mean that the Bahais must abstain from all political participation in the affairs of their democracies; keep away from the polling booths on election day and, if need be, allow gangsters and racketeers to control by their votes the destiny of the unoffending citizenry? The question was asked: How could crooks and shysters be driven out of national and state offices, if the people who were supposed to be straight were deprived of their only weapon—the ballot?

The order of Shoghi Effendi was written in March, 1932, and ere long, the detailed letter including this order which was circulated throughout the continent, became the storm-center of heated debate. Then, in December of the same year, Bahai News published a statement by the National Spiritual Assembly under the title: The Non-Political Character of the Bahai Faith. After referring to the order of Shoghi Effendi the statement continues:—

This instruction raised among American believers the important question whether the act of voting, in the normal pursuance of the function of citizenship, should be construed as a participation in political matters.

Another letter written by his secretary gives the Guardian's view on the subject:—

He strongly feels that the friends should abstain from any election that is along party line.

Again, we have this statement addressed to the National Spiritual Assembly:—

This is the general and vital principle; it is for the National representatives to apply it with fidelity and vigor.

Then the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, feeling a great responsibility in applying the principle to all detailed situations that can arise among local communities, summarizes the Assembly's understanding of this new instruction in the following articles of Faith:—

1. Recognized Bahais of the United States and Canada shall not hereafter take part in any local, provincial or national election conducted by political parties, where votes are to be cast for one of two or more rival candidates.

Exhibit of The New History Society at the New York World's Fair, in 1939.

See page 488

2. Recognized Bahais shall not run for any public office as candidate of any political party, nor take part, directly or indirectly, in the promotion of any party or party platform.

3. Political issues of a partisan character shall not be discussed at Bahai meetings.

4. Recognized Bahais shall abstain from affiliation with movements . . . whether avowedly political in nature or, while non-political in name, advocating social changes that presume partisan political action.

5. Bahais who speak on Bahai platforms shall refrain from making . . . critical statements about any particular Government or National policy.

6. Every Local Spiritual Assembly shall be responsible for the carrying out of these instructions by the Bahais in their respective communities. Local membership lists shall include only the names of those believers who faithfully preserve the non-political character of the Faith.

—Bahai News, No. 69, December, 1932.

The above list of instructions makes startling reading to any citizen of the United States and Canada, but article 1, especially, gives us pause in these days when the idea of a one-candidate Party is far from unfamiliar.

One Ticket

Inasmuch as it is difficult to conceive of Democracy without Parties, the Bahais of the two great Democracies of North America are, by this act, automatically excluded from all participation in local, state and national elections.

On the other hand, there are two other important countries, Russia and Germany, which are known as totalitarian dictatorships, where political life is organized and conducted by means of a One Party system. Therefore the National Spiritual Assembly, in its provisions regarding the political set-up to be contemplated, must have taken a leaf out of the revolutionary chronicle of these countries, which enjoy the very questionable privilege of One monopolistic Party and One Ticket.

In Russia, the dictatorship of the Proletariat has removed the burden of political thinking from the minds of the people. The Parties are liquidated; the liberals either are taking a sojourn in Siberia or have sought refuge in foreign lands, leaving to the comrades all the privileges and rights of voting for the One Communist Party, on its single ticket headed by the perennial Joseph Stalin. Yes, the Russians of today have been able to vote DA, in all safety—or niet, at the risk of their heads.

In Germany, the National Socialist Party, in order to glorify the Fatherland, got rid of all the bothersome Parties; purged the country of all the democrats; sent the intellectuals to concentration camps and drove the Jews and non-Aryans out of the third Reich. Then to the sound of trumpets, martial music, mass-herding and the singing of Horst Wessel and Deutschland Ueber Alles, all the goose-stepping German folk and simon-pure Aryans gathered together in the one and only National Socialist Party, headed by Reichsfürer Adolf Hitler. Yes, the Germans of today can vote JA in all safety—or nein, at the peril of their lives.

Now, I venture to think that the Bahai Administration, with its allowance for a one Party system and its principle of letting the country go to the dogs, or to the wolves, would have been welcomed in Russia yesterday; today we do not know; and in Germany, yesterday, today and unfortunately tomorrow too. The Bahais would be enrolled as members in good standing—models of regimentation, uniformity, obedience and subserviency. It is certain that no Dictator would find their presence irksome or disturbing.

Unrest in Bahai Household

The publication of the above listed articles on the non-participation of Bahais in politics caused great commotion among the followers of the Faith in the United States and Canada. Many sharply disagreed with these Draconian rules and totalitarian measures; some, with a good deal of bitterness, compared them to the teachings of Abdul Baha and, finally, a few wrote to Shoghi Effendi, expressing their surprise and bewilderment. The atmosphere was charged with electric arguments, pro and con.

Many liberal Bahais, honestly and sincerely, considered that the Cause had been betrayed and its principles pilloried on a totem-pole of misunderstanding. The future of the movement had been sold across the counter for a mess of improvident pottage and its ideals sacrificed and abandoned. For a few months, there was no rest in the Bahai household; the opinions expressed were wide apart, for some keenly felt their responsibility toward the Cause, while others, more concerned with keeping out of trouble, were therefore willing to confide both mind and conscience to the tender mercies of the Administration.

The dissatisfaction and remonstrances on the part of the Bahais at length forced the National Spiritual Assembly to publish an explanatory statement in the February 1933 issue, No. 71, of Bahai News. The writer of the article makes a weak attempt to assure the believers that no radical departure from the original teachings had been made, and is quite confident that the grave doubts which had arisen in the minds of the Bahais could, through local consultations, be removed, creating not merely an occasion for blind obedience, but rather for conscious, grateful co-operation. Finally, in order to pour oil over the troubled waters, he makes an utterly meaningless concession, presupposing a possible political situation in which the Bahais could vote; although, he must have known that such a situation has never existed, nor will it ever exist in a democratic or republican form of government. Here is the incredibly fatuous concession:—

The instruction not to take part in political elections leaves us free to vote in any election where the various political parties have combined upon one candidate or one ticket.

Here we are back again in Russia or Germany, or rather, we are being helped forward toward an equally sinister form of government to supplant our Democracy in this country; but whatever the details of this sad postulate, or whatever the name to be used, be it old or new, we can only say, and with all our hearts: In America at least, God forbid!

It is, indeed, a sad commentary on the lack of imagination and acumen on the part of a large percentage of the Bahais, that during all these years the National Spiritual Assembly has been able to pull the wool over their eyes by means of such specious reasoning.

On the other hand, there were some who strove to retain their political rights; therefore, the National Spiritual Assembly once more had to go on record, not only to guard the inviolability of its own word but to protect Shoghi Effendi from further molestation. An elaborate communication, in the form of an open letter to the Beloved Friends, in the April 1933 issue, No. 72, of Bahai News, appealed to the emotional and religious ideals and convictions of the reader, so that the best possible construction might be allowed to a very precarious situation. The writer makes a heroic effort to defend a principle that is indefensible and, whenever he finds himself in a tight corner, resorts to sanctimonious flourishes and undulations, such as may be noticed in the following passage:—

The matter of the non-political character of the Bahai Faith has arisen this year for the purpose of stimulating deeper awareness of our privileges and responsibilities in the World Order of Baha-U-Llah. Only four years ago the Guardian first upheld that glorious conception of the goal toward which humanity is being so rapidly impelled by the power of the divine Will.

For many of us, the idea that we should no longer take any part in the normal political activities of our environment came as a distinct shock.

A distinct shock? That is a mild way of putting it! It was an earthquake, a head-on collision that threw many a sincere Bahai reeling toward the precipice of spiritual collapse. Yet, listen to the pietistic interpretation of the inspiring new attitude:—

The need that we arise to a higher vision and a more universal loyalty was not at first easy to appreciate. But little by little, thanks to the guidance given us by Shoghi Effendi, we can assimilate and make part of ourselves this inspiring new attitude the Guardian wishes for the protection of the Cause and our own spiritual well-being.

Free as Air

And now once more the chimerical situation presented in the February (1933) issue of Bahai News is paraded before the bewildered eyes of the believers:—

We are all free to vote in such elections as are non-partisan—that is, where the parties have combined upon one set of candidates, and voting is not merely a choice between two or more party tickets.

We are all free to vote! Free as air! Isn't that generous? Isn't that wonderful? For a moment, we were nervous; but now we are relieved, indeed! Yet, on second thought, where shall we vote? Certainly not in the United States, nor in Canada, nor in England, nor in Australia, nor in New Zealand, nor in any of the Democracies; because in none of these countries do the Parties ever combine upon one set of candidates. Where shall it be then? Please, don't offer us Russia again, nor Germany; for, even if we do fit in with the regime of those countries, even if they are likely to consider us in every way desirable, we do have a sneaking feeling that, sooner or later, the Democracies will come out on top. We remember that Abdul Baha also said so; but, probably that is one of his sayings that we are supposed to forget.

A Strange Local

To go back to the open letter. The writer proceeds, striking a cadence on the calm peace and steadfast faith that marks the true Bahai. This brand of talk is intended to divert the attention of the victim from the main topic and lull him into the mythical Sahara of a somnambulent, denaturalized idealism. Listen:—

In a world through which run so many conflicting torrents of popular passion and partisan struggle, the spirit of calm peace, of steadfast faith and unswerving assurance marks the true Bahai and sets off a Bahai community from every other type of human gathering. . . . In the establishment of Local, National and International Bahai communities, we have the most glorious field of service ever granted to man.

This seems to be a perfect description of a self-centered, self-satisfied, self-contained, self-opinionated, self-applauding community, useless in every sense of the word to the country that harbors, maintains and protects it. A community, set off from every other type of human gathering, bringing to mind but one thing—a cemetery, which also is set off from every other type of human gathering; in which all the conflicting torrents of popular passion and partisan struggle are eternally stilled, and where, among the tombs, there broods the spirit of calm peace. A strange local indeed for the successors of the Babis and early Bahais, those intrepid, ever-wakeful men and women, who had the will to die and the nerve to live in order that the principles of their Masters might become dominant in the affairs of men!

CHAPTER XX

BAHAI NON-PARTICIPATION IN POLITICS

A Vision of Eternity

Bahais must never forget that they are members of a community that extends beyond the borders of one country and the Guardian's instructions covering non-participation in politics are not based upon human representations in any given communities but upon his vision over cons of time and the results which would follow the actions of the present time.

The above statement, made by the National Spiritual Assembly, presents two points very clearly. First: the Bahais are members of an international community. Second: the Guardian's instructions to them are based upon the future which is discernible to him.

We gather then that the believers must forego local political activities because of their bearing, whether evident or not, upon the larger scene; also, that Shoghi Effendi's vision actually extends beyond the confines of the centuries (according to the dictionary, cons of time means an infinite space of time---eternity). This latter assertion is a stupendous one. It leaves us breathless; for if true, the Guardian emerges from the station of man, seer or prophet, and becomes a conscious part of the Godhead. The National Spiritual Assembly continues:—

obedience to him in the assurance that the wisdom of the principle will become more and more apparent as time goes on.

And now:—

As the new consciousness is universal and not local, the believers cannot lower this standard by participation in divisional activities.

Once more:—

It was generally agreed that if the world cannot be saved, it matters not at all whether one or another is elected, whereas the Bahais are called by Shoghi Effendi to establish the new world order of Baha-U-Llah.

Physician Heal Thyself!

These instructions give pause to the average citizen of the United States, and especially to the American Bahai who has been trained, through the teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, to co-operate with all systems that are tending toward a larger life for the human race. To these people, this type of reasoning applies to the man who, while neglecting his own character, thinks of improving the characters of others; to the community which, unconcerned with righteousness and justice, looks for these qualities in other communities. Physician, heal thyself! is an old maxim; and it would seem that it is the duty of every American to set himself to putting his own national house in order, before attempting to bring order to the world. A person endowed with the Bahai ideal (whether or not he be a Bahai) could well expend his energies on both causes at the same time; but it is difficult to allow exemption from national responsibility to one who claims international citizenship.

Inclusion of a Larger Loyalty

If the National Spiritual Assembly had been consistent in the formulation of its policies, it would have realized the untenability of its position; because, on the one hand, it makes a point of exacting of the Bahais obedience to the ordinances of their government while, on the other hand, by denying them the right to perform their civic and national duties as law-abiding and progressive citizens, it prevents them from so doing. Obviously, Abdul Baha did not invite the Americans to accept the universal teachings of Baha-O-Llah, in order to divest them of their responsibilities as citizens of the United States. It is true that, on embracing the Cause, an American immediately becomes member of a world-wide community composed of Persians, Turks, Hindus, Frenchmen, Englishmen, Chinese, etc., but this larger loyalty does not curtail his loyalty to the United States. When individuals become Bahais, they lose their national prejudices, not their national rights and obligations. Like variegated flowers in a garden, they contribute their beauty to the general scene, while retaining their own distinctive color and fragrance. The sun of the New Day shines upon all, and the mercy of the Almighty envelops the first and the last. The Bahais will co-operate and learn from one another. They will not throw away their hard-won liberties, but will share them with their new-found brethren; for Baha-O-Llah did not come to abrogate the cherished freedoms of humanity, but to enlarge and spread them over the wide expanse of the earth.

The Teachings of the Faith Must be Set Aside

At this point, it is interesting to note that the National Spiritual Assembly, while denying the Bahais rational and humane participation in the constructive civic and social affairs of their country, has urged these same Bahais to register their names for service in the military preparations of the United States; and this, regardless of the already quoted words: the believers cannot lower this standard by participation in divisional activities. I suppose that killing is not regarded as a divisional activity. The people are dead, and that is the end of them!

A letter written in 1939 by the Guardian's secretary to the National Spiritual Assembly of the British Isles reveals Shoghi Effendi's views on the subject of military service:—

It is still his firm conviction that the believers, while expressing their readiness to unreservedly obey any directions that the authorities may issue concerning national service in time of war, should also, and while there is yet no outbreak of hostilities, appeal to the government for exemption from active military service in a combatant capacity, stressing the fact that in doing so they are not prompted by any selfish considerations but by the sole and supreme motive of upholding the Teachings of their Faith, which make it a moral obligation for them to desist from any act that would involve them in direct warfare with their fellow-humans of any other race or nation.

—Bahai News, No. 132, January, 1940, page 1.

Here we find that the believers should appeal to the government for exemption from active military service, stressing the fact that they are prompted by the sole and supreme motive of upholding the Teachings of their Faith. Nevertheless, they must express their readiness to unreservedly obey any directions that the authorities may issue concerning national service in time of war. Thus in order to be on good terms with the government, the Teachings of the Faith must, if necessary, be set aside.

In the Front Line or in Jail

According to my belief, it is good to stand by one's principles. If a man's conscience allows him to fight, and he steps forward to give his all, one cannot but respect him. On the other hand, if he has consecrated himself to the system of pacifism (as I myself have) neither displeasure of government nor the fear of punishment bears the slightest weight. At least, let us be clean-cut about it, taking the risks that are entailed in our conscientious choice; and may we never entreat for indulgence and special privileges when the question of moral obligation is involved!

In a book entitled The Men I Killed written by Brigadier General Frank Percy Crozier, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., published by Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc., New York, 1938, the following dedication appears on the fly-leaf:—

to the end in the front line, and to the genuine conscientious objectors of all nations who stuck it to the end in jail, this book is dedicated.

Now, I would like to see Bahais in either or both of these groups; but to imagine them, with their tails between their legs, begging the government for permission to uphold the Teachings of the Faith is pitiful, to put it mildly. Indeed, the picture is not in accord with their background, their calling nor their name.

Thus, in abstaining from divisional activities through the ballot (because of the fact that the Bahai movement is an international one), and in taking part in divisional activities through the bayonet and bomb (in spite of the fact that the Bahai movement is an international one), the Bahais have assumed a totally illogical position. They cannot maintain it by argument, because they have forsworn their principles, but can merely lower their eyes and feebly rattle their chains in explanation.

Protracted Discussion

To their credit, it can at least be said that the liberal elements in the Assemblies of the United States and Canada did not accept the ruling on non-participation in political affairs without protracted protest. As a consequence, the subject was brought up for discussion and debate before the 25th Annual Bahai Convention held in Chicago during the month of April, 1933.

The July issue of Bahai News (1933) gives us the following under the heading The Story of the Convention:—

Therefore, the first subject for consultation was "The Non-Political Character of the Bahai Faith."

In opening the discussion, the chairman pointed out that with the receipt of the Guardian's letter, "The Golden Age of the Cause of Baha'u'llah," the opposition of the Guardian to participation in party politics became apparent and that later individual Bahais as well as the National Spiritual Assembly received communications saying that Bahais must not vote in any election based upon personal allegiances or partisanship.

These instructions seem to have been misunderstood by a number of the friends and it was felt wise that they should be thoroughly discussed in order that some general understanding and action might be formulated by the Convention.

Mr. Holley in giving the highlights of the subject said that the first intimation that the National Spiritual Assembly had had that the Guardian did not desire the American believers to vote was on receipt of a letter to a believer containing this instruction from the Guardian.

About the same time another believer sent in a copy of a tablet from Abdul Baha to Thornton Chase in which Abdul Baha said American citizens must vote. With these apparently conflicting instructions before it, the National Spiritual Assembly wrote to the Guardian to inquire if he were now setting aside the tablet. In his reply the Guardian said that the instruction of Abdul Baha is not conclusive under present conditions and expressed his abhorrence of political affairs, pointing out that the National Spiritual Assembly is obligated to carry out his instructions on the subject. The National Spiritual Assembly therefore drafted the article which appeared in the Bahai News of December, 1932, and which was considered by some as somewhat drastic. It resulted in the exchange of several communications between the National Spiritual Assembly and the Guardian. —Bahai News, No. 75, July 1933.

The Tablet to Mr. Thornton Chase, already quoted, may here be referred to, and I doubt if any reader, Bahai or otherwise, will find Abdul Baha's instructions on the necessity for voting in any way ambiguous or susceptible to any interpretation other than its plain surface meaning. Here then we have a revealing picture of the way in which the Guardian reaches conclusions.

1. He delivers the opinion that Abdul Baha's instruction is not conclusive under present conditions. Why? If it is inconclusive now, it must have been inconclusive in 1907 when it was written.

2. Shoghi Effendi expresses his abhorrence of political affairs. There is the point! The Guardian, living thousands of miles away, unfamiliar with the democratic processes of the New World, finds them distasteful, chooses to abhor them, and then expects all his followers to alter their palates so that they also may abhor them. I myself cannot help questioning the method of bringing personal taste into the problem at all.

3. Shoghi Effendi informs the National Spiritual Assembly that it is obligated to carry out his instructions on the subject. There is no attempt at reasoning; there is no necessity for it. It is a Caesarian order, pure and simple. In so many words, the Guardian says:—

Yours not to make reply,
Yours not to reason why,
Yours but to do and die.

Independent investigation! The least that can be said of this principle of Baha-O-Llah is that the very mention of it has, by this time, become heresy.

Tactful but Vigorous Handling

A subsequent letter from the Guardian published in Bahai News, No. 78, October 1933, contains a variety of instructions on the subject. Evidently, there was need for a more delicate treatment of the case, for Shoghi Effendi calls upon his lieutenants in the National Spiritual Assembly to handle the subject of the non-participation of Bahais of East and West in political affairs with the utmost circumspection, tact and vigilance. Let us read his new instructions:—

The handling of this delicate and vital problem regarding non-participation by Bahais of East and West in political affairs, calls for the utmost circumspection, tact, patience and vigilance on the part of those whose function and privilege is to guard, promote and administer the activities of a world-wide ever-advancing Cause. The misgivings and apprehensions of individual Bahais should be allayed and eventually completely dispelled. Any misconception of the sane and genuine patriotism that animates every Bahai heart, if it ever obscures or perplexes the minds of responsible government officials, should be instantly and courageously dissipated. Any deliberate misrepresentation by the enemies of the Cause of God, of the aim, the tenets and methods of the administrators of the Faith of Baha-U-Llah should be vigorously faced and its fallacy pitilessly exposed.

Here, I take the liberty of remarking that no responsible government officials in the United States would ever concern themselves with the non-participation of the Bahais in politics. One can take it into consideration that in the 1940 Presidential campaign, nearly fifty million Americans cast their votes; consequently, the absence or presence of 2,585 Bahais (the World Almanac 1941, Page 854) would be neither felt nor noticed. Thousands of others, on account of old age or infirmities, were unable to go to the polling booths; others again, disfranchised for a variety of reasons, did not make an appearance. Then, there always are some men and women who are too listless to take an interest in anything. The government expects to find a vast gap between its population and its voters, and will not inquire into reasons for absence at the polls.

In regard to deliberate misrepresentations by enemies of the aim, the tenets and methods of the Bahai Administration, I will state that because a few interested observers or a number of Bahais did not approve of the disfranchisement of this community and had sufficient concern to voice their opposition, this attitude on their part did not make of them enemies of the Cause of God who should be vigorously faced and their fallacy pitilessly exposed. These people were nothing of the sort. They were honest and sincere men and women, students of the Bahai teachings who couldn't adjust themselves to the new ordinances. Everybody cannot think alike, try as they will, and it would seem that the Bahai Cause is big enough to embrace different opinions, or at least respect them.

During 1932-33, this question was discussed at full length, and some cases of heresy came to light; in a few instances, suspects were dropped from membership on various committees and their places filled with the regulars. Then, little by little, the smoke of the battle drifted from the horizon of the Administration; the day had been won, definitely and completely, and if a handful of enemies of the Cause of God managed to make their escape from the vigorous and pitiless attacks of the forces of organization, these were left to lick their wounds in hide-outs and faraway places, and their very existence was presently forgotten.

In order to mark its definite victory over the opposition, the National Spiritual Assembly sums up the whole struggle from beginning to end in the January 1934 issue, No. 80, of Bahai News. The communiqué is entitled:—

The Non-Political Character of the Bahai Faith. A Statement prepared by the National Spiritual Assembly in Response to the Request for clarification of the subject voiced by the 1933 Annual Convention.

The communiqué is a long one, reviewing the successive instructions of the Guardian and the steps taken on the various fronts to establish the non-political character of the Bahai Faith.

Non-Participation in Bahai Politics

Having, to all intents and purposes, silenced the enemies of the Cause of God, Shoghi Effendi, looking toward the future, legislates an order for the adequate punishment of all those who may ignore the rulings of the new regime—i.e.: non-participation of all Bahais in the civic, social and political affairs of their countries.

This order is dated March 16, 1933, and published at the end of the above-mentioned communiqué:—

But if a certain person does enter into party politics and labors for the ascendancy of one party over another, and continues to do it against the expressed appeals and warnings of the Assembly, then the Assembly has the right to refuse him the right to vote in Bahai elections.

Bahai elections? Yes, my gentle reader! Although I admit that it is almost too quaint to be true; for the punishment meted out by Shoghi Effendi to the Bahais who do not accept his ruling of non-participation in the political affairs of the United States is—believe it, if you can—non-participation in the political affairs of the Bahai movement. Actually, the recalcitrant Bahais, who persist in co-operating with their government for the progress of the Democracy which their forefathers established on these shores, are deprived of membership in the Bahai political machine, an institution which has incorporated within itself all the stratagems, tricks and juggleries of Tammany Hall in its most flourishing days. Thus, the recalcitrant Bahai can no longer attend the Annual Bahai Conventions and sit behind closed doors in its secret sessions; he can no longer apply himself to electioneering, possibly for Tenth or Fifteenth Term candidates; he can no longer go to the Bahai polling booths nor take advantage of the Bahai absentee vote; he can no longer share in the little privileges that are allotted to members in good standing nor bask in the sunlight that is shed upon the humble by those who sit in High Places. Alas! He must resign himself to non-participation in Bahai political affairs, now and for evermore, as the price for being a self-respecting citizen of the United States, and for having tried to make his country a better place to live in.

PART EIGHT

A CONFESSION OF FAITH

21. I Believe in the Bahai Cause

Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts.

—Zechariah, Chapter 4, Verse 6

CHAPTER XXI

I BELIEVE IN THE BAHAI CAUSE

Religion and Theology

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me that religion is not dogma and creed; it is not metaphysics and speculation; it is not mystery and mystification; it is not a series of sanctified and mummified articles of faith and the performance of sacerdotal gymnastics. If we ever find sufficient courage to take our spiritual destiny into our hands, banishing these strange bedfellows to some lonely island from which they can never escape to molest us, we should have the chance of looking straight into the face of religion, and of discovering that, after all, it is not such an insidious enemy of mankind as it is represented by both its votaries and its adversaries. The Bahai Cause states that religion is truth, love, peace, beauty; it also is common sense, good humor and every-day helpfulness. It propounds the question: To what extent are you capable of serving your fellowmen, irrespective of race, color and creed? To what degree are you willing to forego your own so-called interests in the interests of others?

Thus, the Bahai Cause points to service as the highest commitment of religion—not service to your soul, not service to your religious group, but service to people and to principles. This emphasis on altruism is the approach to a humane, spiritual and scientific outlook upon life; it carries with it enthusiasm, indomitable persistence, an all-consuming faith in the final victory of good over evil, of right over might, together with an unshakable belief in the oneness of the essence of religion.

In the Bahai Cause is pointed out the too often forgotten yet important truth that the Founders of the Great Religions were born in the East and that all the Sacred Books were there revealed through the Minds of Eastern Prophets. Hence, the East is the fountain-head of Spiritual Knowledge and the power-house of inspiration in the phenomenal world. Just as the sun rises from the East to flood the earth with its warm rays, so has the Sun of Truth ever dawned in the hearts of Eastern Sages to illumine the world with the splendors of God's Revelations.

While the East has given us spiritual aspirations and ethical concepts of life, the West, according to its materialistic tendency, has constructed vast factories of theology. For ages, prosperous industrial ecclesiastics and privileged barons and princes of monopolistic sects have controlled the minds and the purse-strings of the Occidental nations and, while enriching their corporations, have starved the souls of the people. To all intents and purposes, they have usurped the moral sanction of the Holy Scriptures and dominated the religious scene with the whips of inflexible creeds.

At this juncture in history, the Bahai Cause strives to make it plain that the West is in need of a new outpouring of the spirit of the Prophets, so that it may be enabled to destroy the strongholds of religious materialism and fanatical orthodoxy; and, while bringing to an end the winter of religiosity, usher in the springtime of spiritual spontaneity.

This task once accomplished, it will not be at all difficult to think of religion, not as churches and synagogues, not as mosques and temples, not as theologies and ceremonial ritualism, but as self-illumination and self-realization; for it is an axiomatic fact that no one can lay a claim to the possession of religion before it is realized and witnessed in the inner recesses of the heart. We do not need priests, rabbis, mullahs, authoritarians and theologians to tell us what we should and what we should not believe insofar as religion is concerned. Religion is truth, and truth is religion; religion is love, and love is religion; religion is joy, and joy is religion. Religion is simple and not complex. Religion is caught and not taught. Religion is the whole of life, and not a segment of it. When theology is acquired, religion is lost.

We can dispense with theology and ecclesiasticism, but we cannot live without religion.

A Bahai does not subscribe to any separativeness. He does not believe in nationalism, in racialism, in sectarianism, in churchianism. The moment you imprison your religion within the four walls of a building, it is dead; and the best thing that you can do is to admit the fact and bury it quickly.

From time to time, man has changed the form of his theologies, even as he has changed his politics, his economics, his social life. He will continue to pass through these changes until the hour when the true, unchangeable Form of the Formless Religion is revealed to him in all its simplicity and majesty—the religion that is a good gift, a perfect gift, and which has ever come down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. (James, Chapter I, Verse 17.)

Unity

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me

that religion in its etymological sense means to connect, to unite and to bring the people closer together. On the other hand, any system of thought, no matter under what name it parades itself, which isolates, divides, separates and segregates man from his fellows, is not and cannot be designated as religion. A study of the Bahai Teachings makes it plain that this is the fundamental approach to religion.

An organized religion is hard, dour, rigid, iron-handed and iron-hearted; it is stern, arrogant, coercive and merciless. An administered religion has been, is and ever shall remain an arrested religion; for the premise that a few individuals or a net-work of individuals are able to organize or administer the spiritual realities of God, is an assumption as false as it is impertinent, and as outlandish as it is sacrilegious."

Here is the test of the true religion: Does it unite the minds and hearts of the people in the task of developing a stable society and a humane civilization? Does it make us more tolerant, more sympathetic, more compassionate, more joyous, more sincere, more loving? If it accomplishes these things, then it is religion, indeed, and it comes straight from the Creator of the Universe.

If, on the other hand, self-seeking and self-assertive organizers and administrators place theological and artificial obstacles in the pathway of its followers, it is certain that such a system of thought, in spite of any regenerative powers which it may possess, will be not only limited but also nullified, and that ere long man will embalm it as a mummy and put it away in the museum of religious monstrosities.

Abdul Baha said:—

If religion be the cause of enmity and rancor, if it should prove the cause of alienating men, assuredly non-religion would be better. For religion and the teachings which appertain to it are as a course of treatment. What is the object of any course of treatment? It is cure and healing. But if the outcome of a course of treatment should be productive of mere diagnosis and discussion of symptoms, the abolition of it is evidently preferable. In this sense, abandoning religion would be a step toward unity.

Universal Reconciliation

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me to keep the door of Bahai fellowship open wide to all humanity not excluding a single soul, no matter how sinister, how traitorous, how degraded or how inhuman! Hence, I have determined to associate in joy and fragrance with all, in the task of the education and development of mankind, and to envelop every creature with the mantle of love and forgiveness. My Master has warned us against being dogmatic and self-opinionated; he has told us to put his Ideals into practice, and he has commanded us to go forth, relying on his help, into the wide world to deliver his message of goodwill and cordiality to all the children of men. I heard his voice in the long ago, and since that time, his ideas have reverberated through the corridors of my mind, even as the sound of an angel-choir descending from the upper sky:—

This is the day of international friendship!

This is the era of world-wide association!

This is the age of universal reconciliation!

This is the time of economic brotherhood!

This is the century of mutual helpfulness!

O men! O women! O leaders! Forget your religious differences! Set aside your theological squabbles! Cast to the winds your credal misunderstandings! Come, and sit around the banquet-table of harmony! Away with suspicion! Away with dogmatism! Away with fanaticism! Away with falsehood and accusations! Away with litigations and lawsuits! We are all one—not only behind the veil of glory, but in the open court of the earth!

Protectionism

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me

a set of universal principles destined to regenerate the world of humanity. I am not the owner nor the proprietor of these principles; they were not given to me for safe-keeping, but rather on the understanding that I should share them with others.

The Bahai Cause does not foster a High Tariff Party, striving to create a monopoly of its assets under the deceptive title of Protection. Firstly, the Cause is in no need of protection and, secondly, neither Baha-O-Llah nor Abdul Baha was a protectionist. Instead, both of them asserted that the more recklessly we disseminate their teachings, the more we own them. Truth is its best protection; generosity is the wisest investment, and if the Bahai Cause is the truth, as I believe it to be, then let us give it away, scatter its jewels to the four winds of heaven and establish its domain throughout the length and breadth of the land. We can do this joyously, freely, abundantly and without reserve, for we are aware of the fact that when we unlock the doors of our spiritual treasury, our treasure remains but the safer, showing manifold increase.

Do we want a religion that will forever keep us in a legal nursery? Will we not welcome a religion that will help us to win our intellectual and spiritual freedom? If so, let us realize without loss of energy, and without any further litigations and lawsuits, that the Kingdom of Baha-O-Llah and his Spirit will never be found behind high tariff walls as embodied in the National and State Constitutions and By-laws of the Bahai Administration; nor will they even faintly be detected in Deeds of Trust or Corporation Charters. The Kingdom of Baha-O-Llah and his Spirit are to be discovered within us, as we live, aspire and work in every community for the furtherance of his Cause.

Therefore, I most respectfully submit: Let the undaunted soldiers of Baha-O-Allah and Abdul Baha wage a fiery and uninterrupted war against all the religious protectionists, legalists, fundamentalists, canonists and codificationists of an old and impossible world; and, relying on the confirmation of their Supreme Generals, let them carry on the campaign, both within the Cause and outside of it, until the enemies of freedom fail—until they fall.

Cooperation

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me

the fundamental doctrine of co-operation among the members of the human family, in religion, in politics, in science and in the arts. It emphasizes that in co-operation there is life; in isolation, there is death. As long as the cells of the body co-operate one with another, there is health; disease is lack of co-operation between the cells of one part and the cells of another part of the human anatomy.

A progressive Bahai cannot subscribe to an isolationist program; an enlightened Bahai cannot but be an internationalist.

It is an accepted fact that all the phenomena of life co-operate with one another. The sun co-operates with the mineral kingdom; the animal draws support from the mineral and vegetable worlds. Man is nothing less than the product of co-operation in all the lower kingdoms; then, how shall he refuse to co-operate with his own strata of existence, as expressed by the institutions of his age, through the civic, political and educational forces of his community, through the religious societies and clubs of his country and the peace agencies and philanthropic associations of his world? My Bahai faith proclaims that the mandate of nature as well as of God is the universal law of co-operation, and that from this law there is no escape.

Whenever the leaders of any religious organization, Bahai or otherwise, prescribe for their followers, and put into effect, a plan of non-co-operation with human beings, either individually or collectively, they automatically prepare for the inevitable, if slow, disintegration of their religion; for association, according to Baha-O-Llah, leads to union and harmony; and isolation is synonymous with dissolution and extinction.

As a Bahai I have been taught the following, and I have deemed it wise and true: Consort with all the people with joy and fragrance. Fellowship is the cause of unity, and unity is the source of order in the world. It is indeed a sad commentary on the attitude of certain religious leaders who have lost sight of the teachings of their own Faith to such a degree as to substitute the principle of co-operation with orders spelling the exact reverse. It is a still sadder commentary that in this age, there can be found men and women who are willing to follow such blind leaders.

Has it not been said of yore:—Blind leaders of the blind!

My Bahai faith, as a universal religion, enjoins upon me to live up to its claim one hundred percent by sincerely and cordially inviting all the races, all the nations and all the tribes of men to enter the circle of its benign and generous influence so that they may become part of its great destiny.

Initiative

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me

a plan for the reconstruction of the human commonwealth—the most bold and, at the same time, the most practical ever conceived. In order to help in its fulfillment, every Bahai must, in his own right, become bold and practical. Through his innate power, he must open up new fields of action and, through self-reflection and self-perception, arrive at self-confidence. His heart must be as an ever-playing fountain, tossing high the life-giving waters of truth in order to irrigate the parched grounds of the world of humanity.

He must become a lamp full of light; he must be active and fear not; he must go out from the solitary place like unto a shining star, blazing on its horizon.

In countless ways, the Founders of the Bahai Cause have striven to evoke the original and creative faculties that are latent within us; they have told us not to belittle ourselves by being mere copyists and repeaters of ideas; they have encouraged us to rely on our mental and spiritual resources, for we cannot know the worth of these resources until we have drawn upon them.

Today the Cause requires self-possessed, independent workers. It needs leaders and not henchmen. Courtiers have never served their countries nor their kind, for the man of parts is unwilling to stand first on one foot and then on the other in the close atmosphere of the audience chamber.

It has been said that humility is a part of wisdom, but it also has been said that in the assurance of strength, there is strength. And strength comes from God.

Let us then move, as hollow puppets, on the great stage of life. Through ourselves, we can accomplish nothing, but the Lord holds the strings—we know that; and, if we are willing to respond to the deft workings of His hand, we will play our parts nobly and well, and bring the performance to a triumphant conclusion. Again, we may consider ourselves as actors, and in every scene listen closely to the voice of the Prompter—the still small voice that sounds in the secret shrines of our own hearts—the voice that never fails us, that never leaves us stranded.

Baha-O-Llah addressing each one of us declares:—

I have created thee rich; why dost thou make thyself poor? Noble have I made thee; why dost thou degrade thyself? Of the essence of Knowledge have I manifested thee; why searchest for another than Me?

—Hidden Words, page 7.

The rich resources of spiritual independence are within us; the essences of divine wisdom are implanted in our hearts; the honors of the world of freedom are hidden in our minds. Deaf, dumb and blind, we do not put these inherent treasures into use but instead, like beggars, look to others for spiritual support and moral confidence.

Great is the strength of the individual soul who, relying on the spiritual trust deposited within him by Baha-O-Llah, will arise to spread his Cause! Such a soul will shine forever from the horizon of eternity and will be accounted as among the companions of the White Way.

With wings outstretched, he will soar toward the Kingdom of Heaven; as a flame, he will enkindle the seekers with the fire of the Love of God. Girding up the loins of endeavor, he will display universal efforts, being constantly revitalized with the breaths of the Holy Spirit.

Such an intrepid and resourceful Bahai is a confirmed Bahai. He is the herald of the Cause of Baha-O-Llah, the proclaimer of his message, the producer of his drama, the distributor of his ideas, the interpreter of his dreams, the flagbearer of his army and the disciple at his Threshold.

As if realizing the difficulties that such an individual will have to encounter in his career of service to the Bahai Cause, Abdul Baha thus addresses him: — Let not thy hands tremble nor thy heart be disturbed. (Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. I, page 170.)

A Bahai

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me that a Bahai is a follower of Light, a diffuser of Light, a lover of Light from whatsoever globe it is shining.

He is baptized in the waters of Truth and emancipated from the superstitions of the past.

He is delivered from the sea of names; he does not use signs of discrimination.

A Bahai, not recognizing any racial, national, religious or political prejudices, looks upon all mankind as the children of one Father, as the sheep of one Shepherd, as the stars of one heaven, as the birds of one meadow and the fruits of one tree.

He is unafraid of the authority of Church and State—of Organization and Administration.

He does not sit in judgment upon his brothers, nor does he place stumbling-blocks of ignorance and hatred on the pathway of the marching pilgrims.

He is not occupied with himself, but is intent on the betterment of the world and the training of nations.

He turns his eyes from foreignness and gazes toward oneness.

He does not glory in the love of country, but in the love of humanity as a whole.

He is as an artery, pulsating in the body of the created world.

A Bahai does not attribute to another that which he would not attribute to himself.

He consorts with all the people with joy and fragrance, seeing in their faces the countenance of his Lord, the Merciful, the Clement, the Compassionate.

He does not choose his associates, for God has chosen them for him at the creation; and these associates are the members of his own family scattered over the expanse of the earth.

He is an optimist; he recognizes only the beautiful and the good, and works for the establishment of these virtues in all localities and in all regions.

A Bahai reverences all the spiritual Law-givers that have successively appeared in the East to act as connecting channels between the Supreme Power and Humanity.

He does not concern himself with theological rulings and priestly privileges; but, building his life on internal sanction and turning his sight unto himself, he finds the Eternal Witness standing within him, powerful, mighty and supreme.

A Bahai is one who lives in the Everlasting.

What is a Bahai?

A Bahai is a torch in the darkness, a joy for grief, a sea for the thirsty, a refuge for the unfortunate, an arm for the oppressed. He is a home to the stranger, a remedy to the sick, a fortress to him who seeks protection. He is sight for the blind, a path for the strayed, dew for the earth of kindness, a bark for the sea of knowledge, a sun for the heaven of generosity—a white point upon the brow of the world.

Love of Liberty

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me that the mission of the Prophets and sages of the past was to assemble the scattered fragments of humanity into a whole and to establish the rule of spiritual democracy on the five continents and the islands of the seas.

This is the fiat of Providence, the concern of Heaven and the will of the supreme Architect of the New World Order—Baha-O-Llah.

There may be those within the Bahai Administration and outside of it who may claim that they can level to the surface of a smooth plain the towering Himalayas; they may pretend that they are able to turn backward the flow of the mighty Niagara; they may maintain that they can stop the sun from rising or the winds from blowing; they may announce that they can arrest the march of the spinning globes, hinder the law of universal evolution and progress, damn to eternal perdition the children of the Almighty, or silence God in His Chamber of Melodies and imprison Him in their catacombs of death!

Well, they may lay claim to all these things, and indeed they yet may even have power to perform much weird jugglery and many a fantastic miracle; yet of one thing I entertain not the slightest doubt. It is this:—

They cannot and will never be able to stop, even for a second, the irresistible, uprushing and world-encircling power of BAHAI love and the love of liberty that surges and storms in the minds and hearts of the freedmen of Baha-O-Llah. Such religious technicians together with all the principalities, kingdoms and empires of the earth will be baffled before these individuals who have understood and suffered, who have fixed their eyes on the horizon lit by their Lord and cried out: We have found Baha and we are his ransom.

O freedmen of Baha-O-Llah! Possess daring, to dream the dreams of your Master; then coin these dreams into deeds of emancipation, so as to set their mark on the coming ages. Pave the pathways of your countryside with the accomplishments of intelligence and wisdom. Be compassionate to your enemies and ill-wishers. Seize life by never seizing it, and work unremittingly in this blood-drenched, hate-encircled world to the end that it may be transformed into a moonlit and dream-visited planet!

The Company of Free Individual Bahais

I believe in the Bahai Cause

for it has taught me that it is the Way of God to man and the way of man to God. It is the religion of Truth unveiled before the eyes of the seekers, and the truth of religion heralded from the house-tops. It is the source of all good and the origin of all honor. It is the principle of a Faith that inspires men to lessen words and increase deeds; for he whose words exceed his acts, his non-being is better than his being and his death better than his life. It is the root of knowledge, the mainspring of love and the power-house of endurance and self-sacrifice through which mankind shall be developed and exalted. It is freedom from the superstitions and imitations that have kept the people imprisoned in the dark jails of ignorance.

The Bahai Cause is not simply a religion or a faith; it is not simply a philosophy or a movement; it pre-eminently is a system of constructive thinking and a way of wholesome living that never can lend itself to rigid organization or arid regimentation. It is the assertion of man's immortal spirit, and a rallying cry for those unvanquished heroes who have dedicated themselves to the cause of the new civilization which is destined to emerge from the chaos of our time.

The Bahai Administration, on its part, has expended every effort to confine this limitless Ocean in a bottle and to reduce this glorious Light to a faint glow; and it might conceivably have succeeded in its destructive work, had it not been for the clear-cut decision of Justice Louis A. Valente, rendered in the Supreme Court of New York, which was sustained by the Appellate Division of the same county. That decision was based on a very simple theme—liberty of religious practice; yet, actually, it is packed with dynamite. It will become the cornerstone of developing Bahai activity in this country and throughout the world. Indeed, God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet (Psalms 47, Verse 5), and reactionary leaders of all types would do well to hearken to that sound!

At this juncture in human history, when Democracy is meeting its crucial test before the embattled hosts of Totalitarianism, the Bahai Cause, as the spiritual Democracy of these times, was likewise forced to the encounter. It would seem that that struggle was inevitable in an epoch when the fundamental principle of Liberty is at stake everywhere, to be lost or won, to be blotted out in daily life or worn as a badge of honor, to be annihilated or set on the path of development and progress, where liberty as measured today will be slavery as measured tomorrow.

It is not an exaggeration to state that the aroused conscience of a considerable part of the Bahai world has expressed itself in the simple words of Justice Valente. Through this decision, and in spite of the theological barricades raised by the Bahai Administration, those who feel themselves called upon to serve the Cause independently will be strengthened in their resolve. Obviously, they would have preferred to please the representative of Abdul Baha by co-operating with the National Spiritual Assembly, even as I myself would have so preferred; but, sometimes a choice has to be made. In this case, the Cause of the Bab, Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha waits patiently on the one hand, while the Bahai Administration sits enthroned on the other. We cannot have them both; therefore, which shall it be? Abdul Baha once said that if, in the face of two important issues, it is incumbent upon us to make a decision, we must choose the more important. Then, shall we take our places in the wake of the Glorious Dispossessed or shall we stand at attention before the monopolistic powers? This is a problem which each of us must answer for himself.

Baha-O-Llah's hammer-stroke of fate is sounding! Now is the time! Now is the accepted time! Let the disillusioned regimented Bahais, everywhere, arise and break the chains and fetters that are binding them to a despotic Administration! This is their opportunity to defy the tyrants within the Cause, even as Baha-O-Llah himself defied the tyrants that had subverted the former religions.

It is certain that, in that New World which we as Bahais have been taught to expect, which we in faith have anticipated, the followers of Baha-O-Llah will play no small part. Rising from each community, from each state, from each country, eager, determined children of the New Day shall form themselves into a formless Order—THE COMPANY OF FREE INDIVIDUAL BAHAIS; and these persons, known and unknown to one another, within organizations (even the Bahai organization) and outside of them, shall carry the name of their Lord to every region and take active part in the establishment of his Kingdom upon the earth.

May God be the support of the teachers who shall travel to these countries, and their helper!

Formerly they were as moths, but they shall become as royal falcons. Formerly they were as bubbles, but they shall become the sea!

Who was Baha-O-Llah?

He was the divine Advocate of man's emancipation from the thralldom of former ages. His ideas were not static and temporary, but dynamic and eternal. He was a man of peace, but also he was a man of battle; and he led the army of New Ideas against the army of tradition. He was the personification of a spiritual and intensely human genius. He had daring and sublime self-confidence. While the enlightened religionists of his day gazed fearfully into the depths of prejudice and intolerance where their fellowmen were disporting themselves, he, with one stride, bridged the abyss and, in the face of the storm which rose about him on every side, he called on the kings and rulers of the earth, and on men and women in all walks of life, to arise, to move and to unite, in the name of freedom and in the cause of the oppressed and the downtrodden. Baha-O-Llah fought his battles without reserve.

Now, our time has arrived; our hour has struck! We, THE COMPANY OF FREE INDIVIDUAL BAHAIS must continue his work!

The Bounties of the Omnipotent are inexhaustible and they shall pour upon us! The Favors of the Merciful are boundless and they shall surround us! The Gifts of the King of Kings are numberless and they shall be given unto us! The Glories of the Father are resplendent and they shall encircle us! There is no cause for anxiety and no reason for backwardness. THE COMPANY OF FREE INDIVIDUAL BAHAIS, which always has been in existence, must now become vocal, active, imperative; and let us remember, let us constantly remember that Abdul Baha anticipated us and spoke of our coming. He said:—

The hosts of the Kingdom of Abha are drawn up and filed in battle array on the plain of the Supreme Concourse and are expecting that a band of volunteers will step upon the field of action with the intention of service, so that they may assist that band and make it victorious and triumphant.

—Bahai Scriptures, pages 490-491.

The attitude to be taken and the services to be rendered by this band of volunteers, THE COMPANY OF FREE INDIVIDUAL BAHAIS, are outlined and enumerated by Abdul Baha. Addressing them he says:—

Be not seated and silent. Diffuse the glad-tidings of the Kingdom far and wide to the ears; promulgate the Word of God. . . . Arise with such qualities and attributes that ye may continually bestow life on the body of the world, and nurse the infants of the universe up to the station of maturity and perfection. Enkindle with all your might, in every meeting the light of the love of God, gladden and cheer every heart with the utmost loving-kindness, show forth your love to the strangers just as you show to your relatives. If a soul is seeking a quarrel, ask ye reconciliation; if he blame ye, praise him; if he give you a deadly poison, bestow an all-healing antidote; if he createth death, administer ye eternal life; if he becometh a thorn, change ye into roses and hyacinths. Perchance, through such deeds and words, this darkened world will become illuminated; this terrestrial universe will become transformed into a heavenly realm, and this satanic prison become a divine court; warfare and bloodshed be annihilated and love and faithfulness hoist the tent of unity upon the apex of the world.

—Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. III, pages 503-504.

Therefore, let THE COMPANY OF FREE INDIVIDUAL BAHAIS step upon the field of action with the intention of service so that the Hosts of the Kingdom of Abha may make it victorious and triumphant!

PART NINE

ACTION AND REACTION

22. Out of the Mail Bag

And ye are witnesses of these things.

—St. Luke, Chapter 24, Verse 48

DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
Pastor of the Community Church of New York City

CHAPTER XXII

OUT OF THE MAIL BAG

While the articles which constitute this book were appearing in New History, the mail bag was becoming heavier than usual. Friends, strangers, and especially Bahais felt called upon to express themselves on the problems which the legal action had brought to light. Therefore, a great deal of interesting correspondence was carried on. All the letters received have been placed for reference in the office files. There were hundreds of these letters coming from all parts of the country and from abroad, expressing, naturally, different angles and shades of thought. Indeed, they comprise a slice of life on subject-matter that is seldom dealt with! For this reason, it has been deemed advisable to make some extracts for publication.

Communications, reproduced herewith either in part or in whole, excepting the four historic letters from Dr. John Haynes Holmes as well as a letter from Palestine and one from India, are presented without identification—the matter of moment being the content of the statements, rather than the status of the writers.

April 1, 1940

Dear Mr. Sohrab:

I have read with the greatest interest and with seething indignation your complete Statement with correspondence as published in the April issue of NEW HISTORY.

It's all news to me that Mr. and Mrs. Chanler have been victims of such cruel persecution from the Bahai authorities. This latest attack seems incredible, and I would regard it as such did I not see the actual documents as you print them. Alas, it is the same old story of ecclesiasticism—the Church arrogating to itself all power, and persecuting the prophets and the saints.

I have always known that Mr. and Mrs. Chanler were utterly devoted persons, the unselfish and self-sacrificing servants of a great cause which has become central in their lives; but I never realized at what a price they were standing firm by their ideals. You have done us all a great service in making public the details of this story. Please convey to Mr. and Mrs. Chanler my sympathy and reverent regard, which I share with you as their devoted associate.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) John Haynes Holmes.

April 7, 1941

Dear Mrs. Chanler:

Thank you for letting me know the great victory you have won in the courts. I feel that this is a victory for us all, since it involves the great principle of freedom in religion. Imagine any group arrogantly claiming a monopoly in this great field. I congratulate you with all my heart, for I can realize what this long fight must have involved.

Believe me,

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) John Haynes Holmes.

April 21, 1941

Dear Mr. Sohrab:

I have read with absorbing interest your account of the famous lawsuit and the victory which has been won. More than ever do I feel that this is a victory for us all—a vindication in this country, in a trying circumstance, of our basic principle of religious liberty. There isn't one of us who doesn't owe an immeasurable debt to Mrs. Chanler and yourself. I hope this issue of NEW HISTORY together with the next issue containing your account of this affair, will be widely distributed in the libraries, for it is a document of genuine historical importance.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) John Haynes Holmes.

Sept. 30, 1941

Dear Mr. Sohrab:

I am mighty glad that this book is in hand, for this Bahai lawsuit is a chapter in the history of religious freedom in America. . . .

We have trying and difficult days ahead, and must close up our ranks tighter than ever.

(Signed) John Haynes Holmes.

* * * * *

The wise ones in the Bahai Cause will arise and say: "Praise be to God that Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha have opened our eyes to truth."

Those of opposite mind will either come forward with co-operative endeavor, or thrust our beloved Cause into chaos and confusion. They cannot refute the Word, which is absolute authority in your wonderful treatise.

* * * * *

Your little magazine New History, containing reference to the trade-marking of the name Bahai, etc., came today, and I have read the same very carefully. Allow me to say that I agree with every word of it. I have no brief for or against any individual or group. However, I have watched for years conditions going from bad to worse without meddling, because I see the end of it all.

* * * * *

My sympathies are entirely with Mr. and Mrs. Chanler's great work—what does it matter which way the Light is spread.

* * * * *

I am stirred to surprise and regret by the information you have conveyed to me concerning the strangely inconsistent effort of some Bahai representatives, to appropriate to private use the truly world-universal name and beauty of the Bahai faith.

This narrow, and, it seems to me, fundamentally selfish attempt, is surely directly contrary to all that the Bahai fellowship and devotion stand for. One need only try to imagine, today, a single body of Christians seeking to copyright the name itself of Christian. The error and narrowness of this other effort is, by such comparison, made to appear in its real aspect.

With earnest hope and prayer that such attempts will be withdrawn voluntarily, or, if not, will be defeated in their purpose, and assuring you that we feel that such noble-hearted and pure-spirited loyalty and labor as you and Mrs. Chanler have devoted to the Bahai faith for many notable years of service, should be sufficient to convince any but the sadly bigoted, of the wrong of trying to hamper your great self-sacrifice and witness of divine truth. . . .

* * * * *

I received your small booklet and have read it. You do not say anything about the Guardian of the Bahai Cause, Shoghi Effendi. The National Assembly do just as he suggests in all matters. I am surprised that Ahmad Sohrab, with his background, will not work with the main body of the Bahais.

* * * * *

I have never heard of it—I am re-reading and studying thoughtfully No. 7 issue (April). It has cleared up some subjects that were “foggy” to my way of thinking. I thank you.

* * * * *

I have just finished reading your statement in the April issue of the little magazine, New History, and am simply dumbfounded. The action described seems diametrically opposite to the fundamental teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, so far as I have learned from your compendium of their writings and teachings in your Bible of Mankind, I Heard Him Say and pamphlets.

* * * * *

Thank you for the April issue of New History. My reaction is twofold: interest in your side of the case as presented by you, which has all the earmarks of sincerity, genuineness and soundness, and bewilderment at the past and present action of the Chicago authorities in seeking and securing a patent on Bahai literature and trying to enforce their alleged rights. It is astounding. The legal aspects baffle my layman's mind. But, the whole world seems to have gone cuckoo, and from this you and Mr. and Mrs. Chanler may draw some comfort.

* * * * *

I read with great interest your statement regarding: Horace Holley. It is an impeachment equal to that of Warren Hastings.

* * * * *

Just a word to encourage you in your fight against the orthodoxy which wants to copyright and nullify the words of the Prophet. It has always been that way. Those who can only travel with a collar around their necks have to have some place to go—the others who can think and act for themselves will follow you.

* * * * *

I have read your pamphlets and will say that they are very well written, and no doubt do much good. I am sure however, that a man with your attainments could do much more for the Cause if you would join up with them and become one of the gang.

* * * * *

After reading from cover to cover the recently written statement by your pen regarding the trade-mark, Bahai, I felt so touched by the spiritual tone and the profound declaration of your conviction for the truth to be proclaimed for the Unification of the people of the World and their Emancipation. I read carefully every line of this most explicit article. I pray that this article will bring a peaceful solution for the difficulties in the path of the Followers of the Divine Teachings, who see the blood clot in religious freedom that is forming; an operation is necessary in order that the Will and Testament of Abdul Baha be obeyed.

* * * * *

Now Ahmad, I am speaking to you as a brother. I am for the underdog, but I want the Truth only. Mr. . . . and others stated that you denied the station and authority of the Guardian, and thus the Will of the Master. I defended you on the grounds that your present writing did not indicate it and that I had too much confidence in your loyalty to the Master to reject his specific command. The National Spiritual Assembly is determined to smash you on this rock alone.

* * * * *

I have read with interest the pamphlet you sent me concerning a very unusual court proceeding against The New History Society.

You have justice on your side, and I hope you will also have the law. I know comparatively little about trade-mark law, but my impression is that your contentions are sound. You evidently have good counsel.

* * * * *

Thanks, so much, for New History! It answers so many questions which I have been asked in regard to you and your connection with the National Bahai Organization so much better than I was able to answer them at the time. I have passed it on, to make the crooked thoughts straight.

Personally, I extend both hands to you both in understanding—understanding too deep for words.

* * * * *

I am praying that you will be vindicated in New York, as I feel that Shoghi Effendi, were he in possession of all the things necessary in the case, would feel a debt of gratitude is due any soul who tries to spread the Teachings, whether through book shop, temples, churches or schools.

* * * * *

I have wanted to tell you ever since the April number of the magazine when the great Silence was broken, as I had never heard one word of your side of the story.

I want to tell you how much I appreciate the little magazine, and when it comes every month, I just have to stop whatever I am doing and read it from cover to cover. It just strikes the nail on the head, for me. It clears my mentality, and I can see the whole Truth as you have it, that never can be adulterated, or organized.

God bless you. I am with you heart and hand, and have been from the very beginning. Yours is the sense of universal justice that lifts my heart to where it soars and sings. We need a consciousness as high as heaven to see all life as Love, all men as kings.

* * * * *

I was dumbfounded when I read about what the so-called Bahais are doing. Baha-O-Llah in the Hidden Words says, "I made you free, why are you a slave?" I take the same view as John Haynes Holmes, who so well expressed himself in the Oct. issue of New History. It is a deplorable condition at this time and age to confiscate the Word of God.

* * * * *

I read your magazine from cover to cover—because I had a tired moment—and I kept going, because the subject matter proved interesting.

Do you mean to say that a certain Bahai Cause pursues you because you independently branch out to teach its principles and axioms? Legally pursued! (altho' you use your own money). You're teaching it right—aren't you?

* * * * *

Most Bahai followers are very much of the dilettante order—you know this as well as I. But I will not quarrel with them. Let each soul travel the pathway of his choice. The worst trouble makers are generally the leaders.

* * * * *

And you Sohrab, don't send me your magazines no more. They are thrown into a waste paper basket. I am very particular what I read, and I have no time for your stuff.

* * * * *

I greatly sympathize with you in your troubles with personalities. But, this is beside the mark. Personalities have no importance in the Cause! We are striving to build an organization that will stand intact throughout the future ages—and it will be done. And even though the material that we start with is only one degree above the baboon, we must accomplish this mighty task of consolidating the Baha'i forces for posterity. It may be that you are on the negative side in order to show the rest of the Bahais that this divine cause cannot be divided. There has of necessity to be an opposite in all things.

* * * * *

Just as soon as a soul accepts Baha'u'llah as the prophet of his age, and obeys His teachings, I think that person is as much a Bahai as he could ever be. Some of the organized believers do this only in a very slight degree. The reward for following Baha'u'llah comes from a realm far removed from the world of man.

* * * * *

Your little magazine is very helpful and often has some valuable information in it. I can see your standpoint, and yet I do not approve of it for this reason: The people of the earth are not strong enough to walk alone in the world of spiritual thoughts. It is too foreign and contrary to that which they have been trained so far. You have been given the privilege of living with some of the highest Spirits that have manifested on the earth. Abdul Baha certainly was one of the greatest; Janabe Fazel was like Him in a lesser degree. Through the help of such souls you became free from the world of nature and the struggle for existence. Your life shows this.

* * * * *

We might say that most of the Bahai followers are like unto creatures shut up in an animal house—the world of nature is this animal dwelling. They have far to go before they can be free, soaring high in the sky of spiritual understanding. The freedom that you now have is unknown to these people, and they have no power to live and do as yourself.

* * * * *

I am not at all interested in your publication and must ask you . . . not to waste your postage by sending it to me. Should I ever want anything that you possess (which God forbid!) I shall quite cheerfully let you know.

* * * * *

Their stand was ridiculous. I am afraid many Christian denominations have hugged their good news to their hearts and kept others out. High fences are falling down.

* * * * *

Congratulations on bright victory achieved for humanity the American way.

* * * * *

Of course, I am delighted, but not surprised, that Mr. Shorab and you won the court decision. It seemed ridiculous to bring such a suit in a country founded at least on the principle, that men might worship in their own way. I should give it the utmost publicity.

* * * * *

I congratulate you and Mr. Sohrab upon your great victory. This world can never be a world of peace and happy brotherhood of mankind until cruelty to helpless creatures both human and dumb animals is controlled by righteous laws.

* * * * *

To you and to Mirza Sohrab my heartfelt congratulations for the successful defense of your case—which is a rare triumph indeed of tolerant, all-embracing, loving and warm-blooded religious spirit over narrow-minded formalism. Let us be generous in victory and concede to those forces which want to monopolize a living Creed that they mean well, but are victims of their own jealousy and fanaticism.

You, however, who have carried the torch without pretense, self-effacing and patient, and with such loving insight even into the hearts of your adversaries, you have won the triple award: the outward recognition, the inward justification, and finally the spreading of your methods to settle conflicts, namely to conquer by Love; to prevail by Humbleness.

You might not be aware of the far-reaching effects which your example might cause in a world which needs must be convinced soon that war and riots and violence breed naught but injustice, hatred and despair.

With more than usual interest I have followed your articles in New History since you revealed for the first time the intimate growth of your movement. And you revealed much more. Unknowingly perhaps, you showed us the advantages of taking a higher, impersonal and unimpassioned perspective, even on matters which are closest to our hearts. There was not a single instance of over-enthusiasm, of artificial fervor in those accounts of your religious struggles. On the contrary, everything was told as if it all had happened centuries ago. (And indeed it seemed to me a brilliant mirror of the period when Christianity changed from being a Faith to becoming a Church.)

And again, what impressed me most was your sympathy with your very adversaries; not a single instance of anger, of contempt or even of what is called righteous indignation. Only now and then some subtle humor which so delightfully relieved the tenseness of the situation; some gentle way of poking fun at your adversaries as is the custom amongst good friends. But a greater amount still of self-irony as if to say: "We're all sinners and each of us the worst of all." There was a tenderness, a charm, a serene wisdom in those essays;—so that our souls were captured at once and our minds were calmed with the knowledge that your cause shall prevail. * * * *

Warm congratulations and felicitations upon the thorough and decisive vindication of your entire position, from the Court! The dignity and courage with which you have conducted your part in this debate are worthy of all praise and of this complete verdict.

* * * * *

With greatest satisfaction I got the news, that at last you won a full victory in the case you so valiantly fought for.

Let me congratulate you and Mr. Sohrab for this success. I know how much this means to both of you, and how much it must mean to you to fight for a just cause.

* * * * *

Congratulations! Thank you for the Press Comments on your success in winning the suit that the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the U. S. and Canada brought against you. It delighted me beyond words.

You have rendered a great service to mankind in unmasking the members of the National Spiritual Assembly as the prototypes of the bigots of the dark ages. Their utter lack of wisdom in bringing this suit to prohibit your using the name Bahai, is the strongest evidence of their lack of the Spirit of the Bahai Religion. It has hastened the day hinted at by Abdul Baha when he said:

" . . . If we are not the instruments in spreading this Cause, others will be chosen. . . . God will raise up a people who will hoist the standard of God, who will ignite the Lamp of God, who will conquer the cities of the hearts, who will show forth the potency of the Word of God."—(Bahai Scriptures, Page 374)

* * * * *

Heartfelt congratulations to you and to Mrs. Chanler on your Victory! . . . May your work now go forward with greater joy and greater achievement.

We are so happy that you have overcome the obstacles put in your pathway—but such has ever been the experience of the constructive peoples of the earth.

May the forces of evil grow a million times weaker each day and the forces of good a million times stronger until the victory of Light for the world is won.

* * * * *

I wish to acknowledge your faithful promise to send me a leaflet on the Court procedure, for which I thank you. The verdict is what I predicted to our Local Spiritual Assembly sometime ago.

Religious freedom has been the inheritance of every creature on the American soil. Surely it would not be denied a believer in Baha'u'llah and Abdul Baha and Shoghi Effendi.

* * * * *

I am grateful to you both for the good news you sent me. It was the best news I have had in a long time. Truth sure was mightier than the sword of Excommunication. I don't understand where Mr. Holley and Co. got their ideas from, except from the Roman hierarchy. Baha-O-Llah says, "Why are you a slave when I made you free?" We have been slaves long enough. I hope some of the folks that made up the parties in your house will return back again and enjoy your hospitality and not be afraid of Excommunication.

* * * * *

Please accept and convey to Mrs. Chanler my congratulations on the verdict, about which there was no doubt from the very beginning.

* * * * *

My heartiest congratulations. This news made my heart get into my throat. It was the best I have had for a long time.

Oh what shameless creatures, waiting in the ambush like wild cats for their prey, to devour it.

I am rejoiced over the way the Judge handled the case, putting on them the water hose. How they belittled themselves, walking out like wet rats. . . . So there's where some of the Temple money goes. . . .

Now, I hope and pray that the true believers will wake up,—shake the shackles off our necks. You broke those horrid links. Praise God. . . . How we innocently had suffered. . . .

Now, more than ever, I wish I could be in Chicago and hear what they have to say. Perhaps many will be glad that this happened. Is Shoghi Effendi getting this report? I hope he gets the newspaper clippings and sees that the Cause is in the hands of non-Bahais, and that he was deceived by the sweet tongue of Satan.

* * * * *

Most sincerely I offer my hearty congratulations upon your success in the full establishment of your claims:—

“To draw the thing as you see it.

For the God of things as they are.”

I enjoy the little magazine and read it carefully, and delight in the decision the Court has given you. I do not know all the reasons for the controversy, but I believe in you both; that is quite enough. If I ever return to New York City to reside, I shall follow your phase of the Call most earnestly.

* * * * *

Above all let me felicitate you and Mrs. Chanler on the outcome of the court action which was so unjustly brought against you and your cause. Though I did not write to you for a long time, I have followed everything very closely in the writings you always send to me and which I always enjoy. Through them I never get out of touch with you, at least on my part.

* * * * *

You will forgive any undue delay in congratulating you and Mrs. Chanler on your victory for retention of individual freedom of conscience in religion as guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

* * * * *

Congratulations. I have only just opened the Press Comments on April 1st and 2nd you so kindly forwarded. I am indeed rejoiced to know that religious freedom is still preserved, that formalism and tyranny are again defeated. The right to learn and spread Truth is the most precious part of Freedom and is the only right worth striving for. True religion is the only remedy for our war-torn world.

* * * * *

I spoke to some of the delegates about a girl who got married, and for a long time cooked steak, so her husband said, "Dearie, why do you not use your brain and cook up something else?" "I am trying," she said, "but it is always steak." So I said the same is with the election. They do not try to get someone else on the board of the National Spiritual Assembly.

What a glorious privilege was yours to vindicate the Truth of the Bahai Cause. "Justice is to be desired above all things." You cannot organize the Bahai Cause, Abdul Baha told us in the very beginning of the Cause. So many things have crept into the method of teaching the Cause; but I have been thankful I heard, and was taught from the source, so I kept quiet, but I knew what Abdul Baha had said—so rested on His words. . . . God is not to be mocked nor hindered by man's interpretation, for He rules mighty and supreme.

* * * * *

It will give me the greatest pleasure if you will no longer send me your publication: in fact I request you to cross my name off your list entirely and oblige.

* * * * *

As the road is now clear to carry on with your teaching efforts, let every effort be given to the spreading of the Bahai Cause. The differences between a few people must be forgotten.

* * * * *

Grand too of you and Mr. Shorab to send me the copies of your periodicals that tell of your glorious victory for FREEDOM OF RELIGION. We congratulate you both.

Our best wishes in your great work for TRUTH and FREEDOM.

* * * * *

I was really happy when I read, the other day, in your magazine about the decision given by Justice Valente in your favor. It is really a triumph of Truth and Freedom over selfishness and bigotry. More Power to you! Please extend my heartiest congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Chanler also. Now, I am glad, you can spread your message with more freedom and power than ever.

* * * * *

I want to register my satisfaction at the decision reached by Justice Valente in the long-drawn suit conducted to harass and hinder Mr. Sohrab and Mrs. Chauler. Any other decision would have struck a vital blow at the religious freedom guaranteed under the U. S. Constitution.

* * * * *

Permit me to congratulate you on your great victory. Although I have never doubted for a moment that the New History Society was in its rights and that this ugly controversy must be decided in your favor, I could not help feeling relieved when I received the printed announcement of the Court Decision and thus saw my expectation confirmed.

I read the May issue of your little magazine over and over; I was in my thoughts with you all, back in the New History office at 132 East 65th Street, and lived with you through the breathtaking minutes which you so masterfully described.

* * * * *

It seems incredible that the N. S. A. should appeal the case after such a clear cut decision made by Judge Louis A. Valente, and repeat the same mistake again in regard to the telephone book listing. It only goes to prove how veiled they are. Too bad you have to go all over the case again. They evidently cannot see that they are wrong. I think, perhaps after 5 judges give the same decision they will believe it.

* * * * *

a moment of great enthusiasm, tried to join the Bahai Administration.

In fact, since I have tried to live according to the teachings of the Great Masters, Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha, my heart has been lighter and happier, and I have—I am quite sure—led a more useful life than before contacting them.

As for the Philosophy of Fear—the fruits of which the world is witnessing in the horrible War that now rages—there can be no place for this most destructive of all forces in any religious movement. If the Bahais' idea of keeping their Cause clean and pure is to use Voodoo methods and shun the sinners of the world, for fear of contamination, it might be well for them all—no matter how exalted they have become—to go back to the First Source of their religion and read again and again the words of the Masters.

For in no single instance can I find any such threats against a so-called sinner—which seems to be the title bestowed upon someone who does not agree with them—in these teachings. Mind, I'm not speaking of things written by others than the Masters.

Religious vanity, the temptation to aggrandizement, spiritual pride, self-righteousness, the superiority complex, are all likely to be part of the ego, when one feels that they alone have any monopoly on the spiritual concept—and that they alone have the right to interpret, and, if you please, enforce the teachings of this spiritual idea.

We are all limited by our frail human nature. But even if we cannot be Gods we can emulate them, and try to be something better than we are. No one can frighten any intelligent individual into his particular way of thinking.

There is only one path to spiritual growth:—The path of tolerance and love. Every man, woman and child alive has an inalienable right to seek God according to his or her findings and convictions.

It is my sincere hope that the Bahais will grow into this consciousness, until there is no longer room in their hearts for anything but the tolerance and love that was the keynote of the lives of their great teachers, Baha-O-Llah and his beloved son, Abdul Baha.

* * * * *

Many thanks to your kindness in mailing me a copy of the Bible of Mankind which reached me last evening. I appreciate your generous gift more than I can tell you. I know I shall find it a mine of inspiration for future messages I hope to deliver. It ought to broaden my intellectual and spiritual horizon and quicken my interest in the messages God has given through the prophets of other races.

I was greatly interested in the Quarterly The Children's Caravan.

I was amazed to learn of the lawsuit which you and Mrs. Chanler were compelled to face. How preposterous for any group to claim a monopoly on Religion! Truly their suit was the negative of all they pretended to teach.

* * * * *

My heart rejoices that justice has been done in the work of Baha'u'llah of which you are both such loving representatives.

You were sweet to let me hear at once—but my heart knew it, Peace came like the ringing of a bell and I said—"The decision has been given and Justice has triumphed over lust and greed!"

* * * * *

I want to congratulate you because of your wonderful and well-directed opportunity regarding the Bab, Baha-U-Llah and Abdul Baha—and because of the wonderful Bible that you have given the world. I have read all the Bible carefully. I was reading it to a man (organist) nearly blind, who was deeply interested. We rejoiced over the wisdom of your just judge. And to-day, the paper came from you—and I am glad for you and with you. When the man afflicted with blindness, comes to me again, the news will make him rejoice.

* * * * *

This is all tommy rot. Jealousy is at the bottom of it. Ahmad Sohrab is not spiritually mature or he would never have caused friction. This is the Day of Judgment, heed ye foolish people, you are gloating now, the time is short, instead of co-operating you are tearing down. Shame on you all. Baha'u'llah suffered martyrdom to spread this message and you want to rest on your laurels. Pettiness, wake up and grow up.

* * * * *

Congratulations and many thanks for sending us the Press Comments on your success in the matter on the Decision of the Supreme Court against the National Spiritual Assembly.

This decision could not have been otherwise, else it would be an evidence that there was no sanity left in the world.

All success to you both and again with many thanks for helping to free the Bahai Religion from its arch enemies, the Bahai organization.

* * * * *

In one of your articles you said something about being willing to do "for a Persian Cause" what you would not do "for an American Corporation." . . .

In your June article on 'The Name' I found the closest approach to My thinking I have met for some time, yet I wish you had developed the subject matter. . . .

We have reached the final division in your Bible of Mankind. I read aloud to . . . as opportunity permits. We are enjoying the Bahai section very much. I blame Bahais for hiding their light under a bushel. In the movement in Australia I found the writings closely guarded, reserved for initiates only, instead of being broadcast so that he who runs may read. I am confiding this to you, because you and Julie Chanler have done so much to break down the barriers and get the message through to the world. I bless you for what you have done and I trust you will go on to complete the good work to which you have put your hand.

* * * * *

I want to thank you for sending me the magazines and newspaper items in regard to the case. I shall have to ask you to stop sending the magazines. . . . I assure you that not one copy of your magazine has gone into the waste-basket and I am very glad to know your side—it seems to be what Abdul Baha taught—yet He also said we must be obedient, and if we do obey the majority patiently, everything would be made right in time.

* * * * *

God works in mysterious ways, His wonders to perform.

And so you see, Ahmad, you were trained and prepared by Abdul Baha to vindicate the Truth of the Bahai message.

All must come under the Banner of Truth, Righteousness, Justice and Unity; all nations into one family of God. The Master warned us, if Bahais, so-called, did not fulfill the teachings of Unity, Justice, Peace and severance from all save God they would fail; others would arise, who would carry on,—so the Day of Revealing and Restitution is at hand. Only praise God you were chosen to vindicate the Truth. It was a shock and a revelation to me to find how the Cause had been misunderstood and dominated, until the vision was lost sight of. But the Cause is not lost.

* * * * *

Please discontinue sending me your magazine New History. Thank you!

* * * * *

My heartiest congratulations to you both upon the decision of the Supreme Court. You have nobly served the Cause of freedom of worship and the Cause of freedom of investigation and expression.

* * * * *

The mighty Excalibur has again been unsheathed, and consigned to the dark shades of Erebus at least one petty, selfish and hypocritical ego where inanely it now dazedly wanders about "unwept, unhonored and unsung." Sela. I tender both you and Mrs. Chanler my heartfelt congratulations for your valorous and successful fight over those who would strain at a gnat as if it were a camel trying to throw into discard all fraternal and humanitarian principles not according with their peculiar whimsical ideas.

* * * * *

Please know that I am more than mildly interested in the Bahai movement. I do not know enough of its origin and prestige to fight for it as you are doing, but from my meager knowledge of world religions, I consider your own as the most fitting to human needs, extant today. Furthermore, I believe that transgression of the tenets of your faith is what has brought the world into its present horrible alternatives and actions. . . . In method also you are doing much to work out its problems in human progress. . . . I wish we might have a branch of your faith here, and believe the same could easily be organized.

* * * * *

Thank you for placing my name on your subscription list. I received your last two issues and today the June issue, just when I had begun to think you had forgotten, so thank you again.

I can only say I echo John Haynes Holmes and congratulate you and Julie Chanler (lovely name) on your victory. You know it's queer the answers I received to my inquiries about all this, as if I were a child and broaching something taboo. I am certain you will win the suit when it comes up before the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court.

Also I want to express my admiration of the next to the last paragraph in this issue, the English is exquisite poetry fit to express your feelings of the Most Holy Name.

* * * * *

Spoke to a small Bahai group in . . . 2 weeks ago.
Congratulations on your victory over the orthodox.

* * * * *

Months ago when I was in San Francisco I met a Bahai, not one of your friends, I regret to state. She gave me your address, I wrote to you and received literature from you. Thanks, and please pardon the long delay, I intended to write to you before this.

I first learned about the controversy between "New History" and the Bahai Administration from a Bahai in San Francisco, one not friendly as I said; later, after receiving New History, October, 1940, I learned about your case, and immediately favored you, for I am an Independent myself, and I am most friendly toward you and all other Independents who affirm their Divine right to disregard "authorities" and carry on their own Spiritual Work in their own way. I wish you all success, I hope you have been or will be victorious. I hope that you and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler have won or will win the right to give to the world the Bahai Teachings and the right to use the name Bahai.

I have read your magnificent paper "My Faith" and find myself in accord with you. . . .

I have met and known many teachers and "so-called" teachers. I have had many spiritual adventures in my Quest for Truth. I feel that I know you and it affords me joy. I hope to hear from you.

* * * * *

Kindly do not send any longer your publication "New History" to me. My husband and I regret so very much the course that you have taken and hope from the depth of our hearts you may not stay in it much longer but come back to us very soon. The Guardian is your true brother and will help you, not hinder you.

* * * * *

The one thing in particular that is forbidden among the followers of Baha'u'llah is contention. If those who claim to follow His teachings engage in continual contention, then they are not His followers, but fakers. As long as humans cultivate the spirit of a mad dog there cannot be any unity among the human race. To strive and contend in the name of a religion, even the Bahai religion, will not exonerate anyone from this crime. I will say that your little magazine does some good teaching work, but why not let the personal disagreement drop into the background.

* * * * *

As far as the written word is concerned the Bahai Religion is complete. The mass of humanity will not have a true comprehension of much of that which has been revealed, for centuries yet to come. But it is necessary to promulgate all those parts of our teaching which can be understood by the mass of the people of the world. And to accomplish this great task we must discover the lowest common denominator of ordinary human intelligence. And that is quite low indeed. The organized Bahais, with the help of Shoghi Effendi, are doing just that—dealing with the lowest common denominator of understanding in the Bahai religion. When you undertake to teach a large number, it is certainly practical to offer only that which the greatest number of souls can follow and comprehend. Such being the case, the more advanced souls should not complain that the curriculum is not up to the standard of their particular intelligence. The greater a soul's understanding the less need he will have for any human aid as regards the knowledge of spiritual things. . . .

The person of mystic knowledge is vastly impatient with the stock variety of human intelligence because he knows that it is only a stupid squirrel spinning around in its exercise-cage and then bragging about how great a distance it has traveled. This is a perfect simile of the world of nature-mind. Most of the things about which it thinks have no importance and really lead nowhere—except in an endless circle. Now just as the mystic mind is hostile to the operations of the earth-bound minds, so they are hostile to the condition of the mystic; they cannot understand anything of that world and therefore disapprove of everything related to it.

At the time that Christ questioned His followers as to what they thought about Him, Peter was the only one who said that he knew that Christ was the Son of the living God. Christ thereupon honored Peter above all the others, saying, "Blessed art thou, for flesh and blood have not revealed this to you." In other words, this kind of understanding could not be conveyed from one man to another, it was given by the Spirit of God to a man who was fit to receive it.

Long, long ago I read a little story titled, "In the Country of the Blind the One-Eyed Man is King." The setting of this story was in the Andes mountains in South America . . . I wish you would ask some of the literary searchers to hunt this up for you as it is really quite a little classic story and well worth reading. I am sure you can get something that you can use from it. The author certainly understood human nature.

The human race can never be led into the Kingdom of Heaven unless and until they gain a certain understanding of the universal divine spirit by themselves. And to accomplish this important matter they must first learn to do their own thinking and understanding. Everything in the teachings of Baha'u'llah points to and leads to this necessary power of the human soul—to understand for himself and not blindly follow the dictates of human leaders. . . .

Baha'u'llah did not encourage His followers to contend with each other in courts, or to curse one another or that a small handful should strive to prevent all the others from making use of their own reasoning powers. This idea is only a repetition of methods and systems that have been a curse to mankind throughout the ages past. This does not belong to the Cause of Baha'u'llah! Nay! Nay! . . . Let us beware that this enemy does not destroy the good that Baha'u'llah has brought to the people of the world today.

“Verily, God hath made it incumbent upon every soul to deliver His Cause, according to his ability. Thus hath the command been recorded by the Finger of Might and Power upon the Tablet of Majesty and Greatness.”—Baha'u'llah.

Who shall deprive me of this right and privilege?

* * * * *

All the suffering you endured . . . so long ago was too much for you. But it had to be, and belongs to the crucible of tests in the life of every chosen one to be graced with honors from on high—not the honors that you now have—but the everlasting honors which I hope you will obtain.

I hope that nothing too serious has already happened through your attitude toward the National Spiritual Assembly that could not be rectified . . . It is of course a very serious thing to differ with the Guardian. If there were something radically wrong with the National Spiritual Assembly the Guardian would know it and would correct it. He would not let it stand.

At any rate, it is forbidden in the teachings to feel offended, that is to say, you must not let it be known that you are offended; let God alone know it, and God will be your Advocate. You have the power to transform your sentiments toward the National Spiritual Assembly—there is a point of mystery in our teachings that you have never yet seen, and that is the cause of our differences.

What excuse will you make in the other world when the Judge will ask you, why you did not believe that the National Spiritual Assembly should be obeyed? Your love for Abdul Baha will help you nothing after your making a break in the Cause which is about the last thing you should have done and which now makes it very hard for the 4,000 believers in this country, and very hard for the National Spiritual Assembly and very hard for Shoghi Effendi. Even here in . . . , the non-believers are telling us that a division and split had come into our Cause and that this Cause was therefore not the truth. The Minister of the Christian Church here has received your literature from a Minister of another church. Do you want this damage to the Cause? In the end you will regret having taken so much vengeance on the National Spiritual Assembly.

Do you not read and study the Testament of Abdul Baha? Everything is so clear there. For a believer like you to differ with Shoghi Effendi is a great sin, an unpardonable sin; therefore turn to God to help you in the rectification of this sin. He will help you if you pray for it, but do it before it is too late.

* * * * *

What would be the price for New History for year 1941?

I would especially like to have copies of it beginning with March of this year and back numbers if possible. . . .

I see that the Bahais here in . . . are all split up (I am not a Bahai but am interested in all faiths). It seems that there is some dissension among the Bahais here but I do not know the reason. . . .

* * * * *

Some of the Bahai followers have on occasions told me that I had no right whatever to do any thinking for myself; that the National Spiritual Assembly would do all this for me. But as I remarked before, this idea is the very essence of hell and damnation as far as I am concerned and to bow down to such rot would be worse than death, a thousand times. How can a group of animalistic bodies and brains be a guide to any soul living in the kingdom. Why do they seek to take the place of God, and, furthermore what right have they to be greater than God, for such seemingly is their claim and desire?

* * * * *

To a certain extent you are justified in feeling the way you do. Being spiritual-minded you naturally think that the rank and file of the people should become the same way. But this is entirely beyond their power, the animal propensities have full dominion over most of them. Even among the Bahai leaders of this time you find the main concern is simply gold and physical well being. They are not to be blamed over much because they do not know any better. They understand the work of organizing or gathering together in a crowd but the purpose for which they organize is a secondary concern with most of them. The average human has a mad desire to follow a human leader, Shoghi taking the place of a priest with many of them. Baha-O-Llah wrote often that one of the greatest failures with the human creatures was that they would not think for themselves. It is thus that we find the average Bahai follower today. . . .

Conditions are just as you have written in your magazine and some of the things that the Bahai leaders are doing are quite offensive to any person of real comprehension, but I would not venture to oppose or offend them. . . .

Shoghi is a human the same as the rest of us. . . . You must also consider that most of his impressions come to him from people who for various reasons color their communications to him and give their own particular slants and ideas. In other words, he is working under great difficulties and is able to see things only in part. . . .

Just as you write, the hodge-podge of stuff that is now given them to study is more or less clap-trap as far as the teachings of Baha-O-Llah are concerned and personally I consider it to be a lot of rot harmful to the mind of any soul. . . . As you are a free lance, it is possible for you to present the higher viewpoint of the teachings and I am sure this is just what you are attempting to accomplish. The real acceptance of the Bahai spirit makes any soul a little sun or centre of power and these are the ones who will save the day in the end.

I really think that the vast verbosity in this so-called teaching of the Bahais originally came from legal profession in the ranks of the followers—I know some of them!!! They are always witch hunting and looking for some one to bounce out of the gathering.

* * * * *

If you confine your work to the purely spiritual phase of the Bahai teachings you can have a good effect but to try to make them (the Bahais) believe that they have no right to be organized is a waste of time. They certainly are now organized and strongly so, and will stand because it is in the nature of the earthly people to be organized.

* * * * *

I have been among the organized Bahais enough to know very well that a large number have their fingers crossed, even while associating in the ranks. Their God is not always the Bahai God.

* * * * *

I read with the greatest interest in the August issue of THE NEW HISTORY MAGAZINE the details of the decision, in your favor, of the Appellate Court against the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the U. S. and Canada.

Again I congratulate you both on your triumph over the organized Baha'is in their attempts to restrain the followers of the Baha'i Religion from practicing their beliefs, except through the channel of the organization of the Spiritual Assembly.

You have both rendered a great and lasting service to mankind, the effects of which will become more apparent as time passes.

Do not permit the attempts of Shoghi Effendi to black magic you (as recounted on Page 12 of the September issue of the NEW HISTORY Magazine), or affect you in the least. Such language, as he uses, belongs to the bigots of the dark ages, and not to the teachings of Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha.

* * * * *

It will give me a sense of real spiritual exaltation to be included in your list of the faithful. Seldom indeed have I encountered an occasion on which I would be so delighted to stand up and be counted as in this courageous movement inaugurated by Mirza Sohrab and yourself for the counteracting of the forces of disruption and degeneracy that has been set in motion, through a long term of years, against a noble movement, by the vain and stupid misconduct of a few misguided souls, who seem to have completely missed or forgotten the essential tenets of the Bahai Message.

I regard Sohrab's articles in New History as masterpieces of restrained but incisive arguments. They contain phrases that illumine their subjects like a flash of lightning. That a man not born to the English tongue should have produced such gems of English literature is to me nothing short of a miracle. Such articles constitute a strong confirmation of the Faith, proving that the Bahai Cause is under the special protection of the Supreme Concurrence.

Abdul Baha still lives!

Kindly refrain from sending your magazine "New History" and other publications to my mother. It would be better to use your postage on some one who appreciates your point of view. We do not.

* * * * *

I have had the opportunity to read several back numbers of New History, and I am so pleased to find such a marvelous magazine is in existence. In my opinion this publication will certainly establish the wonderful cause of Baha-O-Llah, firmly in the Western Hemisphere.

* * * * *

Please send with all possible haste your free literature to . . . I have had a long time with these Bahais. Like myself they have been very unhappy and bewildered in this beautiful cause and like myself they believe that you are the one who will lead us back to the teachings. . . . The world needs these teachings now, and I think that it is almost a crime that they are not widely known and correctly interpreted.

* * * * *

The literature that you promised me has just this minute arrived, and I cannot wait a second in sitting down to the typewriter and thanking you for same.

I cannot begin to tell you how happy I am. I have studied this cause for three years, and last March under pressure, I joined the Bahai Organization. But I have never been satisfied. In April, I attempted to break away and join the . . ., but this so disturbed my teachers, who had worked so hard and so lovingly with me that I did not do it. I knew too, that it would be wrong to join the . . . when I was so in love with the teachings of Abdul Baha and Baha-O-Llah. All I could do was to simply "sit tight" and hope that I could somehow persuade my instructors and other Bahai friends to come around to my way of thinking, which seemed like an impossibility. If ever a person was unhappy and miserable, it was I.

Now that I have joined your New History Society, I feel as if I have come home after wandering in desolate and foreign lands. To be truthful with you, I have concealed the fact that I was a Bahai—yes I have been ashamed of it, but NOW I AM PROUD and so, so happy. Everything is going to come out all right now, I know it!

Now I am going to work for the Bahai Cause with all my heart. I am so pleased that you are a Pacifist. So am I!

* * * * *

Baha'u'llah explains in the Ighan that the worst single shortcoming that the human creatures have is: "That they will not try to understand things for themselves." Always they appoint some human creature to do all their thinking for them. Now I ask you, friends, are the organized Baha'is of America doing anything to help their followers to overcome this greatest of all handicaps? It seems they are doing just the opposite! My wish is to point out practices that are highly injurious to the seeking souls. The pure spiritual teachings of Baha'u'llah and Abdul Baha have simply gone to pot and been replaced by a system somewhat like unto dirty politics.

I have good will towards Shoghi as a fellow follower of the teachings of Baha'u'llah, but the man is young, immature and certainly liable to mistakes. He will overcome all this in time. God is a spirit and unless we make every effort to get in touch with this Spirit—then we can never attain to a conscious realization of the nature of it. After a soul has attuned himself to the divine spirit, he comes under its guidance, which of course appears in the mind. Baha'u'llah writes in the Ighan that to reach to the understanding of the Spirit of God is a step of the soul, and is not a step of the body. Unless one will strive for the Goal which Baha'u'llah has marked out for us, we are just creatures running along the shores of a salty lake, getting no place and doing no act except running.

I write to so-called Baha'is and make every effort to point out the really worthwhile features in the teachings, but they all turn their backs upon it. The illuminated man who taught me said that if I were able to bring one single soul into the Kingdom, I will have accomplished the greatest deed possible in this life.

The organized Baha'is have put a checkrein on all their membership, and as far as I can perceive will not tolerate any spirituality. Prayer is a thing of the past, looked upon as something not needed or wanted. Two features only are enlarged, the worship of Shoghi and the giving of all their money to the Cause. The brains of most of the leaders simply boil if you venture to travel the spiritual pathway contrary to their desire. I realize that this is just a natural shortcoming of the natural man, a manifestation of the carnal mind, and we cannot place much blame on them.

I believe that the organized aspect should continue because it is suitable to a certain type of mentality, but I also believe that there should be an unrestricted body of the teachings open to a much more advanced type of minds. I believe that you are able to carry this along.

writings to be a real Bahai. . . . Have you ever read the Surat-ul-Hykal? It tells you in that book that many of the attained ones walk the earth and "their number is known only to God." Shoghi hopes to locate some of them but he could not recognize them even when they stood before him!

* * * * *

Your September issue of New History is very good indeed. Since the advent of Shoghi, the Bahai teachings have been allowed to descend to a low level—that is, as far as the spiritual teachings are concerned. This is the main reason that I can find but little in common with the membership. I surely hope that you will bring back the teachings of Abdul Baha so that they will not be entirely lost to view.

The talk is always about a world order, but how can a world order be established if the Bahais will not obey the teachings of Abdul Baha and Baha'u'llah? If they allow these teachings to entirely die out of their minds they will go from bad to worse. As you have said, they are training their minds to behold enemies on every hand; in other words using a very harmful line of thought which can only poison their minds. I can no longer find many Bahai followers with whom I can enjoy talking, because they do not have much interest in the original teachings and in many cases are not very familiar with them.

Does the influence of Shoghi help them to look upon their fellowmen with kindness and friendliness? It certainly does not appear so to me. A Bahai who looks out upon the world of men with suspicion certainly is a very poor grade of a Bahai. Abdul Baha has had nothing to do with this attitude. I am sure, it is not conveyed in His teachings. Certainly there is something radically wrong at this time. Also must all followers stop thinking and understanding for themselves—they have been so commanded by the present order. Why is this so?

Far be it from me to quarrel with anyone because of a difference of opinion, but I certainly will not allow anyone to prevent me from thinking for myself, seeing for myself and understanding for myself. Life would not be worth living if this came to pass. And really I consider that all others believe the same thing deep down in their hearts.

The aim of the Bahai Cause is to bring about the unity of all mankind. God the Father, revealed by His chosen teacher, Baha'u'llah, has given us all the information that we can possibly make use of in this day. Let us begin to use some of the most important of this great teaching. The most vital is certainly to keep in mind that humanity is all one family, regardless of the defects which may appear in the human creature. Not one of them is our ENEMY. There are plenty of humans who have gross defects, all will admit, but we must take it for granted that this is so because they do not know or understand any better. The punishment for wrong doing is absolutely certain to follow misdeeds, and surely no man likes to suffer. The Bahai teachings tell us that after we find our way into the Kingdom we will be free from error and affliction. This is the only condition wherein the human creature may find or have any peace, either on the earth or afterwards.

"The training of the people of the country of thought . . ." Baha'u'llah has written in the "Words of Wisdom"—old Hidden Words and Seven Valleys! People seldom consider that they are creatures of thought and do not try to discipline their thinking activity; just allow it to run wild without any attempt at direction and pay the penalty for all which is not good. Pure thoughts keep us in contact with the higher planes, and then the spiritual forces are always near at hand to assist us; then they are able to work through us. But when we are dominated by negative thoughts, the forces of the higher planes cannot operate through us and we can get no help from them. The only difference between the spiritual masters and the ordinary person is that the spiritual masters or divine servants have attained the power to direct their thoughts and hold them within the field to which Baha'u'llah has directed all of us. Abdul Baha said that His mind was always in a state of prayer. This is the key. If we wish to gain first hand knowledge of this state, then, we likewise must pray until our defective human consciousness can rise above the world of nature in which nearly all are held prisoners. When we really make an effort, someone will contact us, who really knows and understands this matter. This is explained in the Bahai teachings and can be readily found by all. This is the master key. The rest is only trimmings.

* * * * *

The November 1941 issue of New History is Okay. Any and all Bahai ideas will act as a leaven in the world of thought, and as God has commanded that each soul promulgate these teachings to the best of his ability, I am sure that no collection of common humans can prevent us in this work. No one can successfully corrupt the teachings, because they are all in print and broadcast to the world. Some day the present leaders will be replaced by spiritually evolved people and then the Cause will really expand as it should.

* * * * *

The real teacher of any soul is the divine spirit—holy spirit, or spirit of God. Call it what you will, it is the same. Until one has made a contact with this spirit, he is unable to really comprehend spiritual subjects of any kind. There is as wide a difference between material-minded people and the spiritual-minded type, as between darkness and light. The natural forces of the material-minded person are negative, while the forces of the spiritually enlightened soul are positive. Let me offer a simile easily understood. If one grasp a soft sponge in his hand and submerge it in a basin of water, it cannot absorb its full capacity of liquid as long as it is held in a contracted condition. But as soon as the pressure of the hand is relaxed, it immediately absorbs its full capacity of water. Now, you and I and all the rest are like unto this sponge; we are all submerged in an ocean of spirit which has always existed. Some, like the whale swimming in the sea, are continually asking: "Where is this ocean they talk about so much?" Until some of this water (spirit) penetrates into our consciousness, we remain in ignorance of its existence.

After a soul reaches the highest roadway he does not have much interest in the rag-bag concerns of souls still living in that which Baha'u'llah termed the primary existence. After a soul has learned to absorb this "water of spiritual life" he ceases to be concerned over the quarrels of those who do not know about the spiritual ocean, and do not wish to know.

When you say Baha'i, it really does not have any particular meaning as regards the station of any soul. I meet Christians who are as highly advanced as any Bahai could be. They have established themselves firmly on the true pathway. The Cause of God today is in the hands of earthly minded men and women and for this reason they must be bound and ruled by an earth-like organization—they are entirely unfit for anything else. . . .

One word of these new teachings of God has more value to the human race than all that has gone before, and they will lead humanity to maturity. Men will master the divine art of prayer and meditation, pass through a door within themselves and behold the Kingdom of God about them. Once the spirit is able to enter the reality of any soul, they have the power to direct it where they desire. Then, they are servants, and the ones Baha'u'llah writes about in the Surat-ul-Hyakal. The modern Baha'is dislike these people very much, because a divine servant is the killer of the human ego; it cannot function while exposed to positive spiritual power. As long as you promote the religion of Baha'u'llah, nothing can stop you.

Jerusalem, Palestine

Sept. 7, 1941

For three years I had the pleasure and the honour to share the work of the "New History Society." At the time being I am enjoying the great privilege of defending its founders against attacks. The 2 clippings enclosed originate from the only newspaper in this country that is being printed in English. You may believe me that my reply was written more fully and

BAHA'I VERSUS BAHA'I

Supreme Court in N.Y. Dismisses Suit

HAIFA — A suit brought by the organized Bahais in the U.S.A. against a Baha'i group in New York calling itself the New History Society was dismissed by the Supreme Court in New York recently.

The organized Baha'i sect complained that the unorganized Bahais were giving the erroneous impression that they were authoritative Bahais by conducting — what purported to be Baha'i meetings, lectures, classes and social gatherings. They also solicited contributions through the use of the name of Baha'i and listed the Baha'i Bookshop in the telephone directory over the name of the Baha'i Centre which is the office and bookshop of the organized Bahais.

The Court held that "the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion." The ruling then dealt in detail with the complaints brought against the New History Society and pointed out that the defendants had the absolute right to practice Bahaism.

With this ruling, the New History Movement has launched an intensive propaganda campaign both in the United States and abroad.

Concord and Harmony

The Central seat of the organized Baha'i is Haifa, the home of Shoghi Effendi, who is the recognized "Guardian of the Baha'i Faith" and a direct descendant (grandson) of the founder of the religion, the sage Baha'u'llah who died in Acre in 1892. In the words of Shoghi Effendi, "the Revelation proclaimed by Baha'u'llah, his followers believe, is divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, broad in its outlook, scientific in its method, humanitarian in its principles and dynamic in the influence it exerts on the hearts and minds of men. The Baha'i Faith recognizes the unity of God and of His Prophets, upholds the principle of an unfettered search after the truth, condemns all forms of superstition and prejudice, teaches that the fundamental purpose of religion is to promote concord and harmony, that it must go hand-in-hand with science and that it constitutes the sole and ultimate basis of a peaceful, an ordered and progressive society."

Asked about the "New History Movement" Shoghi Effendi informed The Palestine Post that the "Movement" was started by a Persian named Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, supported by funds provided by Mrs. Julie Chanler of New York. The main difference between Sohrab and the Bahais was rooted in a conflict with the Baha'i administration and, according to Shoghi Effendi, the "Movement" had no support in the U.S.A. except that of Mrs. Chanler and a few isolated followers.

From Cook to Divine

The career of Sohrab, who is about fifty years old, was described as that of an ambitious self-made man. He was formerly a servant of Shoghi Effendi's uncle in Port Said, and was later sent to America as the cook of Mirza Abu Faz, one of the Baha'i teachers. Later he went to Hollywood, where he wrote cinema scenarios.

According to Shoghi Effendi, the New History Movement, started by Sohrab, abused the Baha'i name, and to stop this, the suit was brought against him and Mrs. Chanler.

The dismissal of the suit by the Court, it was stated, has been appealed.

NEW HISTORY SOCIETY

To the Editor of The Palestine Post

Sir, - Please permit us to add somewhat to your information on the 'New History Society' in New York referred to in your issue of August 22, under the heading 'Bahai vs. Bahai', in which the amazing statement was made that this movement had 'no support in the U.S.A. except Mrs. Chanler and a few isolated followers'.

Anyone who knows the work of this Society, as we, the undersigned, who frequently heard the Society's speakers at the crowded 'Caravan Hall', will know that this statement is inaccurate. Among these speakers have been some of the most prominent personalities of American religious, scientific and political life. Among lecturers you could have heard there were Albert Einstein, Norman Thomas, a former German M.P., Gerhard Seger, who escaped from a German concentration camp, and John O'Neill, scientific editor of the 'Herald-Tribune'.

During the past ten years the 'New History Society' has gained a world-wide reputation as a forum open to all working for the betterment of human relationships. It has friends and followers all over the world.

The biographical data on the founder of the Society, Mirza Ahmed Sohrab, is likewise inaccurate and the description 'From Cook to Divine' is accurate concerning neither his origins nor his career. Sohrab came of an aristocratic Bahai family in Persia, and graduated at the Imperial University in Teheran. In 1908 he was sent to Washington as interpreter to Mirza Abdul Fazi by the Bahai leader Abdul Baha, and it is not particularly relevant whether he also cooked for him or not. Later Sohrab served for some time as Secretary to the Minister at the Persian Legation in Washington. From 1912 to 1918 he was closely associated with Abdul Baha and became a member of his household at Acre.

In 1929 Sohrab founded the 'New History Society' with the support of Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler and Mr. Chanler, a great-grandson of John Jacob Astor and former Lieut.-Governor of the State of New York.

The importance of Sohrab as a religious thinker is fully appreciated in the U.S.A. by such outstanding religious leaders of Christian, Jewish and Moslem communities as the Rev. Eliot White, Rabbi Louis I. Newman and Dr. Edward J. Uurji, who gave him their support for his work 'The Bible of Mankind'.

Yours etc.

I have received your magazine and the article published in Palestine Post. It is astonishing. The article stupefied me and stopped my brain from thinking, my heart from breathing. I was paralyzed. I could not believe my eyes in reading such false statements! . . .

The statement that Shoghi Effendi made to the Palestine Post regarding Ahmad Sohrab is not based on his knowledge. I am sure of that; for he, by his own free will, will never stoop to make such a statement, that The New History Society has no support. . . .

I believe that Shoghi Effendi is not told the truth. I do not believe that Shoghi Effendi will do anything contrary to the teachings of Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha. . . .

The Guardian does not know the true facts and therefore he believes in what is being written to him by the National Spiritual Assembly. He should come to America; that is, if they let him out and do not keep him a prisoner. Then he can see and hear everything with his own eyes and ears. So far as I am concerned I am ready to offer up my life to Baha-O-Llah, Abdul Baha and Shoghi Effendi, and I am sorry that he puts so much confidence in the National Spiritual Assembly. . . .

I have known Sohrab for many years and I have found him trustworthy, honest. If Mrs. Julie Chanler has seen in Sohrab the good that others were blind to;

and if she, being spiritual and full of love for the Cause, discovered the same qualities in him—then blessed be the pure in heart, for they shall inherit the kingdom. . . .

Well, maybe, the members of the National Spiritual Assembly will become the substitutes for Baha-O-Llah and Abdul Baha and in time, if possible, they will push out the Guardian. It seems the Cause is in danger. The newcomers do not realize this, for they have not lived in the glorious days of the Master. The old believers are discarded, in order that they may not inform the new ones.

* * * * *

Your magazine and writings are instructive and interesting to an unbiased mind. I was saddened to read the Palestine Post and I was dumbfounded at such foolish statements. I know that God would right the wrongs done to his true and sincere servants. He will not forsake those that love him. I put my trust in him. I cannot believe that Shoghi Effendi would stoop to misrepresent and humiliate you. I am sorry to see that the Guardian places such confidence in the National Spiritual Assembly and yet he cannot see that they are undermining him by misinforming him regarding the true facts.

I can clearly see why they instituted this lawsuit. This false propaganda was hatched by the bosses in the National Spiritual Assembly to discredit Shoghi Effendi, in order that the true and well-informed Bahais may rise against him on account of his making such a statement about you. The Guardian is well-informed regarding your services to Abdul Baha. You were with him for many years, serving as secretary and interprewould make such a statement. If he did, it would be contrary to the wishes of the Master who appointed him in his Will and Testament as the Guardian of the Cause and also guardian of every individual believer. He should uphold and protect them impartially and without any favoritism. If he failed in doing this and neglects the rights of one believer, because of slander and calumny, then he has failed to carry out the wishes of the Great Masters.

I still believe the guardian is not guilty.

FOREIGN COMMUNICATIONS

England.

Am so glad your law case is satisfactorily ended—that is another shackle loosened in the fight against those who want to pin down truth with the limitations of human minds. Truth can only be itself when it is free as the winds to express the divine urge of the moment.

* * * * *

England.

You are doing a great work and I am tremendously pleased by the very satisfactory decision of Justice Louis A. Valente. This constitutes another milestone in the journey to freedom and true civilization: and truly makes New History.

I will shortly be submitting to you an article for publication in the monthly, showing how the Unitarians in England ensure freedom of worship while they build and establish churches to worship in. I feel sure it will interest you.

* * * * *

Canada.

I am just now in receipt of the April issue of New History and learn for the first time of the division in the Bahai ranks. I am very much interested in knowing this, as I can now whole-heartedly express my sympathy for, and participate in your kindly and inspiring movement, knowing that it is broad and liberal and leaves me quite free to also join in other liberal and humanitarian causes.

* * * * *

Australia.

Last week, I received the monthly publication of your society together with printed copy of ruling Justice Louis A. Valente has recorded upon your momentous case at Law, which has such farflung results for people allied to your Cause. Need I, a veritable Bushman far from the seething chiaroscuro of New York, comment upon a verdict so close to your heart?

This would be idle, for my part; but I may at least offer sincere felicitations to those who, with you, have suffered so long torture.

* * * * *

Australia.

Your two recent publications have reached my hand together with reproductions of press cuttings announcing the award of civil justice in favor of Mrs. Chanler and your society.

The decisions are momentous in your New York life and circle of adherents, so that, while I am unable to comment fittingly, I can assure you personally that I esteem the spirit which impels you to resist the impositions of greater organizations upon you and at the same time find space for "outsiders" like myself in so wide an outer circle of the inhabited world.

Sweden.

You can imagine my joy when I read your news about the jurisdiction of your process with the Bahai Administration.

It is very indicative that, even in this time, when only rough force and falsehood everywhere is winning ground, your case still could find JUSTICE.

I think your efforts in writing so very detailed about the Bahai movement en grande, and with your authority, as a man who lived so close to Abdul Baha many years, had its good effect and the Justice could really see and feel WHERE TRUTH is to be found.

The old history is repeating itself always, and after the passing away of the Master, the disciples, in most cases, are tempted to create a NEW CHURCH, and to be themselves the new chosen bishops.

You are surely not one of them, this I felt since I first read your paper and accepted that New History Society is not going to start a new religion and you not the bishop of it.

Freedom is the condition sine qua non of Love and also for a true RELIGION, and I feel so well you are the real GUARD of this Freedom and do not try to create new dogmas and fix anything.

Guatemala.

I have received your magazines and I was very surprised to read all these things which happen between The Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States of America and Canada and you; it is ridiculous and absurd, because between real, true, sincere and spiritual people, these things never hapen; much less taking it to the court. In my humble point of view, all this only proves to me once more the kind of people who call themselves spiritual; and they are not. The Truth and God has nothing to do with all those societies which only exploit the ignorance of the people. There is only One Truth, veracity and verity, and it is not limited by a group nor by any organization or any orders. There is Only One Lord, and One Law. But what most of the societies do, is business and they are based on interest created. They don't do what they say, and they call themselves spiritual, and brothers, only by name, but not in facts. I don't believe in them, only I believe in the Truth, and what I see they do. I say it of any societies, by the fruit you know the tree, by the facts you know the man, so don't worry for what they may say, because if you live a real and true life you are on the way to the Great Truth, and you will help others, without those societies who are only exploiting the ignorance of the people. The Truth is in you, the Light is in you too, but you must look into yourself deeply, and you will find it in yourself.

I thank God that the Cause through His justice is made free from the thralldom of limited minds in the National Spiritual Assembly and the Supreme Court of New York County decided the case in your favor. May God who is the very Cause of New History take upon Himself all the affairs!

I wanted to answer your kind letter immediately in order to tell you that I feel awfully sorry that your activity—I am admiring so much—got you into trouble, initiated by Bahai Organization. I really cannot understand this. It is evident they do not understand the Cause at all. If they did, they simply could not act like this. But I doubt, they will ever go to court. It would be too ridiculous.

I am watching your discussion with the Bahai Organization with great interest; disagreeable as it may seem to you, it is instructive to the observer. It seems so difficult to mankind to behold great ideas in their genuine purity.

I noticed in one of the New History copies, April 1940, an article Regarding the Trade-mark. It was of great interest to me. Ever this play of opposites! When a constructive movement is launched upon the world, pushing forward, right beside it—in its wake rather—rises, and wrathfully so, its opposite. . . . In fact, the cause of Baha-O-Llah thrives on these opposite stirrings—to a great extent, dont you think? As we say in English: "Persecute a thing if you want it to live."

I thank you for the printed sheet which brought the news of your victory in the court. I congratulate you and your colleagues! Indeed, it is said that those days would mean the end of the world when religion would be set for sale! In other words, an age ends and another starts when the spiritual belief is so much degraded that it becomes just a commodity to make profit! I hope, this trade in religion ends, and that a New Era starts, making heaven of this earth. Let us do out duty in the great transformation.

The attitude of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada is deplorable; yet one may pour one's blessings and sympathies on those misled brothers and sisters who are mentioned, no doubt under provocation, as sorcerers, necromancers, etc., in the statement. They will need a great help and prolonged guidance before they can turn back from the path which they are unfortunately treading.

Court Rules Against Monopoly Of the Name of Any Religion

Justice Valente Rejects Suit of Organized Baha'is Against Baha'i Group Headed by Persian Poet; Says Purported Members Can Practice Faith

Justice Louis A. Valente ruled yesterday in Supreme Court that no one had a right to monopolize the name of a religion and that followers of a religion could not be restrained from practicing their beliefs because of the objections of organized practitioners of the same faith.

Justice Valente's decision dismissed a complaint brought by organized Baha'is, who brought suit as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the United States and Canada, and members of the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is in New York, against Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, Persian poet, who is director of the New History Society, and his group.

The organized Baha'is contended that they were the truly authorized followers of Baha-O-Llah, Persian prophet who founded an order nearly a century ago with international peace as its principal aim. They asserted that Mr. Sohrab's group was conveying an erroneous impression to the public by conducting meetings, lectures and other activities in a bona fide Baha'i setting and soliciting contributions as organized Baha'is.

Moreover, the so-called authorized Baha'is complained that the others opened a book store under the name of Bahai (without the apostrophe) Book Shop, and that the listing of the shop in the telephone directory was immediately over that of the Baha'i Center, the office and book shop of the organized Baha'is.

Justice Valente held, however, that "in the court's opinion, the complaint fails to state a good cause of action."

"The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion," his opinion continued. "The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures and other activities.

"No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified or affiliated with the meetings, lectures and book shop of the plaintiff."

Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, wife of the former Lieutenant Governor of New York under Charles Evans Hughes, and founder and sponsor of the New History Society, said last night that Justice Valente's decision "upholds our guarantee of religious freedom." Mrs. Chanler formed the society after she broke with the organized Baha'is twelve years ago.

"Mr. Sohrab and I started our group after we parted from the other Baha'is on good terms," Mrs. Chanler explained. "We broke away because we felt that they were limiting the movement. But time was short and we felt that the world should hear the principles laid down by Baha-O-Llah."

Mrs. Chanler expanded on her theme, saying that according to the teachings of Baha-O-Llah, "there shouldn't be any organization." However, she added, "Americans love organizations, and little by little the teachings of Baha-O-Llah were being restricted to a choice few." Baha-O-Llah, she said, espoused the principle of "unity pervading all things."

Mrs. Chanler also explained that the organized Baha'is took out a trademark on the name "Baha'i," but that she felt that Baha'is "should not be restricted by a trademark."

The organized Baha'is have ten days to serve an amended complaint.

Monopoly on Name Denied to Baha'i Group

Can't Keep Religion From Rivals, Court Rules, Dismissing Complaint

In a decision handed down in the Supreme Court today Justice A. Valente ruled that he could not grant a monopoly of the name of a religion. He also held that he couldn't stop anyone from practicing a religion merely because the organized practitioners of the religion objected.

The decision delighted Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanled, the society woman who has been a leader of a group of Baha'i followers in New York and a sponsor of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, a Persian poet, who inspired her to take up the work.

'Erroneous Impression.'

Justice Valente's decision dismissed a complaint brought against Mr. Sohrab and his group, which was a little formal organization, by the organized Baha'is, who sued as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada in the Spiritual Assembly of Baha's of the City of New York.

The organized Baha'is complained that the unorganized Baha'is were giving an erroneous impression that they were authoritative Baha'is by conducting what purported to be Baha's meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings, etc., by soliciting contributions with use of the Baha'i name and by listing the Baha'i Book Shop in the telephone book directory over the name of the Baha'i Center, which is the office and book shop of the organized Baha'is.

Equal Rights Upheld.

"In the court's opinion," said Justice Valente, "the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion.

"The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities. No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified with the meetings, lectures, etc., and the book shop of the plaintiffs.

Listing Doesn't Enter.

As far as the listing of the book shop in the telephone directory was concerned, the justice said, that was merely an alphabetical and not a legal matter, for it was a well accepted fact that the letter "B" preceded the letter "C" in the alphabet and therefore the telephone company was quite right in listing the "Baha'i Book Shop" ahead of the "Baha'i Center."

1. The first step in the process of creating a new product is to identify the market need. This involves conducting market research to determine the size and nature of the market, the competitive landscape, and the potential for growth. Once the market need has been identified, the next step is to develop a business plan. This plan should outline the company's mission, vision, and goals, as well as the strategies for achieving them. It should also include a detailed financial forecast, including projected revenue, expenses, and profit margins. The business plan is a critical document that will be used to secure financing and guide the company's operations.

2. The third step in the process is to develop a prototype of the product. This involves creating a physical model of the product that can be used to test its functionality and appeal to potential customers. The prototype should be designed to be as close to the final product as possible, while still being cost-effective and easy to modify. Once the prototype has been developed, the next step is to conduct a series of tests to evaluate its performance and reliability. These tests should include both functional and user acceptance testing, as well as a series of stress tests to determine the product's limits.

3. The fourth step in the process is to launch the product into the market. This involves developing a marketing and sales strategy that will promote the product and generate sales. The strategy should include a mix of traditional and digital marketing techniques, as well as a series of sales and distribution channels. Once the product has been launched, the company should continue to monitor its performance and make any necessary adjustments to its strategy. This may include revising the business plan, updating the prototype, or launching new marketing campaigns.

4. The fifth and final step in the process is to evaluate the success of the product launch. This involves conducting a series of metrics that will measure the product's performance in the market. These metrics should include sales volume, revenue, profit margins, and customer satisfaction. The company should also conduct a series of interviews and surveys to gather feedback from customers and stakeholders. This feedback will be used to identify areas for improvement and to guide the company's future product development efforts.

Lack of official Baha'i support for the Rwanda Genocide victims of 1994

Baha'ism has declined in Rwanda while the number of Muslims has skyrocketed- after the genocide of 1994.

The Universal House of Justice and its UN office never issued any public statement denouncing the horrendous genocide of Rwanda 1994. To make matters worse, the UHJ and NSA of various countries NEVER contributed a penny towards the hungry African orphans of Rwanda. The UHJ does not even contribute enough to the budget of the Rwanda NSA for its correct functioning.

Compare that to the $100,000.00 full page add placed in the New York newspaper by the US NSA in 2001 following the attack on the Twin Towers. There were about 2800 victims in Sept.11, 2001 attack- now in Rwanda, there were 1000,000 Africans murdered. Why was there such a great outpouring of "love" by the Baha'i Administration for the victims of the US attack and NONE for the Murdered Blacks of Rwanda?

In fact, Baha'ism does not even come close to emulate the qualities of true Muslims (from which it derives) or NOT even close to emulate the values of Christians-Buddhists-and even Pagans!!!

Amen, Henry

Was Teymour Bakhtiar assassinated with Bahai money?

<http://www.iranian.com/main/blog/faryarm/did-shahs-savak-offer-covert-aid-shia-cleric-establishment-against-iranian-bahai-commun>

One of the most outstanding business figures in the last two decades of the Shah's reign was Hojbr Yazdani. There are sources who attest to Yazdani's faith as Baha'ism but then again there are sources who suggest he was being backed by powerful Baha'i figures no less than the Shah's personal physician, General Dr Ayadi (<http://www.centralclubs.com/topic-t61696.html>). As the question of state-sponsored terror was mentioned on this very blog, I thought it may be of interest to the readers to know that Teymour Bakhtiar's assassination in Iraq was allegedly linked to the Baha'i backed Hojabr Yazdani (<http://www.encyclopaediaislamica.com/madkhal2.php?sid=651>). As the author of this blog is basing his allegations on the IRI-disclosed documents and sources we are safe to use similar IRI-approved sources to dig deeper in to this story. Here is an excerpt from the above source on the Yazdani-Bakhtiar case:

سرانجام ، به ابتکار ساواک ، در 21 مرداد 1349 ، بختیار ترور شد و پس از مدتی درگذشت . درباره قتل او روایات متناقضی هست (ثابتی) . در این که قاتل او عامل ساواک بود شکی نیست . ظاهراً در شکارگاهی نزدیک مرز ایران ، نخست فرزندان او را از او جدا می کنند و سپس مأمور قتل ، که از نزدیکان او بوده ، کار را به انجام می رساند. نام علاءالدین لجمی ، منوچهر خسروداد ، ایلگون میتاسوییان (اطلاعات ، 29 بهمن 1359 ، ص 1-2) و هژبر یزدانی به عنوان دست اندرکاران قتل بختیار مطرح شده است (آل احمد ، ص 91). همچنین به دلیل همزمانی ربوده شدن هواپیمای ایرانی از سوی مخالفان رژیم ایران و بردن آن به بغداد ، چنین شایع شد که ربایندگان در واقع عوامل ساواک و مأمور ترور بختیار بودند (دعائی ، ص 3). صدام حسین نخست وزیر وقت عراق که از دوستان نزدیک بختیار و هنگام قتل وی در مسکو بود ، از قتل بختیار بشدت ناراحت شد (اطلاعات ، 29 بهمن 1359 ، ص 1-2). شاه سالها بعد مسئولیت ترور بختیار را بر عهده خود و ساواک نهاد (ویلیه ، ص 322).

طاہرہ اک مسلمان شیعہ گھرانہ میں پیدا ہونے کے باوجود جوانی میں جس مذہب میں رنگی گئی وہ بابی مذہب تھا۔ علامہ اقبال اپنے ڈاکٹریٹ کے مقالہ فلسفہ عجم میں بابیت پر بحث کرتے ہوئے لکھتے ہیں ”باب کی تعلیمات کا بنیادی ماخذ ملاصد رہ کا فلسفہ ہے جسے شیخ احسانی نے اپنایا اور اسکی تشریحات لکھیں۔ بابی افکار میں یہودیت، پارسیت، باطنیت اور قدیم ایرانی موبدیت کے واضح عناصر موجود ہیں یہ مذہب کے نام پر سیاسی اقدار کے حصول کی عجمی سازش تھی جو سیاسی ناکامی کے بعد مذہبی دنیا میں بہانیت کے نام سے ایک نئے روپ میں جلوہ گر ہے اور اس وقت اسلام دشمن طاقتوں کے ہاتھوں کا کھلونا ہے۔“

امام مہدی کے ظہور کے بارے میں جو مختلف نظریات پائے جاتے ہیں انکا خلاصہ یہ ہے۔

مہدی کے ظہور کی کوئی پیشنگوئی نہیں کی گئی صحاح ستہ میں نامعتبر راویوں کی احادیث صرف خلافت کے حصول کی حکمت عملی کے تحت شامل کی گئی تھیں۔

طاہرہ کی ازدواجی زندگی

مرزا کاظم بیگ کے مطابق قرۃ العین کی نسبت پہلے برگن کے مجتہد آخوند محمد تقی سے ٹھہری تھی جبکہ دیگر مورخین کا کہنا ہے کہ اسکی نسبت بچپن سے ہی اسکے چچا ملا محمد تقی کے بیٹے ملا محمد سے طے پا چکی تھی اور اسی باعث 1831ء میں تیرہ سال کی عمر میں اسکی شادی ملا محمد سے کی گئی جس کا شمار اس وقت کے اچھے قابل علماء میں ہوتا تھا۔ یہ شادی بڑی دھوم دھام سے ہوئی تھی طاہرہ کے ایک گاؤں کے علاوہ بیش بہا قیمتی تحفے تحائف ملے جو ایک خزانہ کی حیثیت رکھتے تھے لیکن یہ شادی مذہبی نظریات کی بھینٹ چڑھ گئی طاہرہ اکڑ کہا کرتی تھی کہ یہ شادی اسکی مرضی سے نہیں ہوئی تھی ورنہ اسکا شوہر سفرو حضر میں اسکا ساتھ دیتا۔ 23 یا 26 سال کی عمر میں وہ دو بیٹیوں اور ایک بیٹی کی ماں تھی۔ بڑے بیٹے کا نام محمد ابراہیم اور چھوٹے بیٹے کا نام محمد اسماعیل تھا۔ بیٹی اور بڑے بیٹے محمد ابراہیم کے حالات زندگی تاریخ کے اوراق پر محفوظ نہیں ہیں البتہ محمد اسماعیل کے نواسہ نعمت ورثا نے بہائی تحریک کی شاعری میں شہرت حاصل کی۔

Free Bahai Faith (Baha'is of Thailand)

Since the establishment of Universal House of Justice in 1963 at Baha'i World Centre, at Haifa the Baha'is cannot make any departure from the norms and the procedures lay down by the UHJ. No amount of failure or development of progressive ideals can supersede whatever is written in the Messages/letters of UHJ.

There is a wide divide between the democratic ideals of equality and freedom, rights of citizens, individual liberty and pluralism cherished by Baha'u'llah, Abdul Baha and the rigid format of governance envisaged by the Self centric and anti-pluralistic Universal House of Justice.

As a result, most of the Baha'is have remained isolated from the Baha'i Holy writings of Central figures of the Faith. The widespread and disproportionately higher level of intolerance shown by Universal House of Justice for all other ideas and thinking and fear of excommunication have made the Baha'is to examine the claims of other Sects of Baha'is and to take solace in them especially the one having Universal House of Justice.

The terrible failure of Ruhi books curriculum and humiliating court case defeats resulting into NSA attorney Mr. Christopher Dolan begging the Sects leader to have a compromise and to find a way out for such a humiliating situation has put further question mark on the UHJ's claim of infallibility.

The dissatisfaction amongst the Baha'is is brewing up against the policies of UHJ. The Baha'is worldwide are thinking that Ruhi system has arrested the growth of Baha'i community worldwide because of its useless Ruhi Books and Ana's presentation. The Baha'is think that the world requires Holy writings as the mean to affect the hearts of the people rather than a jumble box prepared by a former NSA member and counselor of Columbia. In fact Dr. Arbab did not resign but he was sacked by UHJ for forming a group inside UHJ to control and manipulate it. Lately this group is given the name of Ruhi brigade comprising of Arbab himself Faredon Jawaheri, Payman Mohajir second seeded Mr. Sheriyar Razavi, Paul Lample and Gustav correa.

In this system a highly successful Professor in a University or a Baha'i from a respected Family who served the Faith with distinction for the whole of his life whose two family members have served as Counselor are supposed to go through the rigorous courses of Ruhi Book where a 15 year Old girl appointed as Teacher will teach you the tenets of Baha'i Faith. Any disagreement from this system will make you a recipient of a warning letter from the House of JUSTICE. The language used in the letter will make you further reflect that whether the letter is written by the custodians of the Faith or an international Terrorist organization threatening you to come in line with the UHJ or get ready to be declared as Covenant

The Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of Thailand

Dear Baha'i Friends,

Your email letter of 7 January 2010, enclosing a letter addressed to you by the law firm representing Mr. Jamshed Fozdar and another letter sent to you by Dr. Firooz Anaraki, has been received by the Universal House of Justice. We have been asked to convey the following.

Having considered Dr. Anaraki's recent conduct, in particular the manner in which he has chosen to respond to the question put to him about the disclosure of confidential information, the House of Justice has concluded that he has shown gross failure to fulfil the basic spiritual obligations of a Baha'i serving on an institution of the Faith. On that basis, you are instructed to deprive him of his administrative privileges forthwith, a sanction that will, of course, require his immediate removal from membership on the Spiritual Assembly of Bangkok. You should notify the Assembly accordingly, in a manner that you deem appropriate. Dr. Anaraki should be informed of the reason for this decision, and he should also be told that if consideration is to be given to lifting the sanction now imposed upon him he will first need to demonstrate a pronounced change in attitude towards the institutions of the Faith over an extended period of time.

With regard to the latest communication you have received from Mr. Fozdar's legal representatives, you are advised to ignore it; there would seem to be nothing to add to the letter you previously sent to the law firm, dated 13 December 2009.

What Baha'i Youths want from 95 Baha'i Youth Conferences !!

Sir Abbas Effendi the first Covenant Breaker after passing of Baha'u'llah

As all my fellow Baha'i friends are aware of law of Ex-communication now a days it is threat from Baha'i administration whosoever try to raise his voice on any miss-administration or miss-handling of Huqoqulah or any objection or question which our beloved Universal House of Justice fails in reply we get a warning of weapon of ex-communication. My Independent Investigation of Truth has reveal the fact that the first covenant breaker was Sir Abbas Effendi who has disobeyed his father Baha'u'llah and contradicted his teachings and promoted himself in many station and disrespecting Aghsan (lineage of Baha'u'llah) and ex-communicating entire family members of Mahde Uliya (wife of Baha'u'llah) for sure by this he is spiritually ex-communicated and he was epic center of covenant breaker in dispensation of Baha'u'llah.

Here I am bringing few pages of a loyal Baha'i and companion of Baha'u'llah Mirza Jawad Qazvini who has witness rise and spread of Baha'i faith, he has written a book as his memories

"Brief History of Behaullah The founder of Beha'i Religion" By Mirza Jawad Qazvini, author was with Baha'u'llah in 1862-63 in Baghdad; was arrested in Tabriz in 1867 but let go with a fine; went to Edirne midway through 1867; went to Akka with Baha'u'llah and spent the rest of his life there. A partial translation is available in "Material for the study of Babi religion" by the noted Historian Edward Browne translation is under the title "Epitome of Mirza Jawad of Qazvini" the original book is in Arabic I would like to bring few pages of his memories from Page 62-67

The first difference which happened after the death of His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah within this Community was that 'Abbas Effendi concealed some part of the book of [Baha'u'llah's] Testament entitled "the Book of my Testament, which book was given to him by Baha'u'llah in his own holy writing. The detail of this is that on the ninth day after the Ascension [i.e. the death of Baha'u'llah] 'Abbas Effendi chose nine persons from amongst the Companions, one of whom was the author [of this book] and disclosed to them this document, concealing, however, a portion of it with a blue leaf [of paper] without any reason or justification, and gave it to them that they might enjoy the blessing of its perusal. One of them, named Aqa Riza of Shiraz, read it at a sign from him down to the place concealed by the blue leaf, whereupon 'Abbas Effendi said to the persons above mentioned, "Verily a portion of this book is concealed for a good reason, because the time doth not admit of its full disclosure." On the afternoon of that day Majdu'd-Din Effendi read it again, by command of (Abbas Effendi, in the Holy Place, before a company of the Aghsan (sons of Baha'u'llah), Afnan (kinsmen of the Bab), Muhajirin (Exiles), Mujawirin (settlers in 'Akka) and Musafarin (temporary visitors), down to the afore-mentioned passage, as narrated above.

Let it not be hidden from persons of discernment that the injunctions set forth in the above-mentioned book all refer to this community generally; how then could it be right for Abbas Effendi to disclose what he wished and conceal a portion thereof? For there is no doubt that if what was so concealed had not been suitable [for general publication] His Holiness Baha'u'llah would not have written it in His august writing. The duty of sons is to carry out the testamentary instructions of their father, not to reveal a portion and conceal a portion thereof, according to their private ideas and opinions or personal inclinations, for His

Holiness Baha'u'llah says:

"O [Divine Beauty! Verily I have spent my soul and my spirit for the glorification of the Word and the exalting of the Dispensation of thy Glorious and Beneficent Lord. If we see one of the 'Branches' (Aqsan, that is sons) otherwise than as God willeth, we will rightfully drive him away: verily I am the Mighty, the All-powerful."

No Further Manifestation to Take Place for 1000 Years The second difference was that His Holiness our Great Master hath said in numerous places in his Holy Scriptures, plainly and explicitly, that no fresh Manifestation shall take place until a full thousand years shall have passed from this wrong doer and that if anyone advances a claim to any such position before the completion of the above-mentioned period, whosoever he be, and from whatsoever place he be, he is a vain pretender worthy of rejection; as when he says in the "Most Holy Book" (Kitab-i-Aqdas):

"Whosoever claim to a [new] Dispensation before the completion of a full thousand years is a liar and prevaricator... And whosoever construes this verse or Interprets it otherwise than as it hath been obviously revealed is deprived of the Spirit of God, and of His Mercy which encompasses all the worlds

But 'Abbas Effendi, after he had attained to supremacy, clearly and explicitly adopted the position of originality, and claimed such lofty stations and high degrees as belong exclusively to Divine Theophanies, and even proclaimed in public in America that he was the Messiah and the son of God, and in India that he was the promised Bahram

And again he says: "Whosoever calls on men in my Name, verily he is from me."

[But] His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah says: "Whosoever lays claim to any station, rapture, ecstasy or craving otherwise than in this [my] Name, verily he is of [the number of] the most lost, though he speak with all utterance, and cause rivers to burst forth from rocks, and control the winds, and cause the clouds to rain.

"And 'Abbas Effendi says in Persian: " Say, 'the Goal and Sum of all are the products of this Pen (he himself), and the Proof is that which this tongue utters."

[But] His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah says in Persian: "What this Oppressed One desireth of all is Justice and Equity. Let them not be satisfied with listening, but let them ponder on what hath been manifested by this servant.

By the Sun of the Bayan arising from the horizon of the heaven of the Kingdom of [God] the All merciful, had there been found anyone [else] to explain or to speak, we would not have made ourselves the object of men's reviling and calumnies."

And again, in the "Chapter of the Pen" (Suratu'l-Qalam) : "Say, 'Into the heart of whomsoever it entereth to rival this Pen, or to associate himself therewith, or to approach it, or to know what is revealed by it, let it be surely known that the Devil hath whispered into his soul: thus hath the matter been revealed, if ye would know it.' "

Abbas Effendi says in Persian: "This servant is the expositor of the perspicuous Book, and whatever of God's writings is not confirmed by this servant (i.e he himself) is not worthy of credence."

His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah says: "The Covenant was taken at the time of the Dawn from those who believe that they should not worship [aught] save God, nor work mischief in the earth."

'Abbas Effendi ascribes all the covenants and vows mentioned in the Sacred Books to himself, as his words prove. Thus he says in Persian:

"In short, verily from the beginning of Creation until now there hath not happened or appeared any plain covenant or clear promise like unto this. Yea, there have been promises, but they were not beneath the shadow of the Tree of Prophecy and the Lote-tree of the Limit, but were only suggested by allegories. But in this great Cycle and luminous Epoch the Object of the Covenant is visible in the horizons and the Centre of the Promise is known amongst the people of the world."

His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah says in Persian:

"Though one should adduce all the Scriptures in the world, yet speak otherwise than as God willeth, he is mentioned in God's Book as of the Fire, and is [so] inscribed by the Supreme Pen."

'Abbas Effendi says in Persian: "The dispensation in its entirety reverts to the recognized and acknowledged place, and this Station is distinguished, witnessed and explicitly differentiated, like the Sun in all its phases, from all that is on the earth."

His Holiness our Great Master Baha'u'llah in many passages of his writings, as also in the Book of his [last] testament, commanded this community to do away with discord, to extinguish the fire of sectarian hatred, and to consort with all religions with kindness and friendliness, as he says in a tablet

"O people, speak well of [God's] servants, and speak not of them evil, or that whereby their souls may be troubled.' The mention of evil hath also been forbidden in this Law, because the tongue is for the commemoration of the Truth, and it is pitiful that it should be defiled by backbiting or uttering words which cause sadness and grief to [God's] servants."

And again in the same Book: "O people of the world ! God's religion exists for love and Concord: do not make it a means to enmity and discord !" Enmity And Dissension Fostered by 'Abbas Effendi

Alas! Abbas Effendi destroyed these Great principles and Supreme purpose because of his special and personal aims and desires, and thus he laid the foundation of hatred and discord among the people of Baha and created this dissension and caused separation between brother and sister, parents and children, husband and wife, and between the friends of long standing. Furthermore, whosoever did not yield and agree to his ideas and doctrines and did not speak evil against his brother Mohammed Ali Effendi, and against the sacred Family of Baha, he was named by different names as Nakiz (Violater), Motazelzil (Doubter) and Kafir (Infidel). Also Abbas Effendi ordered his followers to abstain from meeting, speaking, dealing with, or accompanying the Violators (Nakizeen).

"respect and heed for the 'Branches' (Aghsan, i.e sons) is incumbent upon all for The glorifying of the Dispensation and the uplifting of the word".

Even today if you notice that the teaching and tablets of Sir Abbas Effendi are preferred more than Baha'u'llah in our gatherings, if you dare to ask this question that why teachings of Baha'u'llah are kept aside, you will come under the radar of Universal House of Justice who now a days has exclusive franchise of Ex-communication.

There are many such misdeeds of Sir Abbas Effendi is mentioned in this book because of space I have just mentioned few deeds and disobedience of him, the author was Baha'i who was present at the time of Bab and Baha'u'llah it is one of the authentic history book after Nuqtatul Kaaf, reader can find this book on internet and can read and decide that Sir Abbas Effendi was real and first Covenant breaker.

James Taylor perfectly describes the purpose of the Baha'i Faith, by accident

Courtesy : http://fruittreeblog.com/2013/03/30/another_day/

This post has nothing to do with economics, governance, business, finance, etc. So if you arrived at this site hoping for some discussion about that sort of thing, don't feel bad if you end up closing this window and going here.

Instead, I wanted to break the routine and share some personal reflections on what I think the Baha'i Faith truly is and its purpose. I don't plan to provide a discussion of its teachings, a supremely useful exercise but one that has been done impeccably well already by many others. (If you're looking for that, a great website that does this simply and eloquently is here.) Rather, I thought I'd share a song that on its surface might seem completely unrelated to the Faith, but in my opinion captures its essence better than anything I've encountered.

A few years ago some Baha'is I knew were hosting a fireside discussion with friends about the Faith in their home on Cape Cod, and invited me to come along. I can't remember much about that evening, including what was said or even the general topic of discussion. All I can really remember is the warmth and friendliness of the atmosphere, and the song they played on the CD player to kick off the evening and set the mood. That song turned out to be Another Day by James Taylor, which is now easily one of my favorite songs ever. To this day, I own no James Taylor albums and have little interest in listening to his other music. But I remain obsessed with Another Day.

My poor wife has endured hours of my gushing about this song, and has handled it (mostly) with class. That's what they don't tell you about marriage before you tie the knot: get ready to hear the same stories over and over for the next half century until you die. So thank you, wife whose name will not be mentioned for personal privacy reasons.

Another Day is kind of a remake of an older hit song called Wake Up, Little Susie. Kind of. The original is about a girl and boy who accidentally fall asleep together at a drive-in movie, and upon waking up in the early morning, comically panic about what people will assume. This was a mega-hit in the late '50s and has been remade countless times. In one of the most random factoids you will ever hear, Wake Up, Little Susie is George W Bush's favorite song.

James Taylor turns the story told in Wake Up Little Susie into a metaphor. In Another Day, a male voice sings to his female companion, asking her to join him as he bravely faces a new world and a new dawn:

Later he sings

I really don't know what James Taylor is intending to sing about, but the song perfectly describes, in my view, the whole point of the Baha'i Faith.

Baha'u'llah made the audacious claim that his coming — and very importantly, the teachings he left behind — were the fulfillment of the prophecies of ancient religions that looked forward to a time of tumult, sweeping change, and resurrection that would bring forth an unrecognizably better world. In the Old Testament we hear about the coming of the "New Heaven and the new earth". The Qur'an talks about the "Qiyameh", when the dead will be resurrected. The Baghavad Gita talks about the return of Lord Krishna at a time when corruption and immorality will become rampant. And so on.

The audacity of Baha'u'llah's message was that he claimed to be God's appointed agent to fulfill the promises of these ancient religions. But Baha'is don't believe these prophecies are literal. There will be no physical reanimation of long-dead human corpses, and the saintly will not magically elevate "up" to heaven.

If not literal, then, how do Baha'is understand these prophecies of complete destruction followed by resurrection and renewal? According to Baha'u'llah's teachings, we are living in a time of unprecedented corruption, materialism, spiritual malaise, and unnecessary suffering. Only by collectively turning towards God's guidance for this day and age can the human race overcome these causes of misery and turn the earth into something truly beautiful. That is Baha'u'llah's message and the purpose of his life on earth, as I understand it.

OK, back to the song. Let me try and actually spell out what it actually contains, and why it so artfully captures what I just described above. Here are some of the lyrics, what they mean to me, and some passages from Baha'u'llah's writings. Note that all of the Baha'i passages below are from the book Gleanings from the Writings of Baha'u'llah.

Lyric: "It was a hell of a night"

My translation: "We've all been through something terrible as a human race"

Baha'u'llah's words: "Consider the multitude of lives that have been, and are still being, sacrificed in a world deluded by a mere phantom which the vain imaginations of its peoples have conceived."

"So blind hath become the human heart that neither the disruption of the city, nor the reduction of the mountain in dust, nor even the cleaving of the earth, can shake off its torpor."

Lyrics: “Another dawn is breaking” “The world outside is waking” “The promise of another day”

My translation: Good things are stirring, and you can see the beginnings of a resurrection of human society.

Baha’u’llah’s words: “Soon will the present-day order be rolled up, and a new one spread out in its stead.”

“Take heed lest anything deter thee from extolling the greatness of this Day—the Day whereon the Finger of majesty and power hath opened the seal of the Wine of Reunion, and called all who are in the heavens and all who are on the earth.”

3)

Lyrics: “Morning light has driven away / All the shadows that hide your way” “The sun has begun / To melt all our fears away”

My translation: It’s only through God’s power and grace that the earth can become radiant as we’ve been promised

Baha’u’llah’s words: “It is incumbent in this Day, upon every man to place his whole trust in the manifold bounties of God, and arise to disseminate, with the utmost wisdom, the verities of His Cause. Then, and only then, will the whole earth be enveloped with the morning light of His Revelation.”

4)

Lyrics: “Wake up Susie / Put your shoes on / Walk with me into this light” “Just to be with you by my side” “Turn and face the sun / One by one”

My translation: The resurrection of the world is not going to be accomplished without great effort on the part of human beings, acting and working together, united.

Baha’u’llah’s words: “Speed out of your sepulchers. How long will ye sleep?”

“Exert yourselves that ye may attain this transcendent and most sublime station, the station that can ensure the protection and security of all mankind. This goal excelleth every other goal, and this aspiration is the monarch of all aspirations.”

“So powerful is the light of unity that it can illumine the whole earth.”

I almost certainly am getting carried away here. I’m pretty sure James Taylor didn’t write this song with the Baha’i Faith in mind. But boy, would I love to meet him one day and tell him about all of this.

A commentary on the differences between Hindu Religions and the Baha'i Faith

A Comment by Julian on a YouTube thread:

Indian people should not give up their natural and ancient religions for the Baha'i faith. The Baha'i faith is very different from Indian religion. And it lacks a great deal by comparison.

Response by an Indian who is adopting and promoting the Baha'i Faith:

"Hi friend, thank you for sharing your views. My background is Hindu and I consider myself to uphold the Hindu religion where ever I go."

Julian: This is clearly because you are unfamiliar with your own religion.

The Indian: "Allow me to give you some insight, perhaps you have been misguided or miss understood the Baha'i Faith."

Julian: I was a very involved Baha'i for 12 years. I know full well about the shallow, religion-reductive Baha'i Faith.

"Baha'i Faith is a beautiful religion you just need to investigate what it truly means. Being a Baha'i"

It means ignoring and being clueless about the contents of other religions but acting like you know. It also means world-obsession and a fetish for mixing bodies of different types together; getting thrills from that. That is, verily, an embarrassment to religion.

"Baha'u'llah says 'you are upholding all the divine religions of the past.'" This means i am Muslim, a Jew, a Christian, a Buddhist, a Hindu, a Sikh, a Babi, and so on. How can a Baha'i stay away from Indian people when Indian people like myself are Baha'is. Peace, light and love :-)"

Muslim, Christian, Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh even. That's a typical Baha'i mouthful. The Sikhs are centered on listening to the enrapturing inner divine sound of God that they call Shabd. Do Baha'is have a take on that? Not last time I checked.

In brief: Do you even know what's in these religions? Baha'is have no concept of the contents of the Bhagavad-Gita, Upanishads, Yoga-Sutras, etc. That content is far beyond Baha'i conceptions of religion. Most basic concepts of Hinduism — such as meditation and meditation techniques, analysis of the mind, analysis of the problem of samsara/duality, or the divine efficacy of austerities (tapas) — do not exist in the Baha'i Faith. And yet these are fundamental conceptions — and religious realities — that bear on mankind's fundamental problem as beings trapped in dualistic external existence. That last profound concept of man's problem — a central starting point in Hinduism and Buddhism — has no conceptual development in the Baha'i Faith; it cannot even be found on their mental radar.

"My Friend, change is the only constant thing in life, as civilization progresses then so does mankind progress and evolve, it is inevitable. We must embrace change and embrace new religions as one. It does not mean you should throw away your culture or heritage."

Whether the simplistic and primitive Baha'i Faith represents cultural progress or evolution is a question I'll leave for later. But you are throwing away your magnificent religious heritage by embracing the Baha'i Faith. I know both religions, and of this there can be no doubt. Baha'is alternately clueless or phobic towards most of your profound religious heritage. If they don't ignore it and trivialize it with ersatz posturing toward meditation (a subject beyond them) they outright reject it. For example they discredit the spiritual value of austerities/tapas. (Though none have tried it, I am sure.) Baha'u'llah calls your saints and ascetics deluded "creatures." Baha'u'llah had a clueless disdain for all your yogis, rishis, and saints who sought and found God within. In fact, the very idea of a God that is personally realizable within — the central and choicest aspect of Hinduism — is utterly undeveloped in the Baha'i Faith! They even consider discussion of such subjects taboo and shun whatever content speaks to it in their own writings. Baha'u'llah's simplistic Islamic, exterior-focused religious viewpoint in no way encompasses the vast spiritual understanding of the Hindu religious heritage. May as well try to invite an elephant into a mouse's hole.

So Hindus worship "change" now, do they? An educated Hindu would say that Brahman — the immutable Pure Consciousness — is the only constant in life, and that it must be found. Clearly you don't understand that the purpose of religion, in Hinduism and other great religions, is to get beyond the tyranny of change and find the Changeless God, the Immutable. You were sadly not educated in your own religion, thus how can you know that the Baha'i Faith fulfills it or improves it? Constant change is a basic feature of unsatisfactory samsara. Bringing more "change" to the ever-changing world is no attainment for a group to crow about. Change happens anyway, the inevitable quality of samsara or repetitive dualistic existence. Even Obama sold "change" to get elected — and he's nothing but a dishonest politician. Change is nothing new, and all change is dualistic — featuring good and bad.

Real religion leads a man to become established in the eternally satisfactory Changeless, fulfilling desires, giving contentment, and making him a true benefit to others because he can now lead them to the same imperishable Brahman.

Which brings me to another subject. There is no "saving the world" without a worthy analysis of what the world is. Hinduism has made this analysis; Baha'i scriptures fail here. Hinduism is far more profound & effective in their analysis of world-problems. They analyzed the exterior world as the self-projection of the viewer.

Are you even aware of the magnificent contribution your own religion has made to understanding of the world phenomena? That the outer material world is has all the characteristics of nightly ephemeral dreams which are self-projected? Are you not aware of the spectacular contributions of your sage Sankara to the understanding of exterior reality? Believe me, the Baha'i Faith is not aware and can't hold a candle to it. But you should be.

Your religion makes a flawless analysis of the world and all its problems/flaws as one's self-mind, projecting outward. Flaws in it are one's own impurities. Thus by self-purification the exterior projected world-dream upgrades and improves of itself; without that self-purification no world-improvement is possible. This was the same conclusion of Buddha! Thus as a Baha'i you block out the profound understanding of your own multiplicitous religious heritage, but Buddhism as well. Beyond an occasional reference to "the world of dust" which Baha'is take no guidance from and never develop, the Baha'i culture lacks all these recognitions of the transitory world, as well as the elegant failsafe solution founded in personal purification. Baha'is are, in my experience, not even able to answer these ideas much less entertain them significantly as a religious system!

Related to this, your religion has a profound, hard-edged concept of the significance of austerities or "tapas." Austerities are undertaken, in your religion, to burn out impurities which block the perception of God and are the basis for outer flaws in the projected world-dream. This insight into the value of asceticism for uncovering God plus changing the nature of the world-projection is deeply resonant with Christian ideas and the life of Christ. The Baha'i Faith lacks any of this understanding. The one place where Baha'is make some gesture towards austerities is once per year in their so-called fast which is not a fast at all. (They still eat, just during the dark 12 hours instead of the daylight. Big deal.) Your religion's understanding of tapas and austerities is of immortal value in the development of God-knowledge. Why trade it for a religion where this concept has no development and no place? From the Hindu, Buddhist, and even Christian point of view, asceticism is used to conquer life's existential personal problems: lust, the small ego, and the mind. Baha'is say, "We reject asceticism." That means the Baha'i Faith rejects any practical tools for conquering these three mortal problems.

As to "progress," do you really believe the primitive, harsh contents of the Baha'i "Most Holy Book" represents positive cultural progress? With its complete lack of metaphysical sophistication present in the Vedas and Upanishads? The vision of human life presented in the Kitab-i-Aqdas is primitive compared to the rarefied and refined cultural ages of India's past. If you want real progress for your people, embrace the values and ways of your own ancient religion — far superior to the Baha'i Faith.

"Being a Baha'i — Baha'u'llah says "you are upholding all the divine religions of the past."

This is a simple lie. To uphold the Divine Religion of Hinduism one does this:

— He practices austerities

— He seeks God within through the stilling of the mind (in meditation or chanting technique) or devotional practices such as concentrated rituals

— He practices brahmacharya

All 3 above are central to the God-realizing religions of Hinduism. And all 3 are ignored — or even condemned — by the Baha'i Faith. There is another principle in Hinduism, and that is guru-devotion. But this principle is ignored in mainstream Baha'i life, and they have no conscious consideration of it as a principle at all. And how can you blame them? Baha'u'llah was an angry gnome with a thoroughly Islamic religious mind and can't hold a candle to the Vedic rishis. How can you prefer him, as a guru, over your own luminous saints like Swami Sivananda? Ramakrishna? Or even a modern living saint such as Karunamayi?

To be a Hindu is to renounce the world and seek God-within instead. Baha'is do not even have a concept of these two; and don't even truly respect the ideas in their actual daily culture. It is far better to be a God-seeker — and a true Hindu — than be "every religion" in a false, inauthentic, way. Why would you want to be "every religion." What is the point of that? Especially if while pretending to be that, you have no concept of God Himself or the tools to find God within. That is the situation with Baha'is. While pretending to be "every religion" (pretending because they do not even comprehend the contents of other religions), they dispense with the central value of religion: Inner God-search and solving of the problem of the dualistic outer world-projection (samsara). Beyond Baha'u'llah's occasional references to "this world of dust," words Baha'is ignore and find no guidance from, Baha'is have no evaluation or analysis of the problem of samsara. What a naive concept to think that samsaric duality dissolves by obsessing on the world's problems or getting people to agree on a few shallow concepts.

These are fundamental Hinduism:

— Austerities

— Brahmacharya

— Meditation for experiencing God within.

These concepts are barely present in the Baha'i Faith; that is, in the actual culture and mindset of Baha'is. Though austerities is a core principle in development of Hindu religious life, the Baha'i faith disparages austerities, saying "We don't believe in asceticism." Then say goodbye to the most spiritually effective aspect of most of the great religions!

As to brahmacharya and the spiritual significance of continence, Baha'is simply do not possess this in their material or in the religious culture that produced Baha'is texts.

As to meditation, Baha'is are phobic toward the very word "meditation." Perhaps they try to humor Hindus in India around their temple with some entertainment of the meditation concept. It would be like Baha'is to at least humor it. But Baha'is themselves lack any catalog of knowledge regarding meditation, the pursuit of God within, or the inner territory. Although their Holy Book obviously specifies a mantra (outloud or japa) Baha'is don't even recognize it as a mantra, or as japa, or have any conception of its significance. By contrast, the science of concentrating the mind for God-perception within is highly developed in Hinduism, having an extraordinarily elaborate lexicon. Hindus have words and basic concepts like manas (mind), dharana (concentration), dhyana (steady concentration), vrittis (movements of the mind), with all aspects of the breath analyzed. This is significant because the moving mind, in Hindu metaphysics, is identified as the producer of the moving outer world-samsara. None of this knowledge exists in the Baha'i Faith. They ask that Hindus give it all up — not even understanding its value themselves — to be replaced by a material world-obsession. The Hindu rishis have identified man's fundamental problem: His mind. They have also mapped the inner territory for the God-seeker — territory encountered by all who grapple with the mind. None of this knowledge exists in Baha'i culture, and is only hinted at in the Sufi language of texts like "The Seven Valleys." But such texts never intrude, in any significant way, into the Baha'i world-view which is externally-oriented. Truly, spiritual and metaphysical knowledge in the Baha'i Faith is comparable to a deaf mule with a basket standing beside the most advanced flying car.

Hinduism/Yoga renounces the world and the unreal in preference for God and the Real. But Baha'is are world-focused, world-obsessed, and material. Don't be a fool and reject or devalue your more genuine religious heritage that is far more profound and effective than Baha'i world-obsession.

Certain traditions in many countries are not improving or evolving society but are negating the well being of society. Its important to reflect on such issues.

At core the problems of societies are founded in man's attachment to the world and the flesh; and his lack of the state-of-grace. The state-of-grace dawns for a man by self-purification, which is the purpose of Hindu yoga and austerities, and samadhi. Hinduism-Yoga addresses this deep metaphysical root of the problem; the Baha'i faith does not.

The Baha'is even suppressed what little yoga (spiritual technique) that they had — their own "Most Holy Book" and it's chanting procedures, considering them unimportant. You cannot "organize the world into happiness." Human happiness is only secured by contact with the faultless, blissful sat-chit-ananda within. Hindu religion specializes in showing men the way to that. The Baha'i Faith lacks even a concept of it. And in practical daily Baha'i life, they shun discussion of such matters. Happiness also is not secured by watching various different colored, or different shaped bodies mixing it up. For certain psychological dispositions, this is a transient thrill or pleasure, only. Later boredom sets in. "The thrill is gone." Or differences or tensions arise. Or you miss your own people — or the distinct peoples — and what they once were. Body obsessions and world obsessions — the warp and woof of Baha'i life — can never secure man's happiness.

Our vision should be global and united.

No, your vision should be of God. "Globe" means world. You are telling me that you should be world-focused. Do you know how many material worlds there are in this samsara? Do you know how many globes? No creditable religion can be constructed from a "vision" or focus on the tired, samsaric, inert world.

No man can have another man's same vision. The only way you can share another man's exact vision is to attain samadhi — alone explored by Hinduism and Buddhism — and get at least temporary oneness with him and all things. As to your Baha'i buzzword "unity," in well-trained Baha'i fashion I see you are learning to throw around a vague concept begging for analysis.

There is no such thing as "unity" in material terms. Each soul remains separate. (Do you want us all to gel into one ball of protoplasm?) Nobody wants such "unity."

But Hinduism understands unity in authentic terms: It is the experience of at-one-ment known by the religious seeker in God-meditation. When Baha'is speak of "unity" they really mean transient pleasurable experiences in which this group is "cooperating" with this group and having transient, pleasant experiences of human interaction.

It is what we need in this world, lets put our egos aside and unite and respect all.

The Vedic rishis had a profounder insight into what we need in this world: Detachment from the samsara, spiritual practices, and actual destruction of the ego through God-union. Even utmost "respect for all" does not guarantee your happiness. Utmost "respect all" does not end the problems of duality and samsara that the individual faces: Constant change, impermanence, and all karmic situations mixed with good/bad. You can remain quite unhappy, and still immersed in duality, while you "respect all." Now, though the Baha'i Faith has "prayers for detachment" in practice they are a highly world-attached and world-focused religion. Meanwhile, the Baha'i Faith lacks any techniques or practices — at least in conscious presentation — for the development of world-detachment.

Start to independently investigate about other religions and start to open your minds to love and accept all as one. To me when someone asks me what religion I am I simply except the faith they are following as mine, because being a Baha'i is a platform for me respect and love all religions as one. To me someone who believes and respects all religion as one, humanity as one and God as one is a Baha'i, unknowingly they just don't know it, they have to investigate it themselves.

"We must embrace change and embrace new religions as one."

Sad to hear an Indian having this concept of religion! A genuine Hindu — and a genuine religious person — says: "We must embrace God, the changeless, the ever-Satisfactory. And take our minds off the transitory world-miasm to solve the problem of how it arises."

All people at all times are swept away with the changing world miasm; merging with it or "embracing" it; considering it important; considering it real, fully mixed with the continuous change of both mind and world. To be in full embrace with the transitory samsara is the ordinary state of the suffering human being!

There is no point in saying “there is one religion” if the religion you embrace— the Baha’i Faith — is conceptually shallow with no address to the fundamental problem of yourself and all men. That problem is mankind’s immersion in unsatisfactory dualistic phenomena; inevitability of death, and repetition of sorrows (caused by karmic vasanas). Better to embrace one religion, from among a thousand, that is authentic and solves that problem, than construct a “one world religion” that merely pretends to be “all religions” and does not address the fundamental problem of man.

“being a Baha’i is a platform for me respect and love all religions as one.”

The typical thing with Baha’is is that they do not even know the contents of the other religions, or wish to know them. You are not “embracing” a thing when you don’t know what it is. You need to ask: Is this a real platform? Do Baha’is truly “respect” or “love” other religions that they do not even understand or wish to learn about? Baha’is do not truly respect the other religions, have no answers for them, and fear them. I have never met a Baha’i who understood most of the concepts in the Bhagavad-Gita. In fact, they reject many of its concepts, and have disinterest for the rest. Better to embrace one religion that gives you God-knowledge than falsely “embrace” “all religions” for the pleasure of a soft-focused pink cloud.

The Hindu rishis get a genuine platform for respecting other religions because they have analyzed them aright: In Non-Dualistic Vedanta (of the Mandukya and G. Karika Upanishads) all exterior religions are understood to be one’s own transient karmic mind-projections, like the rest of the daily world-dream. They all arise from Pure Consciousness behind the mind and are products of individual karma, like the rest of the external world-dream. In other words, all religions just like all other externals are emanations of Brahman or Pure Consciousness. They are one’s own karmic mental projections based on conditioning and vasanas as he evolves over incarnations. This is a profounder understanding of the “oneness of religion.” And it’s in Hinduism. And the better karmic erections (religions) direct you to God within. The Baha’i Faith is not one of those better religions from this point-of-view. Speaking of “incarnations,” the Baha’i Faith rejects reincarnation, so basic to Hinduism and Buddhism, with no convincing demonstration of proof. (Even though the Bab apparently believed in it.) The Baha’i Faith has a vision only for this one life; only the material world. The vision of the Hindu spans beyond lifetimes, ages, and embraces All Time.

It has long been a trait of the Hindu sages to not argue with other religions, not deny their validity, and not attack them. Hindus excel at this in true depth; not Baha’is. It has long been the view of the Vedic seers and yogis that all saints have the same basic attainment, reaching the same mountaintop but by alternate routes, and that all God-realized saints salute each other from their mountain peaks, and finally seeing the essence behind all nomenclature and even all forms. However, the Baha’i faith does not even have the concept of the sage, the yogi, or the saint in the first place, nor the tools that allow men and women to become such. Who wants to adopt the Baha’i worldview in which yogis, bhaktas, siddhas, adepts, rishis, and saints — don’t exist? And one is not allowed to look upon their pictures. But the one picture of their little scowling gnome which is hidden away for PR purposes?

The Baha’i approach is a stealth destruction of other religions. They present themselves as “the new replacement and upgrade” for religions, without even understanding the contents of the other religions. In reality the Baha’i Faith is far more crude and primitive than Hindu scriptural philosophy and historical Hindu periods. And the true religion of the Baha’i Faith can be summed up in this phrase: “Thrills from external experiences of bodily ethnic mixing.”

“To me someone who believes and respects all religion as one, humanity as one and God as one is a Baha’i. “

Sounds boring and insensate. There is not much “oneness” between Baha’i doctrine and Hindu conceptions, and even littler common ground in terms of religious technique. Certainly there is common ground between them. For example, both contain the profound technique of chanting. However, Baha’is tend to disavow the value of their own chanting rules, and there is no knowledge or even discussion concerning them. Hinduism, on the other hand, has a spectacularly well-developed and ancient lore — even a science — relative to chanting, japa, and mantra. The Baha’i Faith is not even on the platform by comparison. The Baha’i Faith ignores most of the riches that Hinduism brings to the table, yet says it is superior and should supplant Hindu knowledge. Supplant it with what? Baha’i offers so little knowledge compared to just a few verses of the Katha Upanishad!

We get enough “oneness” in the state of prajna, or deep dreamless sleep, nightly. (This is pointed out by the Upanishads.) Nobody wants life to be One Blob. The mind prefers differences, distances, familiar/foreign, close-far. The mind will continually generate differences in the external world-dream. That’s what the mind does; and prefers it. Many religions is best. Many religions and many paths is best for the great University of the human world. Many religions — or paths to the mountaintop — is part of the diversity God created. The sad thing is that Baha’is don’t even have a conception for “a mountaintop” or what that means.

Real “oneness” is only truly experienced in samadhi (God-union). Because the external world is mind-generated, the duality and transitoriness inherent in the mind — inherent in the very phenomenon of mental “movement” — will always show up in the external mind-projected world. Only by understanding the external world as your own mind-created dream-projection, powered by Brahma, as taught in Hinduism, does one experience true “oneness” with it. The concept of samadhi (blissful God-union) does not even exist in the Baha’i Faith! To even discuss it would disturb sadly limited Baha’is.

“Unity” is a big concept. The sages of India considered “unities” in a much more intelligent manner. Their metaphysics includes the concept of prakriti, a primordial field of nature. Also space or akasa, the first creation of the Creator God (Isvara/Brahma) in which He then placed dualistic creations. There is the concept of Aum — the divine sound heard by Hindu adepts — in which all knowables exist. Then there is the final “unity” Nirguna Brahman, or “Pure Consciousness” — out of which all of these arise. (Though Nirguna Brahman, the ‘uncarved block,’ transcends concepts like “unity.”)

Baha’i scriptures don’t conceive of these things. In fact, the Baha’i Faith lacks what could be called any coherent metaphysics at all, much less an elaborate metaphysics. There is no analysis of God’s nature or the processes of his creation, or unities such as prakriti, pradhana, Aum, or Light.

What a Baha'i actually means when he speaks of "unity"

But Baha'is always talk about "unity" as if they want everything to coalesce into a giant ball or blob. Unity is a pretty high-falootin' word. So we have to ask ourselves: What do Baha'is really mean when they talk about "unity"? Is it some cosmic static state that, once arrived at, never again changes? And only able to move or change with the introduction of disunity?

People don't like a static state. Does it really mean "harmony"? Lack of significant conflict? But that is not the same thing as some kind of metaphysical unity. A "relative lack of conflict" only references a relative condition, and another dualistic state. (Some conflict is present.) And a profound lack of conflict, should that transitory condition be seen for any length of time, is uncreative and becomes boring. In music a bit of dissonance is required to give it life and interest. Like, say a change from the major 3rd to the minor. Or the use of a diminished 5th note, etc. Nobody enjoys a play or story that contains no conflict or opposing forces. Would the ideal world of the Baha'i be one in which everybody would die of boredom?

Does their "unity" really refer, perhaps, to prosperity? Growth? Is it like the concept of coherence? What? Let's analyze it...

It's easy to find out what Baha'is mean by unity. I know, I used to be one. I knew what it meant to me, and others were like me. Let's say you are talking to a Baha'i. You say, "Why do you like this religion." They may say, "I like the unity ideal."

Now you ask them: "What do you mean by unity? Have you ever experienced this unity?"

The Baha'i will say, "Oh, most certainly!"

Now ask the Baha'i to tell you how and when they experienced "unity." They will proceed to describe a pleasurable experience that they had. Likely it was at some human gathering, where "this colored" people smiled at "that" colored people and shook hands, etc. And this experience gave the Baha'i pleasant, happy, and transient feelings, for psychological reasons. The Baha'i goal of "unity" turns out to be nothing but the pursuit of pleasurable outer experiences in the material and social human world.

The Baha'i, due to his particular psychological conditioning (including notions about "what's been wrong with the world") — gets a pleasurable experience when he sees "this type" smile at "that type," and shake hands at their meeting, or a certain mix of bodies/genes all together, or a group saying "We all declare the same thought" (for the moment). This experience gives the Baha'i psychological pleasure, and he describes that as an experience of "unity." In reality it's just a fleeting pleasure.

So in reality, Baha'is are a people who pursue pleasurable experiences. "Oh look, this one is getting along with that one and they are smiling." "Oh look, I never knew blacks before, but now I am hanging around with black bodies. What a thrill." "Oh look, these islanders are dancing their special samba and we are being all kindly and enjoying the interesting performance. I enjoy these differences and this 'diversity.' And I feel good about myself because I am so righteous and welcoming."

These are experiences of external and psychological pleasures only. They are transitory. It is quite easy, also, to analyze their goals as nothing but desires for thrills in the external material world. The desire to enjoy "differences" (because you are bored or jaded) is not a spiritual desire. It is, according to Buddha and others, the central fault of man's mind. Lust for "diversity" — different shapes and types of bodies — is just that: Worldly and material lust.

The great religions such as Buddhism and Hinduism have to laugh at a religion that considers the pursuit of transitory human or social pleasures, and pursuit of thrills from "diversity" and different bodies — as a religious goal! The prospect of turning such impulses into a religion — how much more the "one religion" to replace all others — is absurd to any perceptive man.

The core teaching of Buddhism is that the external transitory world is unsatisfactory and in fact pure suffering; that this ends when one withdraws from the False Outer, stops craving worldly experiences, and turns toward The Real. (Such as "this group smiling at that group.") Hinduism is similar: True religion begins when the aspirant realizes the pointlessness and unsatisfactoriness of material existence. (See Yoga-Sutras, Yoga-Vasistha.)

Although Baha'u'llah, in his writings, did have a strong world-renouncing attitude (always calling it the "world of dust") and always admonished to turn to God (him, in this case — he didn't direct them to find God elsewhere) — the Baha'i Faith as a religious culture ignores these ideas. It is, in practice, a completely world-oriented religion, obsessed with "world problems," buildings, and watching new amalgams of people mix it up. Sort of like those who enjoy interracial sex, really.

Their religion does not point them to "God within" and such mystical ideas are, in fact, shunned by the Baha'i leadership notwithstanding statements like those found in the "Hidden Words." The official religion points Baha'is continually to the external world, and away from the inner. Their pursuit of "unity" is easily analyzed as nothing but the pursuit of human pleasures through seeing types mix together. They don't seek "unity" in any cosmic sense; but an endless round of "happy parties."

And did you think that "unity" was a new concept in religion? Not at all. The Hindu rishis have been pursuing — and attaining — unitive consciousness for millennia. But when the Hindu offers "unity" he is offering something much more personal, real, and fundamental — than Baha'is conceive of.

There are two areas where use of the term "unity" has legitimacy in Hinduism, and both of them are areas beyond the ken of Baha'i religion. One is the state of Samadhi pursued by the pious, ascetic Hindu. In that state one knows God directly and merges with Him as pure Bliss-Consciousness while in a conscious state. He then knows his oneness with all things. Yet the Baha'i Faith shuns this mystical knowledge. The other is the state of deep, dreamless sleep, which Hinduism calls “prajna.”

The Vedic rishis taught that all of us nightly become “in unity” with God during the state of deep dreamless sleep, though we are not conscious and a thin layer of nescience or unknowing is there. But we actually wake, and re-manifest “a world” out of desire for differences, drama, diversity, and changes. Thus the mind itself, though it gets comfort and strength from merging in God, is inclined to differences & fragmentation. The world itself is nothing other than one’s mind-created fragmentation.

Any such metaphysics analyzing the world-problem, especially what the world actually IS — as a phenomenon — are completely lacking in the primitive, childlike, and world-obsessed Baha’i faith. Baha’is see the world as separate from themselves, and as real and important (though Baha’u’llah spurned it as “dust.”) They have no understanding. Hinduism identified the mind as the generator of the world-miasm, and developed an approach to taming the mind. Baha’i grotesquely lacks this knowledge.

In a sense the Hindu devotee is trying to come into the deep-sleep knowledge while still awake. This is what is attained in the state of samadhi through assiduous work at concentrating the mind plus developing the devotional attitude.

If a religion has no insight into the fundamental laws of the outer world-erection, and offers no techniques for mastering that world-projection, it is an impoverished religion. In Hinduism, with or without “pleasant experiences” (such as Baha’is seek) — the devotee becomes happy. He becomes established in happiness from a causeless bliss not dependent on outer conditions. Baha’i happiness is tied to outer conditions and a constantly desired repetition of pleasant social & human experiences.

Why I am No Longer a Baha'i -Timothy Casey

Preamble

This is not an attack on the Baha'i Faith as some might be prone to suggest. This is an exposition of the experiences that initiated, conflagrated, and concluded my crisis of faith with the conviction that the Baha'i Writings are a testament to the profoundly beautiful, albeit imperfect creativity and wisdom of human beings; but that no more credit is due God for these writings than for any other penned expression of love.

Some Core Beliefs in Review

My closest and dearest friend has been a part of my spiritual journey for many years now, leading me back in my darkest hours to my core belief that God is love and reinforcing the ideal to which I hold that judgement is not of God. She has been my inspiration to explore the questions of spirituality and is the sole reason I have any belief in God at all.

My spiritual journey began with the question, "How would you like it if someone did that to you?". Not even the words of the most holy manifestation of God could match the power and directness of a question uttered by one of many somewhat frustrated fathers albeit the one in question being my own. This was reinforced with the beautiful Christian concept that God is love, but not before I was taught the Old Testament doctrine that all should "fear God". What is there to fear of one who loves you? Indeed, what is there to fear of love? You see, the evident disparity in religious dialogue always made me keenly aware of the gulf between spirituality and pseudo-spirituality, between practical reciprocity and the devaluation of the human being before such idols as are used to justify the unconscionable. This speaks to the great question I believe divides the "armies of Armageddon", as to whether religion was given Creation by the Creator to benefit the Creator even at the expense of Creation or religion was given unto Creation by the Creator to benefit Creation even at the expense of the Creator (Who by definition has infinite capacity to endure expense!). One ideology makes God in man's image to be the ultimate idol, whereas the other sets God beyond human frailties as would befit the Mother of Creation. One ideology is extensively materialistic, manipulative, judgemental, and exoteric; whereas the other ideology is profoundly spiritual, reciprocal, understanding, and prone to be esoteric – even if unnecessarily so.

I believe that any theology that alludes to the Creation being the plaything of the Creator as opposed to something more serious and sophisticated makes a mockery of everything that is purported to be "holy" by reducing the Creator to little more than a neurotic monster of great power. In the absence of any measurable evidence of explicitly divine temper tantrums, such allusions impose redundant and therefore unnecessary complexity on theological models and belief systems. Such impositions are excessively unreasonable in the absence of supporting evidence.

One of the realities to which both sides of "Armageddon" are prone is that interpretation is necessarily fluid in the formation of any consistent theology having philosophical integrity (IE internal congruency). This essentially gives the appearance of "shifting the goalposts". However, fluidity of interpretation is necessitated by the metaphorical nature of primitive languages that engage the use of allegories when communicating the numerous concepts beyond the native vocabulary. This also leads to the shifting of interpretation when demonstrating divine "infallibility" or prophetic fulfilment. As such, neither are valid proofs of divinity because such shifts whether necessary or not, still "shift the goalposts" without allowing falsifiability. This forces the seeker to dig deeper – in search of that ever elusive philosophical integrity.

Philosophical integrity describes the state in which an induced maxim is the source of deduced axioms and major or first principles from which are derived laws with similarly derived scope. Most often, you need to connect the dots for yourself – and if you can, this provides a good reason to join the troop. However, continued involvement requires continued rationality making the "independent search for truth" a never ending investigation. This becomes problematic if the emphasis of consensus with ever shifting group interpretations and priorities increases.

Why become a Baha'i?

I became a member of the Baha'i Faith on ISO:1993-March-27 when I reached the realisation that God is big enough to embrace all peoples in infinite mercy and understanding and likewise, that God is intelligent enough to know, understand, and accept the reality of individual belief based in uniquely individual experience. I had come to the realisation that the "Divine Judge" was the "Great Deception" in that God is love whereas judgement is original sin and not love, and therefore not of God. This is because judgement can be the only fruit of the tree of knowledge of "good" and "evil"; the forbidden fruit that ruined "Adam" as surely as it ruins any other community (cf. Genesis 5:1). Thus, I joined the Baha'i Faith embracing the beautiful axioms which made so much sense in terms of many modern problems:

1. Unity of humanity
2. Independent investigation of truth
3. The foundation of all religions is one
4. Religion by definition is the cause of love and unity
5. The essential harmony of science and religion
6. The equal rights of men and women
7. Abolition of all forms of prejudice and bigotry
8. The obligation to universal peace
9. The necessity of universal education
10. A spiritual solution to economic problems
11. The necessity of a universal auxiliary language
12. The necessity of an international tribunal and government

These twelve principles or objectives can find origin with the empathic principle included vaguely in the maxim enshrined in the Covenant of Baha'u'llah as "The religion of God is for love and unity; make it not the cause of enmity and dissension." I didn't join the Baha'i Faith to have these primary expectations rationalised away for "more important" concepts like "obedience" and "faith". I certainly didn't join the Baha'i Faith to shun covenant-breakers or apologise for the numerous logical and contextual errors of key figures such as Shoghi Effendi, 'Abdu'l-Baha, and even Baha'u'llah – especially in regard to the defamation of temperament groups simply because they were unanticipated by Baha'u'llah! I joined the Baha'i Faith to take a stand against submission rituals in the guise of irrational faith, which rituals are used to justify practices such as demonisation of inconvenient minorities and attempts to gain financial advantage by deception. I joined to show that social spirituality can and does exist without resort to fallacy and fraud.

Ninth Year Misgivings & Six Years of Spiritual Angst

My ninth year as a Baha'i proved to be one hell of a crisis of religion for me. Firstly it was pointed out that according to the Kitab-i-Aqdas ("The Most Holy Book"), accepting Baha'u'llah and obeying him were more important than any "good" including love and/or unity. This was a disappointing experience as I'd entered the Baha'i Faith on the understanding that "The religion of God is for love and unity" and not for purely solipsistic agendas such as recognition and obedience to the messenger of God for this day. The statement in the opening paragraph of the Kitab-i-Aqdas is quite clear, but I had a lot of trouble accepting this because "Most Holy" or not, the Aqdas is trumped by the Covenant in the scriptural hierarchy, is it not? Furthermore, it constitutes a clear example of the kind of "all or nothing" thinking that typifies cults (Tobias & Lalic, 1994):

Moreover, this statement denies the conscientiousness and by induction the conscience of those who find the evidence offered by the Baha'i case insufficient to their experience. This is not the fault of the seeker, but of the Baha'i Faith as an institution, which institution was successively granted by Baha'u'llah and his successors, sufficient administrative authority to be self-correcting. Yet the translation of this passage clearly blames the seeker for not being convinced and furthermore claims the existence of a duty for which there is no experiential evidence. The fact that I cannot remember being given the opportunity to decline my birth in the event that I did not agree to this prenatal contract means that there is no just basis upon which to enforce such a condition.

Baha'u'llah's "first duty" as it is portrayed in this particular translation, is an insult to the sanity, intelligence, and conscience of the human soul to which I took deep offence. It is the reason why I first found reason to seriously doubt and question the station of Baha'u'llah.

I now observed the Baha'i Faith through the eyes of one who has seen the subject contradict itself, and a troubling pattern of attenuation began to emerge. "Deeperings", in which the diversity of understanding of Baha'i literature was focal, were replaced by "Ruhi Classes" in which certain points of doctrine became focal – much like the virtues programme. The misdeeds of a few individuals did not help things, but I soldiered on certain that this was just a passing phase. Six years of soldiering on is meagrely a testament to how stubborn I can be!

The Trigger for the "Great Unravelling"

This year, my fifteenth as a Baha'i, I came across something I'd either missed or glossed over in my values based assessment of the Baha'i Faith:

Shame is a purely social emotion relating exclusively to one's self-perceived status. Its usage by Baha'u'llah (the author) and/or Shoghi Effendi (the translator) in this sense to the exclusion of empathic concepts such as remorse, guilt, compunction, qualm, or even empathy speaks to a purely materialistic viewpoint at best and may indicate the confusion of shame and remorse in either the author or the translator. Lack of backing for interpretation in the form of translator's notes makes this question impossible to resolve without Middle-Eastern language fluency and access to the original source texts. This statement, existing as it does in isolation from an analogous reference to remorse anywhere within the Baha'i writings, is truly more damaging to Baha'u'llah's credibility than just about anything else I can imagine because of the potential implications about the author or a key figure in the administration, his infallibly decreed administration, in whose hands rest the translation of nearly all the Baha'i Writings. Sociopaths (eg. all cult leaders & many abusive partners) replace their moral compass with a social compass that allows them to exploit loopholes in social conventions that allow the perpetration of anti-social behaviour for the "greater" social good. While this makes them very hard to detect, their substitution of remorse with shame dictates that they only feel bad about something when they get caught. This extends itself in the purview of the sociopath to the confusion of shame and remorse such that socially acceptable ends are always believed to justify anti-social means. The significance of "The First Leaf of Paradise" is that it appears to confuse shame and remorse, especially in view of the fact that the author neglects to discuss remorse in what is purportedly literature of a spiritual nature.

To be fair, this proves nothing with respect to mental illness but for the meagre likelihood of such inasmuch as the "First Leaf of Paradise" renders Baha'i literature suspect, in terms of its scriptural authority. However, from the recognition of this particularly obvious spiritual faux pas, I returned to my original study of Baha'i Law as the relevance, equity, and integrity of internal philosophy reflected by rules of membership are the crucial test of any organisation. Not only the passage of Baha'i Authority, but also the decisions of Baha'i authorities are considered legally infallible. Legal infallibility is taken in the Baha'i case as above question and correction as per the implications of the official phrase used in explanation of infallibility as being "freed from all error" (Abbas, Will & Testament). Although this is in itself erroneous in terms of real human beings whose humanity includes the limitations by which they will always err at some stage in their execution of duties, it has legal implications that go beyond logical considerations.

A Re-Visitation of Baha'i Law in Search of Essential Infallibility

While infallibility may well serve its purpose in adjudicating affairs that are not ongoing, such as the execution of a will; with laws that must change in response to social evolution, infallibility ultimately renders jurisprudence infallible, making it impossible to mould the law to the current social conditions without "correcting" the "infallible" foresight of previous administrators, thereby calling into question their "infallibility"; legal or otherwise. The end result is that infallibility as a legal characteristic of a legislative system prevents that system from being able to correct itself in view of present injustice to which particular aspects of past legislation and/or jurisprudence are a party.

One particular example is the emergence just last century of the recognition of temperament diversity by Western academics. This was by no means an original discovery. According to Gurdjieff, the Sufis discovered temperament diversity several hundred years earlier. The system, now known as the “Enneagram”, actually constrains the characteristics of study to products of dominant neural recursion and excludes purely genetic biases such as extraversion/introversion and intuition/sense used in both the Myer-Briggs Type Index (MBTI), and Socionics. Although the Enneagram was not directly compatible with modern psychoendocrinology in spite of being based on dominant emotional response, Gurdjieff documented it as an example of a Middle Eastern study of temperament diversity whose extent must have been at least in part contemporary with both the Bab and Baha’u’llah. The entry of Middle Eastern understanding of temperament diversity into Western society is contemporary with Shoghi Effendi’s education and ministry while the development and widespread acceptance of the Myer/Briggs scale, the Western study of temperament diversity, is contemporary with the emergence of the Universal House of Justice. However, in spite of the widely available evidence for temperament diversity, issues such as the tailoring of marital conditions (Eg. closed vs. open marriages) to temperament are simply not discussed and when raised are not addressed without attempting to label a given temperament (eg. Enneagram type 7 & to a lesser extent type 2) as “psychologically aberrant”, “deviant”, or “immoral”. It is noteworthy that the same studies by Palmer, Myer & Briggs, Kiersey & Bates, Gulenko, & Novichkov & Varabyova, have also determined by repeatable empirical study that no temperament is abnormal, and thus the needs of all temperament groups are equally important. This fact is neither acknowledged nor addressed by the likes of the Bab or Baha’u’llah despite their claim to essential infallibility and their access to a broad spectrum of Middle East literature; and neither has it been addressed by their successors, ‘Abdu’l-Baha, Shoghi Effendi, nor the Universal House of Justice in respect of equitable execution of Baha’i Law (IE without undue advantage or disadvantage to any given temperament demographic).

Another example of legislative inflexibility lies with the emergence of experimental data showing that moderate consumption of red wine with a meal is good for digestion, boosts anti-oxidant levels, and correlates with above average life expectancy. Official interpretation (Aqdas Notes 2, 144, & 170) of the relevant Kitab-i-Aqdas Sections (119 & 155) effectively places all alcoholic beverages, irrespective of the amount consumed, in a class of substances that “steal away reason” and/or damage the body (Aqdas, Section 119 cf 155). Yet a scientific study has shown otherwise for moderate consumption of red wine. As anti-oxidants improve circulation which in turn reduces heart disease and improves brain function, such absolute generalisation is demonstrably false. This speaks directly to the “infallible” decisions of Baha’u’llah’s successors and the fact that their abject lack of infallibility extends back to a lack of infallibility on the part of Baha’u’llah. Furthermore, neither Baha’u’llah nor ‘Abdu’l-Baha demonstrate any knowledge whatsoever that due to the more frequently fatal nature of the harm cigarette smoking causes the body, tobacco belongs to the category described by Kitab-i-Aqdas Section 155 to a far greater degree than alcoholic beverages. This speaks far more directly to the question of Baha’u’llah’s essential infallibility, an attribute essential to the manifestation of God.

However, this point highlights another area of legislative deficiency. Namely the question of whether Baha’u’llah demonstrated adequate qualification to put forward such laws and due diligence in doing so. Attached to the Kitab-i-Aqdas, there is no mathematical proof of temperament equity, as one would expect from a truly Godly legislator. Of itself, the prohibition of alcohol consumption is not explicitly in the parts of the Aqdas attributed to Baha’u’llah, but is nonetheless attributed implicitly to those parts by ‘Abdu’l-Baha. Did Baha’u’llah actually outlaw alcohol consumption in his own writings? Neither alcohol nor wine appear in this context in any other authenticated translations of Baha’u’llah’s writings other than a mysteriously and strangely unspecified tablet attributed to Baha’u’llah mentioned by Aqdas Note 144. If we assume no error in Aqdas Note 144...

The proscription of alcohol consumption is particularly conspicuous in this regard, because Baha’u’llah fails to demonstrate any understanding of the many reasons why people consume alcoholic beverages other than to get drunk. In London, contemporary to the Bab and Baha’u’llah, mead and beer were the only safe sources of fluid available to the working class. Outbreaks of disease due to the contamination of local water supply were not uncommon. In Europe, red wine is consumed in small quantities during a meal as a source of anti-oxidants that actually improve digestion, circulation and by extension intellectual capability – contrary to Baha’i doctrine. Digestives such as Amaro, and France’s answer to Calabria’s Amaro del Capo in the form of Grand Marnier are consumed in even smaller quantities after the meal to further aid digestion. Nowhere in association with the prohibition of alcohol are mentioned any viable alternatives such as clean drinking water for the nineteenth century Londoners; Gingko Biloba, Brahni, or Gin Seng for anti-oxidants and better brain function; nor any non-alcoholic digestives such as Ranitidine {(E)-N-(2-((5-((dimethylaminomethyl)furan-2-yl)methylthio)ethyl)-N'-methyl-2-nitroethene-1,1-diamine)}, Esomeprazole {(S)-5-methoxy-2-[(4-methoxy-3,5-dimethylpyridin-2-yl)methylsulfonyl]-3H-benzimidazole}, Nizatidine {N-[2-(2-dimethylaminomethylthiazol-4-ylmethylthio)ethyl]-N'-methyl-2-nitrovinylidenediamine} or even a humble espresso! One would expect a Godly legislator to take some responsibility when banning practices that are beneficial for so many. The act of denying such benefits even by generalisation, is deceptive in putatively holy literature given the apparently divine access to the sum of all knowledge that is claimed of such literature. If Aqdas Note 144 is correct, Baha’u’llah legislated negligently by not providing advice on the necessary dietary alternatives, disproving his own essential infallibility. If not, the apparent collapse of the Administrative Order is indicated by interpretive error and moreover disproves the essential infallibility of its founder, Baha’u’llah.

Another area of legislative authenticity in terms of divine origin is the absence of proof of equity in divine law. If the Law is God’s, surely God can provide the mathematical proof that the law is indeed equitable across a broad range of customs and temperament demographics. Nowhere in litigious religions of any stripe is this proof furnished. Even in the laws of the Baha’i Faith whose founders had to know something of temperament diversity studies, one of which according to Gurdjieff began in the Middle East, and so had to be available to those founders at the time of “revelation”. While the Baha’i Writings acknowledge the uniqueness of the individual, there is no acknowledgement of temperament diversity and the fact that a law favouring one temperament group will in all probability disadvantage another temperament group. The success of Alfred Kinsey’s (and others’) open marriage(s) raises questions about the advantages of legislating all marriages as closed affairs. In fact, too common is the experience of the anecdote, “too many of the people I know personally are better suited to open marriage arrangements” to simply discard open marriages with no better explanation than the entirely unsupported application of the label, “immoral”. It remains a fact that the closed marriage has an 80% failure rate in the first two years.

Returning to the opening statement of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, that attributes no good to any but whosoever recognises Him Who is the Dayspring of His Revelation and the Fountain of His laws, it is clear to me that this is a denial of the conscientious derivation of belief from unique human experience. On this point, the experiential and necessarily subjective nature of belief is sufficient to totally refute the authorised rendition of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, and by extension the “prophethood” of its author.

A Re-Examination of Baha’i Maxim

As if this is not enough, neither is there any attempt to derive Baha’i Law from first principles, in turn deduced from a maxim, itself the product of inductive proof. Once again, this is not a big ask of any school of philosophical thought, especially if the author really is God! After reconsideration of the preceding points, the apparent double-maxim that follows is what creates an intolerable level of cognitive dissonance for me. The next paragraph describes an apparent contradiction at the highest level of Baha’i Literature that ultimately denied any possibility in my eyes that Baha’u’llah could have “essential infallibility” much less be a “Manifestation of God”...

Although generally it is fairly common for an author to contradict him/herself in seeking the specific expression of two lines of belief, contradictory maxims only coexist in works whose authors are

1. Insane (A high degree of fallibility here)
2. Abnormally prone to exaggerate or otherwise overstate their case
3. Evolving (something that speaks not to infallibility)
4. Multiple in person (IE the works are not by the same author – one or more are incorrectly attributed to their credited author)

Baha’u’llah asserts as Holy Law, the institutionally solipsistic maxim that recognition and obedience defines all good in the opening paragraph of the Aqdas (Section 1), IE:

This statement contradicts the maxim stated in the Covenant that

And is confirmed by the Ninth Ishraq:

And confirmed again in the third of the Persian Hidden Words with explicit reference to the inner compass of conscience via the symbol of the [compass] rose:

In theology and maxim of the Baha’i Faith, God is love; but it seems that in Baha’i Law, God is meagrely recognition and obedience. The fact that maxim and theology are used to attract seekers who are only later to be indoctrinated in law, is known in this context by some as the “Apple-Cucumber” and by others as “Bait & Switch”.

What speaks to intolerance however, is that the Kitab-i-Aqdas neglects to consider the outcome of an isolated human being who never having heard of Baha’u’llah nonetheless makes choices consistent with Baha’i Law simply because the sum of her/his experience has lead to these choices. On the other hand, s/he whose experience contradicts the claims of Baha’u’llah surely cannot be blamed for failing to recognise he who has failed to prove himself? Yet this recognition alone, according to the explicit translation of Section 1 of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, is said to define all good and this definition is confirmed with the complimentary statement that no amount of righteousness counts for anything in lieu of this condition.

Perhaps it can be argued that the Kitab-i-Aqdas is a parody of the claimed “divinity” of unalterable religious law. However, were this the case, Baha’u’llah could not confirm the direct literal meaning of passages within the Kitab-i-Aqdas (eg. Aqdas Section 37 cf. Gleanings CLXVI) without mentioning it lest his own pen should lead some astray. Never mind the fact that because fixed laws cannot evolve with society, they ultimately hold back the process of social evolution; something the Baha’i Dispensation is claimed to accelerate. Eg:

Seen here, the Baha’i literature is said to be intended for naught else but exultation and advancement contradicting the historically verifiable outcome of such laws as Kitab-i-Aqdas Section 37 and the consequent Opening Paragraph of “Other Sections” in the Kitab-i-Aqdas described therein as:

On this evidence however, it is clear that no parody whatsoever is putatively intended by the Kitab-i-Aqdas nor can this book be alternatively authored given explicit repetition of key errors in other works of Baha’u’llah. This renders the internal confirmation by complimentary statement in and of Section 1 of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, in irreconcilable conflict with the maxim of love as stated in the third of the Persian Hidden Words, the Ninth Ishraq, and the Covenant of Baha’u’llah. An irreconcilable contradiction at such a high level in the literary hierarchy excludes any possibility of essential infallibility nor for that matter any more divine intervention than was necessary to write this exposition of my spiritual birth and death in Baha.

On ISO: 2008-May-16 I recanted my belief in Baha’u’llah as essentially infallible “Manifestation of God”, in the presence of my dearest and closest friend, and I did so on this day, being the 36th anniversary of my late brother Patrick’s birthday, in commemoration of Pat’s courageous insistence on the strict individuality of faith. My faith in Baha’u’llah is described at <http://feldcraft.biz/topics/bahai/index.shtml> however, my renewed faith in Love as She speaks to all human beings via their cognitive sense of empathy; is told here at <http://timothycasey.info>

BAHAI CULT LEADER EXPIRES IN SYRIA

Abdul Baha Abbas Had Spent Last Twenty Years on Mount Carmel.

VISITED AMERICA IN 1912

Persian Was Advocate of League of Nations and Believer in Equality of Sexes.

LONDON, Nov. 30.—Abdul Baha Abbas, leader of the Bahai movement, died at Haifar, Syria, Monday, according to a dispatch to The London Times.

Abdul Baha Abbas, as the third prophet of Bahalism always signed his name, although he has sometimes been called Abbas Effendi (Mr. Abbas) or Abdul Baha, was born in Shiraz, Persia, May 23, 1844. It was on that day that Mirza Ali Mohammed, also a Persian, and presently to be called the Bab, preached the first revelation of Bahalism, or, as it has been called, "the Wisdom of the East"—a practical idealism of thought and conduct. It claims not to be a religion, but the root of all constructive religions before, the disciples of the cult assert, they became corrupted by theology, dogmas, and politics. It is supposed to be a cult of harmony, of brotherhood, of infinite charity. It is said that Mirza received his first inspiration to found the cult in the words of Achmet the Turk: "Religion means the various ways in which God is worshipped." The late Prophet spent his life in seeking to have the various religions return to their ideal root which was to be obtained by harmonizing them.

There is an almond tree-shaded villa on Mount Carmel, which rises above the town overlooking the Bay of Acre, where Abdul Baha Abbas spent the last twenty years of his life. At the time of the World War, which he had several times foretold with uncanny detail, he had, to use his own words, "outlived persecution."

In 1912 he had visited the United States and was received not only by the societies of Bahalism, which had gradually grown up here, but also by several universities, notably Leland Stanford University, whose guest he was for several days.

During the worldwide debate over the League of Nations his messages from Mount Carmel were frequent and eloquent in favor of the League.

He also believed in the equality of the sexes.

When he visited New York the local adepts of Bahalism numbered 100, 80 of whom were women.

Maitreya Mission emerged out from the Baha'i Faith !!

This new cult is an offshoot of Baha'ism. Now its missionaries (also Iranian) denounce the Baha'i faith. They say that they don't have any direct relationship with Baha'ism but they have written letters to the Baha'i Organizations to join them. They consider Baha'u'llah as one of the true prophet. The founder of Maitreya Cult was also born in Iran in 1944 (1844 is a significant year for Baha'is) and claims to be the one promised by Baha'u'llah. They have their reasoning, more powerful than what the Baha'is have. They also speak the language of Baha'is (Unity, Equality, Peace and stuff like that). Many Baha'is have accepted this new cult that originated in Iran but flourished in the West.

How Baha'is Converted so many Zoroastrians in India ??!!

At first some Zoroastrians of Iran and later Iranian Zoroastrians settled in India accepted Baháism. The secret movement of this new religion had misled us in the past. We have been misguided by their deceptions up to this day. The Baháis have no churches, they have no priests, they are free to marry non-Baháis. The President or Secretary of an association takes the place of a priest in their marriage ceremonies. Some such prominent person recites a short prayer. Thereafter the couple, their guardians and leading men of the assembly sign the document. At the time of the wedding an 'Alvaha' chosen from the Alvaha composed in Arabic by Baháullah is recited. Under the canopy of their faith it is permissible to retain the 'sudre' and 'kusti' when necessary, to pass as Zoroastrians when need arises, to derive benefit from communal funds and its institutions. The corpse of the deceased they bury in their own separate cemetery.

After the death of Baha'u'llah and the inauguration of the ministry of Abdu'l-Baha, the Baha'i community in Bombay was split as a consequence of the activities of the followers of Mirza Muhammad Ali who had challenged his half-brother's right to legitimate leadership. As a result, Abdu'l-Baha directed a number of prominent emissaries to India, both Persian and Western, to guide the community and encourage teaching. Among these were Mirza Mahmud Zargani, Aqa Mirza Mahram, Mirza Hasan Adib, Ibin-i-Asdaq, Lua Getsinger, Mrs. H. Stanndard, Sidney Sprague Hooper Harris and Harlan Ober. By 1908 the work of these individuals along with a small group of local converts had produced functioning communities in Bombay, Calcutta, Aligarh and Lahore. Of these, the Bombay community took the forefront in both teaching and translation work. Its advancements in the area of translation marked the first time any of Baha'u'llah's writings had been translated into one of the native languages of India. Bombay also managed to acquire the first Baha'i cemetery in India, and Abdu'l-Baha designed the layout of the site. The activities of the Bombay community were commented upon by Sydney Sprague who in 1908 reported: "There are three meetings a week held in Bombay and there are as a rule eighty to a hundred men present. He also noted that it was not easy to become a Baha'i: "It often means a great sacrifice on the part of a believer, a loss of friends, money and position."

During this period, a number of Indian Zoroastrians ("Parsis") were converted to the Baha'i Faith, thereby forming a nucleus of future Baha'i leadership in India. The conversions came about as a result of the work of agents who had originally been sent abroad by the Indian Zoroastrian community to help their coreligionists in Iran. There they came into contact with the Baha'i Faith and supported its activities. Later, several Iranian Zoroastrian converts to the Faith traveled to Bombay (notably Mulla Bahram Akhtar-Khavari) and actively promulgated their new religion among local Zoroastrians. Although they were met with opposition by some of the conservative dasturs, these missionary converts were quite successful in opening the Zoroastrian community to Baha'i concepts and teachings.

In following this tack the Baha'is were in many ways mirroring the attitudes of the reform movements with which they came into contact. Reform was primarily the prerogative of the upper classes who often looked to English liberal ideas and institutions for inspiration. There was little thought of speaking to the masses. Even in the secular Indian political arena it was English educated Indians in the professions who came to form, in effect, a new class, which prior to the arrival of Gandhi on the national scene was virtually cut off from the mass of the population. Moreover, the fact that for the most part the Baha'i message was presented in Persian, Arabic, Urdu, or English added to the sense of exclusivity, as these languages were generally associated with cultural elites.

Also of considerable importance was the establishment of the Afnan's printing press in Bombay which not only resulted in greater contact with other Baha'i communities in the Middle East but also gave to that city a unique Baha'i cultural identity. Extensive telegraph, rail and steamship networks, initially established by European entrepreneurs and colonial governments for their own purposes, now linked the Middle East and British India and were key technological prerequisites for this greater integration of the community, as well.

About the Bahai Faith

The roots of the Baha'i faith lie in the Shi'ite sect of Islam which was led by 12 successive Imams, descendants of Muhammad's son-in-law, Ali. The 12th Imam, as a child, withdrew from society to escape assassination, the inevitable fate of his 12 predecessors. He would make contact with the faithful through "Gates," individuals through whom he would give his teachings.

In 1844, Mirza Ali Muhammad (1819-1850) declared himself to be the "Gate," the "Bab" (pronounced Bob). He claimed he was not just a "Gate," but rather the "Gate" of God, a major Manifestation of God equal to the prophet Muhammad. For six years he gathered the faithful around him, proclaimed a new revelation and the eventual appearance of the final Manifestation for this cycle of human history. After numerous armed conflicts with Muslim authorities, the Bab was martyred in 1850 and his followers scattered.

Before his death the Bab designated Mirza Yahya, a son of nobility, as a caretaker to follow him. Another devoted follower of the Bab, Yahya's half brother Mirza Husayn Ali, proclaimed himself to be "He-Whom-God-Will-Manifest," the major Manifestation of God prophesied by the Bab. He also changed his name to Baha'u'llah, "Glory of God," and proclaimed that the Bab was his forerunner. Mirza Yahya strenuously opposed this and both sides appear to have been involved in assassination plots.

The original followers of the Bab who gave their allegiance to Baha'u'llah became known as Baha'is. Baha'u'llah, a dynamic personality with great force of will, wrote over 100 volumes of Baha'i scripture, entertained dignitaries and maintained a large correspondence while under virtual house arrest for decades.

A troubled period of transition followed Baha'u'llah's death in 1892. He had designated his eldest son, Abdu'l Baha ("Slave of Baha"), as his successor. Abdu'l Baha's brother, Mirza Muhammad Ali, challenged the extent of his authority. Abdu'l Baha retaliated by "excommunicating" practically all his closest relatives and depriving them of their income from Baha'u'llah's estate.

The Baha'i Faith became worldwide under Abdu'l Baha's leadership, and his mission trips to the West. However, upon his death in 1921, the transition of power was once again very troubled. Shoghi Effendi, Abdu'l Baha's grandson, was designated the successor, the First Guardian of the Faith. With this position "his decisions were absolute and final and his words authoritative" (The Baha'i Faith: Its History and Teaching, p.251). This brought him into conflict with other family members and he soon excommunicated every living relative, including his own parents. However, under Shoghi Effendi's administrative skills the Baha'i Faith continued to grow until his death in 1957. He left no designated successor and the Faith is now under the administration of the Universal House of Justice, a group of nine people who are elected democratically and oversee the Cause internationally.

Baha'i historians and authorities have suppressed & the earliest source materials and rewritten the early years of the Faith. One of the earliest and most important historical documents of the time, the Nuqtatu'l-Kaf, was written by the Babi, Mirza Jani. It clearly states that the Bab declared Mirza Yahya as his successor.

Persecution and prejudice by Universal House of Justice

Are Baha'is the only 'persecuted' people on the Earth??

Let us first read these extracts from wikipedia.com

"...In the two thousand years of the Christian faith, about 70 million believers have been killed for their faith, of whom 45.5 million or 65% were in the twentieth century according to "The New Persecuted" ("I Nuovi Perseguitati")"

"..Atheists have experienced persecution throughout history. Persecution may refer to unwarranted arrest, imprisonment, beating, torture, or execution."

"With the Missouri extermination order Mormons became the only religious group to have a state of the United States legalize the extermination of their religion."

"The persecution of Jews occurred many times in Jewish history."

"The Sunni rulers under the Umayyads sought to marginalize the Shia minority and later the Abbasids turned on their Shia allies and further imprisoned, persecuted, and killed Shias. The persecution of Shias throughout history by Sunni co-coreligionists has often been characterized by brutal and genocidal acts."

"The Ahmadiyya regard themselves as Muslims, but are seen by many other Muslims as non-Muslims and "heretics". In 1984, the Government of Pakistan, under General Zia-ul-Haq, passed Ordinance XX,[6] which banned proselytizing by Ahmadis and also banned Ahmadis from referring to themselves as Muslims."

"Hindus have been historically persecuted during Islamic rule of the Indian subcontinent and during Portuguese rule of Goa. In modern times, Hindus in Pakistan and Bangladesh have also suffered persecution."

"Hazara people of central Afghanistan have been persecuted by Afghan rulers at various times in the history. Since the tragedy of 9/11, Sunni Muslim terrorists have been attacking the Hazara community in southwestern Pakistani town of Quetta, home to some 500000 Hazara who fled persecution in neighbouring Afghanistan. Some 2400 men, women and children have been killed or wounded with Lashkar-e-Jhangvi claiming responsibility for most of the attacks against the community."

"..Along with Jews, Homosexuals and others, the Roma Gypsies were rounded by the Nazi Regime of Germany and sent to the death camps."

Bahais speaks volumes about their 'Persecution' in Iran. They always talk about human rights and human values and big things like world peace and world government and bla bla bla .. When so many people around the world were and are persecuted for one or the other reason, Baha'is are busy only in highlighting the plight of 9 bahais arrested in Iran. Where are these 7 million bahais ?? Cant a single voice be raised against those who are involved in these crime against humanity. What is UHJ- Universal House of Justice, Is it really so?? Those stupid 9 persons are dumb, deaf and blind. They are only concerned about those 9 NSA members in Iran. Cant they see other crimes being committed on other people in other parts of the world?? If they are really concerned about humanity they must feel the pain. How are they going to bring world peace when they are so selfish and eccentric?? Such are the people who are going to establish world order of Baha'ullah ?? I doubt and I have every right to say that these people are not working for humanity. They are working to increase their number in whatever way possible whether devotional, children classes, junior youth programme etc.

People are not fools. They have now understood the meaning of Card declaration and Ruhi books. Bahais, go and search for some other method of fooling the people. Your Pseudo religion is not working any more. People are now exiting in troops from your organization and social club. Humans feels the pain and suffering of others humans. They are not qualified to call themselves even human being.

Prof. Juan Cole on Baha'i Faith

Professor Juan Cole, February 23, 1999:

“There is nothing to be puzzled by. Right wing Baha’is only like to hear the sound of their own voices (which are the only voices they will admit to being “Baha’i” at all). Obviously, the world is so constructed that they cannot in fact only hear their own voices. They are forced to hear other voices that differ from theirs. This most disturbs them when the voices come from enrolled Baha’is or when the voices speak of the Baha’i faith. The way they sometimes deal with the enrolled Baha’is is to summon them to a heresy inquiry and threaten them with being shunned if they do not fall silent. With non-Baha’is or with ex-Baha’is, they deal with their speech about the faith by backbiting, slandering and libelling the speaker. You will note that since I’ve been on this list I have been accused of long-term heresy, of “claiming authority,” of out and out lying (though that was retracted, twice), of misrepresentation, of ‘playing fast and loose with the facts,’ and even of being ‘delusional.’ I have been accused of all these falsehoods by Baha’is, by prominent Baha’is. I have been backbitten by them. This shows that all the talk about the danger a sharp tongue can do, all the talk about the need for harmony, for returning poison with honey, for a sin-covering eye, is just talk among right wing Baha’is. No one fights dirtier than they when they discover a voice they cannot silence and cannot refute....”

Haifan Baha'is lied about the late Ayatollah Montazeri's 2008 fatwa

Extracted from: <http://montazerifatwabahai.blogspot.com/2010/02/bahais-lied-about-late-ayatollah.html>

In mid-2008 the world press was abuzz with a media campaign initiated by the Haifan Baha'is claiming that then dissident (and now deceased) Grand Ayatollah Hossein-'Ali Montazeri had issued a fatwa (legal jurisprudential ruling) arguing for full recognition, and tangentially full citizenship rights, to be granted the Haifan Baha'i creed under the Islamic Republic of Iran. On the basis of the Baha'i campaign, the following text was offered by the world media as proof of the claim:

The ruling and subsequent statements about it all came from Montazeri's website, here. The initial claim by the world press as prompted by the Haifan Baha'is was that Montazeri had argued for a full official recognition of Baha'ism in Iran, and not simply rights of citizenship to be respected irrespective of creed. On closer examination it appears that the initial unqualified ruling and explanation offered by the Baha'i media to the world press was not exactly what Montazeri had actually ruled or stated. Here I offer the full text of Montazeri's statement in the original (which can be found on the same page of the website linked above) together with an English translation. To wit,

In His Name, the Most High!

With salutations and blessings. The opinion of this person (nazar-i-een jenab) regarding the misled cult of Bahaism (firqe-ye zale-ye baha'iye) is the same opinion as the one held during the years before the Revolution, and so has not changed. However [the case of] those who in most cases are not followers of any of the religions sent by heaven (adyan-i-asimani) [i.e. Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity and Islam] are referable to the ruling wisdom of the illustrious verse, "Allah forbideth thee from dealing unkindly and unjustly with those who do not fight against thee in the faith nor are ones driving thee out of thy homes, for Allah loveth those who are just" (Qur'an. 60:8); as well as per the letter of the Commander of the Faithful ['Ali] to Malik Ashtar, "You must kindle in thy heart kindness, compassion and love for thy subjects. Do not behave towards them as if you are a voracious and ravenous beast and as if your success lies in devouring them... they are brothers to you, and those who have a religion [other than yours], they are human beings like you (The Peak of Eloquence/Nahju'l-Balagha, Letter 53). [As such] their human rights should be respected. [Now] citizenship rights are also in one particular respect universal and its limits should [therefore] be specified in that respect on the basis of the customary ['or' canon] law ('urfi) and the Constitution [of the Islamic Republic] by the [will of the] majority of the people. However if certain persons are [determined in] pursuing [the path of] enmity against the people of the nation and are abetting foreign enemies, and if their association [with these foreign enemies] be established for the court(s) pursuant to the laws of the nation, they should be punished according to the law(s). Their citizenship [rights] (shahrbandi-i-iran) does not impede [or 'obstruct'] the body of the law [to act] (mani' az ajza'-i-qanun nemishavad). [Yet] it is also necessary that precautions be taken (lazim ast morraqibat shavad) so that the youth of the nation (javanan-i-keshvar) do not become embroiled in their evil propaganda (tablighat-i-su'-i-iran); and if such dealings and association with them will only give cause to their [cultivation and] strength (mu'amileh va mu'asherat mujib-i-taghviyat-i-iran shavad), it is essential to disassociate from ['or' shun] them (lazim ast az an ijtinab gardad).

The ‘Unique’ feature of Baha’i Architecture

The Sydney Opera House is a multi-venue performing arts centre in the Australian city of Sydney. It was conceived and largely built by Danish architect Jørn Utzon, finally opening in 1973 after a long gestation starting with his competition-winning design in 1957. Utzon received the Pritzker Prize, architecture’s highest honour, in 2003.

The Pritzker Prize citation stated: “There is no doubt that the Sydney Opera House is his masterpiece. It is one of the great iconic buildings of the 20th century, an image of great beauty that has become known throughout the world – a symbol for not only a city, but a whole country and continent.”

The design of Lotus Temple is copied from the design of Opera House, Sydney.

In the middle of the Market Square is Helsinki’s oldest public monument, the Tsarina’s Stone. It is an obelisk of red granite topped by a globe and an eagle, the emblem used by the Tsars of Russia. The eagle’s breastplate shows a lion, the coat of arms of Finland. The monument was erected in 1835 in honour of the visit by Tsar Nikolai I and the Tsarina Alexandra, who stepped ashore here. In 1917, the year of the Russian Revolution and Finland’s independence, Russian seamen took down the globe and eagle, but the Finns kept them safe and they were put back in 1971. There are few places anywhere else where original monuments to the old Russian royal family still exist.

Somebody asked this question to Ruhiyyih Khanum the widow of Shoghi :

Down on Princes Street [in Edinburgh], going down the hill towards Holyrood Castle; in that direction, on the left hand side, there was a very very famous antique shop, run by a woman who somebody yesterday in an antique shop told me they knew very well. I thought she was Scottish; she was Jewish, and she was Mrs something-or-other, I don’t remember the name, and she’s since passed away, and the shop doesn’t exist any more.

Bahai Internet Agency Monitoring use of the social networking site Facebook

In February, 2008, Matthew Weinberg, Program Director for the Baha'i Internet Agency, released the following email letter on behalf of the Haifan Baha'i administration (see Baha'i Faith). The letter refers to the activities of the "Covenant-breaker Martin Lavalée", a member of the schismatic and warns members of the Haifan Baha'i community against possible 'exposure' to this individual arising from contact on the social networking site, Facebook. "Covenant breaking" is a term employed by the Haifan Baha'is to refer to groups and individuals who challenge "the authority of the center of the Baha'i Faith", which in this context refers to the authority of the Universal House of Justice and is considered "the most serious spiritual offence that a Bahá'í can commit. It's called Covenant-Breaking and is considered to be a spiritual disease and is punished by expulsion from the community."

"28 February 2008

To All National Spiritual Assemblies

Dear Bahá'í Friends,

We have been requested by the World Centre to alert you to the current activities of the Covenant-breaker Martin Lavalée on Facebook.com. This individual administers the "Orthodox Bahá'is" page on Facebook and also has a personal page on the site. There have been recent instances where Bahá'í youth with accounts on Facebook have unwittingly accepted invitations from Lavalée to be a "friend" or to become "members" of the Covenant-breaker page. Further, as a consequence of the Facebook networking scheme, if an individual accepts a direct invitation from Lavalée or any other member of his group, the "Friends" list (with e-mail addresses) of that individual becomes exposed. In this way, those with insincere intentions have the potential to directly contact an increasing number of Bahá'is, interactions that could pose a threat to the spiritual well-being of youth and other believers who are not deepened in the Covenant.

Each National Assembly will need to determine the necessity and most appropriate manner of discreetly informing believers of this situation in consultation and with the assistance of the Counsellors. In doing so it will of course be important to avoid creating undue anxiety or curiosity about the nature of Covenant-breaker material on the Internet.

It is our intention to provide more general guidance in the near future about how online social networks can be constructively and safely used by Bahá'is.

With loving greetings,

Matt Weinberg Program Director Bahá'í Internet Agency

Lessons for Christians in the history of the Bahai faith

By Adrian Worsfold

When I was confirmed into the Church of England in 1984 I asked some Baha'is I met at their firesides to come along. None did. In the end I fell out with the Baha'is as I discovered academic material that presented their history differently from their own. They are very committed to the preservation of their history as monitored by the Universal House of Justice, the nine seater male-only assembly meant to be a combined secular and religious decision making body for the world, elected without campaigns by the National Spiritual Assemblies below them, these elected by delegates from the Local Spiritual Assemblies below them. It is a very conserving system, a sort of democratic centralism: what the top level says goes.

Very quickly summarising: the origins of the Baha'i Faith are in the Babi faith that developed out of Shia Islam in Iran and Iraq. They were waiting for the return of the Hidden Twelfth Imam and a Holy War for the victory of Islam. In 1844 Sayyid Ali Muhammed Shirazi claimed to be the Bab, the Gateway to the returning Imam. When he didn't appear at Karbala, Sayyid Ali Muhammed escalated his status in stages to the Imam, then the Prophet and then superseding to a new Manifestation of God. The movement was surrounded by violence, and started much of it themselves. The Bab appointed Mirza Yahya (or Sub-i-Azal) to be his successor, but after the Bab was killed by the authorities the violence continued and the movement was in severe decline. Sub-i-Azal's half brother, Mirza Husayn Ali, an elite Persian convert, built up his own faction and in 1863 he, Baha'u'llah (Glory of God) announced himself as the Bab's next Manifestation of God. The authorities never left either faction alone, and the Azalis ended up in Cyprus and the Baha'is at Palestine. However, Baha'u'llah, in the course of the compulsory travels and his declaration to the few and then the world of his status, read Sufi and New Testament material, and completely remodelled the faith as it came into the Western orbit, making itself syncretistic in character, peaceful and expecting the unification of the world.

Baha'u'llah died in 1892, and Abbas Effendi, his eldest son, or Abdul-Baha, became the leader and only interpreter or "Centre of the Covenant". Here there was factionalism, as a group known as the Unitarians (people of the Book, not Abdul-Baha's interpretations) broke out and were excommunicated. The Young Turks' victory meant an end to imprisonment, and Abdul Baha became a traveller around the West even more spiritualising and Westernising the movement, and was a charismatic figure as he attended mosques, Christian and Unitarian (the other sort) churches and synagogues.

After he died Shoghi Effendi became the first Guardian. Some Germans did not accept the validity of Abdul Baha's will appointing him and so the Free Baha'is emerged for a time. Shoghi Effendi should have had a serving Universal House of Justice under him, but he did not set it up. He should have left a will, but either he didn't or it never appeared. So when he died in 1957 there was a crisis of leadership, after which in 1963 the Universal House of Justice was formed and took to itself powers of the Guardian, most importantly the sole power to interpret and the power to excommunicate.

The chief of Hands of the Cause, a forerunner to the UHJ, Mason Remey, thought he should be the new Guardian. Factions have arisen ever since from that branch, including one that now thinks the second Guardian was presumptive, but so was the Universal House of Justice taking power to itself.

The UHJ produces plans for growth. The millennial nature of the Bahai Faith is that it expects the Most Great Peace to arrive (instead we had George Bush) and a tipping point where "troops" of people convert to the Bahai Faith. Unfortunately, the Bahai Faith has been born in a rather irreligious age in Europe, and other than some growth in developing countries, Europe has been slow and with a high turnover of members. Plus, the UHJ in Haifa has a habit of turning members who don't submit to censorship panels into covenant breakers. There are also quite a few people who find themselves mysteriously removed from the rolls of membership, but in the age of the Internet they continue the faith themselves with new freedom, the name Baha'i being in the public realm. A problem for the Haifa Baha'is is that only they can raise money for themselves, and members who can participate in Feasts as well as Firesides find themselves locked into administration details: the Baha'i Faith is an "Administrative Order" after all.

So at each stage of leadership transition elite groups have competed and been excluded, and it is reasonable to say that the quest for unity has been a failure because of its high cost in factions and breakaways, and now there is a more relaxed Bahaism emerging of excluded or driftier individuals. It matters not that the Universal House of Justice only recognises itself as legitimate, because anyone can read the Kitab-i-Iqan and Kitab-i-Aqdas and the published materials that Shoghi Effendi translated into his strained olde-worlde English. Even infallibility is being questioned by individuals let loose.

The Bahai Faith is useful for Christians and Christian theology in a number of ways.

First of all we see something of a parallel in the Bab as a kind of announcer of a new manifestation, although he became what he expected. He gets positioned like a John the Baptist, and probably John the Baptist was his own man too. Then we have the central manifestation (Incarnation) figure, Baha'u'llah. Then we have the very important St. Paul figure, who becomes such an important interpreter and spreader into new cultures and giving a further twist to the faith.

Then we have the issue of authority. There is something of the Pope in the Guardian, of course, but the UHJ is like Orthodoxy or Roman Catholic centralism – with knobs on. In fact it is very Weberian-bureaucratic, and very pyramidal. Weber regarded such with great pessimism: it was anti the life-giving enchantment that he thought religion supplied.

The other lesson is that of allowing theology to grow organically and in diversity. There is a distinct double identity problem of Baha'i member scholarship in secular institutions including that of religious studies departments. It does the Baha'i Faith no favours. We see similar with some Roman Catholics. If Christians become more subject to such pressures of membership conformity, then there is a distortion to both the academic sphere and to the representational sphere.

I also suggest that Christians should express the truth as they find it even when it conflicts with doctrines or interpretations of the Bible. If there is some compelling finding about, say, the Jesus of history as an endtime Jewish rabbi, then this should come first, or at least people should be honest about the layer-cake nature of doctrines or how people interpret the Bible.

Older faiths have developed more maturity with time. They can sit light and worry less about how their faiths are represented. Or at least this is what we thought, as the Christian world gave rise to a secular and plural world.

There are pressures to go along a road of such as the Fellowship of Confessing Anglicans. There is a narrowing of what is legitimate expression of a faith, and there are calls for excluding those who are not biblical enough. An Anglican Communion, properly understood, would become a World Wide Anglican Church with authoritative statements handed down, with again distant high-up forms of selection of those with centralised power.

Who knows how these developments will work out. The Baha'is could not predict their own future, despite the claimed infallibility of the words of both their Manifestation of God and Centre of the Covenant. So Anglicans cannot predict theirs! Nevertheless, if secularisation and plurality lead down the road to authoritarianism and centralisation, there are going to be quite a few Anglican Communion Covenant Breakers who will continue to define the faith in a broad way, however they organise, meet and link up together.

Baha'i Texts and Pictures

Baha'is pride themselves on having an authentic religion unchanged by man. Not much point to that if you don't even let people read the original texts. Then after hiding it for 120 years, altering its content with mendacious translation and "this can't be so" abrogations and nullifications.

you and the women are to sit ahid) 2 and say eighteen times

Finally when the "authorized" translation came out, it was mostly man-made filler and apologetics. They turned a short work -- only 74 pages in the Elder-Miller translation even with all their notes -- into a 320 page behemoth of bureaucratic spin-doctoring and distractions. But the Elder/Miller version shows what the simple text originally said.

An Authentic Summary of the Baha'i Faith

That scary-looking fellow is the founder of the Baha'i Faith, who they call "Baha'u'llah." He gave himself the name. It means "The Glory of God."

It's work to pronounce it correctly, and "bu-HOO-luh" will do. The Baha'i leadership successfully hid this photo from its members for around 150 years. Then along came the internet.

He was a member of an Islamic sect in the 1800s known as the "Babis" led by a charismatic, rapturous, Sufi-oriented mystic called "The Bab" who wrote plans for a 2,000-year Babi dynasty. Based on photographs of Baha'u'llah and some of his sons he appears to have had dwarfism. (See one of his sons, below left.) It is strange that nothing has ever been written in the Baha'i literature about his or his sons' unusually small stature even though physical characteristics of other Baha'i figures are sometimes mentioned in their literature. But he turned out to be a dwarf with a fiery and princely attitude. As we shall see, I think Baha'u'llah had a Napoleon complex to beat the band...

The Babis ended up in armed battle with the Persian authorities, at one point holed up in a fort at Tabriz for months. They tried to kill the Shah. The king finally had the Bab shot. The Babis then scattered.

The Bab had appointed the spiritual, gentle Mirza Yahya as his successor (search "Mirza Yahya" online) calling him "Dawn of Eternity." (Sometimes rendered as "Everlasting Dawn." See him lower down in the left column at age 80.) The Bab had great affection for this young follower and considered him to be one who deeply grasped his (the Bab's) revelation. Mirza Yahya seemed to be a gentle soul by all reports, highly religious in the Babi way, and inclined to seclusion. By now he had seen many of his fellow Babis put to death, often in horrible ways. When Mirza Yahya was given the weight of leadership for a highly controversial sect -- one hunted by all the forces of the Shah -- he was only nineteen years old.

The fellow at the top of this page, Mirza Husayn Ali, was a high-status follower of the Bab who's daddy had been the Vizier or overseer for the household of an Imam and governor, so he was like a royal insider. Importantly, he was the half-brother of the Bab-appointed Everlasting Dawn.

One of Mirza Husayn's (Baha'u'llah's) henchmen, Mirza Aqa Jan. A tough customer and the closest associate to Glory Man (his secretary), he ended up declared a "Covenant Breaker" too. It seems whoever knew Baha'u'llah well turned against him -- even his own family.

Mirza Husayn Ali was 13 years older than the newly anointed Dawn of Eternity, and had been his brother's tutor. In those times an older brother was a natural, lifelong authority over a younger brother. And there was typically competition and some animosity between half-brothers in polygamous Muslim society. Even in monogamous Gentile, post-patriarchal society we observe that older brothers typically do not respect their younger brothers and do not wish to be subservient to them. It likely annoyed Husayn Ali that his younger half-brother had acquired his lofty station in the movement he was a part of. But obviously having his half-brother as leader of the spectacular movement obviously raised his own status, and he used it to his advantage during tumultuous times. (I have seen, and more than once, the phenomenon of a male taking on guru status, with a wife or family member rendering him a guru's respect in front of others while not really buying it personally, only paying obeisance because the elevation of her husband elevates her. This is all humanly understandable.) But Yahya's appointment to lead the movement was, in the end, a terrible test for Husayn Ali.

The movement was in disarray after the Shah shot the Bab, and Mirza Yahya was more of a mystic than an organizer. Thinking that his half-brother was doing a desultory job of leading the movement he cared about, the fierce Mirza Husayn Ali began challenging the authority of Everlasting Dawn for leadership. The Bab had prophesied about "Him Whom God will Make Manifest," a future divine manifestation understood to be far in the future, likely two thousand years away based on the Bab's statements.

Mirza Husayn had apparently experienced a kundalini awakening during his imprisonment, probably due to the devotional attitude and the Sufi-esque chanting that was part of Babi life. (He reported a few phenomena associated with kundalini later in his writings -- sleeplessness, head flows, etc.) This gave him the impression that he was a prophet. In any case whether for the practical purpose of providing better leadership for the scattered movement, or a naive belief that he his spiritual experiences made him an avatar -- Mirza Husayn began saying 'I'm the promised one.'

Being steeped in the portentous "voice" associated with Mohammed and Muslim religious writings, he was easily able to start writing a good jag of "revelations," basically grandiose pronouncements about himself. These simple men tended to compete with each other over the idea of who could write, and whose verbiage was more impressive, and Baha'u'llah said his fulminating "verses" were so astounding that it proved he was the Promised One. Two samples from his brief "Most Holy Book":

"By God he is certainly in the lowest hell-fire! Say: O assembly of the learned, do you not hear the scratching of my Most High Pen?"

"Say: O liar, by God, what thou hast is husks. We have left it for you as bones are left for the dogs. By God, the Truth, if one were to wash the feet of everybody in the world and worship God in thickets and in green valleys, on mountains, hill-tops, and summits, and at every stone, and tree, and clod, and yet the fragrance of My good pleasure be not diffused from him, he would never be accepted. This is what the Master of Mankind has ruled."

Al-Kitab Al-Aqdas, "The Most Holy Book," Elder & Miller, 1961

This is Baha'u'llah's first son by his 2nd wife, Mohammed Ali, who quite apparently was a dwarf. Somehow in the oceans of Baha'i propaganda about him the past 160 years this interesting fact about Baha'u'llah's dwarfism has been hidden. (It can be noticed in Baha'u'llah's present Wikipedia picture. He must have been about 4 feet tall.) It's always image, image with Baha'is. Now, this little fellow was appointed as the Second-in-Command to succeed his kingly father. However, he was excommunicated as a "Covenant Breaker" -- like almost all of Baha'u'llah's descendants. There was not a lot of family unity in Baha'i history!

Baha'i Digest

Some stuff, huh? In both of the above verses Baha is, it is believed, haranguing his hapless half-brother, the Bab's appointee Mirza Yahya. Older brother calls him a "liar" and compares him to a dog. The "Say" business is Baha'u'llah syncing up with the Koran.

Muslim tradition has it that Mohammed had an angel standing over his shoulder dictating what to say -- "Say [this]!" -- and that Mohammed simply wrote what he was told. It is not likely that Baha'u'llah was hearing a voice telling him what to say, and Baha never claimed that was the case unlike Mohammed who did say it was. Apparently Baha'u'llah's "Say!" was just a cheeky bit of theater. But it helped give his "verses" storied atmosphere for any Babis inclined to consider him as their divine prophet. In the second quotation Baha'u'llah is saying that Mirza Yahya's divine knowledge is like "husks" and dog bones compared to his. (Truth be told, the writings of Mirza Yahya are every bit as mystically fantastical as those of Baha'u'llah -- and a good sight more pleasant not-to-mention beautiful.) Baha'u'llah ends with a poetic meander that trashes and makes worthless anything a man might do -- even worship of God -- if not done in his graces, and with his "good pleasure."

So you can see that Baha wrote mighty impressive verses indeed. Baha's state that we here in the west just can't see it; that Mirza Husayn used really clever rhymes and mathematically interesting sentence construction. In any case, as the new claimant to avatarhood he began to crank out a blue streak of mighty verses to prove himself avatar.

At this new claim those standing with the new would-be boss fought with the Babis over who was the true leader. There were murders of varied variety. Sort of like a crime family the Babis from the start -- and Baha'u'llah was an early leader in the movement -- were highly creative in murder. An inconvenient Babi was thrown in the river to drown by the Baha'is. In one anecdote related by Wilson (1905) one of the wives of the Mirza Yahya, Rukayya, after deserting her husband, had to break up household again after Baha'is murdered the followers of "Dawn" who she was living with. But the higher-ups preferred poisonings. It is said that Babis tried to poison Mirza Husayn, and his people tried to poison Babis. In one rather funny account, "Glory" at his dinner table tried to poison his little half-brother when "Dawn" was visiting Glory's home. One side of a dish had been poisoned, not the other. When Dawn took no interest in the plate offered by Glory, Glory tried to allay any fears by eating some from the unpoisoned side.

But the dish had sat there long enough that the poison had suffused slightly to Baha's side, and Glory ended up becoming immediately violently ill. This is the Babi and 3rd-party account. The Baha'is, of course, claim it was little brother trying to poison big brother. However, the event took place in Glory's house, and the dish was prepared by Baha's harem. ('Abdu'l-Baha, son of Glory, was also suspected of using poison when the competitor for the woman he'd long sought died of strange causes eight months after marrying her. Then 'Abdu'l-Baha immediately wed her.)

Whatever the Babi-Baha'i cloak-and-dagger details during this period, tensions and competition of leadership ratcheted up between the mystic and the glaring and imp-like older brother thus that Husayn and Mirza Yahya had to watch what they ate.

But Baha's grandiose statements about himself continually outdid anything Everlasting Dawn was willing to write, and these "verses" impressed Mirza Husayn's partisans muchly. Wilson (Baha'ism and Its Claims, 1905) comments on a poem written about Baha by a follower:

*"The Temple of God's glory is none other than Baha;
If one seeks God, let him seek Him in Baha."*

Who Are the Baha'is Really?

Mirza Yahya or "Everlasting Dawn" who was appointed by "The Bab" as successor. The Babi Mirza Husayn Ali turned out to be a more aggressive organizer than the gentle Mirza Yahya and ended up with control of the movement.

The Baha'is continually falsified their own history, especially the history of the Bab and Mirza Yahya. Though claiming to be the successorship of the Bab, they extirpated all copies of the Bab's writings including his main book "The Bayan." 'Adbu'l-Baha, the son of Baha'u'llah and his successor, continued to falsify the past in his history called "A Traveler's Narrative," and the omissions and distortions were remarked upon by the orientalist E.G. Browne of Cambridge, who had studied the Babis and early Baha'is right in their own locales, including a meeting with Baha'u'llah.

Mirza Yahya:

*Thou art the King of the Realm of the everlasting,
Thou art the Manifestation of the essence of the Lord of Glory,
The Creator of Creation."*

Wilson comments:

"Such are some of the "great swelling words" with which his followers exalt Baha. Yet when we examine his life we find nothing to justify such extravagance. He was simply a man of like passions as others. It may seem invidious to refer to scandalous stories of Baha's youth in Tehran. But does not truth demand that it be stated that his reputation in Persia is sullied by definite accusations of vice and immorality? I have heard such narratives with statements of the time, place, and associates who were partakers of his guilt. His family in riper years exhibits no higher example than a bigamous household. According to the narrative of Abdul Baha in the "Traveler's Narrative," he planned in duplicity to reach the headship of the Babis; for while purposing all the while to set forth a claim for himself, he put forward his half-brother, Subh-i-Azal, as the successor of the Bab -- to protect himself and to insure his own safety during times of danger, He outwardly supported Azal for many years, while secretly planning to supplant him. While acting as Azal's trusted minister, he was drawing the people to himself. We pass over the attempts of these brothers to poison each other."

Everywhere these remnants of the Babi movement went they brought trouble. Thus governments cooperated to isolate them by moving them around like a difficult prisoner in the State Penn, trying to keep the Baha'is separated from the Babis. This worked in Mirza Husayn's favor: He started to cultivate his own following in the "prison city of Acca." Baha'u'llah had no known skill, profession, or work. Mirza Husayn's daddy had been a Vizier before the Shah chased them out of Persia. Having good family connections and an income from Persia, he began to get influence in the city as a new leader for the Babis. He even had a welfare payment coming to him from the governor of Acca. Who knows how.

Though steadily bemoaning his status as a prisoner in Acca, using it to make dramatic 3rd-person wailings about "This Prisoner," Baha'u'llah seemed to live pretty well. He seemed to have connections, and even had a pension from the governor. There is no record of what his income may have been from family connections back in Persia, but he was clearly set. For he would have immediately begun to receive a monthly (every 19 days) income from any Babi who took his side and became a "Baha'i." Babis had always tithed, giving 19 percent of their income to the Bab. (About 20 percent!) You can understand the stakes, then when it comes to "Who's the Avatar" back in these lands. Big money was involved.

After a disease outbreak a lot of people cleared out of the area. His able son 'Adbu'l-Baha -- the tall one -- swung a

An astounding photograph of Mirza Yahya, the Bab-appointed mystic, who Mirza Husayn beat in the struggle for leadership. He is 80 years old in this photo! Notice the serenity of his face compared to Boss Man Baha. A picture's worth a thousand words. A righteous, God-focused life shows on one's face and reduces the effects of aging. Note his lucid, calm eyes.

One reason for the suppression of the Bab's writings was that it contained doctrines like reincarnation which were now being denied by the Baha'is. Another was that the Bab's writings made it seem unlikely or impossible that Baha'u'llah could be his successor or that the new Baha'i Faith could be legitimate.

This falsification of history then extended to the complete suppression of the Baha'i Faith's central scripture in the west, the "Kitab-i-Aqdas" or "Book of Laws," touted by Baha'is as their most important scripture and the blueprint and laws to guide mankind for the next "thousand years." Baha'is have long dismissed the value of other religions by stating, disingenuously, that "they don't have their original texts, we have the original texts." Or, they state that distortions have deal to live in a very fancy place, a large and stately mansion abandoned by a pasha and his family. This was the beginning of great things for the diminutive new "manifestation."

He used his residence in the mansion to boost his nimbus as a Divine Personage. The kingly digs served all the more to draw Babis to his side. After all, he had the mansion, it must be a sign of God. Around this time, likely as a theme to go along with the mansion and color-match to his glorious surroundings for effect, he openly began calling himself "The Glory of God" (Baha'u'llah). He changed the movement's name to "Baha'i" (after himself) instead of "Bab'i. ('of the Bab').

He finally stripped the Bab's appointee Mirza Yahya of many followers, which meant that soon he was getting the serious income (tithe) from former Babis and Baha'is, that is to say, a substantial income that used to go to Mirza Yahya. There in his posh digs the stern-faced, "Worship My Beauty" midget began to interact with curious westerners and, looking westward, honing his message based on the wide-eyed hipsters he was meeting.

In the earlier transitions of leadership there was bloodshed and murder. But at every stage in the religion's development there was conflict. Appropriately, their World Center is now located in a genocidal state that was created by violence and still carries out ethnic cleansing against the natives.

Each leader's death resulted in confusion and division. Thus its first 150 years produced more major controversies -- and even sects -- than other religions. (See Sects of the Baha'is.) Baha'is early on had terms for various kinds of apostates and black sheep: Covenant Breaker, Enemy of the Faith, etc. Conflict over leadership was so rife that 'Abdu'l-Baha, the successor and son of Baha, excommunicated most members of his own family and shunned them as Covenant Breakers.

They're still producing fresh crops of Covenant Breakers still today! That is appropriate, since Baha'u'llah rejected the rightly appointed successor to the Bab, he was a Covenant Breaker himself. The religion was moved forward only by Covenant-breaking since then.

Baha'u'llah's religious project, presented in his "Book of Laws" (Kitab-i-Aqdas) is like a strain of Islam -- with the crept into the old religious texts. But Baha'is did that up 10 times better by simply suppressing the text (along with the photo of Baha'u'llah) and not allowing anybody to read it.

Then, when finally obligated to offer up some sort of translation of embarrassing scriptures, the Baha'i authorities regularly introduce their own distortions to doctor the text.

Something Went Wrong
when they killed the Bab by firing squad. The modest Mirza Yahya looks down in this sad photo. If his older brother had not commandeered the religion, might the Baha'i Faith still be a true mystical, God-oriented religion of world-renouncing devotees instead of a religion of world domination and race-fetishism?

harshness characteristic of Islam --along with major helpings of mysticism characteristic of Sufism. This includes his command to chant a mantra daily ("Allah'u'abha"). Women must say a certain chant during their periods. Men are required to keep short hair but can have more than one wife. "Glory" was a Persian prince. He gives instructions about falcon hunting, tells his followers to "wear sable," silk and squirrel skin. There are dowry laws for marriage. He stressed devotion to God (himself), calling himself the "Blessed Beauty" and many other superlative terms. As in Islam, obedience was highly emphasized. In a sense, the religion revealed in the Kitab-i-Aqdas looks like any religion you'd be able to construct from any Islamic Religion Toy Construction Kit, and it really boils down mostly to a message of "I'm the promised one, not that guy; you worship me, not that guy."

Like most amateur philosophers (including my mother), Baha'u'llah uttered a few universalist statements. Not any more, or any better, than the average mystic. But these morphed into Baha'i bromides like "mankind is one" and "all religions are one" which were brought forward as the prime Baha'i message. In religious annals there was nothing new about these ideas. The essential oneness of all external religions was enunciated by the rishis of India thousands of years ago in the Upanishads far more elaborately and profoundly than anything Baha'u'llah wrote. And of course, the brotherhood of man is a perennial platitude across philosophers, mystics and avatars. In reality, Baha'u'llah had advised his followers to 'consort with the followers of all religions in a spirit of friendliness' for good and practical reasons: The Baha'is and Bab'is had been at war with each other, and it placed him and his movement into trouble with their host governments.

It developed that those westerners first attracted to the movement, mostly out of London and New York, were Marxist type progressives. As many Marxist ideas eventually spread through the west under the influence of Jewish media ownership, a more moderate type, the intellectual progressive, became the main fodder for Baha'i recruitment.

To attract these over-influenced progressives the Baha'is created a "Ten Basic Principles" list that bore no real resemblance to the content of their scriptures. (Hire ten scholars to survey Baha'i scriptures and offer up "Ten Basic Principles" -- they'd never come up with the list that Baha'i promoters use.)

As Baha'i promoters shaped their talking points to appeal to cultural progressives, a difference developed between the Baha'i sales package and the founding literature, particularly the "Most Holy book" or "Book of Laws." Its content was increasingly alien, an unwelcome stranger to the developing program. To deal with this problem the leadership

Lives of the Idle Rich:

Another one of Glory-man's sons, the brute-mouthed, dwarfish Mirza Mihdi fell through a skylight on the roof of one of his father's pads and died. Perhaps because he was drunk. Or perhaps because, like his father, his eyes couldn't focus properly. Or perhaps because of evil acts by Baha'u'llah which gave him immediate fruits of bad karma.

This son had not had time yet to become alienated from his father and be declared a "Covenant Breaker." Thus Baha'u'llah turned him into a saint-martyr and built up a big legend about him so he could moan all the more about his Trials. In photos the Baha'is place a nimbus around his head. Now formerly sane White people in the Baha'i Faith worship this rich man's son for falling through the roof.

Physical notes for a physically-oriented religion:

This son of Baha'u'llah had a rather large mouth in which the lower lip jutted out slightly more than the upper lip, giving a loutish appearance. Sensual, his lower portion was raised up in a permanent pout -- an upside-down smile. A smaller version of it can be seen in the imp-like son Mohammed Ali (and an apparently misshapen left ear):

simply suppressed it. They effectively hid the text from western eyes for 120 years, telling the believers "It's not been translated yet" so as to assure continued recruitment of the naive. Only recently have American Baha'is been able to read it. (And now it's contents get regularly mooted, explained away, or annulled by the Baha'i explainers.) This suppression of their central scripture played a critical role in enabling the religion's teachings to diverge greatly from its original nature.

Was the Baha'i Faith Originally a Feminist Religion?

In the religion's early development in the west, Baha'u'llah's successor, son 'Abdu'l-Baha, came to the Communist hotbed of New York City. There he encountered Suffragettes. (Feminism is one of the planks of Communism for the weakening of the family.) He developed an approach to these Marxist women by emphasizing "equality of men and women" as a religious teaching, though this is little-present in the founding scriptures. Samuel Graham Wilson in "Baha'is And It's Claims" (1915) comments on the complete lack of any feminist teaching in the entire body of Baha'i scriptures:

"Examination of the chief books, the "Kitab-ul-Akdas," the "Ikan" and the "Surat-ul-Haykal" disclose no such teaching. Neither the 155 paragraphs of the "Hidden Words," nor the "Seven Valleys" have any such delectable thoughts for Oriental women. Neither the six "Ornaments" of the faith nor the four "Rays," nor the nine "Effulgences," nor the eleven "Leaves of the Words of Paradise," nor the nine precepts of the "Tablet of the World," nor the fifteen "Glad Tidings" --though they announce many blessings, from freedom to cut the beard as you please to constitutional monarchy as the best form of government--give the teaching of the equality of woman with man. Neither Mirza Abul Fazl in his "Bahai Proofs," representing the new Bahais of Abdul Baha, nor Doctor Kheiralla in his ponderous volume on Beha Ullah, representing the old Behais, in this bitter and rancorous schism; nor Myron Phelps in his "Life of Abbas Effendi," nor Professor Browne of Cambridge University in his learned and impartial investigations regarding the religion makes the statement that Baha Ullah teaches the equality of man and woman. On the contrary, investigation confirmed my previous conviction that the position of woman under Bahai laws and customs is inferior to that she holds in Western lands and that her lot is far less desirable and less blest than in Christian civilization. I reached the conclusion that this doctrine as enunciated by the "Interpreter" is a late addition to Bahaism, intended to attract the attention and tickle the ears of audiences in Europe and America."

"Equality of men and women" was never a teaching of Baha'u'llah. 'Adbu'l-Baha created it after consorting with charming and curious western women of New York City.

In Baha'i scripture women are barred from membership on the Baha'i Faith's highest body, the "Universal House of

This upside down smile was a trait of Baha'u'llah's whole family, and one can discern it in the bearded photo of Baha above. The same mouth is suggested under the beard of Baha'u'llah's brute-like little brother below (who looks like the perfect enforcer and heavy for getting rid of Babis):

It seems merely hanging out with Baha'u'llah and his crew put a pout on your face. The same dour reverse-smile is even seen on the face of Baha'u'llah's secretary Mirza Aqa Jan:

Justice" in Israel. One Baha'i law states that a husband should send his wife home (and pay for her expenses) if they fight while traveling. The entire Baha'i "Book of Laws" (Kitab-i-Aqdas) is clearly addressed to men. This is obvious, for example, in Baha'u'llah's dictums regarding marriage. In that instruction (below) two wives is assumed as normative; 3 or more wives receives a "warning" but it's not actually forbidden. Baha'u'llah often referred to women as "handmaidens." This is his simple statement in the Baha'i "Book of Laws" (Most Holy Book):

"God has ordained marriage for you. Beware lest you go beyond two, and whoever is satisfied with one of the handmaidens, his soul is at rest and so is hers, and one does no harm in taking a virgin into his service."

Al-Kitab Al-Aqdas, Translation of Earl Elder and William Miller, Royal Asiatic Society, 1961

Note that he merely warns "Beware" as in "Be careful!" It's a warning that any man who's had more than one wife might give to a man considering it, and probably good advice. "Beware lest you go beyond two" -- literally means: "Be cautious or you'll end up with more than two." Then it merely praises the fellow satisfied with one-wife and opines that it's likely to yield more peace. (Not necessarily true.) Baha'u'llah had no problem articulating unambiguous don'ts and "do nots" elsewhere in his text. Remember he was speaking to supporters who had 2-and-more wives, and he himself is reported to have had at least three by the time he wrote this. And this somehow was massaged into a Feminist religion?

The Kitab-i-Aqdas has been especially problematic for Baha'i promoters. On one hand Baha'is touted the Kitab -i-Aqdas as mankind's new, flawless message for our "new age," one uncorrupted by translations or time. On the other hand, it contained things strangely at odds with the "Baha'i Faith" being constructed by Baha'i marketers. So to keep the religion from dying off in the west, the Baha'i promoters needed to corrupt the text themselves.

But the first strategy, which they pursued for 120 years, was to simply suppress the text and keep it away from western eyes for well over a century. The standard line was, "It's not been translated yet." (As if all possible Arab translators had died.) Yet its contents began to leak out, especially in a sop thrown to the believers in the form of a "Synopsis and Codification." In that "Synopsis," in the footnotes and "explanatory" paragraphs, the Baha'i Administration began to do their intellectual gymnastics to explain away and nullify the content of their Holy Book.

One early gambit was to say that a polygamy allowance, though apparently present in Baha'u'llah's sacred text, 'couldn't be so' because the Baha'i Faith emphasized justice. Justice couldn't obtain if a man could have more than one wife, etc. (Is there ever perfect justice in any family?) When the Baha'is finally released the contents of the Kitab-

The downturned smile can be seen on the face of the grim-and-wan wife of 'Adbu'l-Baha, Baha'u'llah's best son:

Note the deep-set eyes from a life of stress with a harsh husband too busy to care about the children. (When informed of the death, from long fever, of one of his daughters 'Adbu'l-Baha had not even been aware she was sick. Supportive husband! Baha'is take this as evidence of his saintliness, since he was busy caring about 'everybody else' instead of his family.) I can understand why his wife looks sad. But did no one in the Baha'i camp ever smile? (Creepily, the woman who married Baha'u'llah's son has the same strange V-shaped lower face -- plus eyes -- of Baha'u'llah's midget son Mohammed Ali. Was she actually her husband's half-sister?)

We can surmise that beneath Baha'u'llah's woolly beard lay a similar erp-like mouth: One fish-like, as if you'd expect it to make the sound "erp," with the lower portion jutting upwards in permanent dour judgment. But a smaller mouth like his impish son Mohammed -- a shrew-like mouth often found on those who speak many sharp words and who are ungenerous, and on creatures that have a sharp bite.

i-Aqdas the verse above was translated in clever ways to make it sound as if polygamy was being forbidden. (See: "The Miller-Elder Translation of the Baha'i Book of Laws" for comparative translation commentary.)

The Baha'is are chronically riven with controversy as the ostensible "equality of the sexes" jams up against realities like females barred from the UH and the Most Holy Book's apparent allowance of polygamy for men. The answer is that the Baha'i Faith, at it's foundation, was never feminist nor did it it teach "equality of the sexes" per se. There is no explicit feminist teaching contained in the Baha'i Faith's three important scriptures, much less any radical ones. These are The Kitab-i-Aqdas, the Hidden Words, and the Kitab-i-Iqan. Certainly the phrase "equality of men and women" does not occur in any of these foundational texts, nor any similar phrase.

The original Baha'i Faith is as patriarchal as Islam; as patriarchal as its founders. Feminism -- a version much tamer than what the founders could have conceived of -- was added later. This was apparently because some of the westerners first attracted to it, charmed by 'Adbu'l-Baha and charming to him and having money, were feminists. 'Adbu'l-Baha was a practical man. (He made deals with the British government during WWII and functioned as a spy for them.) What would you do if you had a few suffragettes willing to be your foot soldiers?

Though Baha'u'llah considered it virtuous for a man to "satisfy himself" with one wife but assumed 2 as normative, as the Alpha Male of his milieu it seems he had at least 4 wives. Two were early reported by the traveling English orientalist E.G. Browne, Nawwab and Mahd-i-'Ulya.(Mahd-i-'Ulya was his cousin.) "It has been stated by other authorities who were in a position to know." (Kitab-i-Aqdas, Elder/Miller, p. 41) that Baha'u'llah married a 3rd wife in 1867, Gohar, bore him a daughter named Faruqiyya, then a 4th wife in old age, Jamaliyya who was the niece of one of his favorite followers. It is said that all wives survived him, thus Baha'u'llah himself had at least 4 wives. (And six children.)

The most that can be said is that Baha'u'llah moderated the Islamic rules regarding women a bit, such as freeing Baha'i women of the requirement to wear a veil, something that was radical for the time. There is no question that the highly patriarchal and traditional founders of the Baha'i Faith would have been appalled to see the state of society today, the collapse of sexual identity and sexual roles, and the destruction of the family wrought by radical feminism.

They would have wanted no part of it.

The roof-falling son of Baha'u'llah was also walleyed like his father (had one eye pointing a slightly different direction.)

You cannot see it in the first photo. (It may have been doctored, like many Baha'i photos are. Baha'is regularly Photoshop the eyes of 'Adbu'l-Baha to make them beautiful and mystical, a look they do not have in the actual photos.)

But you can see Mirza Mihdi's eye defect in other photos easily, such as here:

Even in my early years as a Baha'i I heard Baha'is who had gone on pilgrimage processing their experience of seeing, at long last, the photo of their founder in Haifa, Israel. To account for Baha'u'llah's wild-and-crazy looking eyes, one said: "Baha'u'llah's eyes were affected when Everlasting Dawn tried to poison him." This is one of many lines that Baha'is memorize and repeat to each other. (Babis and other observers make a solid case it was the other way around: Baha'u'llah's harem had prepared the food, which was eaten at Baha'u'llah's table. Baha accidentally poisoned himself when, trying to assure Dawn that the food was safe, he ate a bit from the side he believed was free of poison. Poisonings by Baha'is of Babis, Bahas competitor group, are documented and "Dawn" was the leader of the Babis having an uneasy dinner with his half-brother.) Since hearing those fresh-returned pilgrims rationalize Baha's look, I have read the same stuff from Baha'is promoting their fake religion online. They want

But 'Adbu'l-Baha's strategy was canny and paid off: The Baha'i Faith basically got established in the west through the interest of suffragettes and feminist women. Wilson remarks:

"Of the two or three thousand Americans who are following the cult of Bahaism, most are women. Concerning this Abdul Baha says in a tablet: "Today the women of the West lead the men in the service of the cause (Bahaism) and loosen their tongues in eloquent lectures." [1][2] Hence it is timely to consider the teaching and practice of Baha Ullah with regard to women. The editor adds, "Nine-tenths of the active workers in the cause are women."

By now the mystical, spiritual, and austere teachings of the Baha'i Faith have been largely supplanted by externalist and worldly Marxist goals like world government, feminism, deracination, and elimination of nations. Baha'u'llah regularly dissed the world, calling it "the world of dust." But like Marxism, the Baha'i Faith became a world-focused religion. The founders had a negative view of science and technology (both the Bab and Baha'u'llah) and taught that science should be subject to religious values and not exceed them. But Baha'is became technology-worshippers; science can do no wrong. (This is also a value of Marxism, which believes mankind's problems can be solved by materialistic science.) Compared to religions like Buddhism or Hinduism, the metaphysics of the Baha'i Faith are very sketchy. Yet there is a strong Sufi-like element of mysticism. Notwithstanding that content the Baha'i Faith became anti-mystical. The administration's attitude, and life in the ranks of the Baha'is, demonstrates an aversion to the mystical. For example, the Baha'is are given a mantra to say in their "Book of Laws" (as is common to the three other great world religions) but Baha'is are uncomfortable with the word "mantra" and refuse to view it as such. This very easy-to-do practice, typical of Islam and mystical Sufism, was apparently considered "too exotic" by western Baha'i promoters. Though easy to do, the western Baha'is were not even asked to perform it for their first 120 years! This is because image and hope of enrollment growth was always more important to the Baha'i promoters than the real religion itself.

In Buddhism and Hinduism one "saves himself" here-now by encountering and merging with God within, which also alters the nature of the projected external world. They focus on freedom from a dualistic, ephemeral samsara. In Christianity, there is a focus on the afterlife. But in the Baha'i Faith of today, the other-worldly and God-focused content of their own texts is abandoned for a wholly rational, materialistic focus and questionable worldly goals like deracination, race-mixing, salvation via technology, and one all-controlling world government. For this reason I say that the Baha'i Faith is a Sufic movement that was hijacked by Marxist types as a vehicle for Marxist goals, manned and fueled largely by idealistic, well-meaning White people who have been afflicted with White-guilt syndrome.

The Baha'i Faith was built substantially by Jews, and Whites with magnified ideas about a "race problem." They flee to it as a way to "be good" and expiate falsely-induced "White." "Glory" claimed he was "the return of the promised one" -- of "all religions" at once. The Canadian William Sears interpreted a few arcane Biblical factoids to to create a rather tenuous rationale for the idea that 'Glory' was the Return of Christ.

you to believe that their "manifestation of God" to rule mankind the next thousand years was not a wild-looking midget with one eye pointing off to the side.

But based on his son's eyes, this is age old Baha'i history-fabrication and reality-distortion. Baha'u'llah's Marty-Feldman eyes, which he transmitted to a son, were his own lifelong karma, the body he was born with, and as with all bodily traits, a sign of his true inner nature.

This is a bodily defect that gives problems with vision. Did his vision defect play a role in his falling through a skylight on the roof of his father's house?

Note how Mirza Midhi, in the frontal undoctored photo, has a peculiarly sharp V-shaped facial structure. His face is the shape of a wedge, with his chin the point. The first chair-sitting photo, an obviously doctored one, uses a side-view to obscure this. Based on the one above it has also been redrawn to give him a much fuller lower face. A strong chin and full lower face is, after all, one of the timeless masculine ideals in faces.

The same sharply narrow V-face is seen in his dwarfish full Though non-scriptural, racial intermarriage (miscegenation) is now a tacit high sacrament for some Baha'is, an extra measure to expiate White 'guilt' and show they are true believers in the "oneness of mankind" ideal against all psychological naturalness or respect for nature and Time's heritage.

In a nutshell, the Baha'i Faith started as a sect of Islam, became Sufism-writ-large under "Glory," then was transformed into a materialistic and humanist program pursuing Communist goals and lacks the profound analysis of reality, or focus on inner development, characteristic of Buddhism and Hinduism while functioning as an affront to the traditionalism of Islam.

As a longtime student of religions and religious practices, my view is that the devotional content and attitudes in the Baha'i writings are its best content and the best influence on its believers. In Hinduism/Yoga this is termed "bhakti-yoga" and is considered to be itself a religious technique. (And the best one.) The significant fact is that Baha'is do not even have a valuation for this fact and lack a lexicon for it. For example, the average Baha'is would not be able to tell you that their religion is, at the textual level, heavily "bhakti-oriented." This blindness and unawareness exists in the Baha'i Faith because, notwithstanding their pretensions to unite all religions and show us their common ground, Baha'is have little interest in learning about what the other religions teach.

Notwithstanding, the cultivation of devotional attitudes toward God is a valuable and positive aspect of membership in the religion; the very best aspect. Baha'is should be discouraged from having race-mixing fetishes, encouraged to be loyal to their own families and ethnic people, learn that words like "family" and "country" actually mean something, and encouraged in their devotional attitude and love of the God found within. Perhaps then maybe they will end up doing less harm to the world.

In fact, Baha'is should finally take their "Most Holy Book" seriously, discover the good things that are in it, and give up their obsession with the world, worldly power, and give up their fetish for different colored human bodies.

brother Mohammad Ali (Again, above). Note in this son also the oddly narrow lower face and the smallness of his chin compared to the neck behind it. His look is highly unnatural. There's not much chin there at all. And this is with the head raised up and back a bit, which widens the look and increases the apparentness of chins.

We can gather from the photos of his sons that beneath the full beard Baha'u'llah had a strange, narrow, V-shaped face -- the sort of face artists and cartoonists use when drawing a male who is a "geek" or "nerd."

Baha'u'llah was a physically unattractive man. Without the beard, maybe even ridiculously unattractive. Baha'is realized this, and they hid both his face and body from us.

Nabil's history of the Bab and the Babis called "The Dawnbreakers" is an important text to Baha'is. They use it to establish a divine validity for Baha'u'llah by documenting the attractive personality and mystical atmosphere surrounding the Bab, things lacking in their own founder. (While miracles are associated with the Bab and all other religious founders -- even advanced devotees and yogic adepts -- these divine signs did not take place around Baha'u'llah.) In the text the Bab is found stating to his first prospective disciple that one sign of a "manifestation of God" is perfection of the body. The official Baha'i text takes pains to point out the physical beauty, symmetry, and grace of the Bab.

This idea comports with present Baha'i notions of the "attributes of God," presented without much explanation by official Bahaidom, which are said to include "beauty," "perfection," "grandeur" and "loftiness." The idea is that a divine thing would have these Godly attributes of beauty, perfection, etc. This also fits with Hindu ideas. Krsna in the Bhavagad-Gita is found listing similar divine attributes in its 10th chapter. They include beauty. In one case Krsna describes himself as chief among the ghandarvas, which are celestial beings of great physical beauty.

Thus it is understandable that Baha'is have been energetic and firm in hiding available photographs of their founder, this even though Baha'u'llah posed for photographs that he apparently intended to be seen. The photo of him beside a table is obviously set up carefully and he is showing his "best

Baha'is explain that they hide their photo because they revere Baha'u'llah so much that any display of his photo -- except in the most reverent of circumstances -- is disrespectful to it. This flies against Hindu concepts of the guru (and Hinduism is a religion Baha'i hopes to supplant.) In their view, the guru represents God -indeed and in truth. Thus there is nothing that should be more attractive or comforting than the image of one's guru. All Hindu homes feature photographs of a guru plus images of divine characters like Ganesh or Visnu. And these are very pious, religious people. They even use "meditation on the guru's form" as a divinely effective meditation technique and develop great "bhakti" (felt devotion) toward it, the feeling of bhakti itself being a high and auspicious spiritual state. Does having photos of their guru harm them? No, they can't feast their eyes on their guru enough.

Quite different from the devotional delight Hindus get from images of their eminently adorable divine incarnations -- the satvic-faced Anandamayima ma, the noble and radiant Swami Shivananda, or the endearing bhakta Ramakrishna -- a Baha'i recoils upon seeing his guru. He explains that he is terribly offended by seeing it. You ask him why, and he'll say "it's in "the wrong place." And yet he never wants to see it at any time or at any place. Except perhaps once, at near the end of life, in Haifa, Israel briefly while on pilgrimage.

How many must be the shocked moments by westerners in the cloistered place where the photo is viewed! Many, in a state of very heightened emotions associated with the pilgrimage, probably view it through the benign distortion of devotionally misty eyes. But I have long noticed that Baha'is, if going on pilgrimage early in life and seeing the photograph, afterwards draw away from the faith.

Their lineage-holder Shoghi Effendi did not have the temerity in the 1940's to ban the use of Baha'u'llah's photo throughout the Baha'i world. I think he saw how absurd that would be, and what an obvious ploy. He wrote to the Baha'is that it could be used, if in reverent settings. Yet you never see it in any Baha'i setting. Not even in their beautiful temples! Not even "just for Feast" or spiritual services! In practice, no Baha'i sees it unless he goes on pilgrimage to Israel, usually in older age, in a cloistered viewing room.

Unlike Hindus, somehow Baha'is have no attraction for the form of their guru and do not desire to see his form. Because Baha'is, being natural promoters, understand that the photograph is not good for the Faith. Thus the umbrage they take on accidentally seeing it (such as on the internet) is one-part devotee-disappointment, another part Baha'i management concerns. As in: 'Don't show our founder. It hurts our movement.'

Because this religion threatens to destroy the White European peoples (and in fact all distinctive peoples) I am quite happy to let Baha'is see their guru earlier in their deluded membership, haply, before they misspend any more years.

Now, the very idea of the "manifestation of God," indeed, is that God "manifests" himself -- makes himself visible -- for us to see. And in a human form, one that is human yet has divine signs and attractiveness. (Since the divine is attractive.) And Baha'is have all kinds of patter addressing this theory; that we can't handle God directly so he attenuates and downgrades His signal, as it were, by taking a human form that we can "relate to." So Baha'is have ended up with a "manifestation of God" who can't be manifest, i.e. seen, and does not seem to "manifest" divine qualities in his physical form at all. Thus the very idea of divine "manifestation" and "incarnation" is itself neutralized; turned in on itself, in the Baha'i experience. Baha'u'llah is a "manifestation" with two dire problems: 1) He does not manifest divinity in his person, and 2) Baha'i managers are hellbent for leather that he must not be manifested to us at all!

But Baha'is do their cultural control covertly, silently. Somehow Baha'is have not found situations -- whether at their spiritual "Feast" gatherings or in their vaunted temples -- sufficiently "reverent" for the display of the photo.

Now to be sure, they can't hoist "enough" photos of their lineage holders 'Abdu'l-Baha, who was much more charming and photogenic. Have they no proper "reverence" for him?

Baha'i mendacity then takes another leap and they cite Islamic ideas for hiding the picture. They say that the "manifestation of God" should not be depicted bodily in art. They say that Muslims consider any physical depiction of Mohammed to be disrespectful, even sacrilegious, and that's where they get this idea of hiding Baha'u'llah's photo. But one has to point out that Baha'is have dispensed with every other Islamic idea and standard but that one.

Baha'u'llah himself dispensed with most rules of Islam in his "Most Holy Book." And curious to note, in his book containing many sundry prohibitions he did not list any prohibition against photographs of himself or of prophets, while he did pose for a stately photograph in which he clearly intended to be seen.

Meanwhile even if this prohibition did exist in the Baha'i "Most Holy Book" it would hardly matter, since Baha'is have long dispensed with even their own laws -- or staved them off saying they are for some "future time" when mankind is "ready."

So we have the phenomenon of Baha'is dispensing with all Islamic laws en toto, plus ignoring most of their own laws -- yet hewing scrupulously to an arcane Islamic prohibition not even present in their texts.

That's funny. And that's typical Baha'i mendacity. Because the real reason they do it is transparent. This religion is all about promotion and has already invented itself outside of its own scriptures. They knew that the photo of their founder would not be good for the Faith's progress.

The Hindus have observed that the voice takes on a beautiful tone due to chastity, personal virtue, and God-meditation. This can be experienced and seen in the voices of meditative sages. Further, their scriptures and srutis state that physical beauty is an inevitable product of good karma; of past-life virtue and that physical flaws in this birth are the outcome of sin, especially moral sin.

The Baha'is have a founder who's look and physical nature contravenes the Bab's teaching that a "manifestation of God" displays beauty and perfection of form. And contravenes the teachings of other religions associating physical beauty with spiritual and moral virtue. Certainly within his own cultural context, his unusually small stature and wild off-pointing eyes were regarded by others and by himself as defects. That's why he wore rather outlandishly tall hats and posed sitting in a low-backed chair to obscure his size. I note that in the "passport photo" (shown above) Baha'u'llah was obligated to face the camera. But in the "posed" formal photo we have of him he chose to face slightly turned to the right side. Was this to de-emphasize his off-kilter right eye?

Certainly clever western Baha'is early on, the consummate promoters then and now, understood that these matters would have an impact on the mind of prospective seekers and their natural human instincts. Jesus Christ has long been shown as noble and handsome because the human intuition demands that an incarnation of God would have humanly attractive qualities, and Baha'is knew they had to cope with these innate sensibilities of the Christian public. So this attempt to cover up Baha'u'llah's physical appearance probably goes all the way back to the beginning.

It is astounding, indeed, that though physical traits -- even of early believers such as Quddus and Tahirih -- have been cataloged in their texts, no word has ever come from Baha'i writers about Baha'u'llah's physical traits - even though they were highly unusual! Only a deliberate campaign to hide these matters can explain it.

In their promotional work, Baha'is have relied heavily on one sentence by E.G. Browne, the English orientalist who once met Baha'u'llah, to address his physical features. It is a statement that creates an impression that Baha'u'llah had, at least, an 'impressive' look. Baha'is frequently use Browne's "ample brow" quote:

"Those piercing eyes seemed to read one's very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow."

No doubt this meeting with an important western scholar was considered important by Baha'u'llah and he was decked out as royally as possible, be-robed to hide the position of his feet, and probably sitting on a raised chair. Based on the photos we have of Baha'u'llah, he indeed did not seem shy to stare or even glare. Charles Manson, too, was said to have "piercing" eyes.

It is very interesting that the only reference to Baha'u'llah's physical features by Browne involves two items that refined western eyes would find problematic or off putting: His bushy eyebrows, and his eyes. (Notice the photo of Baha'u'llah's little brother at top, who had even bushier brows than Baha -- a veritable uni-brow. I guess even more power and authority rested on them. I am going to take a guess that Baha'u'llah possessed a uni-brow also, but that he plucked out the middle.)

Was Browne, in a momentary good disposition toward Baha'is, striving on their behalf to come up with some kind of compliment? Reaching for something to say about both his brows and his eyes? Was he trying to finesse the situation on behalf of Baha'is by taking two unattractive traits and spinning them in the most positive way? Was he covertly trying to assist the Baha'is by omitting any other physical references and distracting from Baha's personal oddities such as unusually small stature? It seems then that Baha'u'llah's brows, which were apparently in a permanent furrow as if perpetually angry, set over eyes that were odd and disturbing -- were two items needing immediate spin-doctoring by this early friend of the religion. Being friendly to them at that point, he was a good sport for the Baha'is and ministered to two of Baha'u'llah's most problematic features. But I wonder if Browne said other things about his appearance now sunk in the vaults as with other texts. (Like his apparently first translation of the Baha'i Kitab-i-Aqdas, somehow lost to time.)

It is very telling that Baha'is continually quote these few words of Browne, yet cover up and vilify most of his other writings. (Because E.G. Browne, who was there, states things about the Faith's origins that are inconvenient to Baha'is, including decrying Baha'i falsification of their own history.) As disinfo artists, it is obvious that Baha'is have pounced on this one sentence by Browne to spin and direct prospective seekers in a particular mental direction and pre-empt any discussion of the reality of Baha'u'llah's physical persona.

Recently I found a photograph of a cabinet at the Baha'i World Center (Haifa, Israel) that features two of Baha'u'llah's robes, seen through glass. The photo contained many other objects. I saw it as a possible opportunity to gage his height by measuring the robes against the size of other objects. But clearly, Baha'i managers had long ago considered this possibility. The photo did not contain a single item having a reliable size or predictable length. (Any object with a definite, known size -- even one of his turbans.)

There were candles and candelabras, but they could have been very small. I also have not been able to find one photograph of an individual standing in front of this cabinet, which is there to be seen by pilgrims. Normally, pilgrims would delight to take photos of themselves standing in front of these things. So the Baha'is must have a strict rule against pilgrims taking any photos of these items, especially standing within the photo. Thus I believe that Baha'i concern about Baha'u'llah's physical nature goes way back to the beginning, and they are practiced in it.

A final note is that Baha'u'llah never chose to be photographed with any other man -- not even any of his sons, including his most important son 'Adbu'l-Baha, who was of normal stature. (Shoghi Effendi inherited Baha'u'llah's shortness, though probably ameliorated through his mother. A photo exists of a full grown Shoghi Effendi standing next to 'Adbu'l-Baha, and S.E.'s shortness is remarkable.)

So it is that the Baha'i Faith was created by an impish man of very small stature with wild, ill-pointed eyes and a coldly stern visage. Yet we don't know, because Baha'is are obfuscation and disinfo artists, like their founder. For just as Baha'u'llah says "God is the compassionate" after directing us to mark the foreheads of thieves with scars or tattoos; or says "He has no need of the worlds" just after specifying that his "House of Justice" would get all your possessions at death -- the Big Player and manipulator Mirza Husayn, knowing he had a reputation as an ugly man, had the brazen chutzpah to name himself "The Blessed Beauty."

The disappointing visage of their Mansonesque founder, who could stand in as the frightening leader of a Bakersfield, California biker gang circa 1965, must hurt for Baha'is. Because after all, this is nothing if not an outer-focused, material oriented religion. Sometimes I have pointed out these things to Baha'is. I have confronted them with their hiding of the photograph, and raised the real reasons they have done it. I point out that most people would instinctively consider Baha'u'llah's visage to fail in signaling divinity. I have also mocked it. They have often replied saying "The physical isn't important. I don't care what he looks like."

But we must then note how important the physical really is to Baha'is. They erect beautiful temples (and other buildings) of the greatest majesty they can afford, with a full focus on physical beauty. They continually point to these pretty buildings as evidence for the validity of their religion. I know that is why they point to them; I used to be a Baha'i, and that's why they point to their buildings: To demonstrate power and divine validity. Yet the very face and body of their founder lacked any correlative beauty or majesty.

So, just as their teachings are now disconnected from Baha'u'llah's texts which have long been ignored and hidden, their great and beautiful buildings also are disconnected from their usurper-founder who was a small, ugly and frightening man.

Incest

The wife of 'Abdu'l-'Baha is also walleyed like Baha'u'llah. This trait is a genetic flaw that is sometimes associated with early poor diet, or with incest.

Eerily, note also the same sharp-bottomed, wedge-shaped face and pointy chin seen on two of Baha'u'llah's sons (and probably present on the Blessed Beauty himself.) Was the wife of Baha'u'llah's son a relation of her father-in-law? Perhaps Abdu'l-Baha's cousin or even half-sister? The Baha'is were exactly like a mafia headed by a Don, with all the murders and deaths associated with crime families. Such power cadres like to keep things "in the family." With all the secrets Baha'is hide, I would not be at all surprised if 'Abdu'l-Baha married a cousin or even a half-sister.

Baha'i Distortion of their own "Most Holy Book"

An example would be the "wear sable" instruction of the Kitab-i-Aqdas. The unbiased, impartial Arabic scholars Miller & Elder translated it this way:

"Wear sable (sammur) just as you wear silk and squirrel-skin and other things."

The Miller/Ender translations contains cases of mere suggestion by Baha'u'llah as contrasted to explicit commands. They are easily distinguished from each other in their text. Baha'u'llah makes explicit commands regarding hair-length for men. He was a royal, and wanted his people to come off nicely to make him proud. Elsewhere he tells them to use perfume and rose water and renew their furnishings every 9 years. (He also enjoins upon Baha'is very fancy and pricey coffins.) But the "official translation" (when it finally came out) renders the line this way:

"Ye are free to wear the fur of the sable as ye would that of the beaver, the squirrel, and other animals."

...changing what was evidently a command into a mere option.

Who needs textual distortions brought by time and history to mess up your religion if you can simply suppress the text? Then, when obligated to come up with something, when you can create your own distortions yourself?

On Fake Baha'i Membership Statistics

I think I can give some insight into the question of Baha'i membership statistics and their inflation by the Baha'is from a microspheric level; with some slices of Baha'i administrative life at the local and state level.

I was the secretary of a Baha'i "state committee" for Iowa in the 1980s called the "District Teaching Committee." In Soviet style, the Baha'i Administration in Wilmette was trying to turn the United States into renamed regions. Each unique American state became nothing more than a Baha'i "District."

At the time I was living in a small southern town of Lamoni, a R.L.D.S. (Mormon) stronghold, as a "homefront pioneer." I was recommended for the D.T.C., then formally asked onto it in a portentous letter. (The Baha'i Faith is a religion that specializes in generating portentous-sounding letters written by faceless powertripping world-controllers in anonymous offices with good English.) My appointment was obviously due to my close friendship with a fellow already serving on the committee who I'll call "Chad" who was truly my best friend. It was called an appointed position. I think the appointment happened because I knew him well and he knew me (connections), and because of my basic avidness as a Baha'i and maybe my verbal ability. The cranking engines of the Baha'i Faith are faceless men, and perhaps women, who can talk in a certain educated, elegant voice -- the "Baha'i administrative voice" you might say. I could pull that off, and I soon was the Secretary of the committee, a position with a lot of de facto influence because one basically composes letters while harried fellow members nod approval or not.

Once a month I would travel to a set location somewhere in Iowa with Chad in his beat up old Datsun B210 for a meeting with the other 2-3 members. Ostensibly we were supposed to concentrate on "teaching" (think evangelism) projects, but we ended up being mostly bogged down by so-called "administrative" minutia and "enrollment" issues, and the meetings were long and draining. I ended up with a file cabinet full of files and the membership roll. I remember dragging around the floppy, side punched dot-matrix printout with me many places. By the time it got bent and frayed and flappy the "administration" in Wilmette would send another fresh printout each year. It never seemed to get much fatter.

In a sense this committee functioned as a "Local Assembly" for all of the Baha'is statewide who were not under the auspices of a "Local Spiritual Assembly" of nine members, the Baha'is' ideal administrative unit. That is, all Baha'is in groups made of less than nine, which was probably two-thirds of the the Baha'i population. We were only 4-5 members, so we had an important role in the state, trying to nurse along little groups of Baha'is -- from singles to groups of 2-8 -- until they became the magical number nine at which time they could create a "Local Spiritual Assembly." I had already been on the Local Spiritual Assembly of the capital city, Des Moines, before moving to Lamoni. DTC membership was a heavier load than an average member of a Local Assembly, especially for the traditionally overworked Secretary, and that position soon fell to me.

I had traveled already to many Iowa towns as a Baha'i teacher and knew quite a few of the Iowa Baha'is. I noticed there were many names on the list I'd never met. I found that Baha'is had their jargon on the cursed "administrative" side: There were the "active" believers and the "inactives." Part of our duties as D.T.C. members was to stay in touch with members and keep them interested in being active or revive them from inactivity. Activity meant attending meetings, basically. Or we might go "check them out" to see if they were in "violation" of Baha'i laws and required administrative rights removal. (Oh, what little Puritans we were. It was a novel undertaking.) Or to see whether they had improved and mended their ways. In any case, I remember it was commonplace -- whether for myself or another committee member -- to check in on some long inactive member and find them very distant in attitude to the religion, and sometimes hostile. The hard hostiles might be reported as a lost case at the next DTC meeting. I vaguely recall that the secretary who served before me might write a letter to "National" recommending that the person's name be removed, perhaps with National taking over from there and pestering the poor backslider with a "recanting" form. But I myself, when Secretary, never wrote any such reports. My tendency was to think I, or Chad, or somebody we dreamed up -- might be able to warm a problem inactive up somehow, and occasionally we tried, with phone calls, letters, or personal visits. Only a few of these did we ever draw back, through our affectionate encouragement, into attending Baha'i meetings again. But we had a lot of heart. (Certainly the Administration never knows what avid footsoldiers labor selflessly in their trenches, especially when new and bright-eyed, and they specialize in finally killing out all impulses for leadership and action among Baha'is. One reason they're perpetually dying. But that's another story.)

Based on my being in the loop of the Iowa State committee, and my much personal travel to the small Baha'i "communities" in the state (really just little clusters of families) I would say that of the 350 names on the list maybe 100-120 were active at all, with at most 30-40 true stalwarts state-wide.

In the hallowed days of Christian small town life 120 people was like one small church congregation out of perhaps several local churches. (Oh, how I long for those days of the White Europeans now.) I recall that our annual state convention would stay at around 100 attendees year after year. 120 or more was a healthy year. I had been disappointed at the number "350" in the first place when coming onto the committee. But I remember it was all the more discouraging, as an avid Baha'i full of dreams for the religion, to realize how many of those 350 were like deadwood.

I saw this principle then expand rather grotesquely in the aftermath of "mass teaching" events, a couple of which I helped put on. Baha'is would get thrilled by, say, even 3 sudden enrollments. This was around 1980. Five, and it was Big Statewide News in the state DTC Newsletter. Ten or 15 -- and Baha'is would hyperventilate! It was as if angels had filled the sky. Glorious, majestic, and ringing phrases of impending victorious world conquest would fill our newsletter, just like the patter of Glenford Mitchell in a "Feast" letter. (Because I got the "Administrative Voice" down, you see. It was now I who got to be the faceless Baha'i Wizard-of-Oz, writing the heart-pumping prose Baha'is live on, another hidden little 'Glenford Mitchell' for the state of Iowa.) Yet these enrollments were often problematic. These people "came in" through a hard-sell taking place over a weekend, and their commitment was tenuous. It turned out that Baha'is usually failed to work with these people and stay in contact with them. It turned out that these "mass teaching" enrollees, pressured into a life-change by bliss-faced and affectionate Baha'i teachers one weekend then forgotten, when finally contacted later, turned out to be a particularly bitter type of disaffected "Baha'i." (Oh, how I wish I could go back in time and NOT spend an hour with another Baha'i trying to pressure an old farm wife to leave her Christian Faith and join our absurd race-fetishizing religion -- pressuring her until she began to cry. I never did a "teaching project" again.)

I was also on the "Local Spiritual Assembly" of Des Moines, Iowa. Though the capital of the state, our membership roll was never more than thirty until somebody got the brilliant idea to hook up to a bunch of Cambodian would-be immigrants as sponsors. Then "voila!" our community "doubled in size." None of the needy and supplicant refugees -- some with tuberculosis -- were going to refuse the nice man Bill Brown who became their Father Christmas plus "taught them to the Faith" when Bill invited them all to sign some fun little cards. This was no doubt like the future India in miniature. Back in more normal times, before committing the crime of helping change the European ethnic makeup of Des Moines into Hideous Diversity -- even that number "30" was misleading. We only saw about half that number on a regular basis. Just as with the State membership, certain members were like spiders who holed up. One became afraid to ask about those names you never saw, wondering what the trouble was. I still remember some of them to this very day -- inactive names we'd print up on lists for years -- yet never met them once.

Certainly the admin enjoys membership inflation from the fact of cold, disaffected members retaining place on their lists. Some commentators on the blog (see link below) talked about the matter of Baha'i withdrawals. I think it's much worse than these posts suppose, because I believe that MOST disaffected members never do formally withdraw or take their names off of the membership roll. I'm just one example. I'm still part of the numbers they claim.

The organization has this sort of trick in which you must do a formal "recanting" in order to have your name removed. You have to sign a statement repudiating the founder. Something to the affect of "I declare that I no longer believe Baha'u'llah is the manifestation of God for this day" -- is what I heard it was. Anyway, I think the vast majority of Baha'is who become disaffected or alienated do not want to bother with this process.

One reason: It's unpleasant or painful. They don't want to be talked out of it, get any pressure, or argue. Maybe they don't relish facing some cold-blooded Baha'i inquisitor in Wilmette even for a moment. (The women who congregated around the Wilmette Temple for very long were, I found, to be a particularly cold-blooded type. It's as if they've imbibed too much of the distant, grandiose tone of too many Feast letters. Utterly power-striving, Baha'is who cluster around the Wilmette "National Center" are Buddha's perfect picture of an "asura" or "jealous god." After a few experiences, one becomes frightened to even converse with them.) I know that with me, as I became disaffected, I simply didn't want to bring them down. I knew how bad it made Baha'is feel when they heard of anybody becoming negative or "withdrawing." That was especially true for a formerly positive and stalwart member. I cared about the Baha'is. I did not want to hurt them and I knew how much it would hurt to see me turn away.

Now, my animus toward the official religion ("The Baha'i Faith") became great. (That was after I discovered the "marketing package" sold as "The Baha'i Faith" was so different than the original religion.) I felt I'd been deceived and misled by shallow men. So you'd have thought I would have taken pleasure in doing the formal "recanting" paperwork. But to do so didn't even fit my beliefs or have any metaphysical validity to me. I simply didn't see that such a statement was necessary. All the vocabulary itself, such as "Manifestation of God" or "for this Day" -- had become silly to me since broadening my mind with books like "Autobiography of a Yogi," "The Yoga Sutra," and the Upanishads. My understanding of religion had become different. Those terms were meaningless or altered in my new, broader view. There was no need to "renounce" Baha'u'llah. First, I had never developed a felt, personal, or genuine "relationship" with him anyway (as is so possible with a guru figure). And there had been some good in the Baha'i Faith. A lot, in fact, for me in the end. The devotional aspect of the Baha'i Faith, seen in the prayers and writings, had a huge impact on my spiritual life forever to come. And I didn't want anybody to feel bad. Even the Baha'is I disliked, I didn't want them to have to feel that blow. And to some extent I still feel bad about having to abandon them still today. Having a heart for them I left quietly with no display, statements, or checking out. I just happily and hummily faded away, fascinated with the new knowledge and new paths I was finding as I continued to be a God-seeker.

I think that, indeed, the majority of disaffected Baha'is never do formally take their names off the rolls. Baha'i membership is a churning affair. The Baha'i Faith is for most like a way-station they pass through in their process of religious search and exploration. I can't even find a trace of most of my favorite Baha'i associates from the 1970s and 80s. (With one notable exception, the Baha'is who "matchmade" me into a horribly mismatched marriage.) The religion lives by new members and their enthusiasm, and I think the pass-through or attrition rate is far higher than anybody conceives.

That had to be true. When you hide and suppress your own central scripture for 120 years -- you make of your religion a joke. Few people can process the chutzpah and absurdity of that. The beginning of my exit was when I found a copy of the full text of the Kitab-i-Aqdas (Elder/Miller) just after being told by an "Assistant" once more that "it hasn't been translated yet." A glance at a few pages of that book and I saw immediately that the religion I had been sold was not what the religion originally was. Eighty percent of what is promoted as "the Baha'i Faith" is really the thoughts of clever men overly influenced by White guilt and Marxist deracination and nation-killing ideals. Simply reading the Kitab-i-Aqdas straight and unadulterated makes it very clear that the Baha'i Faith is now, in many dimensions, an invented, man-made religion.

A Letter From a Dismayed Baha'i to Maitreya's Followers

Extracted from : http://www.maitreya.org/english/Letters/Bahais/dismayed_bahai.htm

Ok, I've been bothered by this site, and how ignorant the creators and followers of this thing are. There is no third prophet. What 'Abdu'l-Bahá meant by the seventh angel will bring order and worldly peace, wasn't that the seventh angel is a prophet of God, but what he means by the seventh angel, is that the entire world will realize Bahá'u'lláh has come, and the spirit of God will unite in everyone and create world order and peace. The seventh angel is a spirit. Not a person. You have to remember, never take the Bible literally. The bible is always symbolic. From Genesis down to Revelation. The Bible is symbolism, with added truth. You mustn't forget this. I believe that I have made myself perfectly clear in saying that Bahá'u'lláh is the true prophet for this 1000 years.

Answer to the Dismayed Baha'i Sal-Om . . . ,

As a former Bahá'í I can understand the frustration you might have about all the claims you may hear from time to time. However, if you remember, when you became a Bahá'í, you felt a certainty, a feeling of peace, and discovery. This is the same feeling that I had when I had looked at the Mission of Maitreya site and as I heard Maitreya speak on Saturday mornings. Also, I looked at the answers on the site itself given to Bahais which you may have seen. It boils down to "He doeth whatsoever He willeth."

In the first lines in your letter you mention "how ignorant the creators and followers of this thing are." Sometimes I have felt that too in discussions, but we have to remember that the Bab wrote that the person who wrote the book to people in Iran at that time to "the ignorant" as part of its title was in fact not wise at all. Of course anger and frustration often color our feelings and word choices, but in essence Bahais are usually people of loving kindness even in disagreements which should be discussed with utmost respect and kindness in the words of Abdu'l-Baha. So let's agree to treat each other with dignity and love the essence of that spark of God, the soul, within each of us.

Now the crux of your statement is that there can be no third prophet at this time, and that we are in error. Also, you question the seventh angel statement. You mention that the Bible is symbolism with added truth which is partly valid, I think. Remember, however, that God sends a prophet" as soon as the human race is ready for him." Also Bahauallah stated to the Babis after he declared his mission, that "Whether too soon or too late," He was who He said he was and it was up to us to respond or not. God doeth whatever He willeth. Even today it is seen that the Bab did not choose Bahauallah for his successor, but another. Bahauallah assumed the reigns of authority on his own as he became aware of his mission. It is obvious that the Bab knew this. And had not Bahauallah appeared, the Bábi cause, already in disarray, would have ended. God knew it was needed to send a second manifestation. Some would say that the Bab was somewhat violent in his attitude toward non believers. Whether true or not, or whether his words were under duress or in response to certain situations, Bahauallah immediately abrogated this law.

There is a mystery here which I think lies in the knowledge of God that people will react in certain ways, so he sends his messengers with the chance for us to respond immediately, and when we do not, he sends another sometimes in a short time and so on. It is not that HE changes His mind, it is that We do not rise to the challenge that a manifestation gives to us. The mystery of a prophets timing and coming are usually in scripture, BUT require careful ,detached from dogma, thought and openness arising from our hearts.

When questioned as to why he came so quickly after Christ, Mohammed said it was due to the fact that the Christians had so corrupted their teachings beginning even with disagreements between Peter and Paul and the councils and various groups over hundreds of years which caused violence and sectarianism. The Roman emperor, Constantine, made matters worse by his rulings on which doctrines were to remain in the church. The bible and the doctrines of Christianity have likewise been somewhat obscured by the divines, that is, the leaders of these faiths.

Bahauallah stated that he was concerned for "He who was to be sent down after Me." I do not think that was referring to Abdul Baha as some have said, but for the next prophet. Notice, that He expected resistance from the Bahais themselves. There have been many prophecies that the Sun would rise in the West, and that the East would not always be the rising point of Revelation. Bahauallah stated that ONLY after the tribulations of these days would the "Divine Standard" be raised. Shoghi Effendi even stated that Gods plan may change the plans of the followers of his prophets, and that there would be "another manifestation" before world unity was achieved. Yet, even in the Bahai writings there is disagreement. The Universal House of Justice is obviously NOT the one envisioned by Shoghi Effendi. The idea of Bada is dangerous. First, no one can interpret the writings with infallibility aside from THE GUARDIAN. The Hands in using Bada were not infallible and few Bahais questioned them. The House does NOT have the Guardian as its head. If God employs Bada on such an important institution as the Guardianship, than what else in the Faith is BADA?

Go to the Orthodox Bahá'í Faith site to peruse their concepts. Unfortunately, they are seen as covenant breakers, a term with very specific meaning by Shoghi Effendi and Abdul Baha. Now many Bahais are leaving the organization or becoming non active due to the feelings of oppression they sense enveloping the Faith. It is only you who can ascertain the relative validity of all these positions and ideas. Abdul Baha said that in times of non growth and low energy in the Cause, it meant that the Bahais were on the wrong tract. The growth of the Faith has been stagnant and in decline since the early 80's. Why is that? Where are the troops? As to the protection of the faith against schism, why is the Orthodox Bahá'í faith growing in India, Africa, and in the Americas?

All these questions were in my mind for years as I studied as much of the writings that I could. There is much beauty in the writings, but above beauty is even more truth and higher consciousness, a more subtle level of awareness. I could not commit myself to any of the Bahá'í groups, for I saw only discussion of the covenant. I love the gardens in Haifa, but could not that quarter billion dollars have been spent on teaching, humanitarian action, temples and so on in the world? In short, I saw more and more evidence of error in SOME of the interpretations since Shoghi Effendi's death. I urge you to read the sites of other Bahá'í groups and then with an open mind read and listen to Maitreya and this mission. There is, in my opinion, massive failure in the Cause, and so there are. I think, five options. First, stay in the Faith as it is, Second, become inactive, Third, join another Bahá'í group, fourth state that the faith is totally false and rejoin one of the other religions, fifth, realize that a new prophet is needed and seriously study the mission of Maitreya.

Eric, is now a born again Christian. Only he knows his own motives and fears, but the ego of being as good as Bahaullah in writings is obvious, yet a weakness we all have. But Eric knows something is wrong, Joel Marengella, "the third guardian" of the Orthodox Bahais knows something is wrong, many of those excommunicated by the House which does not in the writings have the power to do so, know that something is wrong. The errors of the House in so many decisions, however well intentioned they are, show that something is wrong. This mission shows that only with these conditions of world wide safe access to the people of the planet has the time come where every eye can see and hear him. The mission of Maitreya has many answers to your questions if you sincerely look with an open mind. In the end, IF this mission is false, then it is a great test for the Bahais, and IF this mission is true, then it is a great test for the Bahais as well. The choice, of course as in all things, is yours, and that of all the peoples of the planet.

I think of the time immediately ahead, and I see that in the future after the bad times, communities of light will arise, and the religion of Bahaullah Shall be glorified by Maitreya in His temples and communities and laws. The human race will be unified and share the combined beauty of all the revelations of God. No one will be left out. We will read the Hidden Words, Gleanings, and other Bahá'í and Bábi writings along with those of Islam, Christianity, Buddhism, Hinduism, the native faiths, and the writings of Maitreya all in one center, all equally respected and ecstatically internalized, and we shall have the world order commanded by Bahaullah and developed in detail by Maitreya. There will be a true Universal House of Justice, elders (Hands) and wise interpreters, (Guardians). We will know a new way of thinking and interacting with ourselves, each other, other peoples, and even in time when, as Mohammed states, "at a time WHEN Allah chooses", we will interact with other beings in all the vast universes of GOD. What we have will be what we need, and what we have will be very good, the highest quality we can imagine. No person will go hungry or without shelter. We will be citizens of a united planet as Bahaullah intended.

In the meantime, I wish to give you this link written by a Bahai who I believe has since been forced out of the faith. In his work, he discusses in depth, in a much better way than I can write, the entire idea of the third prophet. Between his work, and the logical and sensible writings of the Orthodox Bahai Guardian, and Abdul Baha, and Shoghi Effendi, you may make your own decision in peace, dignity, privacy, and compassion. You have, if you wish, the five choices I suggested. I know that God forgives error, mine or yours, if it is sincere. In any event we shall all know the truth soon enough. Pray the remover of difficulties, chant the greatest name and read this link and the other suggestions I have made as in the Orthodox Bahai group writings. You are not forbidden to read the writings. How you react to what you read is your own affair unconditioned by no person but in the context of a loving relationship with God, and no one else. There are many subtle clues in this Mission for you to see, and there will be coincidences in your life to draw you to this Mission if it is what you are open to do.

Here is the link: http://www.maitreya.org/english/NEWS_files/Other%20Evidences/Bahai/greatest_name.htm

Please read it carefully as it was written by a Bahá'í. The other writings by Stetson, The Orthodox Bahais, and others, as well as, of course, writings of the present Bahai institutions, read in privacy in your own time and at your own speed.

Thank you for the chance to write to you about the Mission of Maitreya. Once you have read the suggested links, please also read the vast site of the Mission of Maitreya. Meanwhile, look into the eyes of Bahaullah and Maitreya in your meditations and ask what you will. "IN HIM LET TH TRUSTING TRUST."

Sal-Om

Name

Here is one paragraph from the link I have given you.

"Also, Baha'is should take into consideration the following excerpts from Haifa Notes taken during the last year in the life of Shoghi Effendi. "One evening the Guardian mentioned there had been 6000 years of prophetic revelation to announce the coming of Baha'u'llah and to prepare the world for it – that there would be 500,000 years of revelation under His shadow. He stated that world civilization will not be inaugurated before another revelation or prophet appears. " Notes of Alice Dudley, 1957"

Hypocrisy of Bahai Faith exposed.

Mrs Gloria Javed a high ranking official and a member of continental board of counsellor of Bahai Faith in India who reports directly to the Universal House of Justice in Israel in a recent interview about the teaching of Bahai Faith in India agreed that Bahais are involved in conversion of Indian in a deceptive manner. She said that we have now become more straight forward in making Indian people as Bahais because

She said that after a certain time we ask from our seeker (Children and Jr. Youth) that would they like to become Bahais:

Regarding the conversion of the parents of these children and Jr. Youth, she said that, "We call the parents of the children and Jr. Youth and ask them to become Bahais:"

On the other hand we see that the member of Universal House of Justice, Mr. Payman Mohajer saying that.

: So Gloria you come from New Delhi we heard about lot of success is there using Annas presentation there so please tell about what had happen in new Delhi

Actually we started using Anna presentation in Januray of 2007 and the main purpose of using flip chart is to go thorough sequence of it in sir quotation of writing of Bahullah.

India very big problem of teaching is that people didn't mentioned that Bahai Faith is religion in the begining and the bahullah is the manifestation of God just like Lord Krishna and Jeses christ and that he is the promised one of all and if you look at that of anna presentation all these things is writing of first page so than you are not hiding anything from the seeker being bold being assertive you have been audacious as the HOUSE OF JUSTICE ask to do than you are teaching them directly so when they accept the Bahai faith they are accepting as a religion and accepting Bahullah as the manifestation of the God and not as the organization that does good thing and lotus temple that accept all the religions being unity of all religion because I think Bahai faith in India is known as force that unites all religion but they don't know about Bahullah and Bahai faith as religion. I think that made us very bold and we were very afraid to do it first time in January but I think that when you make your self do something that you have never done before and you do it for Baha'u'llah it works.

In we didn't go into controversial topics in annas presentation and you explain them and :Directly as that and what stage of presentation did you ask them

Well actually we realize that we cannot go through the whole album and seekers will get tired and loose their interest so went through various Indian concept of covenant and manifestation of God of Bahullah being most latest and unity of mankind. We stop at the quotation of Abdul Baha and thought of more coming from their side but if they are sitting and they have more time than we are also going to the life of Baha'u'llah because in India there are many Gurus people are following gurus and they think Bahullah is just another guru than we talk about how manifestation of god are different how they suffer from mankind and how yet they are so victorious and we compare it lives of many of gurus in India and how wealthy and prosperous living comfortable life and than compare him so that they don't put him on same level various gurus so if we have time we go to victory of Bahullah

And the two quotes is use that we have produce over here yes we hold it in our hand that was also challenge first time i took it out from my bag I extremely conscious and than I relaise that they don't know that this is first time i am holding in my hand and I am very uncomfortable and nervous they think I am always do it and this is what how we teach our faith and actually ask the seeker to read and it really effects them and we don't realize that we if we explain to them they will more touched but they read the words they have their side so we went ahead just using annas presentation and direct teaching approach and inviting to bahais and its not that we all afraid do it but think that they will feel that we are pressurizing them and making them something they don't want to do but it is not like that we have experience over and over that people are ready to accept Bahullah and we are the person who need to ask them and this was in suburban and central in Delhi In the beginning it was suburban there were receptive population reside they are not wealthy but they are not jobless they all have jobs the workers at different stages but in the last two cycle we have also started affluent of neighborhood of Delhi and we have smaller population there but then to we use annas presentation we have bank managers, executives, young professional working in call center and these the Indian that are educated in various field we guess we consider them materialistic and think that they won't listen but they do they do mainly it was devotional in the home followed by annas presentation and actually divide them to smaller groups and talk to them

How you involve children parents to do the class and involve them and would you explain little about that it is the neighborhood where we have junior youth classes, children classes we consider their parents to be community of interest so then every cycle we hold devotional in neighborhood at large scale and infact we print thousand invitation we give to youth and children of our classes to give parents, neighbors, relatives, and their friends and performed what they learned in their classes during their 3 months. Small sketch stories and confirmation based on what they learned and after junior youth performance we see the total change in their parents both the mothers and their fathers you can see the expressions on their faces and right after performances of junior youth we announce to them that we would now like to talk to you about what is the force behind us working with your children over this long period and why we are working with them so that you can support us and you can help us and we immediately divide the parents into small groups and each of us sits with them with the album and

What are you are doing in JB tell us something about that?

Gloria My understanding that Johannesburg we have good activities that inviting seekers to core activity. They have large number of seekers in their devotionals children and junior youth but they have not able to teach their parents directly so we just came here to teach them with annas presentation people think that we have to complete the whole book but that's what we basically did we approach the parents of junior youth the seekers who are coming to the devotional of bahai homes they have never been taught the faith directly so we went and taught them the faith so we did here the same thing that we did in new delhi but here was more tiring as we go home to home and sometime only person. Ok great we look forward to result.

Independent Investigation of Truth and its Consequences

I am Gamal Naseer an Egyptian, having 23 years of association with Baha'is, a Teacher for long time ,active as a core group member for few years. I attended many Baha'i programmes inside and outside Egypt. Having read many times, it was a question in my mind that why Shoghi Effendi has not left any Will appointing another Guardian, while says that "It is incumbent upon a Guardian to appoint another Guardian during his life time". Shoghi did not nominate any successor after him because of which many divisions occurred in Baha'i faith.

I asked few of senior Baha'is like Bassa Mousa but could not get any satisfactory answer. I started my own investigation, as Baha'i faith which takes pride in Principle of "Independent Investigation of Truth", started reading history which made for me more and more questions. I asked to one of counselor (who happened to be in Egypt as teacher for the core group) that who was Badiullah and titled as Ghusn Noor, to my surprise he turned speechless and started asking me, From where you got such questions? It looks somebody is poisoning your mind. As a good Baha'i you should not ask anything about the family of Bahauallah. I said very politely to him that I read history of Baha'i Faith and found out about him.

He said as a Baha'i you should learn about what the Universal House of Justice requires of you, and what the required objectives and goals of the current five year plan. You should learn about the various institutions and their role in society and in the Baha'i world, and your role in obeying them, and to devote your time for teaching the Baha'i Faith.

He said that you should know that "The expansion and consolidation are twin processes that complete one another, and this understanding will definitely help you conducting children's classes, junior youth circles, devotionals meetings. The UHJ does not want you to know why Abdul Baha said in the Will and Testament "That Guardianship and Universal House of Justice are twin Institution."

You should know the sacrifices of Persian Baha'is in Iran and always be humble in front of them. Remember that Baha'i Faith originated from their Country. Baha'i Faith is the Gift of Iran to the world. Today you see in the UHJ in the ITC and CBC a majority of the Baha'is are Persians

He said that asking such questions will force UHJ of depriving you of your voting Rights or declare you a Covenant Breaker.

Suddenly I realized my meeting with Mr. Hasan Sabri after his second marriage to Ms Isabel in UK. He was absolutely against the Persian Baha'is and their behavior:

They told me that the Persian Baha'is while talking amongst them calls other Baha'is as (Means donkey in Persian). Mr. Sabri went on to say these Persians are very very clever.

They always have a secret meeting amongst themselves they discuss about the agenda and then try to implement the same .Other members have just to approve it.

He was very critical about the Persian UHJ members like Mr. Fatheazam and Ali Nakhjawani whom he believed dominated the UHJ proceedings and is in private contact with the Secretary of NSA of every country.

Mr. Sabri had been hurt quite strongly during his tenure as the HEAD of Socio-Economic Development Project of the UHJ. He said the UHJ us to instruct me one thing and when I wanted to implement it the NSA members of that country use to say that Mr. Fataheazam or Nakhjawani has instructed us to do certain other things on Telephonic Message.

Mrs. Sabri narrated an incident where a few Baha'is from UK came to India for training and when they went back. They were different because of the Persians running the Academy in India.

In August 2010, I attended the 10 day ISGP in Hurghada. I realized that these programmes have a very specific aims planned by UHJ and implemented by the Core group members of that Country

In these programmes both the sexes are allowed to mix freely in the name of equality of sexes. The participants are instructed, How to go about spreading of the Baha'i Faith in those countries where the Baha'i Faith is Banned like Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Yemen Bahrain etc..

I took some of my close friends in confidence and discussed with them these issues and showed them proof from history, two of them said they are aware of these facts, but as they said they are Baha'i now and are denounced by family and relatives in process, and have no where to turn back, so they let go this and moved ahead. But for me it was not a satisfactory answer.

By chance I meet another traveler teacher who was Egyptian by birth but change his nationality to one of middle east country, I asked him same things, he was learned scholar and said it is good work keep it up, He said another Baha'i Scholar in the name of Ahan Rabbani went from UK to House for doing Research .There he discovered some manuscript where he got confused. He started asking questions related to them and as a result the UHJ asked him to leave immediately.

The Counselor guided me to some more academic websites, from where I got many histories rare and unpublished books few of which I would like to put on my blogs, the readers can them self decide. At least I will feel no responsibility on my soul by hiding the truth, rest they them self can do "Independent Investigation of Truth".

An Interesting Comment on Baha'i Faith by our reader

I made friends with a number of Bahais awhile back. After some investigation of the faith, I concluded that it was logically inconsistent and falsely advertised. This is NOT a universal faith, and contradicts science and reason, despite the insistence that it is a faith for modern times. Also, Bahais are quick to be your friend upon learning of your interest in the faith, but will quickly withdraw that friendship should you decide it's not for you. This is not love.

Also, very few people have ever heard of the faith. Seriously, it's been around for a century at least. There are more people on this planet who have heard of those who believe in the "flying spaghetti monster" than they have of the Bahais. With all the communication available to the masses, surely if this was part of God's Divine Plan, there would be more converts, right?

There is no place in the modern world for a faith that:

- will not allow women in the highest echelons of power
- rejects homosexuality
- shuns "apostates"
- lies about membership numbers
- divides the world into "believers" and "non believers" aka "friends" and "enemies"
- behaves like the Catholic Church when confronted with child sex abuse claims
- wastes money on shrine upkeep/building, when thousands are starving
- stunts the intellectual development of people who would otherwise be reasonable

Also, another point: The only people I see joining the faith are those who don't have the social savvy to belong to any other groups other than religious (where they are forced to accept you). So a lot of your time may be spent having to "love" boring, marginalized people....

Control Mechanisms and Sanctions in Baha'i Faith

Baha'i leaders employ a number of important control mechanisms to shape the speech and behavior of Baha'is. These include removal of voting rights, shunning, demands for conformity, accusations of "weakness in the covenant," informing and surveillance, and various forms of censorship. Many of these tools are employed primarily against persons who are somehow prominent or appear to have leadership potential but do not seem easy for incumbents to control, or against intellectuals and some businessmen engaged in Baha'i-related businesses.

The prohibition of nominations and campaigning leads administrators to feel a need for strict controls on Baha'i discourse, and often to the avoidance of even mentioning leaders by name in public, which would be construed as "backbiting." The ban on campaigning can become a ban on visibility or on any sort of critical thinking. A group of Californian believers began a Baha'i magazine, Dialogue, in the mid-1980s. Although all the articles were submitted for prepublication censorship to the National Spiritual Assembly, a feeling of distrust toward the magazine's left-liberal editorial line grew up in Wilmette and in Haifa. In spring of 1988 the editors proposed the publication of a 9-point reform program, "A Modest Proposal," which they submitted for censorship (Dialogue Ed. Board 1987). The article pointed to the decline in conversions, argued against continued censorship, and proposed term limits for N.S.A. members. They offered to (but did not) make the document available beforehand to delegates to the national convention. The response of N.S.A. secretary Robert Henderson and Firuz Kazemzadeh was to accuse the editors of engaging in "negative campaigning." The editors were denounced at the 1988 national convention in Wilmette, and were interrogated by N.S.A. members, who privately expressed concerns that the publication of such a document might have prevented incumbents from being reelected, and who raised suspicions that an independent magazine such as Dialogue might prove a vehicle for gaining popularity in the community for the editors such that they might get elected to the N.S.A. The editors, dismayed at this barrage of what they felt were false charges and violations of due process, and worried that Dialogue could not survive such official condemnation, closed the magazine (Scholl 1997). The ban on campaigning leads to a situation where a great deal of suspicion falls on any active intellectual or any medium of communication not directly controlled by the N.S.A.

Baha'i administrators put a high premium on enforcing relative conformity of views within the religion, taking steps to prevent the emergence of self-conscious subcultures, which are seen as "parties" and as divisive. Despite the clear ideological divide in the community between liberals and conservatives apparent on email forums, Baha'is are forbidden to label one another in this way, which effectively prevents liberals from complaining about the conservative ascendancy. Although the early Baha'i faith had a place in it for cohesive sub-groups of mystics and scholars, the contemporary American community places a premium on homogeneity. Legitimate leadership is held to be collective, though cults of personality do grow up around Baha'i officials. Great suspicion attaches to any Baha'i teacher or lecturer who is not an elected or appointed official and is thought to be "gaining a following." The story of one such popular Baha'i lecturer in the 1980s, an immigrant from Iran whose name I have disguised, is told by a friend:

Under the auspices of the California Regional Teaching Committee he began to do classes . . . on personal reading of the [sacred] Text. These were very widely attended . . . One day after about 4 or 5 months a representative of the CA RTC said that the N.S.A. was very concerned about the extreme adulation being shown to [Ibrahim], some of which was expressed in letters to the National Center. Tragically, this person said that the friends could think what they wanted to, but to please just change what they wrote to the N.S.A.. This was subterfuge, and this, combined with [Ibrahim's] silence on the matter instead of public renunciation of the adulation, was the death knell. The classes were closed down. The rumor was that it was because he was developing a following (personal communication, 16 April 1997).

While a Baptist preacher would have been rewarded for such activities with his own congregation, the collectivist ethos of the American Baha'i community demanded that this popular preacher actually be silenced for his success.

Among important control mechanisms at the disposal of Baha'i leaders is the removal of a believer's "administrative rights." By virtue of joining the Baha'i faith, all adult believers have the right to vote directly for members of their local spiritual assembly, and to vote at District Convention for their delegate to the annual National Convention, who in turn elects the members of the National Spiritual Assembly each year. Elections of local and national assemblies are conducted according to the "Australian" system, such that the nine persons garnering the most votes win. Every five years, members of the world's National Spiritual Assemblies elect the members of the Universal House of Justice.

One's administrative rights also include holding elective office and attendance at the nineteen-day feast, a combination of worship service and church business meeting. Administrative rights are required for participation in a Baha'i marriage ceremony, and only those in possession of these rights may contribute money to the Baha'i faith. Many conferences, and even some email forums, such as Bahai-Discuss, are for Baha'is in good standing only. Local spiritual assemblies may not revoke a believer's administrative rights, but may recommend that the National Spiritual Assembly do so. For the most part the National Spiritual Assembly takes such a step because a believer has repeatedly broken some Baha'i law in a public way—participation in civil politics, belonging to another religious organization, drinking alcohol, gambling, having an affair, homosexuality, failure to abide by Baha'i marriage laws (which require the consent of both parties' parents), or breaking a civil law of some seriousness (Hornsby 1983: 39-51). Those whose rights are removed can no longer serve as public speakers in Baha'i settings, and, if writers, are usually unable to convince Baha'i publishers to publish them. In some instances the N.S.A. has removed rights for essentially political reasons, because a believer has publicly or even privately criticized (Baha'is would say "slandered") the National Spiritual Assembly. A debate on this issue broke out in fall, 1995 on the email network, Talisman, in which liberals pointed out that here the National Spiritual Assembly acted as both plaintiff and judge. Most participants defended the current procedures, on the grounds that Shoghi Effendi had given this prerogative only to National Spiritual Assemblies and had specified that assembly members who were party to a dispute with an individual Baha'i should not recuse themselves in deciding that person's fate.

Baha'is who publicly disagree (e.g. on email lists) with policies of the Baha'i institutions can also simply be dropped from the rolls and declared non-members, as happened to Canadian fantasy writer and editor Michael McKenny in July, 1997. The most serious sanction of all is being declared a "covenant breaker." Although Baha'u'llah himself attempted to abolish the practices of shunning and ritual pollution, contemporary Baha'is, like members of the Watchtower and other cults, shun those who are excommunicated. Only the head of the Baha'i faith can impose this punishment, so that this authority now rests with the House of Justice. Whereas loss of voting rights does not necessarily speak to one's spiritual well-being, being declared a covenant-breaker makes one spiritually condemned. Baha'is are not to speak to or have anything to do with covenant breakers (Hornsby 1983: 148-153). Baha'i friends and family, including the spouse, cut the covenant breaker off. Rank and file Baha'is take the obligation of shunning very seriously, and being cast out from one's support network can be devastating. This punishment typically is imposed upon a Baha'i who has come into direct conflict with the head of the religion. Most often this is because the individual has put forth a competing claim and attempted to form a Baha'i sect, or because a Baha'i has chosen to join or associate with such a sect. Baha'i officials sometimes even declare ex-Baha'is covenant-breakers. In late 1996 in New Zealand a new Baha'i who refused to terminate her friendship with the daughter of a covenant breaker responded to pressure to do so by formally withdrawing from the Baha'i religion. She was nevertheless declared a covenant breaker (Universal House of Justice 1996d). Individuals can also be shunned for expressions of conscience. Recently, the House of Justice informed an American Baha'i liberal who had been critical of the U.S. National Spiritual Assembly and had urged reform of Baha'i judicial procedure that, should he continue on this path, "he and those with whom he has been closely associated" would "find themselves in direct conflict with the Covenant" (Universal House of Justice 1996b). In Baha'i terminology, they were threatening to have these Baha'is shunned if they continued publicly criticizing ("attacking and undermining") Baha'i institutions or their policies, even though they were not fomenting a schism. Threats to use shunning for this purpose have increased with the rise of cyberspace.

Although Baha'i authorities do not appear to intervene in individuals' secular businesses that are licit in Baha'i law, they do feel it their prerogative to interfere with Baha'i businesses that pursue activities directly related to the Baha'i faith. Thus, the making and marketing of Baha'i-related jewelry and decorations is strictly monitored and individuals can be ordered to desist from such activities. Music by Baha'i musicians with Baha'i lyrics must be "reviewed." The National Spiritual Assembly claims the prerogative of telling private Baha'i publishers what Baha'i-related books they may or may not publish, and even of ordering the deletion of certain passages from both secondary and primary sources (MacEoin 1992:i). During the build-up to the 1991 Baha'i World Congress in New York, the National Spiritual Assembly encouraged all Baha'is to use its expensive official travel agency, and some private Baha'i travel agents report that the N.S.A. used threats of sanctions to pressure them not to offer competing, lower-priced packages (personal communication, March 8, 1996, and enclosures).

Conformity of views and behavior is a strong value, and deviation from stock phrases and ideas is looked upon with considerable suspicion (Johnson 1997). Despite the existence of New Age and liberal subcultures, the most widespread approach in the American Baha'i community to scriptural exegesis is literalism, as in fundamentalist Protestantism. Administrative practice is based largely on a literalist reading of Shoghi Effendi's English-language letters concerning the development of the Western Baha'i communities. Although Baha'is supposedly believe in the "unity of science and religion," in practice most U.S. Baha'is put a literalist interpretation of scripture above science. Recently Counselors have begun demanding assent to a literalist approach to Baha'i scripture from liberal Baha'i academics, on pain of being shunned (Birkland 1996).

The community employs a number of mechanisms to impose doctrinal and behavioral conformity. One is to charge that a speaker with whom one disagrees is weak in or actually undermining the Covenant by his or her words. This tactic was employed to disrupt an academic conference on Baha'u'llah's Most Holy Book held in Wilmette in March, 1995, where Baha'i intellectuals presenting other than conservative views were sniggered at by some in the audience and called, sotto voce, "covenant breakers" (personal communication, 1995). When, in the early 1990s, a left-liberal academic Baha'i took a job at Carleton College, Counselor Stephen Birkland of Minneapolis privately told Baha'is in the region to shun him as though he were a covenant breaker (pers. communication, July, 1997). With the rise of unmonitored email forums, where Baha'i liberals and other nonconformists are free to express themselves publicly, the difficulty of maintaining a monopoly on the media for Baha'i orthodoxy has increased. In response, the House of Justice encouraged Baha'is who hear something they think out of the ordinary to challenge the speaker to justify his or her statement with regard to the covenant (Universal House of Justice 1996a). On the Talisman email forum, for instance, an Iranian-American engineer alleged that Baha'i liberals constituted a sub-group who were "attempting to undermine the covenant" (Talisman, April 1996). This practice is similar to the Muslim principle that lay puritan volunteers should go about "enjoining the good and forbidding the bad."

Informing, which is officially encouraged, forms another important control mechanism. If accusations of covenant breaking do not cow the liberal, the conservative Baha'i will often "report" the offender to the spiritual assembly or to a member of the increasingly clergy-like Institution of the Learned. In the U.S. this body consists of four North American counselors, who command nearly 70 auxiliary board members, each of whom in turn has an average of 60 assistants. This cadre of over 4,000 persons forms a significant proportion of the active believers, and those concerned with "protection" in particular vigorously monitor the community for their superiors. An official will sometimes investigate the accused, and then meet with the offender in an attempt to persuade him or her to orthodoxy. The authorities keep files on those so reported, and sometimes blacklist them from prominent committee assignments, appointment as assistants, and from speaking at official Baha'i events and conferences.

Some anecdotes illustrate these practices. A Baha'i professional attended meetings of a special-interest group for Baha'is, in the mid-1980s. At one of these he suggested that the phrase "world government," employed by Baha'is, was off-putting to most Americans and that Baha'is should find a different terminology. (Conformity to the vocabulary of Shoghi Effendi is an especially strong value, which this individual's remark violated). He says that as a result, a member of the National Spiritual Assembly put a fellow conference participant "under secret orders" to keep an eye on him, but that the person recruited to spy on him later confessed this to him (personal communication, 1996). It was alleged to me that this National Spiritual Assembly member maintained a network of informers nationally.

Ross Summers, a health care professional in Seattle, relates that before going on pilgrimage to the Baha'i shrines in Haifa in the 1970s, he saw a newly-issued letter from the House of Justice that discouraged Baha'is from reading covenant-breaker material, but did not absolutely forbid it. Summers then went on pilgrimage, and while in Haifa casually mentioned the letter's contents to another Baha'i pilgrim. Many Baha'is seek out and destroy covenant-breaker materials in libraries, and believe it virtually a mortal sin to possess such books or pamphlets (though the Baha'i institutions discourage such extreme measures). So the Baha'i pilgrim disbelieved Summers' remark, and was alarmed. Back in the U.S. on the East Coast, the offended pilgrim contacted a former auxiliary board member and related the content of the conversation. This man then passed the information on to a counselor. Upon his return home to Seattle, Mr. Summers was contacted by a local auxiliary board member, who sought a meeting in his home about his statement to the pilgrim in Haifa. Mr. Summers accepted, and produced for the ABM the letter from the Universal House of Justice, vindicating his remarks. Neither the ABM nor the Counselors appear to have been aware of this letter previously. Summers felt that having been essentially spied upon rather spoiled the good feelings he had otherwise taken away from his pilgrimage (personal comm., 26 April 1996). As these anecdotes suggest, to be a Baha'i is to be under constant surveillance by one's community, and to be open to being reported on if one says or does anything that seems to another Baha'i out of the ordinary. The accused has no access to such reports and no right to face his or her accuser. The system of using rank and file informers has a venerable history in the Middle East.

Persian Colonization of the Baha'i World Assemblies

I do not have the statistics regarding the Persian colonization of the Baha'i world Assemblies. However, when this topic came up Baha'is from all around the world (India, Africa, Canada, and elsewhere) identified this phenomena. One Indian wrote in and said that even though there are thousands of Baha'is there the people that dominate the Administration are the Persians. I do appreciate that many Baha'is, have not realized what has happened in many areas of the Baha'i world Faith. As you know this is reflected in the election of the UHJ where majority of the members are Iranian. Unfortunately the local people in most of these countries were on the Assemblies and are now displaced – putting us back into a previous condition of having masses of “artificial assemblies” administrating in the Baha'i World.

Babis and Baha'is – Are they Muslims ??

The following article is extracted from: <http://islamqa.info/en/ref/88689>

Shaykh Ibn Baaz (may Allaah have mercy on him) wrote a brief description of Baabism and Baha'ism, which we will quote here. He (may Allaah have mercy on him) said:

This is a brief description of Baabism and Baha'ism.

In their view, the word al-Baab (lit. "the Door") refers to an ignorant Iranian individual who claimed to be a Sufi. His name was 'Ali ibn Muhammad al-Shirazi. He claimed that he was the door to Baha'-Allaah Mirza Husayn 'Ali, and that he was the messenger to whom revelation came from Baha'.

The Baabis are named after him. Every time he was put under pressure and asked to repent, he repented from Baabism and claimed to be a Ja'fari, one of the Ithna-'Ashari Shi'ah.

The Baabis held a conference one year in the desert of Dasht to announce their views and proclaim glad tidings of the awaited imam whom they claimed had appeared.

The Baabis are not all the same in their beliefs and view of the Baab, as is stated on p. 97 of the book al-Baha'iyyah Tareekhuhu wa 'Aqeedatuha wa Sillatuha bi'l-Baatiniyyah wa'l-Suhooniyyah (Baha'ism, its History and Beliefs and its Connection with Esotericism and Zionism), by the head of the Ansaar al-Sunnah al-Muhammadiyah organization in Egypt, Shaykh 'Abd al-Rahmaan al-Wakeel (may Allaah have mercy on him).

In their conference there were two groups of Baabis, one of which was led by al-Bashroo'i and al-Quddoos, and the other by al-Baha' and Qurrat al-'Ayn, as it says on p. 98 of this book. Their gatherings were also of two types, one just for the imams (leaders) of Baabism and another for the common folk. The topic of discussion in gatherings of the leaders was Baabism's abrogation of Islamic sharee'ah. Their ultimate view was that the Baab was greater and higher in status than all the Messengers, and that what was revealed to him of religion was more complete and more perfect than any previous revelation or religion.

As it says in pp. 99-100 of the book mentioned, Qurrat al-'Ayn delivered a reprehensible speech in this conference when al-Bashroo'i and al-Quddoos were not present. Al-Baha' was also absent, claiming that he was ill. He was worried about the consequences of her speech and waited to see the reaction of the delegates and whether they would reject her ideas or not. In her speech she clearly stated that the religion of Muhammad was completely abrogated by the new religion (Baha'ism) which had come to the ummah via the Baab, even though only a little of it had come so far and they were now in an interval. The ruling of Islamic sharee'ah no longer applied and it was permissible for the people – indeed prescribed for them – to share their wealth and women.

Al-Wakeel said that this was what was clearly stated by the Baha'i historian in his book al-Kawaakib al-Durriyyah (p. 180, 210). And she clearly stated in her speech that she did not believe in the resurrection.

This Qurrat al-'Ayn was a strong proponent of their views. She issued a fatwa before she got in touch with al-Baha', then when she got in touch with al-Baha' she submitted to him and attributed the fatwa to him.

The Shi'ah scholars debated with him several times, and he was exposed and his ignorance and confusion were clearly demonstrated. Among the cleverest questions that were put to him was when he was asked about the defects in Islamic sharee'ah and about the perfection of that which he had brought, and he could not offer any answer, rather he could not even say a word. He was asked to deliver a speech and he delivered a worthless speech that did not deserve to be listened to. Hence the scholars ruled that he was a kaafir and should be executed, and he was executed.

Note: We stated above that the Baab in whom the Baha'is believe was the harbinger of al-Baha' and he is the one who received revelation and conveyed it. So he is like a messenger for al-Baha'. The Baabis believe in al-Baab, who is 'Ali ibn Muhammad al-Shirazi, the ignorant Sufi who claimed that he was the most perfect human vessel in which the divine reality manifested itself, and that he was the one who created everything by his word. See p. 117. They also quoted him as saying:

How ridiculous are these words that no wise person would utter. (Shar'at al-Baab, p. 119).

The Baab abolished the five daily prayers, Jumu'ah prayer and prayer in congregation, except in the case of the funeral prayer. He stated that purification from janaabah was not obligatory, and that the qiblah was the house in which he was born in Shiraz, or the place where he was imprisoned, or the houses in which he and his followers lived. These are the places to which his followers were required to go on pilgrimage.

With regard to fasting, it was to be observed from sunrise to sunset, for one Baabi month which lasts for nineteen days. As for zakaah, it was one-fifth of one's property, to be taken at the end of the year and handed over to the Baabi council. There are other ridiculous rulings which you can see on p. 120 of al-Wakeel's book.

Baha'ism

As for al-Baha', who is known as Baha' al-Deen, he was Mirza Husayn ibn 'Ali ibn al-Mirza 'Abbaas Bazrak al-Maazandrani al-Noori al-Iraani. He was born in Tehran in 1233 AH and he was involved in Sufism all his life. He took his myths and stories from his Shaykhs. Then he moved to Baghdad from Tehran as a visitor or in exile, then he moved frequently from Baghdad to other places, then he moved to 'Akka for political reasons and ulterior motives, and because of the many disputes between his Baabi followers and the followers of his brother, Yahya ibn 'Ali ibn Mirza. After all of that and after many developments, al-Baha' made the following claims (see p. 143 of al-Wakeel's book).

Death of al-Baha'

When he was in the prime of his strength and his call was at its strongest, Allaah caused him to develop a fever, from which he died when he was believing in his false claims and ridiculous myths. He died in Dhu'l-Qa'dah 1309 AH. See p. 144 of the essay and footnotes of Abu'l-Fadaa'il. Abu'l-Fadaa'il was one of the propagators of the false sect of al-Baha'.

Al-Baha's methods of propagating his views

He was a Sufi who relied on allusions, symbols and jargon. See p. 147 of al-Wakeel's book.

His books

The most famous of them are al-Ayqaan and al-Aqdas. He wrote the former in Baghdad; it deals with proving that the Baab was the Mahdi and al-qaa'im. It refers to the claims of al-Baha'. He wrote this book in response to questions about the Baab. In this book al-Baha' acknowledged that he was sinning by writing this book. How strange are the actions and evil deeds of this criminal. Glory be to Allaah, how great He is: He insisted that these criminals and liars should fail in their words and deeds. To Allaah be praise for the clarity of the truth and the failure of falsehood. See p. 150 of al-Wakeel's book.

Baha'is hatred towards Muslims

Al-Mirza did not hate any community as much as he hated the ummah of the Final Messenger. It is sufficient for you to know that he accused the earlier and later generations of not having understood anything of the Qur'aan, and he said: Then al-Baha' says: "The one who does not drink from our sealed nectar, the seal of which we have broken with our name al-qayyoom has not grasped the light of Tawheed, and he does not know the meaning of the Books of Allaah, and he is one of the mushrikeen."

Note:

In this summary about the Baabis and Baha'is, I have not seen any words that you cannot find in the book of al-Wakeel. It should be noted that some of it comes from the book of Dr Muhammad Mahdi Khaan al-Irani al-Tabreezi, who lived in Egypt, which is called Miftaah Baab al-Abwaab. Some of it was taken from articles written by Muhibb al-Deen al-Khateeb about Baabism and Baha'ism, and some of it is my own words. And Allaah is the Source of strength. May Allaah send blessings and peace upon our Prophet Muhammad and his family and companions. End quote.

Majmoo' Fataawa al-Shaykh 'Abd al-'Azeez ibn 'Abd-Allaah ibn Baaz (7/407-412).

Shaykh Ibn Baaz (may Allaah have mercy on him) also issued another fatwa stating that the Baha'is are kaafirs. He was asked about the views of Baha'-Allaah who claimed to be a Prophet, and also claimed that Allaah was incarnated in him. Is it permissible for the Muslims to bury these kaafirs in the Muslim graveyards?

He replied:

If the beliefs of the Baha'is are as you say, then undoubtedly they are kaafirs and it is not permissible to bury them in the Muslim graveyards, because anyone who claims to be a Prophet after our Prophet Muhammad (peace and blessings of Allaah be upon him) is a liar and a disbeliever according to the texts of sharee'ah and the consensus of the Muslims, and because this is disbelief in the words of Allaah (interpretation of the meaning):

"Muhammad is not the father of any of your men, but he is the Messenger of Allaah and the last (end) of the Prophets"

[al-Ahzaab 33:40]

And because there are mutawaatir reports from the Messenger of Allaah (peace and blessings of Allaah be upon him) stating that he is the Seal of the Prophets and there is no Prophet after him. Similarly the one who claims that Allaah is incarnated in him or in any other creature is a kaafir according to the consensus of the Muslims, because Allaah, may He be glorified, is not incarnated in any of His creatures; rather He is greater and mightier than that. Whoever believes that is a kaafir according to the consensus of the Muslims, and he is denying the verses and ahaadeeth that say that Allaah is above the Throne, and He is above all His creation. He, may He be glorified, is the Most High, the Great and there is none like unto Him or comparable to Him. He described Himself to His slaves as follows (interpretation of the meaning):

"Indeed, your Lord is Allaah, Who created the heavens and the earth in Six Days, and then He rose over (Istawa) the Throne (really in a manner that suits His Majesty)"

[al-A'raaf 7:54]

End quote.

The Twelve Apostates of Baha'i Faith

Having recently read Moojan Momen's paper "Marginality and Apostasy in the Baha'i Community" in the journal "Religion", I believe that I see a general flaw in the paper. It appears that the cases that Dr. Momen cites to support his thesis are by and large unsupportive of that thesis. This observation is based principally upon the information that Momen provides, though my own experience does enter into it.

In the interest of fair—if not full—disclosure, I was a Bahá'í until 1988, retained my membership for another decade, and have been a somewhat outspoken—though less than outstanding—apostate over the decade since. I have visited the Internet forums to which Dr. Momen refers irregularly since April 1996, and I moderate the Yahoo! discussion group, so I have had some contact with most of the characters to which Dr. Momen refers, but I have never met any of them in person.

Dr. Momen specifies a particular, rather unorthodox working definition for the term "apostate" in his paper: apostates are the subset of the group of people who would typically be called apostates who

1. Are involved in contested exits,
2. Affiliate with an oppositional coalition.

I ask that the reader consider this definition while reviewing Momen's accounts of "apostates", though the definition itself may be somewhat ambiguous.

Dr. Momen enumerates his conclusion in six points, though one of the six appears to be twofold. Following are those points that will be addressed herein (some have been trimmed or summarized for brevity):

1. The majority of Bahá'í apostates have characterized the Bahá'í Faith as a cult, and have been partially successful in doing so.
2. What apostates and dissidents see as bad can be seen by mainstream Bahá'ís as good. For example, what apostates see as authoritarianism in the Bahá'í Faith can be seen by "core members" as guidance.
3. The Internet has enabled apostates and dissidents to form a community, and to a degree, to organize.
4. Although in fact only one of the apostates currently holds an academic post, apostates have been very successful in their use of the academic media to present their views. Several have published books and articles in respectable venues.
5. If religious movements want to avoid apostasy, they must act at an early stage in this process.

I do not wish to address these specific assertions. I do not intend to discuss whether the Bahá'í Faith is a cult or not, or to debate the extent to which the Bahá'í Faith is exclusivist, authoritarian, or paternalistic. I do acknowledge that a number of Bahá'í apostates and dissidents have enjoyed some success in their efforts, often enabled by the Internet, but I don't see the point in evaluating the extent of their success.

As for the last point (5) it seems as reasonable as saying "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," though it appears that Dr. Momen is going further and advocating early and active resistance to marginal believers and apostates. If that is the case, he is not concise enough for his assertion to be addressed in a serious manner.

Those points aside, we are left with two points which attempt to characterize the phenomena of dissidence and apostasy as they pertain to the contemporary Bahá'í community:

1. The apostates have created an apostate mythology, with its own heroes and anti-heroes. This mythology, when combined with the apostate issues, which form something of a creed that is regularly recited; the 'captivity narratives' are the equivalent of salvation or conversion stories; and the medium of the Internet, creating a community, amounts almost to the creation of a religion of its own. One could call it an 'implicit religion'. But since this 'religion' has no independent life and exists only to oppose, it would perhaps be more accurate to call it an anti-religion.
2. ... the road that leads to apostasy is usually a long one. Clashes with the central authorities in the religion over positions, actions or strategies lead to the build up of resentment, which is expressed in ways that, in the Baha'i community at least, leads to further clashes. Frustration leads to marginality and in turn to rejection of the religion. The accumulated hostility can then lead to apostasy...

These assertions are not obviously representative of real Bahá'í apostate communities, and must be tested against real world observations.

Dr. Momen mentions 17 individuals in various degrees of variance from the mainstream Bahá'í community, one of which is an enrolled but marginal Baha'i. Twelve to fourteen are considered apostates by Momen. A number of these, however, claim to be Bahá'ís, but are probably willing to accept the "marginal" label.

Here I review the primary examples that Dr. Momen provides, and attempt to determine the extent to which each conforms to Momen's thesis.

1. K Paul Johnson

I begin chronologically with K. Paul Johnson, a young Bahá'í who resigns his membership at age 20. Twenty years later he becomes a well-known author on theosophy, known for his critical but non-antagonistic research on Madame Blavatsky.

After he became established as a theosophical historian, Mr. Johnson introduced himself to the online academic Bahá'í community in the mid-1990s, seeking assistance for a forthcoming book addressing Bahá'í history. Dr. Momen accuses Mr. Johnson of "attacking core Bahá'í beliefs", but provides no example nor even a specific reference wherewith to validate this accusation. Still, we may allow that Mr. Johnson has criticized Bahá'í beliefs: would this information support Momen's thesis? Would it establish that Johnson is a case of resentment, or someone who conforms to a community myth? No, it would only establish that Johnson has criticized Bahá'í beliefs.

Mr. Johnson has not made himself known as an outspoken antagonist of the Bahá'í Faith, but thanks to Dr. Momen, Mr. Johnson may very well have that reputation from now on.

Having myself interacted with Mr. Johnson in recent years, I have found him notably disinclined to debate with Bahá'ís. He is far from an object example of Dr. Momen's thesis. There is no known period of marginalization, and no visible expression of hatred or envy that might be born of. Given what I have seen, I am inclined to believe that Momen did not do adequate research on Johnson. For example, Momen's assertion that Johnson "could be called a serial apostate" seems to have no basis whatsoever.

2. Francesco Ficicchia

Dr. Momen credits this Swiss apostate with giving the Bahá'í Faith the reputation of a cult in Germany. Dr. Momen claims that Mr. Ficicchia was marginalized before his apostasy, but Momen does not support this assertion. He states that Ficicchia "had been a Baha'i from 1971 to 1974, when he declared to his former fellow Baha'is that 'you will from now on have me as an embittered enemy who will fight you with all possible means at every opportunity'". This sudden, angry opposition does not represent a pattern of apostasy emerging from marginality. It appears more like an epiphany. As for whether any apostate community or associated myth applies to Ficicchia's case, Momen admits that it does not. Ficicchia was not a member of any marginal community or coalition.

3. Denis MacEoin

I remember hearing of Mr. MacEoin as a young Bahá'í. He was the only apostate that I was aware of, other than yours truly. I remember wondering whether I had acquired a "MacEoin syndrome".

Dr. Momen states that Dr. MacEoin "departed after clashes with the Baha'i administration." This tells us that MacEoin may have become unhappy with the Bahá'í administration, and even the religion itself, before he disavowed it. But was his exit contested?

MacEoin was a professor of Islamic studies, and his disagreements with the Bahá'í leadership were not, however, a typical matter of personal marginalization, but rather a matter of academic controversy. Momen admits that MacEoin, like Ficicchia, was part of a group of dissidents or an oppositional coalition. Though both of these men are apostates, they are not apostates by Momen's formal definition, and certainly do not fit his model.

Dr. Momen submits no argument that either Mr. Ficicchia nor Dr. MacEoin supported a myth of lost innocence or administrative usurpation. Their criticism of the Bahá'í Faith appears all too fundamental, comprehensive, and personally conceived to fit any such mythology. Perhaps the next generation of dissidents and apostates will better fit Momen's model.

4. Juan Cole

Yet another respected scholar and author, Dr. Cole "voiced concerns about certain aspects of Bahá'í administration", and upon being confronted by the Bahá'í leadership, resigned his membership amid much debate and controversy, but before long turned his attention to world affairs. I see him often on TV, discussing the Iraq war as an expert-for-hire. Again, this is not a picture of all-consuming resentment. This man, hardly a marginal sponge for community myths, has moved on. It seems to me that Dr. Momen ought to have recognized this, and left Professor Cole out of the picture.

5. William Garlington

Mr. Garlington is an Ex-Bahá'í author who, as far as I am aware, is not associated with a community of apostates, and Dr. Momen does not indicate anything to the contrary. Momen asserts that Garlington presented a biased weighting of the issues of the American Bahá'í community in his book, but he makes no claim that Garlington ever made any false statements or exhibited any envy, hatred, or any other behavior that might be born of resentment.

6. Eric Stetson

Mr. Stetson was a Bahá'í for several years as a young man, then became known for supporting ex-Bahá'ís and uncertain Bahá'ís and promoting Christianity. Though his web site has a good deal of content that is critical of the Bahá'í Faith, it is not written in a hateful or a vengeful way. Furthermore, Mr. Stetson is not an active critic of the Bahá'í Faith, but has put his efforts into promoting Christian Universalism, which, contrary to Dr. Momen's assertions, is not Mr. Stetson's creation. Momen is apparently unaware that Christian Universalism is a significant part of the American religious tradition that lives on, to a degree, in Unitarian Universalism, and has begun to regain support among some liberal Christians today.

Dr. Momen also indicates that Mr. Stetson once claimed to be a prophet. That may be a fact, but it has no bearing on Momen's thesis. Upon reflection, such a detail would appear to contradict the thesis, as it would show that Stetson was capable of moving in his own direction. Mr. Stetson may have once been confused about his self-image, and he may yet again, but any assertion that Stetson is obsessed with opposing the Bahá'í Faith is baseless.

As a moderator of Mr. Stetson's discussion group, I have become acquainted with Stetson over the last couple years, and have found that he has become uninterested in Bahá'í controversies. He is all but absent from the discussions, and leaves daily operations to the moderators.

7. 'BB'

This angry, self-described Bayani is idiosyncratic to say the least. I think it is safe to say that he is not about to conform to any community myth, whether apostate or otherwise. My personal experience has been that he is just as inclined to hurl accusations at apostates as he is inclined to denounce the Baha'i authorities. Though he may be subject to some resentment, and who isn't?, this individual appears to have positive interests in a variety of cosmic pursuits. I have interacted with him online (partly as a group moderator), and I find him, as volatile and angry as he can be, quite the antithesis of Momen's communal apostate.

8. 'CC'

Dr. Momen points out that this man, who was only very briefly a Baha'i, is a conservative who doesn't fit well at all into any supposed apostate community or myth thereof. Again, not a very good match for Momen's full thesis.

9. Frederick Glaysher

This benign but paranoid man exists on the fringe of the dissident fringe. As Dr. Momen points out, he is typically regarded as little more than a spammer. He is more an erratic lone wolf than a community member, though many of his liberal stances are not objectionable to many dissidents. Like 'BB', he is no conformist.

Mr. Glaysher is too erratic to represent Momen's proposed model. Momen presents little to indicate that resentment is a factor in Glaysher's behavior, rather, Momen presents yet another thesis for Glaysher's case; not one of social conformity, but one of personal fantasy in isolation.

10. 'DD'

Though I may have unknowingly interacted with 'DD' at some point in the past, I am not familiar with him, so I will have to base my response on what little data Dr. Momen provides. Momen briefly describes 'DD' as follows:

1. He exhibited a marginality phase on talk.religion.bahai previous to his resignation.
2. He has grown "ever more extreme" on talk.religion.bahai since his resignation.

We might call into question whether 'DD' is even an apostate according to Momen's definition, considering that:

1. Momen says nothing about a contested exit.
2. Momen says little to give the impression that 'DD' is a member of an oppositional coalition, or that 'DD' conforms to a community myth.

Dr. Momen implies that 'DD' is a member of an oppositional coalition by pointing to the presence of 'DD' on talk.religion.bahai. I am unsure that this Usenet group represents a community due to its chaotic, unmoderated nature. I have typically avoided talk.religion.bahai for this very reason. Still, some individuals may have formed a kind of niche community in that chaotic space.

Dr. Momen provides nothing to support the notion that 'DD' is a case of pronounced resentment or that he conforms to an apostate community myth. Momen is notably brief in his coverage of this apostate's behavior, telling us only that 'DD' is "extreme in his attacks on the Baha'i faith." Does this broad stroke say anything useful?

11. Alison Marshall

Is Alison Marshall an apostate? Let us review Dr. Momen's definition. An apostate is:

1. involved in contested exits,
2. affiliated with an oppositional coalition

According to this convoluted definition, Mrs. Marshall is the ultimate apostate because she really wanted to remain a Baha'i and still stubbornly considers herself a mainstream Baha'i. It is certain that few Baha'i exits have been so contested as the expulsion of Marshall.

Mrs. Marshall still appears to be orthodox in most respects. I will concede that she speaks her mind, and that she does not appear to be happy with being cast out of the Baha'i Faith organization, but she does not appear to be interested in vilifying the Bahá'í authorities. Though some mainstream Bahá'ís that I know often express opinions that appear flagrantly antagonistic to the Bahá'í authorities and even the Baha'i Faith itself, this is not my experience with Marshall.

Where I must question Mrs. Marshall's credentials is with respect to the second criterion. She may have contested her expulsion, but is she affiliated with an oppositional coalition? My experience has been that she shuns all such things. Admittedly, my experience with her has been limited.

Dr. Momen identifies Mrs. Marshall as a among dissidents and apostates. This is perhaps true among the dissidents, but not so true among the ex-Bahá'ís. To a dissident Bahá'í, Marshall may be a heroic figure in that she still appears to love Bahá'u'llah yet she has been expelled from the body of believers, which is much more than a social club; it would be more accurate to call it the . An ex-Bahá'í, as someone who does not follow Bahá'u'llah in the first place, is more likely to see Marshall as one of a myriad would-be religious reformers who is an unfortunate casualty in an internal squabble. An ex-Bahá'í is likely to be sympathetic to Marshall as a tragic figure, but less likely to see her as a hero.

Mrs. Marshall may be a hero to some, but she can hardly be seen one who has conformed to any anti-institutional community myth. She has clearly resisted association with the wide variety of criticisms of the Baha'i authorities and the Baha'i religion that are commonly expressed on the Internet today.

12. Karen Bacquet

Dr. Momen concedes that Ms. Bacquet is not known to have undergone a marginal phase, so she is also a mismatch with respect to Momen's thesis. She simply leaped from Baha'I to enemy of the Faith, though she appears to have been quite inactive over the last year or two, albeit she does continue to maintain her web site and discussion group, as can be seen in her reappearance to respond to Momen's statements about her.

This concludes Dr. Momen's list of apostates; his of the Anti-Faith. He goes on to mention several others, but does not attempt to show how any of them conform to his model.

The list of "apostates" Dr. Momen has provided is not a satisfactory representation of his model. There may be angry apostates, bitter apostates, obsessive apostates, and even insane apostates, and there may even be apostates who conform to Momen's model, but until this latter group can be identified, we cannot apply the model to the population as a whole.

Bahai Faith-A Religion Out of Balance

“I believe in Baha’u’llah; I just don’t believe in that other stuff” is a common refrain heard among disillusioned, inactive, and unenrolled Baha’is. To believe in Baha’u’llah is to accept His Writings as the Revelation of God. The “other stuff” is Baha’i administration.

How did administration come to hold such a central place in the Baha’i community? The first generation of Baha’is in this country were free-wheeling seekers of truth, who looked upon their new-found faith as “the spirit of the age”, and thought nothing of participating in the worship services of Christian churches, or in mixing with Theosophists and other New Thought groups. How did their descendents become servants of an inward-looking bureaucracy?

To answer that question requires a quick look at Baha’i history:

Baha’u’llah had two concerns when he laid out the instructions for how his religion was to be governed: The first was that it was not to be ruled by professional clerics, but by the consultations of elected bodies. So he instructed his followers, in his Writings, to elect “Houses of Justice”(currently called Local Spiritual Assemblies) to consist of nine people in every city. The religion as a whole would be governed by a Universal House of Justice.

The second concern was for the unity of his faith, that it would not be divided into various sects. In his will, called “The Book of the Covenant” he appointed his eldest son, ‘Abdu’l-Baha, to be the leader of his faith and the interpreter of his Writings. The existence of a scripturally mandated central authority was meant to prevent major schisms in the religion, and has, for the most part, been successful.(There have been, throughout Baha’i history, small groups that have challenged the central Baha’i authority, but none of these have ever been viable threats to the Baha’i mainstream)

There was little administrative development under the ministries of Baha’u’llah or ‘Abdu’l-Baha. However, ‘Abdu’l-Baha, in His Will and Testament, established the institution of the Guardianship, a hereditary office whose occupant is both the chief executive of the religion and the authorized interpreter of the Writings. The Guardian, along with the legislative body, the Universal House of Justice,would work together in governing the affairs of the Faith. This Will also appointed his eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi Rabbani, as the first Guardian. Since all of Shoghi Effendi’s relatives were excommunicated, and he had no children, there was no one left to fill this hereditary office when he died in 1957. The Universal House of Justice was elected in 1963, but the administrative directives laid down by Shoghi Effendi are still closely followed. It is, in fact, very difficult to reform any of them, since as Guardian, he is popularly regarded as infallible.

Baha’i administration does not develop according to the needs of the community for organization, but exists as a goal in itself. In fact, many Baha’is believe that these institutions will evolve into a future world theocracy, so that in creating them, they are actually engaged in “saving” the world.

Baha’i scholars, however, have questioned this theocratic model, pointing to evidence that Baha’u’llah himself actually supported the separation of church and state. (See Juan R.I. Cole’s book “Modernity and the Millennium” for an excellent presentation of Baha’u’llah’s political thought.)

A Local Spiritual Assembly(LSA) will be formed as soon as there are nine adult members in a locality, so it is not uncommon for virtually all the active community members to be serving on it. (It is also not unheard of for inactive members to be elected to an LSA, if the community is so small there is no one else to elect.)In such a situation, it is almost impossible to be an active member and not be involved in the administration. Even brand-new converts are frequently put on Assemblies.

There are warnings against over-administration in Shoghi Effendi’s writings, but it can scarcely be avoided when the formation of an Assembly is the first thing a community is expected to do. In fact, Baha’i missionaries, called “pioneers” will relocate primarily in order to help form an LSA — going to a community that already has seven or eight members. (Those with less than nine members are encouraged to organize as a “group”, which includes electing officers.)

Another very odd regulation is the way that localities are divided up. Localities are determined by already existing government boundaries, so that the Baha’i population, no matter how small, existing within a city limit makes up one Baha’i community. Baha’is who reside outside that city limit make up another, separate community. For example, during my first year as a Baha’i, there were eight Baha’is in the city, and three in the surrounding court district that were expected to organize separately. Yet, so important was the formation of the city Assembly considered, that the first question I was asked when I was showing an interest in the Baha’i Faith was whether or not I lived in the city limits.

I personally know of people that have begged the National Spiritual Assembly to do away with this ridiculous and unnecessary roadblock in the way a small, struggling communities. But such pleas have fallen on deaf ears. It is difficult not to believe that this is done primarily to make the statistics look good. The Baha’i Faith claims to have over 1700 LSAs in this country, and no one on the outside would ever suspect that many, perhaps most, of them really have no community to manage, except for the Assembly members themselves.

Finally, administration invades even occasions that are primarily for worship. One-third of the main devotional service, the Nineteen Day Feast, is devoted to the discussion of community issues. It is this administrative portion that makes the gathering off-limits to non-Baha'is. This time is usually devoted to reading letters, listening to tapes, or watching videos sent from the National Center. Ideally, this period is supposed to be used for community consultation, and recommendations are to be given to the LSA. (Rather redundant when everyone is already on the LSA.) However, anecdotal evidence suggests that this time period is not often used very effectively, and that believers seldom feel that their suggestions are being taken seriously. Also, a long period spent discussing business negates the spiritual atmosphere that is supposed to attend such an occasion.

Baha'u'llah, besides ordaining the election of a "House of Justice" for every city, also mandates the building of a "House of Worship" in every city. This institution, more properly known as the "mashriq'u'l-adhkar" (meaning roughly "dawning place of God's remembrance"), is supposed to be the center for Baha'i worship and charitable giving. Various humanitarian services (schools, clinics etc.) are an integral part of the mashriq. The House of Worship and its charities are to be open to all humanity, whether they are Baha'is or not.

So, just like its sister religions, Christianity and Islam, the Baha'i Faith was intended to be a religious community that centers on worship and charitable giving, and yet one can hardly spend five minutes as a Baha'i without realizing that neither of these things are given top priority.

A reorientation of the Baha'i community towards this center of worship and charity would restore some of the openness that was present in the early Baha'i Faith. To participate in administration, a person must be an enrolled Baha'i in good standing, and even many of these are not suited for administrative work. Members of the community associated with the mashriq'u'l-adhkar do not even need to be Baha'is. This fact is recognized even in current practice, since non-Baha'i scriptures are commonly read in the existing Houses of Worship, which are open to all.

There are Houses of Worship in the Baha'i World — in the U.S., Germany, India, Uganda, Australia, Samoa, and Panama. A person can hardly encounter an introductory pamphlet about the Baha'i Faith without seeing pictures of one or more of them. However, these beautiful buildings are not practical places of worship for the vast majority of the world's Baha'is. They are showplaces for curious tourists; they are another opportunity to "teach the Faith"; they give us pretty pictures used to prove that the Baha'i Faith is indeed a "world religion". But they are only the shiny wrapping on a box that remains mostly empty.

The major obstacle, at least in the West, to the creation of local Houses of Worship is the pattern of Baha'i development. Quite obviously, communities that consist of 12-15 members are not going to be able to afford even the simplest building. As long as the Baha'i administration divides Baha'is into tiny "localities" the mashriq is only a dream for the vast majority.

Another obstacle is internal — Baha'is are accustomed to thinking of the House of Worship as something for the future, an institution that will develop when the tiny local communities grow to the point when it can be supported. The fact that it is, according to Baha'i scripture, even more important than the Spiritual Assembly is overlooked.

Instead of a distant dream, the mashriq can be a living reality in Baha'i communities today. 'Abdu'l-Baha clearly called a meeting "where they shall glorify God and fix their hearts upon Him, and read and recite the Holy Writings" the mashriq'u'l-adhkar.[1] That is, a worship meeting itself is the mashriq, not the building; it is this that is supposed to be the center of Baha'i community life.

There are some positive signs, however. Recognizing the hunger for a more spiritual and meaningful community life, some Baha'is have made concrete steps towards establishing the local mashriq'u'l-adhkar by centering the community around "mashriq meetings" instead of the more administratively-oriented Feast. One U.S. community has even purchased land on which to build their House of Worship.

Official reactions to this development have been mixed, however. Support of the mashriq'u'l-adhkar was characterized in the April 7, 1999 letter from the Universal House of Justice as a "particularly subtle form" of "internal opposition" to Baha'i teachings. However, since then statements have become more moderate, even positive. Especially encouraging is its Dec. 28, 1999 letter which promoted the "holding of regular meetings for worship open to all and the involvement of Baha'i communities in projects of humanitarian service" as expressions of the mashriq'u'l-adhkar. So there is certainly room for hope, even though there is still considerable suspicion in some quarters of any vision of the Baha'i Faith that does not center on institutional development and loyalty.

Why the Baha'i Faith Can't Keep its Converts??

The National Baha'i Center in Wilmette, IL claims that there are 140,000 Baha'is in the United States. However, it is almost axiomatic among Baha'is that half of the Faith's enrolled members are inactive. In fact, the reality may be even worse than that. One independent poll on American religions estimated that there are only 28,000 people in this country who consider themselves Baha'is.

One reason for this huge discrepancy is that no one is ever removed from the membership rolls unless they write a letter to the National Center renouncing their belief. So a person who becomes disillusioned and simply drifts away can remain on the rolls indefinitely. While the 28,000 figure is probably low, the Baha'i assumption that there are thousands of people who consider themselves Baha'is but have no contact with the community is not realistic. (There is the possibility that some do maintain their belief in isolation, but there are not likely to be many who do so.)

What I propose to examine here are the possible reasons for that. This article is not based on scientific data, but my own observations. I would not have the resources to research something like this, even if I had the training. However, I did spend thirteen years in the Baha'i community, and watch a lot of people come and go. Also, the Internet is rife with "ex-Baha'i" stories, and I think the Baha'i community can learn something from what these people are saying. The teachings of the Baha'i Faith — the unity of religion, the individual's right to investigate truth, racial harmony, and the agreement of reason and religion — have a wide appeal. The Baha'i Faith appears to be a religion that is wasting its potential.

I have no way of knowing which of the problems I mention is responsible for the greatest amount of convert dissatisfaction, I have therefore put them in the order that a convert is likely to encounter them:

THE FALSE FRONT

The Baha'i Faith, in its public presentations, emphasizes the more broad and tolerant aspects of Baha'u'llah's teachings. The itself is not dishonest, since those liberal teachings are actually present in Baha'i scripture, and historically, converts into the Faith have been from among more open-minded and educated people. However, these free-spirited seekers often do not find out about the more authoritarian and exclusive aspects of Baha'i thought until after they have enrolled.

There are a few things commonly told to converts that can hardly be seen as anything other than deceptions. (To be fair, however, Baha'is often convince themselves that they are true.)

Another example is the exclusion of women from the Universal House of Justice, the religion's supreme governing body, even though equality of the sexes is promoted as a fundamental principle. That fact also can come as a shock to a new convert, and perhaps cause them to leave. For a more detailed look at this issue, see my Themestream article ["But Some are More Equal than Others".]

UNSATISFYING COMMUNITY LIFE

One of the least understood aspects of the Baha'i Faith by the general public is the central place administration holds in Baha'i community life. Life as a Baha'i can seem like an endless series of frustrating committee meetings. Building a multitude of LSAs scattered geographically all over the country has taken priority over building solid communities. Once a community has the nine adults necessary to form an Assembly it can be left virtually on its own. In fact, Assemblies exist on paper that never actually meet because not enough of the people in the community are active. But such Assemblies are counted in the impressive statistics given to the public.

The vast majority of Baha'i communities are too small to offer much in the way of services. In an era when mega churches that provide something for everyone are all the rage, the Baha'is look pretty thin. In a very small community, sometimes just getting together for any activity at all can be difficult. Baha'is are often enjoined to be patient, and told that the Faith is only in its infancy. Realistically, however, a religious movement that has been part of the American scene for the last 100 years can hardly continue the claim that it is "embryonic". The simple fact is that the Baha'i Faith has just done a terrible job in creating a rich and rewarding community life for its members, and many of them drift away for that reason.

On the bright side, however, there has been some recognition of this problem on the part of the Baha'i institutions, and in some areas, greater efforts towards community development have been made.

SANCTIONS AND PUNISHMENTS

Like Judaism and Islam, the Baha'i Faith has a religious law code that adherents are expected to abide by. Persistent, public, and continued violation of one of these laws (for example, drinking alcohol, or cohabitation without marriage) can result in sanctions, most commonly the removal of administrative rights. A person so sanctioned cannot participate in any administrative activity, including Feast, the main worship service. This can prove to be an extremely alienating experience, and can result in a person leaving the Baha'i Faith altogether. Even the threat of such sanctions can be the cause of disillusionment. Also, unfortunately, some Baha'is feel it is their duty to "turn in" people who are not living up to Baha'i standards.

INTIMIDATION BY BAHÁ'Í AUTHORITIES

There are abundant stories on the Internet that tell of Baha'is leaving after an encounter with a Counselor or Auxiliary Board Member (ABM). These appointed officials have the responsibility for the “protection and propagation of the Faith”. It is primarily those who have responsibility for “protection” that show up to investigate cases of possible impropriety. The primary target of these officials are people who are showing an interest in one of the small Baha'i sects, known to mainstream Baha'is as “covenant-breakers”. Opposition to the current head of the faith, the Universal House of Justice, is considered to be a spiritual illness, that could possibly be contagious, so the news that someone is reading their material and openly discussing it will almost certainly bring an ABM into the community who will investigate, warn, and threaten with shunning, a person who fails to abandon such contacts.

However, with the advent of the Internet, “protection” duties will also include the monitoring of email traffic for anything that seems heterodox. The most notorious incident of this was the Talisman crackdown in 1996, where professors and intellectuals were threatened with shunning for statements made on an email forum.

Besides associating with schismatics, or email heresy, a Baha'i can attract the attention of Baha'i authorities simply for oral statements, or being seen as a “charismatic leader”. Independent and innovative thinking are viewed with suspicion, with submission to the institutions viewed as a fundamental value. This can drive some of the more talented members away from the Faith.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's you're with me or you're against me policy was embraced by his grandson, and the price they both paid for their unwillingness to condone the slightest dissent, even when it was motivated by a person's faithfulness to their immediate family, was the annihilation of the Asán line that Bahá'u'lláh based his covenant upon.

Baha'is in my Backyard-Trailor

“World peace, no less, is what the Bahai faith wants – a widespread and mysterious religion. This is an investigative road movie about a feel-good religion, two overachieving directors, a prophet’s great-granddaughter, and a CIA agent. A detective-like quest after the Bahai religion, which originated in Iran some 150 years ago, and ended up building its world center on Mount Carmel in Haifa, Israel, – right in our backyard.” For more information go to www.belfilms.co.il

Baha'is answer these two questions!!

The Baha'i Faith is indeed a strange religion. The more I study it, the more I am amazed at its level of duplicity and intent to deceive people. Let me explain this.

You know there are those kinds of people who like to please everyone. And they will say anything – right or wrong to ensure that people like them or that they don't lose their appeal. Sure, for some time we like them. But then their "sweetness" starts getting to you. Over a period of time, this "sweetness" starts getting sickening. You then want them to come clean in discussions, when it comes to giving their opinions and speak the right thing. You want them to speak the facts and not what people want to hear. Ever met people like that?

Well, the Baha'is remind of these types of people. Those who will say anything to appear pleasing to everyone in the world. Let me give you some examples on this.

Baha'is claim to unite religions. Yet they have no thought or opinion on how they can unite the tangential beliefs in religions without antagonizing the other. Christianity believes that Jesus is the son of God. Islam says no. Christianity believes that Jesus was crucified. Islam says no. If the Baha'i Faith was truly the next generation revelation which is meant to unite religions, it must address these very clear contradictions. But you know what. They will never call a spade a spade. They will go onto a tangent. So who is Jesus? Is he the son of God? Ask the Baha'is – they will say he is a Manifestation of God. Sure. But is he the son of God? He is a Manifestation. Oh, but is he the son of God? whew... You will never hear anything from them. Why can't they come clean on this? Why can't they either tell the Christians that you guys have been misguided all these years – Jesus is not the son of God. Or simply tell the Muslims – there is no unity of God. Jesus is the son of God. Perhaps they can't come clean on this without antagonizing either Islam or Christianity. So as the adage goes – if you can't convince, then confuse!

A Persian Baha'i with Zionist President

I am still unable to reconcile the fact that Baha'is are not meant to teach the Faith to Jews. Huh? C'mon are you not a universal religion or Bahauallah the messenger of all times etc etc, as you claim? Then why are you depriving the Jews of guidance. Ask the Baha'is and they will tell you that this is as per pact which Bahauallah entered with the Jews. Huh? A messenger of God entering into an arrangement with a community to deprive them of the teachings of God? Ask the Baha'is and they will shy away from this. What right do they have to stake claim to being a universal religion when they cannot teach such an important community in the world? So whenever a Muslim comes to me, that's what I tell him – ask the Baha'is to teach the Jews first and then Christians and then Islam. In any case that is the sequence in which Allah revealed his message in any case. Or else, tell us that the Jews are right and we all will follow the Jews and not Bahauallah.

There are several such instances which highlight the false sweetness of the Baha'i Faith. The sad part is that the Bahais themselves are not able to see through these contradictions. Anyways, if ever you meet any Baha'i who appears very sweet to you, just throw him these questions and watch the "sweetness" disappear!

Leaders of Baha'i Faith

How much really changed in the Aqdas?

Bahá'u'lláh is said to have written the Kitáb-i-Aqdas in 1873, or perhaps several years earlier. This was relatively early in his ministry, so much was added or amended afterward, but the Aqdas stands as the book that Bahá'u'lláh intended to serve as the foundation of his scriptures. The Aqdas, when viewed with its Islamic, Shi'i, Iranian, and Bayanic origins in mind, presents very little original material, and is hence a very traditional book in the Shi'i style, and it contains much that western Bahá'is and non-Bahá'is might find hard to swallow. It is therefore no surprise that the Bahá'í authorities did not complete an authoritative English translation until 120 years after its release in Arabic. Its release in English, along with the advent of the Internet, preceeded a surge in fundamentalism in the previously liberal western Bahá'í community.

First and foremost, the Twin Duties assigned by the Aqdas to all men are (1) belief in Bahá'u'lláh and (2) obedience to his laws and ordinances. ¶1 The Aqdas states quite clearly that good deeds—without satisfying these two duties—are worthless. This fundamentalist doctrine of salvation leaves no room for the unbeliever and those who cannot manage to live by the entirety of Bahá'u'lláh's rules and regulations, which are—as well shall soon see—quite hard to swallow. The Bahá'í community, in fact, does not follow many of the directives of the Aqdas, though they claim they will one day when mankind has reached a sufficient level of maturity.

There are certainly passages in Bahá'í scripture that exhibit tolerance of the unbeliever, but there are certainly passages that exhibit a less than complimentary attitude:

The peoples of the world are fast asleep. ... So bewildered are they in the drunkenness of their evil desires, that they are powerless to recognize the Lord of all being, Whose voice calleth aloud from every direction ... ¶39

One of the most striking characteristics of the Aqdas, especially in light of the fact that such gravity is given to its laws and ordinances, is that a number of important issues are omitted while several less important topics are addressed in great technical detail. What the Aqdas chooses to address appears to follow the pattern of Islamic tradition and Bábí law more than issues that concern modern civilization. Indeed, the Aqdas itself indicates that Bahá'u'lláh wrote the Aqdas to appease the many contemporary Bahá'is who saw great importance in addressing Islamic law. ¶98

It is not enough to say that the Aqdas endorses capital punishment. In many parts of the world where capital punishment is used, it is reserved for extreme crimes. In the Aqdas, the application of capital punishment is more straightforward: if one kills (with intent), one is to be killed. ¶62

Even stronger is the punishment for arson, which appears to be the equivalent of burning at the stake. ¶62 Not to imply that arson is not a dreadfully serious crime, but isn't that a bit cruel and unusual? Is there no other crime that calls for a punishment of proportionate cruelty?

Though Bahá'u'lláh dealt with a handful of topics in great detail, his handling of these topics left something to be desired with regard to fairness.

One example of this are the flat monetary fines applied to fornication ¶49 and manslaughter ¶188 and flat amounts assigned to dowries ¶66: did it ever occur to Bahá'u'lláh that this approach favors the wealthy? It has the effect of making fornication and manslaughter similarly minor offenses for those who can easily part with a little gold.

I have, on occasion, stopped to wonder how a modern criminal court system might be served by the additional load of fornication cases. I also wonder how people might come to be accused of fornication. It's good for a laugh or two.

Manslaughter is treated as a civil offense for which the blood money is set to about 11 troy oz. of gold. The fine for first offense adultery is about an ounce.

The passages of the Aqdas on marriage ¶63-70 are noticeably gender-biased. Men are permitted to have two wives ¶63 ('Abdu'l-Bahá later abrogated this allowance of bigamy). Men are presumed to be the sole bread winners, so no consideration is given to the likelihood that a woman might work ¶67. Whereas adultery is considered to be an offense that men and women can commit ¶49, divorce appears to be justifiable by female adultery only, for, in keeping with Islamic tradition, divorce is not a two-way street: the man divorces the wife; not the other way around. ¶68.

Dowries are set to a couple ounces of gold for city urban Bahá'is and a couple ounces of silver for rural Bahá'is. ¶66 Silver is, of course, worth much less than gold. This system favors rural residents whether they are rich or poor, but more importantly, why even bother with such detail? Why require dowries in a modern age in which wives are presumably no longer possessions?

Bahá'u'lláh's rules for inheritance clearly favor men over women. ¶20–29 The only defense Bahá'is have for this is that Bahá'u'lláh's rules are merely a default to be used when Bahá'is don't leave a will (which would be illegal). Is this to suggest that Bahá'u'lláh's inheritance rules are not to be used, even as a model? Of course they are to be used! If failing to leave a will is forbidden, why else would Bahá'u'lláh have specified these allotments? To punish the female descendants only? Important Topics Avoided

It seems a bit peculiar that, having dealt with incidental topics in great detail, Bahá'u'lláh found his way to sidestep some important issues, such as circumcision—especially the female variety practiced in parts of the Muslim world. He must have been aware of the practice, yet he did not seem to believe it was an issue deserving of his attention.

Some heinous crimes are not touched by the Aqdas. Thievery is addressed in detail, but robbery—the violent equivalent—is not touched.

The Aqdas does not address sexual crimes such as molestation and rape. These heinous offenses may not have been considered as serious from Bahá'u'lláh's Islamic perspective, but of course that's no excuse for a universal manifestation.

The Aqdas fails to discuss rape, sexual assault, or molestation, but it does express great abhorrence for something it ambiguously calls the subject of boys. ¶107 Shoghi Effendi interpreted this as a general forbiddence of sexual relations between males. As ambiguously grossed out as Bahá'u'lláh appeared to be by the subject of boys, Shoghi Effendi was probably reading Bahá'u'lláh right.

Though the Bahá'is claim to respect cultural diversity, the very fabric of the Bahá'í Faith threatens cultural diversity, because the Bahá'í Faith is no mere code of international and interracial good will as it has been sold to us; rather it is a complex set of behavioral codes that dictate manner of dress, eating, worship, marriage, and on and on. One directive that drives this point home is Bahá'u'lláh's directive on the trimming of hair:

Shave not your heads; God hath adorned them with hair, and in this there are signs from the Lord of creation to those who reflect upon the requirements of nature. He, verily, is the God of strength and wisdom. Notwithstanding, it is not seemly to let the hair pass beyond the limit of the ears. Thus hath it been decreed by Him Who is the Lord of all worlds. ¶44

It's a good thing Shoghi Effendi clarified the prohibition against long hair to be directed only toward men! Still, given the apparent spirit of this passage, consider how Bahá'u'lláh kept his own hair. We have included a photo to assist the reader.

The Roots of Shundamentalism

Shundamentalism, the distinctly Bahá'í practice of shunning other Bahá'is who follow another Bahá'í leader, was put forward again and again by Bahá'u'lláh, and an example is to be found in the Aqdas:

Erelong shall clamorous voices be raised in most lands. Shun them, O My people, and follow not the iniquitous and evil-hearted. This is that of which We gave you forewarning when We were dwelling in Iraq, then later while in the Land of Mystery, and now from this Resplendent Spot. ¶37

Later, in Questions and Answers, Bahá'u'lláh utters this remarkably divisive statement regarding non-Bahá'í family members, giving great legal weight to the practice of shunning apostates:

Any heir, from whichever category of inheritors, who is outside the Faith of God is accounted as non-existent and doth not inherit. # Answer No 34

Why one should not become—or remain—a Bahá'í, according to the Aqdas

Finally, here are some selections from the Aqdas to help motivate good people to keep clear of the Bahá'í Faith:

It is inadmissible that man, who hath been endowed with reason, should consume that which stealeth it away. ¶119

Burden not an animal with more than it can bear. ¶187

"If we made the requirements too rigorous, we will cool off the initial enthusiasm, rebuff the hearts and cease to expand rapidly. The essential thing is that the candidate for enrollment should believe in his heart in the truth of Bahá'u'lláh. Whether he is literate or illiterate, informed of all Teachings or not, is beside the point entirely. PO Box 833 Southport 4215

Dear Baha'i Friends,

RE: MR. NIMA HAZINI

The National Spiritual Assembly of Australia has been informed by the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States that Mr. Nima Hazini occasionally spends time in Australia visiting parents and often associates with the Baha'i youth here. As Mr. Hazini's parents are members of your community we are sharing the following information (which has been provided by the National Assembly of the United States) with your Assembly: "...It is important for you to know that Mr. Hazini withdrew his Baha'i membership in December 1996 after expressing his strong dissatisfaction with the Baha'i community and our National Spiritual Assembly. Shortly after his withdrawal was accepted, Mr. Hazini wrote to the National Spiritual Assembly stating that he had not withdrawn from the Baha'i Faith but had withdrawn only from the Baha'i community. He provided a copy of his letter to the Universal House of Justice...When Mr. Hazini received a copy of the Universal House of Justice's letter, he chose not to pursue reinstatement of his Baha'i membership. The last information that we had about him was that he had decided to become a follower of Sufism."

At one stage Mr. Hazini was transferred to the United States as a Baha'i in good standing. However, in light of the information given by the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States we have made the necessary changes in our records about his status. Your Spiritual Assembly is advised to be alert to Mr. Nima Hazini's activities in your area, when he comes to Australia to visit his parents, especially his association with the Baha'i youth.. Thanking you for your cooperation and with loving Baha'i greetings. Gul Williams for the Secretariat

19 Myths Baha'is LOVE!!!!

Myth #1: The Bab and Baha'u'llah was anti-slavery

Truth: Both owned, bought, and sold black slaves. Baha'u'llah forbade the slave trade in the Aqdas, not slavery itself. One of the first laws that the Confederate States of America enacted was to make the slave TRADE illegal. But slavery itself continued.

Myth #2: Baha'u'llah was tolerant of homosexuality because He told Baha'is to have a “sin-covering eye”.

Truth: Baha'u'llah called homosexuality HARAM (absolutely forbidden) for Baha'is. The term sin-covering eye referred to “minor sins” (sagiraḥ). There is no one Arabic word for “sin”. There is one for major sins (sagiraḥ) and one for minor sins (sagiraḥ). Baha'u'llah used the one for minor sins. He considered LIWAT (male homosexual acts) and SIHAQ (female homosexual acts) to be among “satanic deeds”; another name for MAJOR sins. He likened LIWAT and SIHAQ to ZINA (adultery/fornication).

Myth #3: ‘Abdu’l-Baha was infallible.

Truth: No way. He said that Universal Peace would be established in 1957. He said that under the Law of Moses a thief’s hand could be cut off. Both untrue. He identified the “24 Elders” in the Book of Revelations as “the Bab, the 18 Letters of the Living, and 5 others” in one place, and identified the same 24 Elders as the 24 Guardians during the Baha’i Revelation in another, contradicting Himself.

Myth #4: Baha’i Holy Law does not mention abortion, and thus it is up to the House to rule upon it.

Truth: The Kitáb-i-Aqdas was the Addendum to the Babi book of Laws, the Qayammul-Asma’, which forbade abortion and divorce. Shoghi Effendi repeatedly said that abortion was “absolutely forbidden” for Baha’is, without making exceptions to this rule.

Myth #5: The Central Figures and Shoghi Effendi preached against racism, and proclaimed that all races are equal in every respect.

Truth: Shoghi Effendi NOWHERE wrote or said that the races are equal in intelligence. He did NOT condemn scientific racism (something he was taught at Oxford as scientifically proven fact), but rather “racialism”; the philosophy that one race can dominate others.

Myth #6: Baha’i teachings say that Jesus never arose from the dead, but His body is still buried somewhere in Jerusalem.

Truth: Baha'u'llah said that Jesus had the “Power of the Great Ether” and this is why He arose from the dead.

Myth #7: Baha’i Writings say that Christ came to unite cities, and to improve the status the rights of minorities and women.

Truth: Nothing in the Writings, nor in the Pilgrim’s Notes, says anything close to that.

Myth #8: Krishna was a black Manifestation of God.

Truth: Krishna is presented in the Bhagavad-Gita, and in Hindu tradition, as an Aryan of the Warrior caste. All of the Manifestations of God in the Adamic Cycle have been Caucasian men.

Myth #9: The next Manifestation of God will be a woman.

Truth: .

Myth: #10: The Baha'i Writings say that all the Prophets are equal to each Others, none of Them are greater than the Others. To say one is greater than the Others is to "distinguish" between Them, which the Writings forbid.

Truth: . By "distinguish between Them" Baha'u'llah was NOT condemning allotting to them ranks, but rather condemning what the Christians and Jews were doing his His day, accepting some and rejecting others as Prophets.

Myth #11: The World Order of Baha'u'llah will be established via the "World Peace" Message, when everyone realizes that we can only have World Peace by becoming Baha'is, then they will become Baha'is.

Truth: Baha'u'llah in a pilgrim's note says how the World Order of Baha'u'llah will be established. It will come after a World Union is formed. The World Union will outlaw religion because of wars and terrorism and enmity between religious groups. Religion will be outlawed by the World Union. However, in one or two generations the leaders of the World Union will see that mankind will become too corrupt without organized religion, so they will choose the Baha'i Faith among all the religions as the most ecumenical and suiting of the needs of world unity, and thus all children will then be raised as Baha'is, and that will commence the World Order of Baha'u'llah.

Myth #12: The death of Jesus on the Cross was just a martyrdom, nothing more. The Bab suffered more because He was tortured before death. Baha'u'llah suffered more because He was put in the Black Pit for four months.

Truth: *Ishmael (offered as a test upon Abraham) *Jesus (died the sins and iniquities "of all mankind") *Imam Husayn (blood atoned for collective sins of Shia Muslim community) *Mirza Mihdi (died for the sins of the Baha'is against Baha'u'llah...allowing them to re-enter His presence)

The ONLY Manifestation of God in that list of Jesus Christ. His death was a "universal atonement" in that its effects had an effect "on all created things".

Myth #13: The depictions of Hell-fire and Jehenna in the Qur'an are mere symbols, and were created by Muhammad as a way to frighten ignorant Arabs into getting them to follow the religion of Islam

Truth: There is NOTHING in the Writings or the pilgrim's notes that even suggests this! In His Tablet to Varqa, Myth #14: The Bible is full of myths and errors of fact, and everybody knows this, and the Writings say this too. The Gospels as well are full of myths and errors, and were written many years after the events described therein.

Truth: but that certain parts of the Bible should be considered parable or metaphor rather than literal (such as Eve eating a piece of fruit after being tempted by a talking snake).

Myth #15: The Baha'i Teachings are summed up in the 12 (or 11 or 13 or 14) Principles of the Baha'i Faith.

Truth: The "Principles" were first called the "Foundations of World Unity" and they were NEVER put forth as the summum bonum of Baha'i beliefs, nor even basic Baha'i beliefs. They were compiled as "Foundations" to present to world peace clubs and race unity clubs, to find common ground with them, so that Baha'is could speak at such meetings to talk to others about the Faith.

Myth #16: Baha'u'llah said that what the Afterlife was like is beyond description, meaning we cannot possibly know what it is like, therefore the Qur'anic descriptions of the Afterlife must merely be parables of something we can't possibly understand.

Truth: Baha'u'llah described the conditions, including the stench, of the Siyah Chal ("Black Pit") as being "beyond description". This does not mean that we cannot imagine it, nor that the Siyah Chal was simply a metaphor or parable of some personal suffering of His that we cannot comprehend. Baha'u'llah affirms the Qur'anic descriptions of the After life in His Tablet to Varqa.

Myth #17: The Writings say that Heaven and Hell are conditions of the soul, not geographic locations. Therefore, Paradise and Hell have no existence other than in our own souls.

Truth: (i.e. Paradise was just beyond the fixed stars..fixed in a crystal sphere, and Hell was under the earth in great caverns of fire). The Sufis said we create our Heaven or Hell, depending upon the condition of our soul at death. In other words, if our soul is in Heaven at death, a Heaven is created for us. If our soul is in Hell at death, a Hell is created for us, in the Unseen World, which is as real as this World, but is ethereal instead of physical. The Unseen World exists in every location where the physical Cosmos exists. For years Baha'u'llah used the title Baha'u'Din, the name of the founder of a popular Turkish Nashqabandi Sufi sect. Baha'u'llah wore a Darvish Turban of the Nashqabandi Sufi Sect from the time He lived among the Nashqabandis (1863-5) until His death in 1893.

Myth #18: The Writings say that reincarnation is not true, and impossible.

Truth: Baha'u'llah wrote He was the return of "Jesus, the spirit of God". 'Abdu'l-Baha said that "human souls" do not return to THIS planet. The Sufis taught that when a man became a WALI ("Saint") he no longer had a human soul, but an angel soul or a divine soul. This occurred when the Seeker extinguished his "ego" (human soul), and his nafs (self) is fana' ("blown out like a candle"). Other incarnations on other planets are not ruled out, and seem to be at least hinted at in some Writings and pilgrim notes. The souls of Prophets are pre-existent, and thus not human souls. The souls of the Saints are not "human souls" because they have extinguished their human souls and the only eternal thing that remains in them is the Divine, or Angelic, Soul.

Myth # 19: The purpose of the Baha'i Faith is to establish World Peace/Race Unity/the Equality of Men and Women/Universal Education/equal pay for equal work/socialized medicine/national health care/Esperanto as the Universal Language, etc.

Truth: The purpose of the Baha'i Faith is to establish the Justice of God on Earth; to end injustice in all forms, so that Mankind may be spared from the Wrath of God (final extinction).

Baha'i Cult Leader was on the Payroll of the Racist & Imperialistic British Military

Source : <http://iranianfacebook.com/2012/07/15/bahai-leader-bahai-prophet-was-on-the-payroll-of-the-racist-imperialistic-british-military-the-same-british-that-gandhi-had-to-free-india-from-during-its-period-of-enslavement/>

Why I believe Baha'i is false!!

My initial impression of the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh was favorable. After all, the objectives of peace and regeneration of the world were noble and desirable. However, noble objectives are not sufficient to substantiate the reality of its claim to be the ultimate explanation of supernatural reality.

What about the many cases of martyrdom of believers in the Bab and in Bahá'u'lláh? Do not these lend credence to the Baha'i faith? Much as one is emotionally inclined to do so, I believe this is insufficient to constitute proof of supernatural reality.

Bahá'u'lláh proposes that divine revelation occurs in stages. This is the concept of progressive revelation. Each stage is suitable for the level of human understanding at that particular stage in history. He proposed that he is the ultimate Messenger of God and constitute the Messiah hoped for by the Jews, the triumphant return of Jesus Christ and the long-awaited return of Imam Mahdi.

This audacious claim is nonetheless a theory. Any theory purporting to explain the divine is attempting to explain a reality in the supernatural realm. As such, it must stand up to the scrutiny of tests of supernatural reality.

If the writings associated with the theory contain historically supported events which cannot be explained by nature, then it constitutes evidence that the theory probably describes a supernatural reality.

The two objective tests of supernatural reality are accurate predictions of future events and performance of miracles.

Prediction of future events constitute one type of evidence of supernatural reality if the likelihood of those events taking place by chance is extremely remote.

Other than three predictions, I have yet to find other predictions in the life and works of Bahá'u'lláh which have come to pass in secular history.

Behá'u'lláh claimed that the Báb had predicted his coming.

The Báb had declared that his own revelation as the "door" to the Imam Mahdi was not final, and that he would, at some future time be succeeded by "Him whom God shall manifest". At the same time the Báb had laid it down that the time of this promised deliverer's arrival was known only to God, that no one could falsely claim to be him. The Báb also indicated that the next manifestation would appear suddenly and unexpectedly.

After the execution of the Báb in July 1850 by the Iranian government, a number of important Babis put forth extravagant claims of divinity. This included Sayyid Basir-i Hindi of Multan in 1851. He was one of several Babi leaders of the time who claimed participation in divine manifestations, similar in some ways to those claimed by Sufis or mystics. Another such person was Sayyid 'Uluvv who had made claims to being God incarnate. He resided in the shrine city of Kerbala in Iraq, the site of the tomb of the Imam Husayn.

Thus during those turbulent times, anyone could claim he was "Him whom God shall manifest." I believe Bahá'u'lláh seized the opportunity to declare his divinity and take over the mantle of leadership of the Babis. Thus his appearance as "Him whom God shall manifest" was neither sudden nor unexpected.

Bahá'u'lláh predicted that Sultan 'Abdu'l-'Aziz, the Grand Vizer, 'Ali Páshá and the associate, Fu'ád Páshá would have their lives taken from them as punishment for exiling him to the prison city of Akka.

It is not uncommon for people to curse their enemies. I believe the likelihood of the curse made by Bahá'u'lláh coming to pass by chance is not extremely remote.

What is more interesting is not the prediction coming to pass but the very fact that the curse was made at all. One of the central tenets of Baha'i Faith is belief of common brotherhood of man and that people of the Baha'i should be shining examples to all mankind. I quote from his Writings on the Civilizing of Human Character:

"O peoples of the world! Forsake all evil, hold fast that which is good. Strive to be shining examples unto all mankind, and true reminders of the virtues of God amidst men."

This appears to be contrary to the making of curses. I believe that is an example of hypocrisy and is totally inconsistent of a man who claims he is the "Manifestation of God." and the epitome of the virtues of God.

Behá'u'lláh predicted that a democracy of the people would rule one day in Iran. If this prediction was made before democratic government appeared on earth, it would have been exceptional. However, Behá'u'lláh was looking at the fledgling democracy in England when he made his prediction. Hence the likelihood of this prediction occurring by chance is not extremely remote.

In summary, the likelihood of these three predictions concerning Behá'u'lláh occurring by chance are not extremely remote and therefore are not sufficient to invoke a supernatural causation.

Performing deeds which are impossible in the natural to occur are known as miracles. Miracles constitute evidence of supernatural reality. I am unable to find examples of miraculous acts performed by Bahá'u'lláh.

Thus there is insufficient evidence for me to be convinced that Bahá'u'lláh's theory of "Progressive Revelation" represents supernatural reality.

How can I explain Bahá'u'lláh's behavior? I like to propose a theory that Bahá'u'lláh has megalomania, a psychological state characterized by delusions of grandeur. Examination of his writings show that this theory is plausible.

Bahá'u'lláh claimed that he was infallible (incapable of failure or error) (the 'Ishraqat circa 1855)

However, he made an error when he pronounced that creation had no beginning. I quote from his 'Writings on the human soul'.

"As to thy question whether the physical world is subject to any limitations, know thou that the comprehension of this matter dependeth upon the observer himself. In one sense, it is limited; in another, it is exalted beyond all limitations. The one true God hath everlastingly existed, and will everlastingly continue to exist. His creation, likewise, hath had no beginning, and will have no end. All that is created, however, is preceded by a cause. This fact, in itself, establisheth, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the unity of the Creator".

It had been scientifically established that there was a beginning described as the 'Big Bang'. Thus Bahá'u'lláh was not infallible.

Bahá'u'lláh's original name was Husayn-`Ali Nuri. Consistent with his condition of megalomania, he renamed himself Behá'u'lláh, the meaning of which is "The Glory of God."

He claimed that he is the Manifestation of God and that no one can recognize God except through Him. (the Tajalliyat circa 1855)

He claims that the various messianic prophecies of earlier religions were fulfilled by his coming. (the 'Ishraqat circa 1855)

He glorified himself in a fashion consistent with megalomania:

*"Had Muhammad, the Apostle of God, attained this Day, He would have exclaimed: 'I have truly recognized Thee, O Thou the Desire of the Divine Messengers!' Had Abraham attained it, He too, falling prostrate upon the ground, and in the utmost lowliness before the Lord thy God, would have cried: 'Mine heart is filled with peace, O Thou Lord of all that is in heaven and on earth! I testify that Thou hast unveiled before mine eyes all the glory of Thy power and the full majesty of Thy law!' ... Had Moses Himself attained it, He, likewise, would have raised His voice saying: 'All praise be to Thee for having lifted upon me the light of Thy countenance and enrolled me among them that have been privileged to behold Thy face!'" (Bahá'u'lláh, Summons of the Lord of Hosts, p.149)*

If I examine Bahá'u'lláh's claim that the prophets Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muhammad, Imam Mahdi and Bahá'u'lláh are Manifestations of God, I find something interesting.

None of them claimed to be Manifestations of God except Jesus and Bahá'u'lláh.

Prominent Baha'is of India involved in Criminal Activities!

The Delhi High Court on Friday stayed the arrest of the trustees and management committee members of Delhi's Lotus temple, till September 25 on a complaint registered with the Delhi Police.

Justice A K Sikri directed the Economic Offence Wing(EOW) of the Delhi Police not to arrest the trustees and management committee members of the Lotus temple, founded by the Bahai faith, till the next date of hearing.

Trial Judge Kamini Lau, on the complaint of some of the former employees of the temple, had directed the Delhi Police to lodge a complaint against the trustees and management committee members who were allegedly involved in smuggling of classified defence documents, hawala transactions and religious conversions.

The trustees and members, some of them from Iran, also procured about 80 Indian passports by submitting false address proof, Counsel S S Tripathy and Sandeep Jain said. Incidentally, Zina Sorabjee, the wife of former Attorney General of India Soli Sorabjee, is one of the trustees. UNI

Scripture Censorship in Baha'i Faith

Any and all scripture that would call into question Baha'i orthodoxy is censored. Is there an authorized Baha'i version of the Bab's W&T, no; is there an authorized Baha'i version of the Bab's Bayan, no. Why?, because these scriptures call into question the very legitimacy of the Baha'i faith and of Baha'u'llah's covenantal claims.

If Baha'u'llah's and Abdu'l-Baha's Wills and Testaments are taken as evidence of Baha'u'llah's covenant shouldn't the Will and Testament of the Bab be put forth as a part and parcel of that covenant?

Truth is that the Bab's Will & Testament is unlikely to ever be issued in an authorized Baha'i version because it would have to be so censored and or altered as to make no sense to cover up the fact that according to the Bab's Will & Testament it was Azal and not Baha'u'llah who was given the authority over the Bab's covenant.

Truth is that church fathers whether they be Christian, Baha'i, Buddhist or Muslim are always willing to make things up as they go to cover up any and all inadequacies and inconsistencies in their orthodox scriptures, doctrines and dogmas.

They are willing to leave things out or gloss things over which would show their chosen ideology in a poor light. In short they are more interested in fabrication than they are in the truth as long as that fabrication fits the mold of their personal interpretation.

Thus the Gnostic Gospels were edited out of the Bible. So to do the Baha'i powers that be strictly control, through the review-censorship process, all Baha'i information using their false label of authorization.

False facade of ‘Unity’ and ‘Love’ by Bahais

Let all non-baha’is realize the FALSE facade of ‘unity’ and ‘love for all people’ portayed by the BAHAI universal House of Justice.

Please read my posts and one can deduce that Baha’is ARE NOT ABLE to answer logically- safe to make derogatory remarks.

INDIVIDUAL CONSCIENCE is NOT TOLERATED BY The Baha’i authority- BAHAI universal HOuse of Justice— this is discuss details by Martin(Baha’i mathematician from Canada- member of the all male 9 members of BAHAI Universal House of Justice).

Any Baha’i member with individual conscience is SUMMARILY threatened with expulsion and ostracized by his-her own Baha’i family.

In this case Martin and his 8 ‘divinely’ inspired members of BAHAI universal HOuse of Justice decided to shut Shirin up for 3 years by KIDNAPPING HER IN Peru and placing her in a mental institution.

To many, the Baha’i cult is a dangerous PLAGUE – that plans to take over the world through a Middle Eastern Theocracy- whereby non-baha’is will be forced into financial ruin (through the laws of baha’i inheritance- THE AQDAS).

The Baha’i cult had in fact MISLEAD its own followers into believing that THE LESSER PEACE would be instituted by the end of the 20 century. THIS HAS NEVER HAPPENED

This STUPID prediction was based on the book of Daniel that was supposed to have occured in 1957 then re-written by Baha’is to occur by the end of the 20th century.

NOW, why do Baha’is refer so often to the Bible when at times, Baha’is do not believe that the Bible is entirely authentic. Baha’is choose what they want to portray- and make ‘fun’ of Christians for their belief in the physical ressurection.

Here is a link to Baha’i views on the “lack of authenticity of the HOLY BIBLE”= <http://bahai-library.com/uhj/holy.scriptures.html>

Baha’u’llah is CAUGHT misquoting the Bible in the Gleanings- “As to the question raised by...in connection with Baha’u’llah’s statement in the ‘Gleanings’ concerning the sacrifice of Ishmael; although this statement does not agree with that made in the Bible, Genesis 22:9, the friends should unhesitatingly, and for reasons that are only too obvious, give precedence to the saying of Baha’u’llah, which, it should be pointed out, is fully corroborated by the Qur’an which book is far more authentic than the Bible, including both the New and Old Testaments. The Bible is not wholly authentic, and in this respect is not to be compared with the Qur’an, and should be wholly subordinated to the authentic writings of Baha’u’llah.” (From a letter dated July 28, 1936 written on behalf of Shoghi Effendi to a National Spiritual Assembly

“...we cannot be sure how much or how little of the four Gospels are accurate and include the words of Christ and His undiluted teachings, all we can be sure of, as Baha’is, is that what has been quoted by Baha’u’llah and the Master must be absolutely authentic. As many times passages in the Gospel of St. John are quoted we may assume that it is his Gospel and much of it accurate.” (From a letter dated January 23, 1944 written on behalf of Shoghi Effendi to an individual believer)

The Baha’i CULT -an offshoot of Iranian Islam- SHI’ITE SECT- has REPEATEDLY tried to discredit the authenticity of the Bible- and the have turned around and have Baha’u’llah make statements that ARE NEVER FOUND IN THE BIBLE.

Proselytizing Baha'i faith in schools is unethical and immoral

I was a student of New Era School and I will not hesitate in accepting that a full scale Proselytizing goes on in the school in the name of Children Moral Classes. To be honest I have to say here that I did accept the Baha'i Faith for a while for which I was given a declaration card to sign stating that I believe in Bahauallah and Abdul Baha. Therefore I was not at all surprised to see your blog which points towards the Baha'is Proselytizing the Faith to the tiny tots in the Schools in India in the name of Community development. The methods adopted by the Baha'is are dangerous and deceptive as the children are not mature enough and cannot realize what is the actual purpose of these courses. But the fact is that whatever Baha'is are doing is just the order of their apex organization the Universal House of Justice. To support my point, I am reproducing the following extract which has been taken from Baha'i newsletter, 'Reflections on Growth' – Number 25, August 2009, Page 6 Prepared under the auspices of the International Teaching Centre for the institution of the Counselors.

Need I say more?

From the time New Era school has been established there are cases of 500 conversions to the Faith. Countless others are sympathetic and support the cause by large donations – cash and kind.

My dear countrymen, be cautioned !!!!!

Bayanis (Azalis) through the world celebrate New Year 165

Today (23 April 2012) is the 1st of the month of Baha' (splendor) and so the beginning of the Year 165 of the Bayani calendar. Also unlike the Baha'is the Bayani calendar possesses no intercalary days to make up for the 365/366 solar year cycle deficiency. The calendar of the Bab follows a strict scheme of 361 days (19×19) so that the beginning of every new year falls on a different day than the one previous. This is because the Bayani calendar is supposed to reflect and symbolize the all-things/kullu-shay' ($19 \times 19 = 361$).

Given the occasion, I would like to here extend a heartfelt happy new Bayani Year to the Bayani community of Iran and abroad, and hope that our collective efforts to set the historical record straight against 146 years of orchestrated persecution by the Baha'i establishment with their anti-Bayani Baha'i propaganda and historical whitewashes – which the Western establishment has helped them diffuse – will finally begin to pay off. This Year of 165 should be a significant year since 165 is the abjad numerical value of there is no god but God لا اله الا الله

What is the religion Baha'i about?

1. How new members are found ?

Baha'i Faith: There are secrets but these secrets are not known to the poor, innocent, newly converted Baha'is. Does the common baha'i know that the Baha'i Elections are fully controlled by the "All Male, Supreme, All Infallible, Haifan Organisation"? Do they know this, that these are not spiritual but highly fraud and controlled? there are many secrets and are available on the internet. Search on google for Pakistan Baha'i Election Fraud, Baha'i Control on their Electoral System, Baha'i Election fraud in India.

2. How funding is obtained? Baha'i Faith: Has commercial businesses, they collect money from poor Indians, Burmese, Nepalis, Pakistanis in the name of Community Banking and then use these funds for proselytizing. Also auctions are held of different used Clothings of Baha'i Leaders for fund raising. If they know (and they actually know) that you have money, they (Especially Iranian Baha'is) will start motivating you to give the Some of the fund is used for Pioneering purpose and it is allocated by the Counselors to its own people, sometimes exceeding 15000 US$ a year. There are huge financial scams in the Baha'i community. Just google to learn more, Search for Baha'i financial scams in Dubai, India, Italy, Pakistan, Africa, Iran etc.

3. Charismatic central figure.

"Baha'i Say: There is no clergy, paid or unpaid" Totally false!

4. Investigation of truth Baha'i Say: Baha'is are encouraged to investigate all religions, and to appreciate truth no matter where it is found.

Totally Wrong.

Baha'is are strictly not allowed to read the material of other Baha'i Sects.

5. Behavior control, as defined by Hassan. Baha'i Faith: Behavior is fully controlled by the Supreme Baha'i Administrative Bodies. Once Baha'i Administration declares any fellow as a "Covenant Breaker" then other Baha'is are supposed to totally boycott / shun him even if he be your brother.

This is what I found, the advice of UHJ to Baha'is "There is no excuse for believers continuing to associate with ... and those who, knowing everything, still insist on doing so, should be shunned by their fellow-Bahá'is. The same applies to people who have left the Cause and associate with ..."

6. Thought control ! Baha'i Faith: The "Ruhi Institute" is specially meant to brainwash the newly converted.

7. Emotional control! Baha'i Faith: Exactly same here, Guilt and fear are often used to control members, including alternating praise and public humiliation (if you are critical of this cult) or forced confession, and indoctrination (Shunning) against leaving the group.

8. What happens when people leave the religion Baha'i Faith: Exactly Same with the Baha'i Cult. Search the Phrase "Non-association with Covenant-breakers" and read the teaching of Baha'u'llah, Abdul Baha and Shoghi Effendi.

"SO BAHAI FAITH IS ACTUALLY A CULT" "THE MOST DANGEROUS NWO CULT" Source(s): <http://bahaicultfaq.blogspot.com>

Baha'i government would be totally tyrannical

The Baha'i Administrative Order, developed by Shoghi Effendi, and derived from the writings of Baha'u'llah and Abdu'l-Baha, is a badly flawed and ineffective mode of government, which would naturally take over an area if the Baha'is ever became the majority of any place on Earth. Here's why that must NEVER happen:

Second, consider this quote from Baha'u'llah himself: Consider the pettiness of men's minds. They ask for that which injureth them, and cast away the thing that profiteth them. They are, indeed, of those that are far astray. We find some men desiring liberty, and priding themselves therein. Such men are in the depths of ignorance.

Liberty must, in the end, lead to sedition, whose flames none can quench. Thus warneth you He Who is the Reckoner, the All-Knowing. Know ye that the embodiment of liberty and its symbol is the animal. That which beseemeth man is submission unto such restraints as will protect him from his own ignorance, and guard him against the harm of the mischief-maker. Liberty causeth man to overstep the bounds of propriety, and to infringe on the dignity of his station. It debaseth him to the level of extreme depravity and wickedness.

Regard men as a flock of sheep that need a shepherd for their protection. This, verily, is the truth, the certain truth. We approve of liberty in certain circumstances, and refuse to sanction it in others. We, verily, are the All-Knowing.

Say: True liberty consisteth in man's submission unto My commandments, little as ye know it. Were men to observe that which We have sent down unto them from the Heaven of Revelation, they would, of a certainty, attain unto perfect liberty. Happy is the man that hath apprehended the Purpose of God in whatever He hath revealed from the Heaven of His Will, that pervadeth all created things. Say: The liberty that profiteth you is to be found nowhere except in complete servitude unto God, the Eternal Truth. Whoso hath tasted of its sweetness will refuse to barter it for all the dominion of earth and heaven.

I think George Orwell would call this sort of thing "doublespeak". Of course, if you are a Libertarian, this is total nonsense to you. War is peace, freedom is slavery, ignorance is strength. NOT!

Consider this testimony from another ex-Baha'i:

<http://www.bahai-faith.com/ex-Bahai-10.html>

I used to be a member of the Baha'i Faith, and though it has some very good points, it ultimately fails to pass the test of independent investigation. Baha'is usually seek an image as being very liberal and open-minded, to attract seekers no doubt. Once within the community however, you are very limited in terms of how you should feel about any aspect of life... it has to be the "Baha'i Way" or no way. In fact, you may find yourself in a ridiculous situation if you have unique family situations...

Are you adopted? Oh, too bad if you were wanting to get married.... Better hope you can track down your biological parents, or you will face a real nightmare, because you need their permission before you can marry if they are still living. If they, let's say, don't like "negroes" and you want to marry interracially, then despite the fact that they have never seen you before in their lives (because they dumped you at an orphanage) you are forbidden to marry, and face severe penalties if you do so anyways. Have you, or anyone you know, had an experience where you faced a four fold conflict with: the love of your life, a biological parent you've never met (or a hard-headed parent with prejudices against your love's race), the Baha'i religious administration, and your own conscience.

Then why bother to have a UHJ at all? It is toothless!

A Multi-Milliard Rial Scam By A Baha'i Company in Dubai

Originally appeared in the Persian language 'Asr-i-Iran 26th of Isfand 1387 (solar) = Monday, March 16, 2009 CE
<http://www.asriran.com/fa/pages/?cid=67633>

After the passage of 20 months it is established that this company not only did not build a single tower/high rise, but didn't even obtain the properties for their construction! In an unprecedented scam involving the amount of 2,150 milliard rials (which was taken from Iranians who had invested money for the purpose of obtaining property in Dubai), a high-rise/tower construction development company connected to the Baha'is in the United Arab Emirates has committed fraud.

According to reports by [the newsagency?] MAWJ (wave), approximately 20 months ago the company 'Reliance', which is connected to two Baha'is by the names of Farhang Rahavi and Elham Sabeti, took money from Iranians in a pre-sale/'on plan' venture capacity, which involved 60 percent on the sale value [of properties], totalling 724 million dirhams (equivalent to 1,950 milliard rials).

With the sale of two [corporate] projects (a German named 'Solar Star' and the Emirati named 'Al-Mahara'), this company as well demanded the sum of 75 million dirhams (equivalent to 200 milliard rials) from Iranians for the purpose of buying property, and obtained it.

Farhang Rahavi, who is an Iranian national with an American passport, then traveled to Dubai with the aim of organizing an association for the defense of the misled Baha'i cult. He – who sometime before, due to his involvement with other fraudulent ventures, had earlier fled Iran – married Elham Sabeti (the former wife of Dr. Mahbubi, i.e. the community head of the misled Baha'i cult in Dubai), and with the company named 'Reliance' entered the real estate property market in Dubai.

It should be mentioned that amongst this collected sum approximately 1,110 milliard rials (equivalent to 112 million US dollars) has been transferred out of the United Arab Emirates and over to the United States of America.

The buyers [i.e. investors] are of the opinion that through the agency of one individual named Pezhman Riazati, who is also a Baha'i, their money was sent out of Iran over to the United Arab Emirates and then transferred to the United States.

The defrauded Iranians in seeking redress with the legal courts of the Emirates are as yet unsuccessful in obtaining hearings, and moreover their cases presently stand in a state of limbo. Some of the bigger Iranian real estate companies in Dubai, who likewise had dealt with this company in the past, at the present time have also not been able to contact the company owners of 'Reliance'.

A few years ago, in regard to foreign investments and transactions in Iran, the Chief Justice of our nation had in some cases specifically warned about unknown companies without identity.

* 'Kollah-bardari' (literally, 'taking the hat off') is translated interchangeably as 'scam' and 'fraud'.

Badi Villar Cardenas: A Bahai Terrorist!

Badi Villar Cardenas is a Lima, Peru based member of a dangerous rightwing Stalinist religious cult known as Haifan Baha'ism. In his capacity as a member of this cult, on the internet he serves in their Baha'i Internet Agency. Throughout Latin and South America, in the past Haifan Baha'ism has been involved with CIA-funded rightwing regimes, such as that of Augusto Pinochet in Chile, and even rightwing death squads in El Salvador in the 1980s as well as the CIA crack-cocaine funded Contras in Nicaragua in the 1980s. Members of the Haifan Baha'i National Spiritual Assembly of Chile served in the cabinets of Augusto Pinochet and so are culpable for the human rights violations under the Pinochet regime against the people of Chile. Recently high ranking members of Haifan Baha'ism in Peru maintained close ties simultaneously to the ousted authoritarian regime of Alberto Fujimori as well as Abimael Guzman's the Maoist Shining Path terrorist organization. It is a well known fact that uhj member Farzam Arbab, the father of the Ruhi Institutes, developed his model upon that of Marxist guerilla indoctrination cells which the Shining Path maintained in the jungles of Peru, Bolivia and Columbia. With Alberto Fujimori high ranking members of the NSA of Peru have maintained (and apparently still do) financial interests. On April 7, 2009, Fujimori was convicted of human rights violations and sentenced to 25 years in prison for his role in killings and kidnappings by the Grupo Colina death squad during his government's battle against leftist guerrillas in the 1990s.

In his various capacities in the Peruvian Haifan Baha'i community, Badi Villar Cardenas serves as consultant to several Haifan Baha'i owned agribusiness contractors in the Amazon, one of which was owned by now deceased Costa Rica (cosa nostra) based Iranian Baha'i Hozhabr Yazdani. These are (Haifan Baha'i) companies who are responsible for logging and destruction of the Amazon rainforests and contributing to the genocide against the native Amerindian peoples living along the river — monies which they then send to their cult headquarters in Haifa, Israel. As such Badi Villar Cardenas is an accomplice in the war and genocide against the indigenous Quechua peoples and, along with his Baha'i cosa nostra masters, a war criminal who should be hauled before a human rights commission at the Hague.

On several occasions (esp. in 2006) Mr Cardenas has committed identity theft on the internet against assorted critics of Haifan Bahaism. Additionally Badi Villar Cardenas is rumoured to engage in brujeria (black sorcery, witchcraft) and to solicit the services of Peruvian brujos and brujas (male dark sorcerers and female dark sorcerers) against the ideological enemies of his creed in Peru and outside of it.

Was Mirza Subh i Azal the real successor of Bab?-A Debate

Anonymous Oct 31, 2010 07:46 PM He was NOT the real successor of the "Bab". He was the half brother of Baha'u'llah. Her mother pushed her son and the other friends to try to gain power... His followers poisoned Baha'u'llah and trying everything to destroy Baha'u'llah family and followers.... Reply

Lover of Bab Dec 14, 2010 11:40 AM @ Anonymous You are totally biased. What are the proofs of all that you said? You are just saying what has been taught to you in your Ruhi Classes. You have been brainwashed. I feel sorry for you. Reply

Anonymous Jan 19, 2011 10:14 PM how is it biased, it is the truth it has not been stated anywhere that mirza yahya was the successor of the bab. Look at all the things that he did to Bahau'llah, do you think that it was good? Of course not, Mirza yahya was the arch covenant breaker. Also it doesn't just say that in the ruhi books it says it in most of the holy writings, so i dont know what your talking about. Reply

Badi 19 Feb 7, 2011 01:39 AM Dear Anonymous, You said Subh-i-Azal was not a good man. The same is said about Baha'u'llah, that he was not a good man. Do you know that the Thugs of Baha'u'llah murdered so many followers of Subh-i-Azal? Have you ever visited <http://www.bayanic.com/> You will get all the information about Subh-i-Azal and how Baha'u'llah committed crimes against Azal and his followers. May God guide you towards the right path. Reply

Anonymous Feb 23, 2011 03:50 AM Don't tell me about the right path mirza yahya was a covenant breaker as well as his so called followed. Bahau'llah did not have thugs. They are called his followers who are known as today as the Baha'is. I do not mean to be rude but please review the writings of bahau'llah and the many Baha'i stories, I'm sure you are a knowledgeable person. Bahau'llah was a manifestation of god and endured many sufferings including sufferings from his own half brother mirza yahya. He endured those sufferings for humanity. He was a manifestation of and we should all recognize this, please think this over. Reply

Naser Mar 4, 2011 08:29 AM You haifan baha'is are completely ruhi'i'zed. Open your eyes! don't just follow all what is being taught to you in those Ruhis. The haifan UHJ is taking the benefit of the poor people of your likes. You are completely blind of the Babi history. Reply

Anonymous Mar 6, 2011 10:20 PM oh shut up stop making your own stupid sects its people like you that cause all these problems it plain and simple. A prophet is sent down us to teach us Gods message either take it or leave it but DO NOT CHANGE IT! Its not that hard to understand The ruhi books are another way of teaching. STOP making your own stupid terms like 'ruhized'. Grow up! Stop causing problems. What is in the ruhi books is in line with the teachings of the faith. It is not seperate so stop making seperate. The governing body of the Bahai faith is The Universal House of Justice you know that I know that everyone who is a bahai knows that. All bahai's are bahai's there are no sects. STOP causing problems. If religion was the cause of dissension it would be better for it not to exist at all. This is quoted. CREATE UNITY NO PROBLEMS. Ya Bahaul Abha. Reply

Anonymous Mar 6, 2011 10:25 PM Oi nasser whats with the 'haifan UHJ' what are there other Universal Houses of Justice. Think before you say something. I inplore you to read the BAHAI writings which i'm sure are available. Independent investigation of the truth is one of the important things of the bahai faith. Do not listen to others, investigate it for yourself, if the bahai faith is not to your liking, at least do not cause problems! Reply

Naser Emtesali Mar 9, 2011 09:32 AM "whats with the 'haifan UHJ' what are there other Universal Houses of Justice" Dear Anonymous, There is one another UHJ that I am aware of and I am sure you are also aware of it. See this : www.uhj.net bye Reply

Anonymous Mar 13, 2011 04:33 AM No I'm not aware of it and I shouldn't have to cause there is no such thing as another universal house of justice there is only one. Why to you believe all these different misconceptions and ideas. I don't understand why you can't just be a Baha'i. Don't believe that stuff. I honestly believe you can change your mind. It really upsets me that people make problems and have misconceptions and just can't create unity. Not that I'm trying to say that I'm superior at all. Do you really think that 7 million Baha'is around the world are believing in something false and that people like you are understanding the truth of the faith. I didn't want to have to say that but how can I influence people such as your self. You guys are just making things complicated. Mirza yahya was a covenant breaker he did bad things throughout bahaullahs life, yet bahaullah endured them, disentangle that sound updating to you. Bahaullah was trying to teach everyone about the faith the message from god and that he was a manifestation, mirza yahya caused problems to bahaullah, he was in no wise a good man, how can a man such as mirza yahya be good, he did no good he showed no good and he was not faithful to bahaullah or the faith and yet you still believe in him. I don't understand that after all that you still choose to follow that path. Mirza yahya had the opportunity to become a follower yet he chose to throw it away, how can someone such as himself who was close to bahaullah throw an opportunity like that away. He was jealous and ignorant, there always is a ignorant person, I can't understand why he would want to hurt bahaullah or the faith, if he didnt like bahaullah or the faith he could of at least not involved himself in it. Instead of causing all these problems for everyone, what god has set and sent down will be achieved I can guarantee you that, if it is gods will it will happen eventually the whole world will be unified and will be Baha'is, steadfast bahais that a steadfast in the covenant and hopefully do not follow in the footsteps of mirza yahya. I hope you read this extremely long message with great thought and given it a hard thinking, sleep on it, do what ever you want with it, I can only hope that you will become a Baha'i that is firm in the covenant and steadfast with the laws of bahaullah and his teachings Reply

NaserMar 14, 2011 03:47 AM I thank you for your humble comments. I really have sympathy for Haifan Baha'is like you who are completely brainwashed. When the Haifan Bahai Administration (HBA) is not allowing to read you the authentic Babi material. How can you pass a judgment by reading only those censored Haifan Books. Please do justice to yourself. If you really believe in IIOT (Independent.....truth) then do visit <http://bayanic.com/>, do read the crimes committed by Baha'u'llah and his goons in the early days.

Because the HBA says you so about Subh'i' Azal and because it have so many chapters dedicated to him in your Ruhi Course, you have become blind. Open your eyes.

Baha'i faith was not, is not and will never be united. There are two UHJs one Based in ISRAEL and the other in US. Where is your unity?

There are so many guardians and they have so many followers and all are saying that your Haifan UHJ is bogus without a guardian. Isn't that mentioned in your writings.

7 Million baha'is is a Joke. Were are these 7 millions? Which country. Scattered here a there a few people does not make 7 million.

GOODBYE AND GOOD NIGHT FOREVER. Reply

Wahid Azal Mar 25, 2011 06:07 AM “Her mother pushed her son and the other friends to try to gain power...”

This is quite a humorous statement considering that the mother of Subh-i-Azal died while Subh-i-Azal was a baby and it was the mother of Mirza Husayn 'Ali Nuri (aka Baha'u'llah) who became Subh-i-Azal's primary care giver. She also died before the events under the question.

It does not cease boggle the mind as to how ignorant Haifan Bahais are of the overall features of their own history. Reply

The issue being discussed is; who was the One that the Báb predicted that would be made Manifest: The Azal's believe it was Mirza Yahya Subh-i-Azal; The Baha'is Believe it was Bahá'u'lláh.

Lover of Bab Asked: “What are the proofs of all that you said?”

On investigating The Baha'i Faith, as with other religions I was told bad things about the Faith, however, I investigated these rumors for my self, and after clearing away the dirt, I saw such a luster of spirituality, I wanted to be part of this myself. My point is, if one wants to know the truth, one must investigate the reality themselves. The proof I needed was Bahá'u'lláh's teachings has the ability to change peoples lives by the love of God and a love for their fellow man with honesty and truthfulness.

What follows is a few things worthy of consideration.

In a “Tablet Addressed To ‘Him Who Will Be Made Manifest’ ... The Báb says only “Him Who Will Be Made Manifest” can establish His Faith “that no one can attain anything save by Thy power and that He Whom Thou hast raised up is but Thy servant and Thy Testimony.” Only Bahá'u'lláh was able to establish His Faith and made It a world Faith. And further, in this same Tablet, The Báb said: “I, indeed, beg to address Him Whom God shall make manifest ...” “do Thou grant a respite of nineteen years as a token of Thy favour so that those who have embraced this Cause may be graciously rewarded by Thee.” The Báb declared His Faith in 1844; Bahá’u’lláh declared His Faith in 1863, Exactly 19 years after the Báb declared His Faith.

Bahá’u’lláh’s younger half-brother Mirza Yahya Subh-i-Azal ... rejected Baha’u’llah’s claim to be “He Whom God Will Manifest,” ... As for those who followed Subh-i-Azal; Professor Browne himself estimated their number to be no more than three or four in every hundred Babis, all the remainder having recognized in Bahá’u’lláh the signs of the Bab’s “Promised One.”(15)

“It is impossible that any responsible examination of the Babi era could be undertaken without making extensive use of THE DAWN-BREAKERS: NABIL’S NARRATIVE, the detailed history of that period written by the one person who was both a firsthand observer and recognized historical writer.(19) “For those events which he did not personally witness, Nabil provides in exhaustive detail, the identity of the observers from whom he received the accounts and very often the circumstances surrounding the transmittal”(20) In its place, the principal source used for this period (apart from Mr. Azal) is an extraordinary manuscript produced by unknown writers some time between 1852 and 1863, under the title NUQTATU’L KAF. (21)

“The Bab’s recognition of the title of Bahá’u’lláh (Glory of God) was particularly significant since He had used precisely this term in the Bayan to allude to the promised “Him Whom God Will Manifest.” On the eve of His departure for Tabriz where He was executed the Bab reiterated this recognition in a remarkable Tablet which He forwarded to Bahá’u’lláh. Nabil, who was himself a witness of the transmittal, describes the document as: ...a scroll of blue paper, of the most delicate texture, on which the Bab, in His own exquisite handwriting, which was a fine shikastih script, had penned, in the form of a pentacle, what numbered about five hundred verses, all consisting of derivations from the words “Baha.” ... So fine and intricate was the penmanship that, viewed at a distance, the writing appeared as a single wash of ink on the paper. We were overcome with admiration as we gazed upon a masterpiece which no calligraphist, we believed, could rival” (37) “The scroll was duly delivered to Bahá’u’lláh at Tíhran. The most cursory research would have cleared up any question which a modern student of the Baha’i Faith might have on the subject.” 38 As a foot note, the Báb sent a box with His Tablets including the Scroll just mention, and with the Báb’s on pin, to Bahá’u’lláh.

In conclusion: I know that Bahá’u’lláh makes a new creation of those who comes under His Teachings. I don’t have any experience with the Azal movement, so I have nothen to say.

The Báb said only the one that God Manifested could established His Faith. I know that Bahá’u’lláh establish His Faith, and It became a world Faith.

The Báb asked “do Thou grant a respite of nineteen years as a token of Thy favour so that those who have embraced this Cause may be graciously rewarded by Thee.” Bahá’u’lláh Made His public declaration in 1863 exactly 19 years after the declaration of the Báb. Did Azal give a declaration 19 years after the Báb’s?

Did the Azal’s , study the detailed history of The ‘Dawn- Breakers’: Nabil’s Narrative? Or were they content with the NUQTATU’L KAF, a manuscript produced by unknown writers?

If Azal was the promise one, Why did The Báb sent a box with His Tablets, and with His own pin, to Bahá’u’lláh?

This is something to think on! Regards. Reply

Guys, please. Let’s put our differences aside and stop arguing. Honestly, what is the point of argument. It achieves absolutely nothing. Allah’u’abha Reply

“The Báb said only the one that God Manifested could established His Faith”

Not the Primal Point’s, and beside the Bab explicitly said He whom God shall make Manifest would not appear for between 1511 to 2001 years.

“I know that Bahá’u’lláh establish His Faith, and It became a world Faith. “

So did Reverend Sung Young Moon, Osho, Sai Baba and a whole slew of New Religious Movement cults – some of whom even outnumber you Bahais.

“do Thou grant a respite of nineteen years as a token of Thy favour so that those who have embraced this Cause may be graciously rewarded by Thee.”

He addressed this to HWGSMM when he appears between 1511 and 2001, and not to Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri.

“Did the Azal’s , study the detailed history of The ‘Dawn- Breakers’: Nabil’s Narrative?”

No, because no such history was ever written by Nabil Zarandi. The DAWN BREAKERS is a complete fabrication of Shoghi Effendi. If this te:

is real, let us see the original. <http://www.scribd.com/doc/59724054/Tabatabai-on-Tarikh-i-Nabil>

“Or were they content with the NUQTATU’L KAF, a manuscript produced by unknown writers?”

Nuqtat’ul-Kaf was authored by Hajji Mirza Jani Kashani, a companion of the Bab. There are early manuscripts of this work as early as 1853 (a year after the author’s death).

“If Azal was the promise one,”

He wasn’t. Subh-i-Azal never claimed to be anything other than what the Bab had nominated him as: his Mirror (mir’at) and successor (wasi).

” Why did The Báb sent a box with His Tablets, and with His own pin, to Bahá’u’lláh?”

He didn’t. This is a lie and fiction peddled by you Baha’is. All the earliest documentary evidence proves beyond any shadow of a doubt that all of these were sent to Subh-i-Azal, not to Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri. Reply

Baha'i "Elections" in Haifa, Israel are a Fraud

This year, out of 1'200 votes cast, 500 have been sent by mail to Haifa, Israel, according to the Baha'i administration.

The Israeli Postal Authority (an Israeli Government Agency) has replaced and tempered some (if not all) of these votes. The entire procession is a farce!

Letters are opened and fake ones replace the votes (the list of Baha'is who are eligible is OPEN information).

Most "experts in security" know that it takes less than 30 minutes for a government agency like the Israeli Postal Authority (or Mossad) to open a letter and replace its content (or just make copies) – including SEALED letters, without ANY possibility of detection by the addressee.

Notably, Baha'i elections do not allow campaigning (rightly so), therefore one can expect the votes to be RATHER EVENLY distributed among the 1200 people that can be elected (except may be the names of present members of the UHJ and Counselors, etc.) People are not elected with 70% of the votes with may be the exceptions cited above. Now that the corruption is in place, it is easy to control the administration entirely from the inside, not counting some CORRUPT "Baha'i officials" in Haifa who are unelected.

Therefore, the 500 votes sent by mail can make a BIG difference if (some of) the letters' content has been replaced even partially (or tempered with). Nevertheless, checking it should be an ESSENTIAL PART OF THE AUDITING PROCESS, but again, unfortunately, it is virtually IMPOSSIBLE to audit this part, unless exceptional measures are taken, beyond the ones taken by the Baha'i administration at present. It does NOT require "big" logistics for any Government to commit this kind of fraud. It can be done VERY EASILY, as explained above by the Israeli Postal Authority or the Mossad. However, the "Baha'i" administration will dismiss this possibility. This by itself is very strange...

The Baha'i administration, by its own admission, does NOT verify the authenticity of the mail's CONTENT (i.e., the votes themselves), but ONLY the fact that the sender's name matches the authorized list of Baha'is. Furthermore, the ballots are SECRET (that means that no one knows "who voted for who" beside the person himself/herself, which is not bad by itself).

But this important loophole CAN and has been exploited by the same people who wrote the Protocols of Zion and who have sworn to replace ANY religion with their perverted form of Judaism and who have been condemned and denounced by many US Presidents.

Beware of the Baha'i Elections unless ALL the above issues have been resolved in a COMPLETELY TRANSPARENT way!

Electioneering in Universal House of Justice

As we all know, Baha'i elections are supposed to take place without any nominating procedure, and without campaigning.

I'd like to suggest that in the light of these principles of Shoghi Effendi, the last few persons elected to the Universal House of Justice were elected in contravention of Baha'i electoral law and are guilty of de facto electioneering.

Typically, the punishment for electioneering is that the person's administrative rights are removed and the body on which he serves is often dissolved for new elections.

In 1963-1983, Baha'i elections for the Universal House of Justice, in which NSA members serve as delegates, appear to have been conducted in an upright manner. Several US and UK NSA secretaries were elected. But then people like Hushmand Fatheazam (India) and Ali Nakhjavan (pioneer in Uganda) were also put on.

From 1988, however, almost all electees have been Counsellors with appointments at the International Teaching Center in Haifa. The two exceptions prove the rule. Adib Taherzadeh was a continental counselor and Doug Martin had been brought to Haifa as a publicist for the UHJ. The NSA secretary of the largest Baha'i community, India, has never been ranked that highly in the voting, even though he makes the most sense given that most Baha'is are in the third world and he knows how to administer them. Likewise, NSA secretaries or just NSA members in large Baha'i communities in Africa and Asia are not considered eligible, apparently.

On Taherzadeh's death last year, Kiser Barnes, yet another Counselor at the International Teaching Center, was tapped to succeed him. He joins Hooper Dunbar, Peter Khan and Farzam Arbab, all of whom came in that way.

Now, one gets to be counselor at the ITC by appointment. If the ITC counselors are now the candidate pool for UHJ membership, which is what the voting pattern of the past decade and a half demonstrates, then appointment of a male counselor to the ITC is a form of nomination.

Counselors at the ITC travel (on your dime folks) all over the world to consult with NSAs, so that they become very well known to the very people who elect the UHJ. This is a form of stealth campaigning. They are also in a position to do favors for NSAs and their members.

It seems to me, then, that Hooper Dunbar, Peter Khan, Farzam Arbab, and Kiser Barnes got to be on the UHJ by nomination and campaigning. The same applies to Doug Martin in my view, but that case is more ambiguous.

Khan and Arbab in particular have shown a ruthless disregard for Baha'i law and basic human decency (as in the scurrilous threats launched at talismanians and the hijacking of the Baha'i encyclopedia by Arbab, and the expulsion of Alison Marshall at Khan's insistence). This pattern of unethical behavior accords well with the illegitimacy of their route to power.

Recently the ITC was shuffled yet again and counselors like Fred Schechter, who were considered too 'soft,' were fired, with extreme hardliners brought in. Not only are the ITC Counselors now 'nominated' for UHJ membership and then sent about to campaign, but they are subject to an ideological litmus test that is ratcheting the center of gravity on the UHJ increasingly toward the Far Right of authoritarianism, disregard for the rule of law, regimentation of the community & etc.

In an ideal world, those guilty of electioneering would be forced off the House, have their administrative rights removed, and the House would be dissolved in preparation for free and fair elections. But, then, in an ideal world, Hell would have frozen over.

Cheers,

Juan

Universal House of Fear

Baha'u'llah, founder of the Baha'i Faith in 1863, stated "The essence of all that We have revealed for thee is Justice" and designed a "new world order" including a world-wide system of elected, nine-member bodies at the local, national and international levels, with the top-most body named The Universal House of Justice (UHJ), first elected a century later in 1963.

Many assumed that Baha'u'llah and his UHJ crowning a developing Baha'i Administration may eventually fulfill various messianic prophecies such as "the Kingdom of God" on earth, that the meek shall inherit the earth and the like. However, in subsequent decades, most notably in the 1980s, a growing number of Baha'is began to perceive that various corrupt practices were permeating the Baha'i Administration on all levels. This article explores the idea that the UHJ may be degenerating into a weak Universal House of Fear at a time when the Baha'i community needs strong leadership.

Several examples of the House of Fear come to mind. "In Search of Ruhi" suggested some possible implementation faults in the Ruhi program, apparently promoted by at least one contemporary UHJ member. Commenting on this article, Baquia wrote "James, you're going to get in trouble if you keep this up." Was Baquia implying the troubling notion that the UHJ or some of its members might somehow strike back at authors writing critiques on some of their pet projects, contrary to the Constitution of the UHJ? The clear implication may be that Baha'i Administrative institutions might be becoming objects to fear instead of love. Individuals and institutions that rely on fear for influence are inherently weak. The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

Recent UHJ actions may belie fear of consultation, debate and diversity of ideas and opinion in the Baha'i community The summary ex-communication (removal from membership) of Alison Marshall in New Zealand a few years ago may be a case in point. It seems the issue was whether women should be eligible for election to the UHJ, an idea which Ms. Marshall favored. Exactly what does it matter if one or more Baha'is think women should be able to serve on the UHJ? Why should this issue not be openly debated? The weak avoid debate; the strong welcome it. In prior years, a group of Baha'is in Los Angeles, California, raised this issue, but felt it necessary to present their views in a secretly distributed manuscript, fearing retribution from the Baha'i Administration. With humanity in peril of the worst economic depression in history and a possible world war, has the UHJ membership lost perspective of the highest priority issues that most merit focus and effort? The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

The ex-communications of Sen McGlinn and many others provide similar examples. When the purported rationale for membership removal in the McGlinn case is read carefully, it may be clear that there was no rationale. McGlinn had done nothing different than dozens of other Baha'i writers according to the literal description of the UHJ. This lack of rationale for what may amount to religious persecution of McGlinn appears to suggest fear and weakness among the UHJ membership. Is the membership so weak that it cannot tolerate an articulate writer on Baha'i subjects? Should not the priority be to increase membership in the Baha'i Faith, not decrease it? These sorts of efforts to stifle independent investigation and expression have prompted many capable Baha'is to become inactive or simply leave the Baha'i membership roles. The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

The bogus Khan-Martin doctrine of the supposed infallibility of UHJ actions, exposed as lacking any scriptural support in "Infallibility Artifice" and further debunked in "Infallibility Verdict", has revealed just how weak and fearful the UHJ membership may have become. For about two decades, Khan and Martin were allowed to promote their man-made infallibility doctrine, without any support from Baha'i scripture or from any official UHJ statement. This doctrine appears to have had only one purpose: to humiliate and weaken the UHJ as the leading administrative unit of the Baha'i World, turning the UHJ into a sort of institutional clown to be laughed at and mocked as absurd by observers in every quarter — far from the lofty intentions and aspirations of its designer, Baha'u'llah. During this entire period when Khan and Martin and their surrogates travelled the world promoting their doctrine to disgrace the institution of the UHJ, did even a single UHJ member publicly speak up to clarify that the Khan-Martin infallibility doctrine was nothing more than a misguided theory or to oppose this assault on Baha'i interests? Did a single National Spiritual Assembly (NSA) or NSA member speak up? The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

Meanwhile, silence of the Baha'i Administration on the campaign of Khan, Martin and surrogates to replace the Baha'i Faith with their revised version allowed these usurpers to plant the false idea among many Baha'is that UHJ decisions were in fact infallible. Indeed, a growing number of Baha'is came to believe that the home-brewed infallibility theory was actually based on Baha'i scripture, although nobody could produce any quotation to verify it, since available scripture dealt with inputs to, and the design of, the UHJ and not its specific decisions. Did the childish illusion that UHJ decisions were infallible act as a sort of invincibility drug for UHJ members? Rephrasing, how many UHJ decisions have been reversed in, say, the last 30 years? Can anybody name even one such case? Absence of any evidence that the UHJ can perform one of its constitutionally mandated functions — changing prior decisions, may be viewed as yet another sign of weakness. The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

"Purge Cover-Up" is the most popular article among Baha'i readers, showing abundant awareness in the international Baha'i community of the apparent failure of the Baha'i Administration to officially recognize the largest schism and loss of membership in the history of the Baha'i Faith as well as to formally issue appropriate apologies, remedies and reparations. Is it possible that the elected members of key NSAs and of the UHJ are not as aware of their own history as the community they serve, as gauged by the popularity of "Purge Cover-Up"? Strong, confident UHJ leadership might have addressed these pressing issues thoroughly and effectively years ago. The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

Among many out-spoken authors, Baquia continues to document the freeze in the elected membership of most major NSAs and of the UHJ in Baha'i Administration. As suggested in "Bondage by Baha'i Election", Baha'i voters elect persons who voters deemed to be "best qualified" in prior years, rather than assessing who may be "best qualified" at election time. As a result, the elected membership of many NSAs and the UHJ has come to resemble a powerful, entrenched elite, similar to that which controls secular political parties. Can these elected NSA and UHJ members be unaware of this trend which can severely impair realization of Baha'u'llah's vision? "Bondage by Baha'i Election" suggested several obvious remedies, some of which have been on the table from other authors for many years, such as term limits. Has there been any hint from these NSAs and the UHJ that a remedy to this serious problem is being considered? How many of these members have announced their resignations effective on the date of the next election, to allow Baha'i voters to improve their voting performance by electing other qualified persons? How many of these existing NSA and UHJ members can honestly say that their performance merits re-election? Is silence on this problem consistent with adequate performance of administrative duties or alternatively, with fear, weakness and even incompetence? The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness.

The need to renew and invigorate the Baha'i Administration, to exit from apparent inaction, elitism, fear, weakness and lack of creativity, continues to gain priority as political and economic problems in the secular world increase in severity and as the next UHJ election in 2013 approaches. Will the Baha'i community suffer more of the same? Since the UHJ is elected by NSA members, the annual NSA elections come into sharp focus in April, 2012. Can there be any excuse for failure by delegates in those elections to replace the entire membership of most NSAs with new blood of qualified persons? Can delegates actually do their job and research prospects for new members? It may be that no less will be required to elect an entirely new UHJ. The power of the elected bodies — NSAs and the UHJ, resides in great part in the teaching that members should follow the dictates of their own conscience. Likewise, the power of Baha'i voters arises from their ability in each election cycle to issue a vote of confidence or no-confidence whereby some or all members of a Baha'i institution are replaced with persons deemed to be better qualified at that time to fulfil Baha'u'llah's vision. Will Baha'i voters arise to this challenge in 2012 and 2013? Will they make some effort to replace the elitists who, intentionally or unintentionally, have come to occupy key elected positions "for life", contrary to the Baha'i precept that elected members are "lay persons", not permanent administrators until death? The Baha'i community needs UHJ leadership exhibiting confidence and strength instead of fear and weakness. © 2012 James J Keene Posted by James J Keene PhD

Baha'i faith and it's teachings (Persian) Part 1

The Final Word about Baha'ism and Polygamy

Reference : <http://reference.bahai.org/fa/t/b/KA/ka-87.html#pg57>

Here is my translation from the Arabic version of Ketabe Aghdas.

Sec 57: "Follow the Sonat [that mean culture but my Palestinian translator believe he is attacking Soni's], but not the old people, and not the ignorant. God wrote that you should get married, do not you ever think about going over two women [wives]. And if the guy is satisfied [with one], it is better for you and her."

By that there is no more argument has left that polygamy is legal in Baha'ism up to two wives. My only question is how come Baha-aalah had 3 wives.

Should anyone intentionally destroy a house by fire, him also shall ye burn-Kitab Aqdas

I was invited to a Baha'i party last weekend. The food was great and we were having fun till the host of the party started reading random sentences from a book "Sexuality in Islam" (قوه باء). This book, Sexuality in Islam, is an honest gathering from all the Islamic documents that contains the meaning of sexuality, sexual relation, and even the sexual desires of Mohammad. This book was published in Iran after the revolution and its content has been approved by many Iranian officials and religion authorities.

We were laughing loud and having fun until I mentioned "Islam like any other religion is full of crap, and if you look deep in the Baha'i book you will find nothing but historical jokes like that". This comment has faced a serious feedback. To elaborate my point, I mentioned "Ketabe Aghdas (کتاب اقدس) said if someone burned your house you should burn him to death".

62 : Should anyone intentionally destroy a house by fire, him also shall ye burn; should anyone deliberately take another's life, him also shall ye put to death.(Kitab Aghdas)

Reference: <http://reference.bahai.org/en/t/b/KA/ka-5.html#gr62>

That sentence ended the joy of the party. All I remember was the Baha'i army who were fighting me to prove no such a thing existed in their book. I asked for the Ketabe Aghdas several times; however my requests were rejected with louder argument. Finally someone took responsibility to go online and check for the accuracy of this fact. And believe it or not, I was right.

When the English version of the book revealed that, you can burn a person alive to death if he burns your house, they challenged me to check into the Arabic version. And sadly this strategy did not take them too far. They relentlessly argued at each other for the next two hours on how to translate the Arabic version and how to interoperate it properly to not to make it look better. Meanwhile other friends and I were laughing at them while drinking tea.

They are the group who didn't go to school for their religion, they consider themselves patriotic, but they do not know the content of a 60-page book of Ketabe Aghadas.

But I learned one thing that night. If you understand the true meaning of their book and say it loud, you might be in trouble.

Are Baha'is Worshiping God or Son of God?

I was reading Baha'i prayers last night, surprisingly majority of the prayers are addressing Abolbaha, not even BahaAllah or God. Even the prayers that has put together during Abolbaha's time, directly address him as a rescuer and savior. I did a little of research to see why Baha'is who claim they have the most modern religion still stock with the name and the individual. And the following are my discovery.

Baha'is in contrast with traditional religions do not believe in a path to God. The only pass is the happiness of Abolbaha and his successors, Garfield Castle (house of Justice).

Although Baha'is believe in:

"There is none other God but Thee, the Inaccessible, the Omnipotent, the Omniscient, the Holy of Holies." (Bahá'u'lláh Gleanings)

They completely block the way to discover that God. The relation between Baha'is and God has to go through Abolbaha because the real god is inaccessible. In other writing Abolbaha has even forbidden to search or try to understand God.

THE WAY IS CLOSED AND SEEKING IS FORBIDDEN. (Abdul Baha Questions pg. 169)

And that is more astonishing to read BahaAllan boldly called himself God:

"Manifold and mysterious is My relationship with God I am He, Him himself, and He is I, Myself, except that I am that I am and He is that he is." (p.66-67 GLEANINGS FROM THE WRITINGS OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH)

Maybe that is the reason Baha'is like Christian pray and Worship the son of God. And the only remaining question is that "Are Baha'is worshipping God or son of their God (Abolbaha)" Posted by Ataturk

Baha'i Electoral System seems to elect the ambitious and greedy (and paranoid) to the top offices

The problem with the current situation in Baha'i Faith is not merely that the voting records of the NSA members are completely unknown. It is that the activities and policies of the NSA as a whole are almost completely unknown! What exactly do these people do? What policies have they made? What effect have the policies had? Have they been good for the growth of the community, numerically and spiritually? Without knowing the answer to this question, how can the delegates even begin to vote intelligently? Though, as we have seen, the very rules of the elections leave them with little potential impact.

We know that there were about 48,000 adult Baha'is with good addresses in the US in 1978. There are now about 60,000. In the meantime 12,000 Iranians immigrated. This means that there has been no growth in over twenty years. None. Of course, hundreds if not a few thousands of people have come in during the past two decades, but enormous numbers of them have gone right back out. Would any CEO who had not increased his earnings a single penny over twenty years be reappointed by the board?

The exclusivistic policies of Mr. Henderson, who is frankly mean-spirited, have contributed enormously to this Great Stagnation. He was the one who cracked down on Dialogue magazine in such a nasty way. He bullied Baha'i travel agents in 1991, for the Lord knows what reward from the corrupt Corporate Travel Consultants. He agitated behind the scenes for a crackdown on talisman@indiana.edu. He has chased travel teachers out of the country, seeing them as an electoral threat should they become successful. I have no idea about the propriety of Jim Nelson's book-keeping practices, but surely for Henderson to publicly smear him after Jim served on the NSA 1971-1999, in circumstances where Nelson cannot even publicly defend himself, is the height of sleaze. Henderson has arranged for himself to live rent free free in a 9-bedroom mansion (having the Bourgeois studio knocked down to build it, against UHJ instructions) with free Baha'i maids and gardeners, and his main business seems to be bullying Baha'is into silence behind the scenes. And I fully acknowledge that he is probably acting rationally given the way the Baha'i system is structured.

So, I think all these things are related: the fact that the Baha'i faith in the US has been going nowhere fast for decades; the fact that the electoral system seems to elect the ambitious and greedy (and paranoid) to the top offices; the fact that even initially upright people are made perpetual incumbents, exposing them to the temptations of absolute power held for decades and corrupting them; the fact that the electoral system provides an incentive for the incumbents to slap down and chase out potential competitors; the fact that it would not be in the incumbents' interest for the faith to expand, become more open, attract a lot of new voters who might rock the boat.

Term limits would go a long way toward solving all these problems. In fact, why not have staggered elections for 4-year terms? You could elect 5 members in 2000 and 4 in 2002. People who don't serve as long as Nelson did might not become tempted to act high-handedly. They wouldn't face reelection and so would have no reason to fear being unseated by active young folks.

Counselor Fred Schechter, one of the people who falsely accused me, once told a friend of mine that anyone who becomes active in the faith will be attacked (by the faith's officials, it is implied). We hadn't at the time realized that Schechter intended to act on this observation!

This is a dysfunctional system, folks. There are ways in which it destroyed Dan Jordan (forcing him to live a lie and to resort to secret trysts), Allen Ward, and now Jim Nelson—not to mention the spiritual harm it has wreaked on the Baby Boom intellectuals who were enticed in with promises of tolerance and justice (!!!).

When Glenford Mitchell had become a huge pain in the ass as NSA secretary and was finally elected off it to the UHJ, everyone breathed a big sigh of relief. And when Henderson came in, the word was that he was a good guy, and we were all relieved. And then in a few short years he demonstrated that he was an even bigger pain in the ass than Mitchell had been. Even dumping Henderson wouldn't solve the problem. The system creates the Hendersons and the Nelsons. If anyone cared about the fortunes of the faith as opposed to the size of their marble offices, they would fix the system.

Bahai hypocrisy over The Exiling of the Palestinian People

The Exiling of the Palestinian People

“When the Zionists decided to found an independent Jewish state on Palestinian territory, one of the first problems they faced was the small size of the Jewish population living there. In the early 1900s, Jews constituted less than 10 percent of the population of Palestine. Thanks to the efforts of the Zionists, the number of Jewish migrants, 100,000 in the 1920s, reached 232,000 in the 1930s according to official figures. By 1939 there were 445,000 Jews out of a total population of 1.5 million. From representing 10 percent of the population just two decades before, they now constituted 30 percent by 1939. Jewish settlement areas were also expanded in line with the rise in population. By 1939 the land owned by Jews had doubled in comparison to the 1920s. By 1947, there were 630,000 Jews in Palestine and 1.3 million Palestinians. Between the partitioning of Palestine by the United Nations on November 29, 1947 and the founding of the state of Israel on May 15, 1948, the Israelis acquired a substantial part of Palestinian lands. As a result of pressure and killing in Palestinian villages, the number of Palestinians living in some 500 cities, towns and villages fell from 950,000 to 138,000. A great number of these people had been killed, and others were exiled. The Zionist terror groups that would later form the Israeli Army attacked Muslim villages at night. Muslims were shot, and everywhere these groups passed through was burned and destroyed. By these means, some 400 Palestinian villages were wiped off the map in 1948 and 1949. The property left behind by the Palestinians was taken over by the Jews by virtue of the Absentee Property Law. Until 1947, Jewish land ownership in Palestine was some 6%. By the time the state was formally established, it had sequestered 90% of the land.⁹ The Palestinian Arabs were left with just two separate areas, the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. <http://www.harunyahya.com/spring04.php>

In 1937 the Baha'is owned one million dollars' worth of property on Mount Carmel. (see evidence enclosed below) .Today that could be as much as one billion. After 1948 the local Arab Palestinians were exiled by force and their land and property confiscated by the Jews who in turn sold some of these properties to the Baha'is in Haifa and Acca. Surely many readers would agree Christ (or the Muslim Madhi or Quam) would not return in the form of Baha'u'llah to do such a prejudiced discriminating deed on his people, as has happened to the poor sad Palestinian people since the Jews laid claim to their land in 1948.

“The Bahá'ís own one million dollars' worth of property on Mount Carmel, one quarter of this is owned by the American N.S.A., about 35 acres. Muhammad Ali's son, Moussa Bahá'í, had to sign all the deeds which went to America as he is on the land commission. When they wanted to transfer the property in the name of the N.S.A. of America, through a power of attorney, Moussa Bahá'í said the N.S.A. was not recognized legally in Palestine. Shoghi Effendi went to a lawyer, who recommended forming a Palestine Branch. A new power of attorney was sent and the property transferred. This pilgrim house (Western) belongs to the N.S.A. of America, also a plot of land near Akka. Shoghi Effendi's plan is to have all the N.S.A.'s of the Bahá'í world own property here on Mount Carmel. This will impress the authorities and protect the property. The “endowments of the Bahá'í Faith in America” would be a better name than “property of.” There are National, International and local endowments. The endowments here in Haifa (Akka, etc.,) are International. The Temple, etc. is a National endowment, and local endowments must also be obtained. http://bahai-library.com/?file=maxwell_haifa_notes.html&chapter=2

In Abdu'l-Baha's & Shoghi Effendi's time there was not enough housing accommodation for 900 Baha'is who work at the BWC as there is today. It was only after the Guardian died in 1957 and the UHJ was formed in 1963 did the Administration start buying up property to house the expanding workers and staff. Most of the property which house these 900 Baha'i workers today was purchased from the Jews who had confiscated it from the exiled Palestinians.

The Jews in Haifa built new homes with the profits from selling some old Palestinian property to the Baha'is for the new incoming Russian Jew immigrants to Haifa. The Russian Jewish immigrants only lived in some of these old Palestinian apartment buildings (for an interim period) until new accommodation was built for them. Some of these apartment buildings still lie vacant today they had to be kept for returning Palestinians as the property rightly belonged to them. But that all looks about to change as George Bush has agreed with Sharon only yesterday to not let any Palestinians back to live in Israel. So the Jews will start selling more of this property now to the Baha'is who will only be too happy to gobble up as much real estate as they can in Haifa and Acca.

Below are some facts about Haifa most Baha'is never hear about.

“There are numerous old Palestinian apartment buildings that are still standing in Haifa and vacant. These cities are central to Palestinian culture and history. Accommodating returnees in the major Palestinian cities will greatly contribute to the resolution of the conflict. If Palestinians continue to be barred from these cities they will remain a painful thorn in Palestinian memory and history that will threaten stability.”

“The Palestinian Arabs within Israel made up the majority of inhabitants of Palestine before to 1948. As a result of the war of 1948 and the establishment of the State of Israel, 84% of the Palestinian population” were exiled and became refugees <http://www.arabhra.org/article26/general.htm>

“I have cousins in Beirut, in Syria, in Saudi Arabia, in all the countries of the world. It is their right to return to their country and homeland. The son of Haifa has the right to return to his town. ... The person who comes from America or Russia has the right to live in Haifa and Tel Aviv, and the true son of Haifa and Tel Aviv remains homeless and exiled. Is this justice? Where is justice? Would you accept that for yourself? Would Bush accept this? <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/holy/onground/pales.html>

1948 March 22.

Palestine today had one of its ugly days of violence in Haifa, Jews blew up two areas in the Arab quarter, killing 17 and injuring another 150. Chronical of the 20th century (by Jacques Legrand 1988)

How could you make a sustainable solution out of telling Palestinians exiled from Haifa and Jaffa that they could “return” only to Jericho and Nablus? <http://www.yaledailynews.com/articlefunctions/Printerfriendly.asp?AID...>

May I ask, does your prophet Baha’u’llah (Second coming of Christ) find the interpretation in the Christian Gospels to support this?

Future Baha'i (inspired) Government in Iran

by Ravian Bilani 27-Jun-2009

Baha'ism has set forth a system of civil government. Claiming to be a revelation from God, it has enunciated the laws and regulations of the future State. It approves of constitutional monarchy as the best form of government, and permits republics. But this monarchy will be limited not so much by its constitution as by the law of Baha'ism and its hierarchy. Baha, in the "Kitab-ul-Akdas," the Book of Laws, directs that Baitul Adl, houses of justice, be established in every place, with nine or more members, all Baha'i men, who shall be Trustees of the Merciful, Administrators for God. In the thirteenth, of the "Glad Tidings" he says:

"The affairs of the people are placed in charge of the men of the House of Justice. They are daysprings of command (divine agents, representatives of God). They may execute what they deem advisable. It is incumbent upon all to obey them. Their souls will be inspired with divine aspiration. God will inspire them with what He willeth."

With them will lie the interpretation of points of doctrine. They must decree and judge according to Baha'i revelation. "They must gaze day and night towards that which hath been revealed from the horizon of the Supreme Pen." They shall rule by divine right. Their authority shall be absolute. Abdul Baha restates the words of Baha: [n 1 "The House of Justice must be obeyed in all things." "It is the centre of true government." "The Law of God will be invested in them, and they will render decisions." "All judgment will be from the standpoint of God's laws." "Its decisions and commands will be guarded from mistake. It will have conferred upon it infallibility." The House of Justice will have local councils, national ones, and an international one. Of the latter, Abdul Baha said in an address in New York:

"A universal or world House of Justice shall be organized. That which it orders shall be the Truth in explaining the commands of Baha'u'llah and shall be obeyed by all. All men shall be under its supervision."

Its functions are not confined to matters of faith, for Abdul Baha continues: "The House of Justice is endowed with a political as well as a religious aspect.

It embodies both aspects, and is protected by the preserving power of Baha'u'llah himself." In the political aspect it will be supreme. "The separation of the Religion and the State can only be temporary," says Dreyfus, "a momentary stage. For the present the two spheres are separate. When Baha'ism triumphs they will be united." "The House of Justice will have under its control almost the whole administration, and naturally will take the place of our municipal councils. Such has been Baha Ullah's intention. Further he clearly aims not only at a municipal House of Justice, but also at a legislative one, sitting as a national parliament and as an international tribunal." Remember that all the members are to be Baha'is. So Remey says, "There will be a union of Religion and the State — the governments of the nations. The material laws of men will be founded and enforced according to" Baha'ism. In this politico-religious regime, the political will be subject to the religious. "The kings and rulers of the world," says Abdul Baha, "will find their true authority under the rulings of the House of Justice. It will decide between kings and kings." Baha addressed letters to kings with arrogant assumption of authority to control the civil powers.

The Houses of Justice will have large financial powers. They shall inherit all property of those dying without heirs, and one-third of that of those dying childless. One-third of all fines for crimes shall go to them. For example, in case of murder, two-thirds of the blood money shall go to the family of the murdered and one-third to the House of Justice. A tithe of nineteen-hundredths shall be given into their hands. They shall act as trustees for minors and incapables, and as a Poor Board.

They shall have civil jurisdiction, "to settle material difficulties between believers," for the protection of men, for the preservation of human honour. "If any man refuses to educate his children, the House of Justice shall do it at his expense," and "shall order all the negligent to pay" and use police powers to enforce it.

They must also interpret and administer criminal law, for Baha has "revealed" a code of laws and regulations concerning material as well as spiritual things. Abdul Baha says, "The revelations of Baha'u'llah contain all the great laws of social government." "The laws cover all points and questions of national administration." For example, in the "Kitab-ul-Akdas," the punishment for theft is prescribed: for the first offense, exile; for the second, imprisonment; for the third, branding "thief" on the forehead, "lest other countries accept him." For adultery a fine is to be paid to the House of Justice, and for the second offense, double of the fine. Arson is made punishable by burning, etc. This fiat legislation of Baha'u'llah is to be imposed upon the parliaments of all nations. "All legislative and administrative functions," says Dreyfus, "shall assume a sacred character" under the control of the Baha'i House of Justice.

In brief, Baha'ism would set up in each town, in every country, ruling councils, and a central one universal in its sway, composed entirely of Baha'is, clothed with supreme authority, because God-given, over kings, parliaments, and peoples; councils infallible and absolute, superior to appeal or protest; deciding and exacting obedience in every department of the life of humanity — religious, domestic, social, educational, financial, judicial, and political. It would be not an imperium in imperia, but an Empire over all. It would be a priestcraft [2] such as the world has not yet seen—a religious-political regime in which kings and presidents will go not to Canossa but to Acca, and alike hold the stirrups of Baha'i justices, and laws of parliaments will be subject to revision and veto by the Baha'i House. In it is the certainty of priestly oppression when fallible men set up their judgment as God's. The Baha'is claim to have no priests and no hierarchy. It is a question of names. Their system and laws contain the real thing, full-fledged, men mediating God's will. We may call it a Baha'iarchy, if they prefer.

Abdul Baha, recognizing the objections that will be made to the political functions of the Baha'i justices, and foreseeing difficulty with Governments, has, for the time being, directed that in America and Europe the name "House of Spirituality" or "House of Consultation" be used. But change of name does not alter the reality or change the "revelation" of Baha. The House of Justice (central) is to be set up when Abdul Baha dies, and it will assume its functions gradually as opportunity and expediency demand. Already orders have gone forth prohibiting the interpretation of the words of Baha or personal expositions of them. Already the fiat has interdicted the publication, by a Baha'i, of a tract, book, or translation on the Baha'i religion without submitting it to the censor at Acca.

The effect of the working of the Baha'i system may be realized by imagining it as set up in Persia. Suppose, for example, that the small minority of Baha'is now in Persia should become a majority, with a Baha'i Shah. Baha'ism would become the established religion. "Houses of Justice" would come into operation. What of those who remain Moslems and Christians? Fortunately Baha has abolished the law of the Bab that required their expulsion from the chief provinces of Persia and the confiscation of their property. But either the other religions must be judged by Baha'i courts, or separate courts must be set up for them. This would perpetuate the double system of courts, the urfi or civil and the shari or religio-civil courts. The latter would be entirely Baha'i and either lording it over or in conflict with the civil administration. This would be a continuation of the present confusion of Persian conditions, only with the Baha'is in control. What might the minority expect? The oppressions and anathemas received by the old Baha'is from the followers of Abdul Baha Abbas give the answer. Fortunately for the world, the universal reign of Baha'ism is not to be realized, neither is the prophecy of Abdul Baha to be fulfilled which says "that the flag of Baha'u'llah will overcome every other flag and all rulers will do homage to it."

Introducing the Baha'i Jewish Lobby

The anti-Iranian nature of the missionary affair continues to reverberate within the Iranian Baha'i community. Iran has been the cradle of this British manufactured, Zionist supported cult from the very beginning. Most of its adherents have come from Iran. In fact, for all their posturing that they have managed to convert large populations in the Third World – and who for some reason can't actually be found any rolls –, no other country in the world has been so receptive to the Baha'i idea than Iranians and particularly Iranian Jews.

These days, predominantly of former Jewish and sometimes Zoroastrian backgrounds, the current make up of Baha'is in Iran is vastly different to what it was in the late nineteenth century. The Baha'i faith lost its appeal to the mainstream Iranian community in the early 1900s during the Constitutional Revolution when Abbas Effendi not only failed to support the constitutional movement, but tacitly even supported the Russian involvement in Iranian internal politics and its sponsoring of Muhammad Ali Shah's coup d'etat against the Parliament and people of Iran. Later in the mid 1950s Shoghi Effendi directly instructed Iranian Baha'is to work closely with the Pahlavi regime, ergo Habib Sabet. The exodus of Baha'is from Muslim backgrounds resulted in the reduction in the intellectual output of the community.

Coupled with that came the influx of new believers from these Iranian Jewish and Zoroastrian minorities. The new believers had been under persecution in their respective religions and saw the new faith as an opportunity to exert control over others. Introducing the powerful Baha'i "Jewish" Lobby.

Brought together by their dislike of Muslim influences on Iranian culture, the Jewish Baha'is began to gradually purge the Iranian Baha'i community from its Islamic roots and origins. This can be witnessed in their whitewashings of the militant Shi'ite and Babi past.

This agenda fitted well with Shoghi Effendi's vision of abandoning Iran in favour of exporting the cult to other parts of the world. With the death of Shoghi Effendi in 1957 and the rise of the new UHJ oligarchy, the new Jewish (and sometimes Zoroastrian) adherents were quickly promoted through the ranks to high places within the Iranian and International Baha'i communities. Key members of the Iranian NSA and continental Board of Counsellors came from this new ethnic grouping in the Baha'i cult. Following the 1979 revolution, most of the Jewish Baha'i elite migrated to Western Europe and California, USA, where their monies helped buy properties for the AO. The completion of the ARC project is owed to a large part to donations given from these two groups. Several confidential trips by UHJ members Fatheazam and Nakhjavani to LA and Australia in 1989 ensured that all the monies required for the ARC were secured from these groups. In fact the whole of these monies had been raised long before the advertising campaign for fundraising ever begun, much of through their own investments, with smatterings of large grants and subsidies given them by the Israeli government.

During the late 80s and early 90s many of the donators and their relatives were rewarded by the BWC by being nominated to key positions on the Continental Board and the ITC. In fact a quick scan of existing Counsellors in Europe, Australia and North America since 1985 suggests that former Zoroastrians and Jews have done quite well in this regard, but not their Muslim background counterparts.

The UHJs decision to adopt a more rabid form of fundamentalism and hardline position in 1996 bode well for the Baha'i Jews especially.

They were the ones that successfully lobbied the UHJ to: 1) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to attend Naw-Ruz celebrations by Iranian exile communities; 2) Instruct Iranian Baha'is not to associate with the general Iranian community in exile, thereby attempting to foist a Baha'i-only - rather than a universally Iranian – Naw-Ruz culture.

Counsellor Manijeh Reyhani, for example, who was instrumental in getting Hamid Taheri excommunicated comes from a dual Zoroastrian and Jewish background. These people control the Payam-i Bahai magazine (run by '60s-'70s Pahlavi insider Shapour Rasekh a.k.a. Delaram Mashhuri), the Andalib magazine, and, until its demise Landegg in Switzerland, as well as Radio Bahai (broadcasting in Persian), not to mention composition of the Ruhi modules.

Iran has always been rich in supplying and exporting Baha'i travel teachers around the world. The Baha'i Jewish lobby now wants to dominate and silence the mainstream Iranian Baha'i community by exporting their hyper-fundamentalist reading of the cult into Iran. They have funded companies and businesses through the missionaries in order to "teach the youth" and set up Ruhi Institutes. The Baha'i community in Iran has suffered enormously at the hands of the Islamic regime. It has lost some of its most charismatic Baha'i intellectuals like the Bakhtavars or Davudis. The present elite leadership is exclusively made up of former Jews. There are deep divisions in the community and some of the truly learned ones have boycotted the current crop of leaders and their activities.

So this latest effort to export missionaries is aimed at demonstrating "the correct version of the faith" to the rank and file at the same time isolating (and hopefully driving out) the voices of dissent. It is also a means, among others, by the Israelis to gain further footholds inside Iran itself. Both policies, it would appear, have now failed. The Iranian Baha'i community is racked with dissension and schism, and the IR finally blew its top (and reasonably so given all the freedoms they had given the Baha'is since the mid '90s) with this ridiculous allegation of genocide by the Jewish Baha'i leadership. One wonders if maybe deep down these Jewish Baha'is actually pray for a holocaust to occur in Iran so that they can politically capitalize on it for their future designs, just as their European Jewish counterparts vis-a-vis Palestine.

The Soviet system of Baha'i elections

Originally posted, here by ravi.kumar.7079@gmail.com

IT IS SELECTION NOT ELECTION

A. A study of Baha'i institution

Many control mechanisms relate to the electoral system and the realities of power are existing in the Baha'i community. Early Baha'is allowed nominations to be made for Baha'i office, and also allowed campaigning for Baha'i Institution. When early Baha'is asked 'Abdu'l-Baha, how they should conduct elections for local spiritual assemblies ? He replied that they should follow the rules for elections common in their own country ('Abdu'l-Baha 1908-1916: I,7).

Van den Hoonard points out that nominations and canvassing for Baha'i office were standard practice in North America in the time of 'Abdu'l-Baha (van den Hoonard 1996:157-158).

Baha'i Institutions abolished the practice of nominations and campaigning for elective Baha'i office in accordance with Iranian Baha'i practice. Although ending these practices appears to have a reason, as the community grew, it became impossible for Baha'i elective institutions to have a control over the elections and to bring only those candidates whom they rely and decide.

CRITICISM OF BAHAI INSTITUTIONS BY A BAHAI IS CONSIDERED AN ACT OF "COVENANT BREAKING".

Criticism of Baha'i institutions by a Baha'i is considered an act of "Covenant Breaking" and is often branded a "dishonest attack" on the Baha'i faith, punishable by shunning. After a vote has been taken, all the members of the Baha'i community must support the result, and defeated minorities may not continue to criticize. This theory of political behavior denies the need for checks and balances.

The placing of elected bodies above public criticism and the silencing of defeated minorities has had predictable effects at the national level.

BAHA'I ELECTIONS ARE INFECT SELECTIONS

BAHA'I ELECTORAL RESULTS ARE SKEWED IN THREE WAYS.

First The National Spiritual Assembly enjoys all the advantages of controlling the image of potential NSA members in the national newspaper, The Baha'i News India (an organ of the N.S.A.), sending these incumbents to local communities, and sending members around to conferences, which enhances their visibility (all this is paid for out of the national Baha'i fund). These advantages of incumbency are especially very useful in a system where no campaigning for office by others is allowed.

Second The sitting members often promote close associates onto the body, "flying them around to conferences," appointing them to high-powered national committees, and giving them prominence at important events. Since speaking openly about candidates is not allowed, subtle non-verbal signals have taken on extreme importance for delegates, who seem willing to be guided by the incumbents in these indirect ways.

So the future members of the NSA is made a part of an orchestra conducted by the N.S.A Formally approved by Universal House of Justice and supported by the Continental Counselor present in the Convention.

Third Some campaigns are launched by unannounced candidates who go about the country giving talks. Such informal campaigning, the National Spiritual Assembly occasionally stops by ordering the person's talks cancelled, or, if chairmanship of a national committee is becoming a platform for popularity, by firing the individual.

Baha'is call these manipulation of elections, as divinely inspired. Control Mechanisms and Sanctions.

Baha'i leaders employ a number of important control mechanisms to control the Baha'is. These include removal of voting rights, shunning, demands for sticking to traditions, accusations of "weakness in the covenant," informing and surveillance, and various forms of censorship. Many of these tools are employed basically against persons who are somehow prominent or appear to have leadership potential but do not seem easy for incumbents to control, or against intellectuals

The prohibition of nominations and campaigning leads administrators to feel a need for strict controls on Baha'i discourse, and often to the avoidance of even mentioning leaders by name in public, which would be considered as "backbiting."

The ban on campaigning leads to a situation where a great deal of suspicion falls on any active intellectual not directly controlled by the N.S.A. Great suspicion attaches to any Baha'i teacher or lecturer who is not an elected or appointed official and is thought to be "gaining a following."

B. A study of Indian Baha'i Institution

National Convention

Delegates Till about 1986 there were about 171 delegates, courtesy Oliyai Family. These delegates were in accordance with the paper Baha'is projected by the Oliyai family which controlled the NSA elections. False statistics were given by which a large number of delegates were procured. These delegates were given free Delhi trip and free lodging and boarding and were asked to vote for particular candidates. One of the delegate reported "While all of us were coming from Gwalior in a Jeep for National Convention, one of the delegates said," Nissan Oliyai is a very good boy, vote for him."

Many of the decisions of the NSA were taken outside NSA as Oliyai family enjoyed the majority. A set of decisions were made and it was circulated amongst their friends to finally approve them in the meeting.

Once the members were of no use they were dropped from the NSA list in the next elections. Mr. Bargawa in 1972 Mr. Khare in 1986 Mr. & Mrs. Gandhi in 2000 Mr. Khemani in 2000 Mr. Shah in 2003

Later on the UHJ cut short the number of delegates from 171 to 38 to cut Oliyai family to size, but HOUSE failed miserably. Letter of Universal House of Justice dated 20th September 1988 The allocation of 38 delegates to India is a temporary measure. {11th meeting of NSA, 26th and 27th May 1993.}

Canvassing in the National Conventioni. A full scale canvassing is being done during the National convention, the NSA members show deep interest in the delegates enquiring about every minor and finer points of their states, to convey to the delegates that they are very true and faithful Baha'is and always wish for the development of the Faith in his state. This concern goes down till the Ballot paper. And once the Election is over, everything is backed to original state.

ii. Some of the members although unable to pronounce clearly Allahabha use to greet every delegate with a loud welcome of ALLAHUABHA. To show that they are completely PERSIANISED.

iii. The NSA members also do not fail in giving treats to the delegates of ICE CREAMS, who under ordinary days will not even bother to glance at them.

iv. The consultation during conventions are a major platform to project the Candidates for the NSA election. All the speeches are occupied by outgoing NSA members where they leave no stone unturned to show that they are the one "Human with potentials" and deserved to become the NSA members.

v. Although Hindi is the Mother Tongue of a large number of the delegates, the NSA members will give big speeches in English, which is not even understood by a large number of delegates, but English is the effective way of proving that they are PERSONS WITH CAPACITY

vi. The NSA also decides during the year to have meetings in different states. This is just a publicity stunt and to impress the delegates who will be attending the convention.

False Voting

A teller reported that a number of Ballot papers are received by post with the same name repeated in the same order showing that the source of all these ballot papers are one

The total numbers of delegates present in the convention were 17. The total number of ballots received and counted were 33.

All these is well known by the Counsellor present in the convention. It all takes place with the effective approval of the UHJ as they do not want any unapproved member on NSA.

UHJ interference in elections

Many a times the appointment of Chairman, Secretary and Treasurer came from UHJ, there was no election, only selection, but it was announced as election of the office bearers. It was clear that the House was very interested in appointment of certain member as a Treasurer.

Many a times Members of the House attended the NSA of India meeting and requested certain members to resign.

Present Scenario

The UHJ controls every bit of NSA members and their decisions

Mr. Payman Mohajir is the person responsible for India. He is in direct contact with Mrs. Farideh Vahidi who cares a damn not only to the various departments of NSA but also to her host Country. When one of the employees of the Baha'i House, who was unjustly removed after his long years of services asked her to follow the law of the Land, She said I care a damn about your Country and its Laws.

The election of Mrs. Sorabji is actually an election of Mr. Sorabji. It should be known that a non-Baha'i Mr. Sorabji is more useful to the Faith than Mrs. Sorabji. As amount of power he yields in the Government.

Mr. Sohail Mohajir, Yes the Surname matters a lot to UHJ.

So the main decision taker is UHJ through Mr. Payman Mohajir supported by Mrs. Vahidi, Mrs. Sorabji Mrs. Nazneen Rohani and ofcourse one can take Mr. Mohajir for granted because of his surname.

To put aside any discrepancies Mr. Satnam is appointed as the consultant showing the real position of Indian counselors.

Not to mention all other members NSA are just a show piece. Congrats to Mr. Sarwal and Dr. Ansari for their self respect.

The Claims and actions of Babis and Baha'is

The claims of Bahaullah.

He considers Bab as his herald. But is he the “Man Yazharahullaho”?

He considered himself a prophet (God Passes By).

He claims to be God.

“There is no God but Me, the Honoured, the Wise.” (Kitabe Aqdas, page 42)

“Take what the Ancient Hand gives you.” (Kitabe Aqdas, page 96)

“There is no God but Me, the securer, the regulator. Certainly We have sent the prophets and revealed the books.” (Kitabe Aqdas, page 58)

“The God of eternity is in the prison.” (Iqtedarat page 36)

“Everything other than Me is created by My command.” (Kitabe Mobeen)

“I am the Greatest Branch (Abdul Baha) without any partners.” (Behjatus Sudoor)

“We Bahais are certain of the eternal beauty.” (Behjatus Sudoor page 217)

“Surely I am God. There is no God but me, the Lord of all things. Everything other than Me is My creation, then O My creation you worship Me.” (Tajalliyate Baha, Tajalli 4)

Baha considers himself to be a Worthless Ant (Asare Kalame Aala vol.4 page 364)

So many personalities in a single person! This is truly fantastic.

Was Bahaullah mentally unstable when he made all (in one) claims!!!

Apart from those discussed above there are yet five principles:

Equality between men and women: This statement is just to please women and in reality is just hogwash.

Let us review some Bahai rules about gender equality

No women are included in the 9-member Universal House of Justice (UHJ) with the sole exception of the widow of Shoghi Affendi. Why only this lady is included? Is she not a normal woman!

The shroud to be given by the eldest male child. Women are disallowed.

Dower to be given to women only.

Polygamy is acceptable but polyandry is banned.

If a man wishes to travel he should inform his wife of the time duration, which if exceeds nine months the lady has right to remarry. Then if the husband does not specify the time of his journey the wife should wait for him all her life.

Maintenance of women is obligatory on the man.

Only women should attend to the household chores.

No Hajj for women. Nor are they expected to keep the fasts lapsed during the days of menstruation. Why? Tahera Qazvini sanctified her life for Bahaullah but her grave is not included in the Hajj. Why was her body not brought to Akka like others?

The house and the clothes of a deceased are the sole property of the eldest male child and nothing is there for women. Is this not inequality?

Equality and justice for one and all. Firstly this is not a new principle – rather all religions and societies aim for its achievement. Secondly, it is important to see how have the Bahais interpreted this.

The Bahais killed Mohammad Ibrahim by throwing him into the river Tigris for not believing in Bahaullah's call. (The Book of Haji Maftoon, page 23).

They tried to assassinate Nasiruddin Shah the king of Iran.

Bahaullah killed one hundred and thirty people in one night and plundered their belongings (Nuktatul Qaf page 161).

Bahauallah ill treated his brother Subhe Azal and Abdul Baha did worse to his brother Mohammad Ali.

Let us now see the Babi teachings in this regard. Babis! God has made war obligatory upon you. Capture cities and people for Babism (Bayan chapter 1)

Do not let those who do not believe in the Bayan remain on the earth (Bayan chapter 1)

Snatch the wealth of those who do not believe in the Bayan (Bayan Arabic chapter 5)

Rejectors of Bab! Even if you take bath 1000 times in a day, you shall remain unclean.((Bayan chapter 2)

Whatever belongings of the non-Babis come into possession of the Babis they become clean (Bayan chapter 4)

Illegal sale of Alcohol at Baha'i Center-A Report

Attention All Units!

Wait til they find out about IMBRA and other Tahirih Justice Center crime spree!

“Being a Bahai is stressful enough, especially when you don’t know exactly when the takeover is going to happen! Bahais don’t believe in drinking alcohol or at least that’s what we tell everybody. The truth is that we are such lushes, we want ALL the liquor for ourselves as long as somebody else pays for it! If we could just get some of the damn booze Layli Miller-Muro is hogging for the politicians and herself, we wouldn’t need to break no stinking laws. License? We Bahais don’t need no stinking license!”

Monday, November 19, 2007 4:52 PM Police Confiscate Illegal Alcohol BY POLICE MEDIA UNIT

Police at Central Station and Liquor Licensing Squad are investigating an incident of the illegal sale of alcohol at BAHAI CENTRAL last Thursday.

Police attended a residence at BAHAI and discovered that the resident owner was selling alcohol without a license.

During the operation, police have confiscated LARGE QUANTITIES of various types of alcohol, including: cartons of SB, cartons of Solbrev, cartons of Saratoga, cartons of Ice House, cartons of Scotch Cola, cartons of Red Horse, bottles Rum, bottles of premium Whiskey, bottles of Frigate rum, a bottle of Captain Morgan and bottles of premium Vodka.

The Officer in Charge of the SIPF Liquor Licensing Squad said that illegal selling of alcohol is a serious crime and members of the public should consider the legal consequences of such an act.

“To sell liquor in the Solomon Islands, you must have a license. It is illegal to sell alcohol without a license and police are working very hard to stop this from happening,” he said.

Police seized the alcohol and the seller will be charged on a later date.

Investigation is continuing.

Ayyam-i-Ha or Ayyam-i-Dal ??!-Stupidity of 19 days months

The Baha'i calendar has 19 Months of 19 days each, totalling 361 days in a year + the intercalary days (Ayyam-i-Ha). Only a leap year has 366 days. Obviously Husayn 'Ali Nuri (Baha) could not count properly because any solar intercalary calculation would make those days Ayyam-i-Dal (i.e. the days to the calculation of the letter dal, 'd', letter dal = 4) not Ha (letter ha = 5). Ayyam-i-Ha would technically only occur for the leap years not the normal years. So much for the 'supreme manifestation of the day' who could not even count properly!

Baha'i Faith is at a stage, which can see its utter extinction

Written by a very depressed Baha'i :

Do you guys not realize that the leaders of the Baha'i Faith, the people sitting on top of the Carmel Mount, don't know that Baha'i Faith is at a stage, which can see its utter extinction? They know.

What else are they to do? The Bab is gone. Baha'u'llah is gone. Abdul'-Baha is gone. Shoghi Effendi is gone. There is no-one left to lead the Faith. Even Shoghi Effendi didn't know what to do to preserve the Baha'i Faith, once Abdu'l-Baha passed. Don't you think he was afraid? Very afraid?

And its running out of gas. The vision of the Bab... can we let it die with Him? What about Baha'u'llah.... just writing His name moves me. I support the House is all they do.. and command you all to follow in my footsteps.

If we splinter off... let our egos start to take over – ‘hey, I want to run something’ will Baha'u'llah disappear forever.

Baha'u'llah will disappear.

Some Unanswered Questions about Baha'i Faith

Today, I don't believe Baha'u'llah's was who he claimed to be. As for his purposes I can only judge them by being able to read different opinions from others, which I was unable to read prior to coming on the internet. I believe many western converts to Baha'ism are ignorant (of the Christian Bible) like I was when I first became a member and are easily tricked into joining this nice so called religion wanting Unity for all. But even in my ignorance I knew something was drastically wrong.

Here are some views I questioned when still a Baha'i but found no Baha'is willing to discuss it. All I got was a wall of silence in my community.

Baha'u'llah taught that while normal human beings have two natures (physical reality and rational soul), the manifestations of God have a third nature (the spirit and attributes of God reflected in them). The same spirit of God (although not the same as the Holy Spirit in Christianity) is said to have dwelt within each manifestation, which is why Baha'u'llah claimed to be the return of Christ.

If this is so, how could two different manifestations of God live in the same era of history? Not only were Buddha and Confucius contemporaries (both lived between about 550-480 B.C.), but Baha'u'llah was a disciple of the Bab. Did each of these men only have half of this spirit, or are there two different spirits? Baha'is reject both of these options. The Bab said of He whom God will manifest whose coming he foretold, Were He to appear this very moment, I would be the first to adore Him, and the first to bow down before Him. Yet Baha'u'llah was regularly near the Bab, yet the Bab did not recognize Baha'u'llah as this manifestation, and there is no suggestion that he ever bowed down before him.

'Abdu'l-Baha' said that the physical universe has neither beginning nor end. Baha'u'llah taught this too, but he also declared that God created all things out of utter nothingness. Obviously both cannot be true. But if the Baha'is hold that the universe has eternally existed, this violates their basic principle that religion cannot contradict science. The second law of thermodynamics says that the universe is running out of usable energy, hence it could not have been here forever or it would have already spent itself. It must have had a beginning in a moment of time, brought into existence by God.

Baha'is also believe in a form of macro evolution, but they do not believe that man evolved from species of animals. 'Abdu'l-Baha' said that while man may have existed in the form of animals which changed and progressed to the present state, he was always by nature the human species, distinct from animals. In this attempt to reconcile the pseudo-scientific theory of evolution with the belief in a Creator the Baha'is contradict both the Bible and the widely propagated Darwinian view of evolution. We know that each species of plant and animal has a unique, unchanging DNA code. Therefore a dog cannot give birth to a monkey, and a monkey cannot produce a human being. And the Bible affirms that plants and animals were created according to their kind, with man being created separate and distinct from them, in the image of God (Gen. 1-2).

One of the greatest contradictions within the teachings of Baha'u'llah is the fundamental principle that religious truth is not absolute, but relative. This means that the truth which a manifestation teaches may later be contradicted by another manifestation, yet the teachings of each manifestation were true for his time. Baha'u'llah may have thought that this was a solution to the insurmountable problem of vast differences among the doctrines of the religions of the world, but this concept is self-defeating. The statement religious truth is relative must be a religious truth, since it was uttered by Baha'u'llah who, as a manifestation of God, claimed to be infallible. If his statement religious truth is relative is absolute, then the statement religious truth is relative cannot be true. If, however, his statement is relative (i.e. true only some of the time), then his statement is not universally true in all times and in all places, meaning that absolute revelation does indeed exist. Either way, this doctrine of relative revelation is false.

This revelation by Baha'u'llah by itself condemns him as a false prophet to be avoided by those who seek truth (Deut. 18:22).

White, Ruth. Abdul Baha's Questioned Will and Testament. Beverly Hills: White, 1946:

"The scientific indications are that the will of Abdu'l-Baha is not genuine. Also, from the spiritual viewpoint, there are overwhelming indications that it is not genuine, as it contradicts the teachings of both Baha'u'llah and of Abdu'l-Baha. But whether the alleged will of Abdu'l-Baha is authentic or spurious, the results of the administration of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is stand as an historical indictment against them. They no more represent the Bahai Religion than the bigots of the dark ages of Christianity" (11-12).

"One of these actions is the trade marking of the name "Baha'?" in 1928. This is the same as if one sect within Christianity had tried to trade mark the name "Christian." In their application for the trade mark they described themselves as the "National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is of the United States and Canada, a common-law corporation, organized and operated under declaration of trust and doing business at . . ." This trademark was later pronounced invalid by the court when the Assembly instituted two law-suits, during 1941, against two well-known Bahais, to prevent them, or anyone else, from spreading the Bahai teachings except through their organization. Of course the Assembly lost both suits and they were severely reprimanded by Judge Valente, who reminded them of the Bill of Rights, and pointed out that each one has a right to practice his religion unmolested by others.

"The Assembly of Baha'is use the assets that Baha'u'llah and Abdu'l-Baha built up by preaching some of their principles from the platform. But in private, after a person has joined the Assembly, that person is faced with the alternative of complying with the narrow, bigoted edicts of Shoghi Effendi and the Assembly, or of being excommunicated.

"For in the hands of Shoghi Effendi, and The National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, the great universal Baha Cause has been changed into a narrow bigoted sect and many of the tactics of the dark ages have been revived. This is what has happened to the religion that many leading thinkers of the day believe is the remedy for this age" (26).

"I also did a great deal of recollecting of events that had happened during our two visits to the home of Abdu'l-Baha, where I had an opportunity to see him in relation to his family and his "in-laws." The deductions that I made confirmed what Abdul-Baha had so often said—that the spiritual relationship was the real kinship, and not the physical. For his family, with the exception of his wife and sister, were the average types with a strong bent toward organized religion, whereas Abdu'l-Baha was universal, "super-racial and undogmatic." The world was his family. His loving care for his universal family was evident throughout his life, but at no time was it more evident than during the first world war and directly after it. He personally supervised vast agricultural projects at Tiberias and Adassieh, and he rationed and distributed the products that he cultivated, thereby saving thousands from starvation" (28-29).

"It is important for those who are interested in the Bahai Religion to free themselves from the idea that the family of Abdu'l-Baha is a "Holy Family." In fact his family, and "in-laws," with the exception of his wife and sister, were somewhat materialistic, and viewed the religion more or less as a little family affair with a strong bent toward organization. For years they have indoctrinated, more or less, the pilgrims who visited the home of Abdul-Baha, myself included, with this conception of religion. This partly nullified the great universal teachings. The result was that when Abdul-Baha passed from this world in November, 1921, some of his family, who had laid the ground-work for organization through these pilgrims while he was alive, hastened to establish it more firmly when he died. All this resulted in making the Bahai Movement, under the dictatorship of Shoghi Effendi, an organization which for narrowness and bigotry has no parallel in history except in the dark ages" (31). "Not until three years had elapsed after the alleged will had been read in 1922, were copies of it finally distributed, and then only to "old and recognized believers." I was among those who received a copy. But my stand continued to be one of "watchful waiting." This stand on my part caused me no embarrassment, inasmuch as I had never been a member of the Bahai organization, (Spiritual Assemblies of the Bahais). I knew that belonging to them meant conforming to the group repression and being shorn of the universal attitude which Abdu'l-Baha said is the essence of the Bahai Cause" (40).

"In May 1926 the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais incorporated the Bahai Cause, made the alleged will part of the by-laws, and proclaimed it an article of faith that Shoghi Effendi as the Guardian of the Bahai Cause must be obeyed in all things. The alleged will had never been examined by handwriting experts. by the powers granted in the alleged will, the Guardian collected large sums of money, and sent out various pleas for this purpose" (40).

"As Mr. Mountford Mills was one of the "well known Baha'is" who had gone to Palestine shortly after the passing of Abdu'l-Baha, I wrote to him asking him to give me what information he could concerning the alleged will. Mr. Mills, by the way, drew up the by-laws of the Bahai Cause, than which nothing could be more un-Bahai. although he is an exceptionally fine man, that did not interfere with his blindness. Just after he had drawn these by -laws, my husband and I had an interview with him, in which he said that he had recently finished reading 'Christianity Past and Present' by Charles Guinebert, and that if he had read it before drafting those by-laws the history of the Bahai Cause would have been different. In other words Mr. Mills deeply regretted his action" (45).

"Dr. Mitchell not only spent months examining the enlarged specimens submitted to him, but he examined minutely every line of the ten photographs of the alleged will, and his conclusion is that it is not written throughout by the same person. This fact, in addition to others, indicates that the will is spurious, especially if we bear in mind that Shoghi Effendi, and the Spiritual Assembly of Bahai's, assert that every word of it is written in the hand of Abdu'l-Baha. Also if we bear in mind that it is undated and unwitnessed, and that it contradicts the teachings that both Baha'u'llah and Abdu'l-Baha gave during their lifetimes—that the Bahai Cause is a spiritual democracy and not a theocracy. The appointment of an hereditary guardianship contradicts this” (69).

“Dr. Mitchell’s report also shows that none of the handwriting of the alleged will is the same as the authentic specimens of Abdu'l-Baha’s handwriting that were submitted to him” (69).

“Most persons are unaware of the fact that handwriting experts use modern inventions that measure the slants, the spaces, and the tremors of writing so accurately that it makes the difference between two specimens of different writing overwhelmingly apparent, when these are enlarged, even though one of the specimens may be so clever a forgery of the other as to appear identical to the naked eye” (69-70).

“Those Bahais who assert that they are familiar with the handwriting of Abdu'l-Baha, and have compared it with the writing of the will, and have found them identical, reveal the fact that they are either totally unaware of the science used by the best handwriting experts, or else fear has prompted them to assert their belief in the authenticity of the will—fear of being excommunicated if they so much as question the document. This science that the best handwriting experts use is so mathematically accurate that any number of experts using these modern inventions will arrive at the same results” (70).

“I have already referred to the extreme care that Abdu'l-Baha showed in regard to letters purporting to be from him, sent or brought to this country. The following instance shows that he was even more careful to make certain that any Tablet or document of his relating to important public matters was properly translated and authenticated before it was sent out. He wrote a Tablet to the Secretary of the Court for Durable Peace, at the Hague, on December 17, 1919, and he considered it necessary to have four men translate it. These four men were Shoghi Effendi (Rabbani), Dr. Zia M. Bagdadi, Mirza Lotfullah Hakim, and Dr. J. E. Esselmont. This Tablet was signed Abdu'l-Baha Abbas, and was published in the Star of the West (Bahai Magazine), August 1, 1920, with the four names of the translators and witnesses.”

“The quadruple witnessing of this Tablet, written two years before Abdu'l-Baha passed from this world, make it evident that he did not consider Shoghi Effendi careful enough, or efficient enough, to translate the Table to the Court of Durable Peace without the help of three other men. Is it likely, then, that at this very time and authentic will of Abdu'l-Baha’s, of infinitely greater importance than this Tablet to the Hague, should lay hidden in the earth, undated and unwitnessed, in which this same Shoghi Effendi was appointed sole guardian of the Bahai Cause, with more potential power and wealth than asking and pope combined? And that later this same will was translated by the one person only, the beneficiary himself—Shoghi Effendi. Is this in accordance with Abdu'l-Baha’s super-carefulness?” (70-71).

“Abdul Baha said that if an angel from heaven comes down and tries to change the teachings of Baha'u'llah, do not believe him. Shoghi Effendi has changed them by pronouncements and actions which are in direct contradiction to Bahai teachings—above all he has changed the very character and fundamental principle of the Cause by putting a theocracy, which the founders said it was not [boldface in original], in place of the spiritual democracy which they said, over and over again, it is. The following instances show what acceptance of the alleged will has done to the blind followers of its rules.”

“Mr. Horace Holley, as spokesman for Shoghi Effendi, made this statement in 1925:

“The individual conscience must be subordinated to the decisions of the elected Spiritual Assembly.” [boldface in original]

“This statement strikes at the very foundation of the Bahai Cause, as one of its cardinal teachings is that man must have freedom of conscience. Among dozens of instances that could be given of Abdu'l-Baha’s statements on this subject is the following: ‘... the conscience of man is sacred and to be respected . . . ’” (73-74).

“We can see from the foregoing that Abdu'l-Baha emphasized the necessity of man’s being able to exercise freedom of conscience, as Baha'u'llah did” (75).

“During the lifetime of Abdu'l Baha the attempts of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha’is to organize the Bahai Religion were held in abeyance, but after he passed from this world, under the dictates of Shoghi Effendi, they swung it into an organization the like of which has not been seen since the dark ages. They tried to exercise the power over the Bahai world that Baha'u'llah said would be vested in the SUPREME TRIBUNAL of the future world governments. In order to enforce this power they excommunicated those who would not accept their pronouncements, and twice the members of the National Assembly sued at law in order to try and prevent other Bahais from promulgating the religion which they held in common; but, fortunately, they lost both these suits. Judge Valente, reprimanding them, reminded them of the Bill of Rights, which grants freedom to every man to practice his religion unmolested. All of this the reader can learn in the ensuing pages” (76).

[Ruth White quotes Abdu'l-Baha]:

“The worst enemies of the Cause are in the Cause and mention the Name of God. We need not fear the enemies on the outside for such can be easily dealt with. But the enemies who call themselves Friends and who persistently violate every fundamental law of Love and Unity are difficult to deal with in this Day. . . .”

“This last paragraph applies overwhelmingly to the activities of Shoghi Effendi, and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha’is. They have violated the principles of brotherhood and unity because of their inversions of the Bahai teachings. These inversions are all the more tragic of this particular time when the world has been made receptive, through much suffering, to the great universal principles of the Bahai Religion. Two prophecies of Baha'u'llah have been so accurately fulfilled—the discovery of Atomic Power, and the embryonic Supreme Tribunal as manifested in the United Nations Organization that we would do well to consider the third—the possible destruction of our planet unless we circumvent this threatened fate by a balanced spiritual civilization” (84-85).

“This matter of freedom of conscience is the most important part of the Bahai Teachings. God has given man free-will, and no earthly priestcraft nor dictatorship must interfere with man’s using that free-will in matters of faith and the inner relationship between the soul and God. This is the meaning of the spiritual democracy of which Abdu’l-Baha so often speaks—religion percolating through all the affairs of our daily life, and an ideal political government coming into existence as the result of the change of man’s nature and belief.”

“This is just the twist that the present leaders of the Bahai organization have tried to give to the Universal Message of Baha’u’llah.”

“There are many other wholly un-Bahai edicts that Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais have issued beside these two that follow: “. . . the individual conscience must be subordinated to the decisions of the Spiritual Assembly, . . . and: ‘. . . individual Bahai effort without due consultation is foredoomed to failure” (87-88).

“Everyone of these edicts are inversions of the Bahai Teachings, as given to the world by the Founders of the Cause.”

“In saying that recognized Bahais must not vote in any election based on a party system Shoghi Effendi and his hierarchy have set up what might be considered a government within each government in every country where there are enough of his followers. Over that government he is supreme dictator. His subjects must pay taxes to him (tithes) and he forbids his followers to vote on national and civic affairs. All his edicts no matter how un-patriotic, or how much in violation of the universal principles of the Bahai Religion, must be obeyed under threat of excommunication.”

“This revival of excommunication is a horrible inversion of the Bahai teachings—the Revelation for which Baha’u’llah suffered imprisonment for twenty-five years, and Abdu’l-Baha for forty years—the Cause for which twenty thousand martyrs sacrificed their lives to establish freedom of conscience and to unite all mankind regardless of religion, race or country. The idea of excommunication is impossible in the world envisaged by Baha’u’llah” (89-90).

“Whether the alleged will of Abdul Baha is authentic or spurious, the results of the administration of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha’is stand as an historical indictment against them. [Boldface in original] They no more represent the Bahai Religion than the bigots of the dark ages of Christianity.

“We had the dark ages because the bigots of that era got control of Christ’s teachings and tortured all those who did not comply with their interpretation. Shoghi Effendi, and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha’is, cannot in this day resort to physical torture to enforce their will, but they have resorted to mental torture by blackmailing with excommunication all those who do not comply with their inverted teachings” (100).

Foreword.

The atomic bomb was prophesied by Baha'o'llah, founder of the Bahai Religion, eighty-one years ago. At that time he also gave the remedy that would circumvent the possible destruction of our planet. This prophecy was repeated by Abdul Baha in 1912. He warned that we must speed up spiritual civilization to keep pace with scientific and material progress, otherwise materialism would destroy us.

This book deals with the conditions that have largely prevented their remedial teachings from becoming better appreciated — the mal-administration of the Bahai heritage by Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is,* who claim to derive their authority from the alleged will of Abdul Baha. In this book also is printed the analysis of that alleged will, by the great handwriting expert for the British Museum, Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell. The scientific indications are that the will of Abdul Baha is not genuine. Also, from the spiritual viewpoint, there are overwhelming indications that it is not genuine, as it contradicts the teachings of both Baha'o'llah and of Abdul Baha. But whether the will is genuine or spurious, the actions of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is, and of Shoghi Effendi, stand as an historical indictment, recorded for all time against them. Their actions show that they no more represent the Bahai Religion than the bigots of the dark ages represented Christ's teachings.

One of these actions is the trade marking of the name "Baha'i" in 1928. This is the same as if one sect within Christianity had tried to trade mark the name "Christian." In their application for the trade mark they described themselves as the: "National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is of the United States and Canada, a common-law corporation, organized and operated under declaration of trust and doing business at . . ." This trade mark was later pronounced invalid by the court when the Assembly instituted two law-suits, during 1941, against two well-known Bahais, to prevent them, or anyone else, from spreading the Bahai teachings except through their organization. Of course the Assembly lost both suits and they were severely reprimanded by Judge Valente, who reminded them of the Bill of Rights, and pointed out that each one has a right to practice his religion unmolested by others.

The Assembly of Baha'is use the assets that Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha built up by preaching some of their principles from the platform. But in private, after a person has joined the Assembly, that person is faced with the alternative of complying with the narrow, bigoted edicts of Shoghi Effendi and the Assembly, or of being excommunicated.

This book is a challenge to them to prove, if they can, not only whether the will of Abdul Baha is genuine, and the authority which they claim to derive from it is legitimate, but also whether their administration of their assumed authority is in the spirit of the teachings of Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha.

Each one reading this book should feel a personal responsibility toward this greatest peace movement of modern times. Dr. David Starr Jordan said of one of its founders:

"Abdul Baha will unite the East and the West, for he travels the Mystic Path with practical feet."

FOREWORD 1947

Will pro-God democracies and freedom prevail in the world? Or shall we become slaves of the state under an anti-God communism?

The pro-God's possess an invulnerable power—the equivalent of the atom bomb in the domain of Spirit. It can shatter the forces of materialism, and circumvent our destruction by atomic force, if it is rightly understood and applied.

The communists are trying to undermine this power by destroying faith in God—the very genius of humanity. For faith unfolds our intuitions. It transforms us into spiritual giants, compared to which the materialists, however mighty, are pygmies.

Chapter I

Atomic power prophesied by Baha'o'llah

When I met Abdul Baha in May, 1912, while doing newspaper work in Boston, he started me on a spiritual trail that led me out of the labyrinth of materialistic philosophy into the spiritual, or intuitional consciousness. Prior to meeting him I had read much literature on Marxian Socialism and Communism and had met many of the exponents of both philosophies. As a result the poverty of the submerged classes got into the very marrow of my bones. So concentrated on negative conditions had I become that I reproduced the stigmata of poverty in my life and affairs as surely as Saint Francis, through much concentration, reproduced the stigmata of Christ's wounds upon his hands.

But my first glimpse of a photograph of Abdul Baha in a newspaper revived in me remembrances of happier days — when I had believed in the wonders and mysteries of religion. Gradually this belief had faded through much contact with the dry formalism of institutional religions, and was finally replaced by a growing belief that perhaps communism was the best solution for man's woes.

Fortunately, at my first interview with Abdul Baha he turned me face about and told me that communism and the regimentation of the human race was not the way. The most urgent need of humanity is to attain God-consciousness — to establish spiritual civilization — that was the burden of his message everywhere he went. After release from forty years imprisonment for his faith, he traveled through Europe and America in order to arouse man from his materialism, which, he said, was driving us into universal war.

Both he and Baha'o'llah pre-visionsed atomic power and both warned that in order to circumvent the possible destruction of our planet we must speed up spiritual civilization to keep pace with scientific and material progress. Eighty-one years ago Baha'o'llah said:

"A strange and wonderful instrument exists in the earth; but it is concealed from the minds and souls. It is an instrument which has the power to change the atmosphere of the whole earth, and its infection causes destruction." *

This prophecy was reiterated by Abdul Baha in an interview which he gave to the Japanese Ambassador to Spain, Viscount Arawaka, and his wife, during his sojourn in Paris — October, December, 1911, and recorded by Lady Blomfield. He said:

"Scientific discoveries have greatly increased material civilization. There is in existence a stupendous force, as yet, happily, undiscovered by man. Let us supplicate God, the Beloved, that this force be not discovered by science until Spiritual Civilization shall dominate the human mind. In the hands of men of lower material nature, this power would be able to destroy the whole earth."

He prophetically indicated that the discovery of atomic power on American soil was God-ordained. For, though he said this country is also very materialistic, yet he conceded that we are more trustworthy than any nation on earth, our form of government is better than any on earth, and that eventually it will be adopted by every country and universal peace first will be proclaimed here.

Spiritual atomics is the core of every religion that ever existed, and hints of it have been released in every age. It is the awakening of our slumbering genius, our spiritual consciousness.

The hunch of the man in the street is this spiritual consciousness in embryo; in its fulness it is the Samadhi of the yogis, the dhyana of the Buddhists, the Tao of the Chinese, the Wacanda of the American Indians, the Kingdom of God of the Christ, the Resignation of Mohammed, and the "Intuitions of the Holy Spirit," of the Bahai Religion.

When a sufficient number of people awaken this consciousness, spiritual civilization will come into being.

Abdul Baha opened my eyes to the fact that the problem of paramount importance in the world today is the struggle between those who are anti-God and those who are pro-God, for in this problem all others are involved. The basic reason for this struggle is unknown to most people. In the world of politics the anti-God tendency is manifested by the dictators who stand for state regimentation and the bondage of the race, and the pro-God tendency is manifested in the democratic form of government.

Democracies are always pro-God. Or perhaps it should be expressed the other way about. Religion always stands for the freedom of the individual and for democracy. When the principles of religion, as given by Great Teachers who appear in different eras are applied, the application increases the freedom of the individual and increases the genius of the race by developing the intuitional or super-consciousness of man.

On the other hand, the dictators, with their regimentation of individuals, are always anti-God in their tendencies, and are an evidence of loss of faith. The State takes the place of God, and through loss of faith the development of the super-consciousness is more or less retarded, thereby conducing to a moronic condition of the race.

The pro-Gods, who are vitalists and who believe that life is ruled by a beneficent Design, should become more fully aware of the definite cleavage between their ideology of democracy and that of the anti-God communists, who believe in the mechanistic conception of life, and that life is based on and governed by chance. They must become more fully aware of the priceless heritage of faith — more completely united on the most important point of every religion that ever existed — faith in God. Unless they do, they cannot circumvent the united efforts of the anti-Gods to undermine their faith. For the communists are fully aware that the quickest way to establish their form of government is to lessen faith in God.

I mention communism as the great menace, for out of it stems all other forms of totalitarianism. Within this frame of pro-Gods and anti-Gods there are many gradations of belief and unbelief. Innumerable people who think they have faith in God believe in Him only as a theory without any vital influence in their lives; they therefore belong in the frame of the anti-Gods although they are not militantly anti. This applies to many persons inside the churches as well as to many outside. It is this loss of faith in the reality of God as a living vital influence in one's life which is the greatest calamity that can happen to man.

As the militantly anti-Gods are organized on a world scale to regiment the whole of mankind, therefore the lukewarm believers in God should strive to awaken to this menace. In 1919 when Abdul Baha was asked by Mr. W. H. Randall: "What will be the future of Russia?" he replied:

"The future is bad; in the future there will be great destruction. Nations should rise to extinguish this fire (of Bolshevism) so that it would not spread to other countries. Soon it will affect them. . . ." *

If I had not had the advantage, although it was through much suffering, of this alternating contact with the pro-Gods and the anti-Gods, I would also have remained asleep, as so many people are today, to the significance of this struggle. I would have remained unaware of the fact that the almost universal malady of modern man is spiritual atrophy. Baha'o'llah gave a warning of this eighty-one years ago, which was reiterated by Abdul Baha later. They both said in substance that if the race cannot be awakened spiritually, then calamities will increase until man will be driven, through untold suffering, to believe in God. We know that this has already partly taken place. Only by establishing a spiritual civilization can we avert further major calamities.

When I was a near-communist my outer condition was a reflection of my inner poverty of spirit. I was unhappy, poor, unsuccessful. But when Abdul Baha revived my faith in God, life became for me a glorious adventure, enriched on all the planes. This enrichment came to me through the awakening of my intuitional nature, which enabled me to see beneath the surface of things and to act wisely in all aspects of life. This gift is open to anyone who really lives according to the principles of religion, and it always enriches us and contributes to the enrichment of the race. It is the next great step forward in spiritual, mental and moral evolution. Only by taking this step can we keep pace with the material evolution on which we have concentrated too much attention. Belief in the supernatural aspect of religion, together with the application of its principles, is the formula for attaining this super-consciousness. To ignore this belief in the supernatural is to rob religion of its vital power — the part that revives the genius of the race.

If our attitude toward scientific discoveries had been as skeptical as most people's attitude is toward the discovery of the supernatural aspect of religion, we would have been largely deprived of our modern inventions, such as radio and television. The development and discovery of the spiritual counterpart of radio and television is of infinite importance today, especially as our material development is now so far ahead of our spiritual unfolding that it threatens our destruction.

Dr. Alexis Carrel says:

Mystical activity has been banished from most religions. Even its meaning has been forgotten. Such ignorance is probably responsible for the decadence of the churches. The strength of religion depends upon the focuses of mystical activity where its life constantly grows . . .

I have emphasized this mystical aspect of the Bahai Religion not only because of my first hand experience with it, but due to the fact that since Abdul Baha passed from this world in 1921, it has been excluded from the Bahai Religion by Shoghi Effendi, his grandson, together with the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada. They have tried to use the Bahai Religion for the regimentation of mankind on the religious plane just as Stalin is trying to do on the political plane. Incredible though it may seem, in this supposedly progressive age, the members of the Assembly, urged on by Shoghi Effendi, carried their idea of regimentation to the extent of actually trying to violate the constitution of the United States. They instituted two lawsuits against two Bahais, Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, to restrain them from spreading the religion except through their organization. Naturally the members of the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is lost both suits. Furthermore they were severely reprimanded by Justice Louis A. Valente for attempting to break the Bill of Rights, which grants freedom to every man to practice his faith unmolested.*

The logical conclusion of such actions is that if Shoghi Effendi and the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is had succeeded in violating the Bill of Rights, and in gaining enough followers, it might have resulted in time to a recurrence of the dark ages. The offices of this organization are at Wilmette, Illinois, where stands the Baha'i Temple. Their publications are, WORLD ORDER (magazine), BAHÁ'Í YEAR BOOK, and BAHÁ'Í PUBLISHING COMPANY. Lectures are given under the caption BAHÁ'Í FAITH, and other captions.

For those who are not familiar with the Bahai Cause I give this brief outline so that in reading the second part of this volume they may know why the Cause has been temporarily obscured.

The Bahai Cause had its inception in Persia on May 23rd, 1844 on which date occurred the double event of the Declaration of the Bab and the birth of Abdul Baha. These two great lights, together with Baha'o'llah, are the Founders of the Bahai Cause.

Of the fourteen important principles that Baha'o'llah gave to the world eighty-one years ago, as the ideal for man to pattern his life upon, practically none had been envisaged by mankind. Neither had the modern scientific inventions been discovered which are now forcing these principles to be adopted. In an era when such a thing as a world tribunal was not thought of, Baha'o'llah warned the world that the present day cataclysms would engulf us unless we developed spiritual civilization side by side with material civilization. He gave to the world an economic plan together with his spiritual teachings, which, if applied, would bring universal peace and happiness to mankind. At that time, about 1865, when he showed the necessity for an International Tribunal, conditions had not yet arisen which would seem to make this imperative. But now, after eighty-one years, the plans which he prophetically outlined have become a necessity, and we see a concerted attempt on the part of the United Nations to establish it. These attempts have been hastened by the discovery of the atomic bomb, which brought to a speedy end the war with Japan.

Through this terrible instrument of destruction man is now being forced into adopting some of the principles which otherwise might have required several centuries to come into existence. In other words, what we would not heed through precept, we are now being forced into accepting through chastisement.

The fourteen most important principles that Baha'o'llah gave to the world eighty-one years ago, which were later exemplified by his son, Abdul Baha, are as follows:

1. The independent investigation of Truth. Freedom of conscience.
2. The unity and oneness of all religions.
3. The unity and oneness of mankind.
4. The unity of religion and science.
5. The unity of all countries, but each retaining its individuality. A spiritual democracy, founded on a two party system, by the votes of the people.
6. Universal education.
7. A universal auxiliary language.
8. Equal rights between man and woman.
9. Solution of the economic problem.
10. Prejudices of all kinds must be forgotten.
11. Universal Peace.
12. An International Tribunal.
13. The demonstration of Divinity and Inspiration.

14. The necessity of the confirmations of the Holy Spirit.

The last two of these principles are the most important for on them depends the ability to carry into successful action all the others. They are what Christ called "The Mysteries," and Abdul Baha called, "The Intuitions of the Holy Spirit. He said:

" . . . if a man is bereft of the intuitive breathings of the Holy Spirit, deprived of Divine Bestowals, out of touch with the heavenly world and negligent of the eternal truths, though in image and likeness he is human, in reality he is an animal; . . . " *

Therefore the ethics and morals of religion by themselves have not the magic power to transform man individually or collectively. It is this leaven of the spirit only that will accomplish that. If we combine and apply the morals and the ethics with the Intuitions of the Holy Spirit, we become the possessors of an Aladdin's Lamp. For the Power of which Aladdin's Lamp is a symbol is the Gift of religion to man; but when he forgets how to use it, it remains entombed within the religion. It needs only the magic touch of the right application of our faith to release it with benefit to ourselves and to mankind. It is our slumbering genius, which, when awakened, will catapult humanity to such heights that we of today shall appear mere pygmies in comparison.

In the following pages I shall try to show what has temporarily halted the progress of the next great step forward in spiritual evolution.

Chapter II

Alleged Will of Abdul Baha discovered

The late Professor E. G. Browne of the University of Cambridge, who was the best historian of the Bahai Cause, states:

“My object in the present essay on the Babis is twofold. . . .

I wish to point out how much still remains to be done to thoroughly elucidate the matter, and to emphasize the fact that every year which passes will render it more and more difficult to fill in certain important details in the history and chronology of this sect. I sincerely hope that some, who have the means and opportunity of assisting in this task, may be induced to do so while it is still possible; . . . Believing as I do that Babism* is destined to leave a permanent mark in the world, I feel very strongly how desirable it is that this work should be accomplished. . . .”

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1889; page 485.

It is equally important to chronicle the history of the Bahai Cause as it has come under my observation from the time that Abdul Baha passed from this world, in November 1921, up to the present writing, 1945.

The earlier chronicles of the Bahai Revelation dealt with the physical martyrdom of the Babís. This present history deals with the spiritual martyrdom which the Bahai Revelation has suffered, since Abdul Baha passed from this world. For in the hands of Shoghi Effendi, and The National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'ís of the United States and Canada, the great universal Bahai Cause has been changed into a narrow bigoted sect and many of the tactics of the dark ages have been revived. This is what has happened to the religion that many leading thinkers of the day believe is the remedy for this age.

I have already published in 1929 some history of this matter in my book, "The Bahai Religion and Its Enemy the Bahai Organization." In this book is printed the complete set of nine photographs of the alleged will of Abdul Baha written in Persian together with the English translation of it consisting of thirty-one pages.*

But since the publication of this book such appalling conditions have taken place, under the administration of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'ís of the United States and Canada, that I feel it necessary to write again upon this matter, and recount the calamitous results of those happenings.

Three months after Abdul Baha passed from this world, November 26th, 1921, the following cable was sent to this country to Roy C. Wilhelm of 104 Wall Street, New York City:

*Copies of this book may be purchased from the author, Mrs. Ruth White, P. O. Box 1471, Beverly Hills, Calif.

“Wilhemite, N. Y.

In Will Shoghi Effendi appointed Guardian of the Cause and Head of House of Justice.

(Signed) Greatest Holy Leaf, Haifa.”

The “Greatest Holy Leaf” is the sister of Abdul Baha.

The appointment of a successor came as a thunderbolt out of a clear sky to everyone. For Abdul Baha gave no hint that this was his intention. On the contrary he spoke many times against such a possibility.

A typewritten English translation of the alleged will arrived in New York four weeks later. This document, undated and un-witnessed, was read by Mr. Horace Holley to a gathering of Bahais at which I was present. No details concerning it and no comments upon it were vouchsafed. Later we heard that it had been buried in the ground, but who found it, and when, and where, has never been revealed so far as I know.

As I listened to Mr. Holley’s reading, my inner admonitor kept up a running comment: “Why had Abdul Baha appointed Shoghi Effendi as Guardian when everything he said and wrote indicated that he did not mean to appoint any successor?” And as Mr. Holley continued: “. . . a fixed money offering . . . is to be offered through the Guardian of the Cause of God . . .,” I thought “This endows Shoghi with more potential power and wealth than a king and pope combined.”

Then Mr. Holley continued, “The Hands of the Cause of God must be ever watchful and so soon as they find anyone beginning to oppose and protest against the Guardian of the Cause of God, cast him out from the congregation of the people of Baha and in no wise accept any excuses from him. . . .”

Again my inner admonitor reasoned: "That is what is known in law as the "terror clause," in case a will is disputed. It will prevent those who can be easily frightened from investigating, or from even asking questions concerning the will."

After Mr. Holley had finished reading the document those present filed out of the room shocked into silence.

I kept my thoughts to myself and decided to re-read everything that both Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha had said and written, and find out if I had missed something in my previous readings which would indicate their intention of appointing an hereditary line of successors or guardians.

My husband and I had the privilege of knowing Abdul Baha for the last ten years of his life, and we spent over a hundred days in his presence, forty-nine of which were spent at his home in Haifa, Palestine, during two visits there. I had read and re-read all of his published writings as well as hundreds of unpublished Tablets and notes and I now went through the long list again. After months of research I found that neither he nor Baha'o'llah had given the slightest intimation that they intended to appoint an hereditary guardianship. In fact everything that they had said or spoken indicated the opposite intention.

I also did a great deal of recollecting of events that had happened during our two visits to the home of Abdul Baha, where I had an opportunity to see him in relation to his family and his "in-laws." The deductions that I made confirmed what Abdul Baha had so often said — that the spiritual relationship was the real kinship, and not the physical. For his family, with the exception of his wife and sister, were the average types with a strong bent toward organized religion, whereas Abdul Baha was universal, "super-racial and undogmatic." The world was his family. His loving care for his universal family was evident throughout his life, but at no time was it more evident than during the first world war and directly after it. He personally supervised vast agricultural projects at Tiberias and Adassieh, and he rationed and distributed the products that he cultivated, thereby saving thousands from starvation. For this service and for his help in frequently bringing peace between warring factions in the Holy Land he was knighted by the British Government in April, 1920, at which ceremony we were present.

I also wish to give a few high-lights on Shoghi Effendi, the grandson of Abdul Baha, who is now his alleged successor. He had failed in his college course at the age of twenty-four, and he wished to go to Oxford University, in the autumn of 1919. Despite the objections of Abdul Baha he went. This act demonstrates that Shoghi Effendi had little consideration for the wishes of his grandfather, who was then seventy-four years of age. It also shows that he was lacking in the spiritual attributes which would have enabled him to know that it was of far more value to be with Abdul Baha, both spiritually and mentally, during the last two years of his life, than any amount of academic training could possibly be. For these last two years were filled with intense activities, and spiritual confirmations, as it was just after the first world war, and the war had made people hungry for spiritual enlightenment. As a result there flocked to the home of Abdul Baha a steady stream of pilgrims from all over the earth — the poor, the wealthy, the distinguished, and also frightened refugees. They came by camel, train, auto, boat, and on foot to imbibe the spiritual wisdom of Abdul Baha, and each day there dined at his table about forty pilgrims. This personal contact which we were privileged to have was of tremendous importance, not only because of what he said, but because of the emanation of his spirit, which transported those who were receptive into kingdoms of enlightenment and happiness. Yet Shoghi Effendi chose to be away during the last two years of Abdul Baha's life, and did not return for a full month after he had passed from this world.

Another significant fact to which I wish to call attention is this: If Abdul Baha had had any secret intention of appointing Shoghi Effendi as Guardian of the Bahai Cause, it does not seem plausible that he would have excluded him from the entourage that accompanied him on his trip through Europe and America during 1912. Shoghi Effendi at that time was eighteen years of age and spoke and wrote English, Persian and Arabic; yet he was not included in this trip. Even after Abdul Baha returned to Palestine, instead of choosing Shoghi Effendi as his secretary, he chose Ahmad Sohrab, who had accompanied him to Europe and America, and who continued as his secretary for five succeeding years.

It is important for those who are interested in the Bahai Religion to free themselves from the idea that the family of Abdul Baha is a "Holy Family." In fact his family, and "in-laws," with the exception of his wife and sister, were somewhat materialistic, and viewed the religion more or less as a little family affair with a strong bent toward organization. For years they have indoctrinated, more or less, the pilgrims who visited the home of Abdul Baha, myself included, with this conception of religion. This partly nullified the great universal teachings. The result was that when Abdul Baha passed from this world in November, 1921, some of his family, who had laid the ground-work for organization through these pilgrims while he was alive, hastened to establish it more firmly when he died. All this resulted in making the Bahai Movement, under the dictatorship of Shoghi Effendi, an organization which for narrowness and bigotry has no parallel in history except in the dark ages.

Remembering these things, together with my months of research, convinced me that neither Baha'o'llah nor Abdul Baha had at any time advocated an 'organization' of Bahais, far less an official organization headed by a Guardian who collected 'dues' and had the power of excommunication. Among hundreds of quotations that could be given on this subject to show that they had no intention of such an organization the following will suffice:

"The Blessed Perfection* has upturned the root of the tree of superstition and religious officers. In the past the ambitious leaders of religions have been the cause of the retrogression and ignorance of a nation. In this Cause there are no religious titles, no ceremonies of ordination. One is not respected simply because he wears a peculiar dress or carries a religious title, or has inherited it from the Fathers. No! These are not the marks of distinction. On the other hand, those sanctified souls, the signs of their divine sanctity and spirituality become apparent in the hearts of others. People are unconsciously attracted to them through their pure morality, their justice and loving kindness. Everyone is drawn to them through their praiseworthy attributes, and pleasing qualities, and all the faces are illumined by the lights of their virtues and integrity. In this movement there is no title to be given to anyone; no See to be inherited by any person. 'The Hands of the Cause' are the Hands of Truth. Therefore, whosoever is the promoter and the servant of the Word of God he is the hand of Truth. By the 'hands of God' certain definite meanings are connoted. It is not only a verbal expression. Whosoever is more humble in the Cause of God, he is more confirmed; and whosoever is more evanescent, he is more favored."

*Baha'o'llah

Spoken by Abdul Baha at a Persian meeting and recorded by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, July 19, 1913.

It is inconceivable that Abdul Baha would have made this public declaration and also the following two statements if at that very time a will existed appointing a successor endowed with all the powers of a pope:

"There are no officers in this Cause. I do not and have not "Appointed" anyone to perform any special service, but I encourage everyone to engage in the service of the Kingdom. The foundation of this Cause is pure spiritual democracy and not a theocracy."

STAR OF THE WEST; page 116. August 20, 1917.

"In answer to a question as to whether or not there would be any clergy in the Bahai Cause, Abdul Baha said: 'No. In this movement there will never be any paid ministers, no appointed clergy, no bishops, no cardinals, no popes, no ceremonies. A clergyman, assuming that he is ordained to his ministry, may think that he knows more about God than anyone else, whereas the humble man in his congregation may know more about God than he does. The sacerdotal and theological position makes a clergyman proud and haughty. But there is one thing in this Cause: some people may become greater than the rest, not through appointment, but through the purity of their hearts, their unselfish deeds, their heroic sacrifices, and their knowledge of God. Such illumined souls, like kind fathers or teachers, will guide and teach those less fortunate. They are the elder brothers of the members of the community. They do not arrogate to themselves any title or position. You will know them by their humility, their sincerity, their deeds, their severance, their knowledge, their spirituality, and their attraction."

Diary of Ahmad Sohrab, March 21, 1913.

"A gentleman who had spent many years in India asked by what means and what kind of organization Abdul Baha intended to spread his teachings. The answer was: 'Our organization is the love of God, the knowledge of the Almighty, the descent of the breaths of the Holy Spirit, the outflow of the spiritual life; our capital is good deeds, merciful attributes, heavenly characteristics, and divine ethics.'"

Diary of Ahmad Sohrab, December 30, 1912.

"Holding to the letter of the law is many times an indication of a desire for leadership. One who assumes to be the enforcer of the law shows an intellectual understanding of the Cause, but that spiritual guidance in him is not yet established.

The alphabet of things is for children, that they may in time use their reasoning powers. 'Following the spirit' is a guidance by and through the heart, the prompter of the spirit. The Pharisees were extremely orthodox, holding strictly to the law. They were the cause of the condemnation and ultimate crucifixion of Jesus."

"Were not the Revelation of Baha'o'llah one adaptable to the entire world and its diverse nations, it could not be a unique and universal Revelation, but its elasticity adapts itself to all conditions, and its spirit is one that moulds itself into every vehicle and need for the accomplishment of the divine plan of unity.

But when some follow merely the hard and fixed letter of the law, they deprive it (the Revelation) of its elastic quality — the spirit — and endeavor to convert it into a hard instrument of inflexible qualities."

Star of the West, June 24, 1915; pages 43, 44, 45.

"O friends! It is the wish of Abdul Baha, that the friends may establish general unity, and not a particular meeting of unity. You must have great consideration for this fact, for during past cycles such events were, in the beginning, a means of harmony, they became in the end the cause of trouble."

Tablets Containing Instructions; 1906.

". . . It is not necessary even to label one's self. One may call one's self a Bahai and in no way live the life; on the other hand one may live the life and never be known as a Bahai. It is not so much by what name you are called, but what you are in your heart. Are you loving and serving God? Love and service are the greatest requisites of a good life. Endeavor in every possible way to do some favor, some service for someone else; do this daily, no matter how small or trivial the act of kindness may be. Even a smile counts for much."

From Table Talks of Abdul Baha; 1906.

"If we are true Bahais, speech is not needed. Our actions will help on the world, will spread civilization, will help the progress of science, and cause the arts to develop. Without action, nothing in the material world can be accomplished, neither can words unaided advance a man in the Spiritual Kingdom. It is not through lip service only, that the Elect of God have attained to holiness, but by patient lives of active service they have brought Light into the World.

Chapter III

Bahai Religion Incorporated

From the beginning of my contact with Abdul Baha I observed a definite cleavage between the universality that he was trying to establish, and a strong tendency on the part of most of his followers toward organization, and I evaded all attempts to be drawn into it. Although I was a "recognized Bahai" I never belonged to the "Spiritual Assemblies." During my first visit to the home of Abdul Baha, in May, 1920, I decided to ask him if my stand was right. So one morning, when my husband and I were taking early morning tea with him, we found him engulfed in great floods of correspondence, and contrary to his usual custom of praising people he spoke of the dreadful lack of harmony existing among the members of the Bahai Assemblies in America, and the letters of complaint that they wrote to him one against the other.

"Great God!" he exclaimed, "Can't they understand that I have nothing to do with such pettiness?"

The thought occurred to me, "Why is he telling me this? I have never belonged to the Assemblies." I concluded that this was an opportune time to ask him if my stand in not becoming a member of them was the right one. His face beamed with happiness as he nodded approval and said:

"The organization that the Bahais have among themselves has nothing to do with the teachings of Baha'o'llah. The teachings of Baha'o'llah are universal and cannot be confined to a sect."

These same people who were the leaders in the organization then are the leaders in it today.

During the lifetime of Abdul Baha the following utterance of his was widely circulated in a blue pamphlet, 9:

"The Bahai Religion is not an organization. You can never organize the Bahai Cause. The Bahai Religion is the Spirit of this age. It is the essence of all the highest ideals of this century. The Bahai Cause is an inclusive movement; the teachings of all the religions and societies are found here; the Christians, Jews, Buddhists, Mohammedans, Zoroastrians, Theosophists, Freemasons, Spiritualists, etc., find their highest aims in this Cause. Even the Socialists and Philosophers find their theories fully developed in this Movement."

My months of research was in accordance with one of the most important points of the Bahai Religion — Independent investigation of truth, as the following by Abdul Baha will make plain:

". . . . know ye that God has created in man the power of reason whereby man is enabled to investigate reality . . . He has endowed him with mind or the faculty of reasoning by the exercise of which he is to investigate and discover the truth; and that which he finds real and true, he must accept. He must not be an imitator or blind follower of any soul. He must not rely implicitly upon the opinion of any man without investigation; nay, each soul must seek intelligently, and independently, arriving at a real conclusion and bound only by that reality. The greatest cause of bereavement and disheartening in the world of humanity is ignorance, based upon blind imitation. It is due to this that wars and battles prevail; from this cause hatred and animosity arise continually among mankind. . . ."

"God has given man the eye of investigation by which he may see and recognize truth. He has endowed man with ears that he may hear the message of reality and conferred upon him the gift of reason by which he may discover things for himself. This is his endowment and equipment for the investigations of reality. Man is not intended to see through the eyes of another, hear through another's ears nor comprehend with another's brain. Each human creature has individual endowment, power and responsibility in the creative plan of God. Therefore depend upon your own reason and judgment and adhere to the outcome of your own investigation; otherwise you will be utterly submerged in the sea of ignorance and deprived of all the bounties of God. Turn to God; supplicate humbly at his threshold, seeking assistance and confirmation, that God may rend asunder the veils that obscure your vision. Then will your eyes be filled with illumination; face to face you will behold the reality of God and your heart become completely purified from the dross of ignorance, reflecting the glories and bounties of the kingdom.

". . . It is the duty of everyone to investigate reality, and investigation of reality by another will not do . . ."

The Promulgation of Universal Truth.
Discourses by Abdul Baha; pages 285-287-288.

Not until three years had elapsed after the alleged will had been read in 1922, were copies of it finally distributed, and then only to "old and recognized believers." I was among those who received a copy. But my stand continued to be one of "watchful waiting." This stand on my part caused me no embarrassment, inasmuch as I had never been a member of the Bahai organization, (Spiritual Assemblies of the Bahais). I knew that belonging to them meant conforming to the group repression and being shorn of the universal attitude which Abdul Baha said is the essence of the Bahai Cause. During these three years, however, my outer as well as my inner life was absorbed with the question of Abdul Baha's alleged will.

In May 1926 the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais incorporated the Bahai Cause, made the alleged will part of the by-laws, and proclaimed it an article of faith that Shoghi Effendi as the Guardian of the Bahai Cause must be obeyed in all things. The alleged will had never been examined by handwriting experts.

By the powers granted in the alleged will, the Guardian collected large sums of money, and sent out various pleas for this purpose. I made four contributions during 1925 and 1926, in answer to one of these pleas which was printed on the Bahai Fund receipt and was as follows:

"It is the sacred obligation of every conscientious servant of Baha'u'llah, who desires to see His Cause advance, to contribute freely and generously for the increase of that Fund.” — Shoghi Effendi.

One division of this BAHAI FUND was to be used in response to Shoghi's plea that more money was needed at once to buy land around the Tomb of the Bab on Mount Carmel, in order to protect this shrine from the encroachment of other people who were also buying land there. In answer to this plea I sent $200 for the Mount Carmel division of the Bahai Fund. Later I wrote to Shoghi Effendi, and also to the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais, asking how much land had been purchased, and the number and size of the lots, and where they were situated. But the only information I could get was that my contribution had been pooled with contributions of others. Who these 'others' were I could not find out. Nor was any other information given me for which I had asked.

Now I will jump ahead to 1944 and show that Shoghi Effendi and The National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is have, for the last twenty-one years, continued to disregard the question of accounting for money received. Mirza Ahmad Sohrab in his book published in 1944* writes that the Bahai Movement, under Shoghi Effendi is now an organization, and he makes the following statement:

“The movement is an organization run by an administrative body along the lines of laws and by-laws; and to be consistent with this new aspect, the financial department should be regulated according to institutionalized custom. . . . He (Shoghi Effendi) as treasurer, should see to it that a certified accountant give to the members of his community a detailed report on this fund to which they have subscribed. . . . This has not been done up to date, although twenty-one years have elapsed since the departure of the Master (Abdul Baha) . . ."

Now to return to my own experience in 1926. I knew that inasmuch as I had made contributions to the BAHÁI FUND, in answer to Shoghi Effendi's plea, and could get no financial statement from him or the Assembly, that I had a legal right to demand a photographic copy of the alleged will. I therefore wrote to the Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is part of which letter is as follows:

"I request that you, in your official capacity as one of the officers of this organization, present to me legal evidence that your organization, in its acceptance of Shoghi Effendi as the successor of Abdul Baha, is founded on a legal claim, by presenting to me, on or before the 19th day of January, 1928, an authentic photographic copy of this document which purports to be the will of Abdul Baha.

Yours in the service of the Cause of God,
Ruth White

Four weeks later, on December 31, I received a reply from Mr. Holley, part of which is as follows:

National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada
Office of the Secretary
129 East Tenth Street, New York City
December 31, 1927.

My Dear Mrs. White:

Although you have indicated several points on which you desire explanation or comment, we feel that your letter raises only one fundamental question, namely, the validity of the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha. Since this Will appoints a Guardian to administer the administrative affairs of the Cause, and since the Guardian has approved the matters you question, it of course follows that those who really desire to conform to the wishes and instructions of 'Abdu'l-Baha will accept His instructions concerning administrative affairs as soon as they know what these instructions are.

We can, therefore, give you full assurance that the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha, a copy of which was sent you over two years ago, is a document written by Him in His own hand, the validity of which has been established by a number of well-known Baha'is from different countries who inspected the original at Haifa.

Apart from this entirely convincing proof, it is a matter of interesting historical record that, when the custody of one of the Bahai'i tombs at Haifa was questioned after the departure of 'Abdu'l-Baha the final decision lay in the hands of the representative of the British Government administering Palestine under the mandate of the League of Nations, and after full investigation he restored the keys of the Tomb to the Guardian appointed in the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha.

As no photographic copies of this document exist in this country, we are unable to meet your request for such a copy. In view of the fact that the world-wide Baha'i community naturally most concerned with establishing the completeness and accuracy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's final instruction to His followers, has been satisfied with the verbal accuracy of His Will and Testament; and in view also of the fact that the highest civil authorities of Palestine have also accepted the Guardian as the administrative head of the Baha'i Cause, we know that you may rest assured that obedience to 'Abdu'l-Bahá at this time means obedience to the Guardian appointed by Him in all matters pertaining to the Baha'i Cause."

(Signed) HORACE HOLLEY, Secretary.

This answer was wholly unsatisfactory, for the very point of my letter, as well as others that I had previously sent, was that the alleged will is not in accord with the wishes or teachings which Abdul Baha expressed during his lifetime. Furthermore Mr. Holley's so-called proof of the validity of the will, that it is "a document written by him (Abdul Baha) in his own hand, the validity of which has been established by a number of well-known Baha'is from different countries who inspected the original at Haifa" would be thrown out of any court as worthless. For the "well-known Baha'is" were not handwriting experts, and no one but a handwriting expert is legally qualified to judge the validity of a questioned will. Another reason why the evidence of these "well-known Baha'is" is worthless is that they are not disinterested witnesses. They are leaders in the very organization in the by-laws of which this alleged will was incorporated. and they had made it an article of faith that this will must be accepted. Those who even questioned it were to be thrown out of the congregation of the Bahais.

As for Mr. Holley's statement: "... in view also of the fact that the highest civil authorities of Palestine have also accepted the Guardian as the administrative head of the Baha'i Cause . . ." it means nothing at all as far as the vital issue is concerned. For there was no property, either personal or real, bequeathed in the alleged will and as no one contested the right of Shoghi Effendi as successor to the point of insisting upon having the alleged will put to the acid test of handwriting experts, the government's recognition of him consisted in permitting him to be the custodian of the Tombs of the Bab and of Baha'o'llah. This would have been conceded him even without a will, as he is the oldest male descendant of Abdul Baha.

As Mr. Mountford Mills was one of the "well known Baha'is" who had gone to Palestine shortly after the passing of Abdul Baha, I wrote to him asking him to give me what information he could concerning the alleged will. Mr. Mills, by the way, drew up the by-laws of the Bahai Cause, than which nothing could be more un-Bahai. Although he is an exceptionally fine man, that did not interfere with his blindness. Just after he had drawn these by-laws, my husband and I had an interview with him, in which he said that he had recently finished reading 'Christianity Past and Present' by Charles Guignebert, and that if he had read it before drafting those by-laws the history of the Bahai Cause would have been different. In other words Mr. Mills deeply regretted his action.

The following is his reply to my letter:

January 19th, 1928.

Dear Mrs. White:

I have your letter of yesterday and have also received the copies of your earlier letters to the National Spiritual Assembly and to Mr. Holley, all bearing upon the question whether the Will accepted by the National Spiritual Assembly as Abdul' Baha's Last Testament is really so. Needless to say, I am glad to give you any information I can relating to the matter.

Answering more specifically the questions in your letter to me,

I have seen the Will.

It is written entirely in the Master's own hand.

It is signed by him.

Its parts written before the Master's seal was stolen from him in this country are sealed.

It is not dated, but its approximate date appears from its contents.

It has not been probated in the sense that we use the word, as there is no provision under the laws of Islam for such a proceeding. It has, however, been officially recognized by the British Government, the Mandatory Power now governing Palestine.

I hope these answers will satisfy the doubts that have arisen in your mind concerning the authenticity of the Will. Please let me know. I have enjoyed exceptional opportunities to learn the facts about it and do not hesitate to assure you that the document of which copies have been circulated among the Bahais in this country is the Last Will and Testament of Abdu'l Baha and embodies his final and most sacred message to his followers.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) MOUNTFORD MILLS.

Then upon further questioning he wrote again as follows:

January 22nd, 1928.

Dear Mrs. White:

I have your letter of yesterday.

As I wrote in my last letter, the formal standards in executing wills here required by our laws cannot be applied to the Will of Abdu'l Baha. Viewing it through the eye of our custom so far as possible, however, we should consider its three parts as forming his main Will to which two codicils had been added, all three parts being his Last Will and Testament. This is the view I took when writing you. It also seems beyond question that this was the Master's own intention. The three parts were filed together in one place by him, with the evident intent that they should be read together as one document.

Answering your specific questions,

All three sections are signed by Abdu'l Baha.

The first two sections are sealed.

All three sections are in the handwriting of Abdu'l Baha.

The Master's seal was stolen during his visit to this country in 1912.

The first two sections were thus obviously written before 1912, the last section after his return to Palestine in 1913. A closer approximation to the exact dates can be drawn from events referred to in the separate sections, but I have not this data with me here. As explained above, following our occidental terminology, there is but one Will with two codicils, the three parts having been written at different dates.

The commands of Abdu'l Baha which you quote concerning the identification of letters alleged to have been written by him were given out with special reference to Orientals who might come to this country and mingle with the Friends with the purpose of creating differences among them, and it has always been supposed that the commands were given with particular reference to Dr. ———, who, as you know, did come here shortly afterwards. That these instructions could not have been intended to apply in full detail to all of the Master's writings is clearly shown by the innumerable Tablets sent to us that were almost never written in his own hand beyond the signature. However, I agree with you entirely that he would wish even more strongly that anyone feeling that he had reasonable grounds to doubt the authenticity of so gravely important a document as his Will should take every reasonable precaution to be sure.

Sincerely,

(Signed) MOUNTFORD MILLS.

Here again in both letters Mr. Mills' statements: "It is written entirely in the Master's own hand," and . . . "All three sections are in the handwriting of Abdul Baha" are no proof at all, as only a handwriting expert is legally qualified to judge the authenticity of the handwriting of a questioned will.

In response to other letters that I wrote to the National Spiritual Assembly, reiterating my request for photographs of the alleged will in order to have it examined by handwriting experts, I received a reply from Mr. Holley asking me to meet the members of the Spiritual Assembly. I accepted this invitation and met them on February 25, 1928. The object of the meeting on their part was, apparently, to try and make me feel that I should accept this document on verbal and circumstantial evidence. I, on my part, reiterated what I had written in my letters and tried to make them realize that to accept it in this manner was disobedience to the commands of Abdul Baha.

I asked them how they could possibly believe they were carrying out the wishes of Abdul Baha in accepting this alleged will before they had first carried out his wishes regarding the acceptance of any document alleged to be his. I reminded them that he had written:

"Any Persian . . . (who comes to America) . . . even if it is Shoghi Effendi, or Rouhi Effendi (the two grandsons of Abdul Baha) the friends must demand of him before anything else, his credential letter, written in my handwriting, or signed with my signature."

(Signed) Abdul Baha Abbas.

From Star of the West, October 16, 1915.

They contended that this referred to a certain relative of Abdul Baha's. I maintained that it referred to anyone, and that it made no difference whether a letter or document alleged to be Abdul Baha's was brought or sent to us. He would insist that we should see his own writing or signature before we accepted it. In particular this would apply to his alleged will, for it gave Shoghi Effendi authority totally out of keeping with Bahai principles.

The fact that Shoghi Effendi was specified in the letter of Abdul Baha just quoted, was portentous of what has happened. It was a prophetic warning foreshadowing just what has taken place.

I learned at this meeting with the Assembly that the photographs of the alleged will, which I had requested three months prior to this meeting, had not even been sent for. Therefore the next day, before the members of the Spiritual Assembly adjourned, I sent a letter to them by special delivery in which I urged that they cable to Mr. Allen McDaniel, who was then in Haifa, and request him to bring back the photographs when he returned.

In response to this letter Mr. Holly wrote that the photographs had been sent for.

Chapter IV

London — on the trail of the alleged Will

Although everyone whom I had questioned concerning the alleged will of Abdul Baha had assured me that it had never been photographed, yet about this time I heard that one set of photographs did exist and was owned by a Persian in London.

In order to insure having photostatic copies made from these in case the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais failed to secure the photographs they had sent for, or would not permit me to photograph them in case they came, I sailed with my husband for England on April 25, 1928.

I believed I could secure copies of the set through the help of a prominent Bahai in London, Mrs. Claudia Coles, because I had rendered her a great service in 1926, through foreknowledge of an event that vitally concerned her welfare. The whole story is so extraordinary that I wish I could recount it here, for it demonstrates that those who follow guidance must be willing to follow it for others also, no matter how much work is entailed and how much time and money spent. Lawrence and I had made our trip to London in 1926 solely to help her. In this particular case the Higher Powers had acted on me in the same way that a novelist acts when, as he plots his novel, he "plants" ahead of time hints of future events. Many times I have been moved in this way to do inexplicable things, the wisdom of which only became known to me later. Happy are we if we can catch a glimpse of the plot of our lives and align ourselves with it.

The events of 1926 gave Mrs. Coles such confidence in me that now, when I suddenly appeared two years later and asked her to secure for me the photographs of the will of Abdul Baha, she gladly consented.

The very day after our arrival the photographs were in our hands and together we went to the British Museum and had them photostated. Some of the ten sheets were illegible in part, as evidently something had been spilled over the photographs from which they had been reproduced, or perhaps the plates had been over-exposed. But, needless to say, I was overjoyed at the truly miraculous way in which we had gained possession of them.

After meeting practically all the Bahais in London and many of those in Germany, we returned to America with the much-coveted document, arriving in New York on May 29th, 1928. On that very day Mr. Holley wrote to me that the photographs of the will were at his office and invited me to inspect them. But I assured him that an inspection at his office would not suffice. Three days later, on June 1st, he wrote to me again and his attitude is typical of that of all the Bahais in the organization toward the alleged will. He thought that by looking at it, and then looking at the writing, which might or might not be that of Abdul Baha, I could judge whether the writing of the will is genuine. They surely must have known that only an expert could determine this after much work with the comparative microscoper used by handwriting experts. The following is part of his letter:

My dear Mrs. White:

June 1, 1928.

At the time when the National Assembly recorded in its minutes a reference to your joint meeting with us, and our decision to request photographs or photostats of the Will and Testament, it was not contemplated that you would require more than a careful inspection of these copies of the original papers at my office. The members felt sure that by comparing the signature and handwriting with copies of original tablets which might be in your possession, you could readily satisfy yourself that the Will and Testament is absolutely genuine.

If I had not surprised him with the information that I had just returned from London with photostatic copies of the alleged will, I believe that an inspection at his office is all that would have been granted me. When I asked permission to have his set photostated as some of the sheets of those I had were partly obliterated, he said he would bring the matter up before the members of the National Spiritual Assembly.

While awaiting their decision I wrote them another letter on June 26th, 1928, saying that it would greatly assist me if they would send me three or four photographs of tablets of Abdul Baha, written in his own hand, in order that these might be compared with the alleged will. Although I sent this by registered mail and the return card came back with Mr. Holley's signature, yet when he mailed the photostats to me on July 13th no mention was made of my request. This despite the fact that there were in the Bahai archives in New York, as early as 1907, five hundred tablets of Abdul Baha.*

*See Tablets of Abdul Baha, Vol. I. Introduction.

In fact the National Spiritual Assembly by refusing to have the original text of the will examined themselves and by their obvious reluctance to assist me in my efforts to have it done, appeared to be unwilling to put the alleged will to the test of handwriting analysis for fear that it might be proved invalid.

My next step was to secure the services of the greatest handwriting expert I could obtain, one whose integrity was above reproach. I finally went to Mr. Albert S. Osborne but for a number of reasons he could not undertake the task. Yet he was greatly interested, very kind, and gave me valuable advice. He said that the document should be examined from three different angles. First, from the spiritual point of view. Does the alleged will agree with the teachings and the intent that the maker held during his lifetime, or does it contradict them? Secondly, from the literary point of view. Is it written in the style of Abdul Baha? Thirdly, from the scientific point of view — submit it to the scrutiny of the best handwriting experts. As he lived in Montclair, New Jersey, Mr. Osborne kindly procured for me a photograph of the inscription written by Abdul Baha on May 12, 1912, in the Bible in the Unitarian Church in that city.

Mr. Osborne emphasized the value of having the original document of the will examined. As this was in the Holy Land he suggested that I take the matter up with the British Analyst in Palestine. But on inquiry I was told there was none there. I therefore wrote to the High Commissioner of Palestine on December 31st, 1928. I assumed that, inasmuch as the alleged will was an affair of international interest and inasmuch as it had been incorporated, without legal proof of its authenticity, in the bylaws of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is, and had thereby empowered Shoghi Effendi to collect large sums of money, the High Commissioner might undertake the examination of the document. I felt also that his verdict would carry much more weight than if I personally undertook the work, even if I had had the means to do so.

The following is the reply to my letter:

Secretarial, Government offices, Jerusalem, 6th February, 1929.

Madam,

I am directed to refer to your letter of the 31st December regarding the Will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas and to inform you that any information which you wish to obtain must be obtained privately and that if you wish to take any steps to examine the Will you would be well advised to employ an advocate in Palestine.

The money order which accompanied your letter is returned herewith.

I am, Madam,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) E. Mus,
For Chief Secretary.

Mrs. H. Lawrence White
New York City, U. S. A.

This letter from the High Commissioner was such a disappointment that I decided to publish the result of my long and careful study of the material bearing on what Mr. Osborne called 'spiritual proof': does the alleged will agree with or contradict the expressed intent of the alleged maker? In the autumn of 1929 I published the book to which I have already referred, "The Bahai Religion and its Enemy, the Bahai Organization." This was followed in 1930 by an appendix in which I definitely challenged the authenticity of the will.

For between the publication of this book and the appendix I sailed for England in order to engage the services of the very best handwriting expert in England, Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell. I felt he was especially qualified as he is the official expert on documents in the British Museum and the editor of THE ANALYST. Equally important was the fact that he is a man above reproach.

I submitted to him specimens of the handwriting of Abdul Baha together with photostat copies of the alleged will. The authentic specimens that I submitted are as follows:

1. A photographic copy of the inscription which Abdul Baha wrote in the Bible of the Unitarian Church at Montclair N. J. in 1912. This was secured for me by Albert S. Osborn and on the upper left margin of the photograph was typed: "Authentic writing of Abdul Baha written in the book of the Unitarian Church, at Montclair, N.J., U.S.A. 1912"

2. Writing from the Guest Bible for 1912, City Temple, London. This photostat copy was made by Donald Macbeth of the Manuscript Division of the British Museum.

3. Authentic signatures on two letters written to Mrs. J. Stannard and a signature on a very old letter written to Mrs. Devine.

The three photographs herewith reproduced are: 1. Section of the alleged will of Abdul Baha. 2. Facsimile reproduction of the authentic writing of Abdul Baha written in the Bible of the Unitarian Church, Montclair, New Jersey in 1912. 3. Facsimile reproduction of the writing of Abdul Baha written in the Guest Bible of the City Temple, London, in 1912:

Two of these specimens herewith reproduced are authentic writings of Abdul Baha beyond a doubt. The one from the Guest Bible of the City Temple, London, agrees with the writing in the Bible of the Unitarian Church at Montclair, New Jersey. Three men witnessed Abdul Baha write with his own hand the inscription in the Bible of the City Temple. They are: John Kelman, Oliver Lodge, and Edwin Brough. Donald Macbeth, of the manuscript department of the British Museum, who photographed it, signed on the back of the photograph to that effect. The following is the translation of this inscription that Abdul Baha wrote in the Bible of the City Temple, in 1913:

This book is the Holy Book of God, Celestial Inspiration; it is the Bible of Salvation, the noble Gospel. It is the mystery of the Kingdom and its Lights. It is the Divine Bounty, the sign of the Guidance of God.

(Signed) 'Abdul Baha' 'Abbas

This English translation appears side by side with the Persian writing of Abdul Baha.

The following is a translation of the inscription that Abdul Baha wrote in the Bible of the Unitarian Church at Montclair, New Jersey, May 12, 1912, on which occasion he spoke at that church:

"O Almighty! O Pure God! Thanks be unto Thee that the mountain and desert were traversed, the all surrounding ocean was crossed until we arrived on this continent and now in this country have we loosed our tongue in Thy name and Mention, and in this church like unto Elias have we heralded Thy Kingdom.

O God! Attract the members of this church to Thy Beauty, protect and guard them under Thy Shelter and bless them!

(Signed) Abdul Baha Abbas.

The third specimen of handwriting reproduced here is from the alleged will of Abdul Baha. A comparison of this enlarged writing with the enlarged writing of the two authentic writings of Abdul Baha makes differences perfectly apparent that would not be so apparent without enlargement.

There can be no doubt about the authenticity of this signature to Mrs. Devine's letter, or of the two signatures in letters to Mrs. Stannard. Dr. Mitchell said that these two undoubted specimens of Abdul Baha's writing and the specimen from the Unitarian Church in Montclair, and also that from the City Temple in London, all agree together as the writing of the same person.

After months of analytical work on the handwriting of the alleged will, comparing it with the three undoubted specimens of Abdul Baha's writing, Dr. Mitchell says that the writing in the alleged will is not all in the same hand. Furthermore none of it is in the same handwriting as the specimens submitted. The following chapter is devoted to Dr. Mitchell's report.

R E P O R T

ON THE WRITING SHOWN ON THE PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE ALLEGED WILL OF ABDUL BAHA.

I have made a minute examination of the writing in the photographs and photographic enlargements of the alleged will of Abdul Baha, and have compared it with the authenticated writing of Abdul Baha in a series of photographs and photographic enlargements received from Mrs. H. Lawrence White.

In the absence of an opportunity to examine the original document, any conclusions to be drawn from an examination of the photographic enlargements must necessarily be of a provisional character contingent upon the accuracy of the photographic records. Moreover, some of the facts which are taken into consideration in the scientific examination of an original document cannot be perfectly studied in a photographic reproduction, such as, for example, the ink, paper, penstrokes, and so on.

Assuming that the authenticated specimens of writing are of approximately the same period as that at which the disputed will is alleged to have been written and signed, the points which can be accurately compared in the photographic enlargements are the mode of formation of the writing, the changes in pressure, the form of individual letters, and the relationship in the size of parts of the letter to the whole.

A fact requiring explanation is the presence of apparent erasures on some of the pages of the will, namely in lines 12 and 13 of page 2, and line 13 of page 4. Without a microscopical examination of the original document it is not possible to state whether a chemical agent has been used, but assuming there have been erasures at these points I think it probable that they were done mechanically, not chemically. The apparent erasure on page 5, line 11, may possibly be the result of an imprint from other written matter while the ink was wet.

The photographic reproductions of authenticated specimens of the writing of Abdul Baha were the following:—

1. Writing from the Book of the Unitarian Church, Montclair, New Jersey.
2. Writing from the Guest Bible for 1912, City Temple, London.
3. Authenticated signatures on two letters to Mrs.

Fac-Simile Writing of Abdul Baha from the Bible of the City Temple, London

Stannard on a photograph, and a possibly authentic signature in the possession of Mrs. Devine.

There is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the signature from Mrs. Devine, since it agrees closely with the other signatures.

The Signatures on the Envelope: — A comparison of the four signatures on the envelope of the alleged will with the four authenticated signatures reveals many striking differences in the mode of formation of the characters, as for example:

In the authentic signatures the width of these characters, compared with their height, is much greater than in the signatures on the envelope. The strokes are also much firmer in the envelope signatures than in the authenticated signatures.

In the authenticated signature, the entire character is roughly $2\frac{1}{4}$ times the width of the open space between the uprights; in the disputed signatures the corresponding figure is twice as great. In the authentic signatures the cusp is rounded; in the disputed signatures it is pointed. In the authenticated signatures the relationship between the depth of the gap and its breadth is as 1 : 1.4 to 1.6, whereas in the disputed signatures it is as 1 : 2.3 to 2.6. Thus the ratio is totally different. In my opinion these differences are not consistent with the signatures upon the envelope being in the writing of the writer of the authenticated signature.

The Body of the Will: — A comparison of the formation of the writing on the envelope with that on pages 9 and 10 of the will shows so many points of resemblance that there is no reason to doubt that they were written by the same person.

I have also studied minutely the photographic enlargements of the writing on the other pages of the will, and have formed the following conclusions:—

The other pages, namely 5, 6, 7 and 8, agree in the characteristics of writing with the writing on Page 4. That is to say, the writing does not agree with the hypothesis that it was all written by one person.

The writing of Abdul Baha has certain distinctive features, among which are a sudden change of pressure in some of the strokes, wavering formation of some of the curves, and the formation of sharp angles in some of the characters. These characteristics are sharply indicated in the enlarged photographs of the writing in the City Temple, London, and in the Montclair writing.

A minute comparison of the authenticated writing with the writing on every page of the alleged will, and in particular with the lines 10, 11 and 12 on page 5, has failed to detect in any part of the will the characteristics of the writing of Abdul Baha, as shown in the authenticated specimens.

In addition to these differences in writing habits, there are also differences in the shapes of many of the parallel characters in the body of the document compared with the authenticated writing, as in the case of the signatures mentioned above.

(Signed) C. AINSWORTH MITCHELL.*

Dr. Mitchell not only spent months examining the enlarged specimens submitted to him, but he examined minutely every line of the ten photographs of the alleged will, and his conclusion is that it is not written throughout by the same person. This fact, in addition to others, indicates that the will is spurious, especially if we bear in mind that Shoghi Effendi, and the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is, assert that every word of it is written in the hand of Abdul Baha. Also if we bear in mind that it is undated, and unwitnessed, and that it contradicts the teachings that both Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha gave during their lifetimes — that the Bahai Cause is a spiritual democracy and not a theocracy. The appointment of an hereditary guardianship contradicts this.

Dr. Mitchell's report also shows that none of the handwriting of the alleged will is the same as the authentic specimens of Abdul Baha's handwriting that were submitted to him.

The ratio between the depth of the gap and its breadth, Dr. Mitchell shows, is totally different between the authentic signatures and those in the alleged will. It is as 1:1.4 to 1.6 in the authentic signatures, whereas in the disputed signatures it is as 1:2.3 to 2.6.

Most persons are unaware of the fact that handwriting experts use modern inventions that measure the slants, the spaces, and the tremors of writing so accurately that it makes the difference between two specimens of different writing overwhelmingly apparent, when these are enlarged, even though one of the specimens may be so clever a forgery of the other as to appear identical to the naked eye.

Those Bahais who assert that they are familiar with the handwriting of Abdul Baha, and have compared it with the writing of the will, and have found them identical, reveal the fact that they are either totally unaware of the science used by the best handwriting experts, or else fear has prompted them to assert their belief in the authenticity of the will — fear of being excommunicated if they so much as question the document. This science that the best handwriting experts use is so mathematically accurate that any number of experts using these modern inventions will arrive at the same results.

I have already referred to the extreme care that Abdul Baha showed in regard to letters purporting to be from him, sent or brought to this country. The following instance shows that he was even more careful to make certain that any Tablet or document of his relating to important public matters was properly translated and authenticated before it was sent out. He wrote a Tablet to the Secretary of the Court for Durable Peace, at the Hague, on December 17, 1919, and he considered it necessary to have four men translate it. These four men were Shoghi Effendi (Rabanni), Dr. Zia M. Bagdadi, Mirza Lotfullah Hakim, and Dr. J. E. Esselmont. This Tablet was signed Abdul Baha Abbas, and was published in the Star of the West (Bahai Magazine), August 1, 1920, with the four names of the translators and witnesses.

The quadruple witnessing of this Tablet, written two years before Abdul Baha passed from this world, makes it evident that he did not consider Shoghi Effendi careful enough, or efficient enough, to translate the Tablet to the Court for Durable Peace without the help of three other men. Is it likely, then, that at this very time an authentic will of Abdul Baha's, of infinitely greater importance than this Tablet to the Hague, should lay hidden in the earth, undated and unwitnessed, in which this same Shoghi Effendi was appointed sole guardian of the Bahai Cause, with more potential power and wealth than a king and pope combined? And that later this same will was translated by one person only, the beneficiary himself — Shoghi Effendi. Is this in accordance with Abdul Baha's super-carefulness?

Chapter VI

Spiritual indications that the will is spurious.

I have tried to show that the authenticity of the alleged will does not stand the test of handwriting analysis; that its contents contradict the often expressed intent of Baha'o'llah and of Abdul Baha for Bahais; and that its undated, unwitnessed condition is in direct contradiction to Abdul Baha's habits of extreme, meticulous care in regard to everything which he wrote.

I wish now to trace the devastating effect of this alleged will upon the organization which accepted it blindly, and to show by contrast the splendid work which has been done by Bahais who have acted freely and in accordance with true Bahai teachings.

Abdul Baha said that if an angel from heaven comes down and tries to change the teachings of Baha'o'llah, do not believe him. Shoghi Effendi has changed them by pronouncements and actions which are in direct contradiction to Bahai teachings — above all he has changed the very character and fundamental principle of the Cause by putting a theocracy, which the founders said it was not, in place of the spiritual democracy which they said, over and over again, it is. The following instances show what acceptance of the alleged will has done to the blind followers of its rules.

Mr. Horace Holley, as spokesman for Shoghi Effendi, made this statement in 1925:

"The individual conscience must be subordinated to the decisions of the elected Spiritual Assembly."*

This statement strikes at the very foundation of the Bahai Cause, as one of its cardinal teachings is that man must have freedom of conscience. Among dozens of instances that could be given of Abdul Baha's statements on this subject is the following:

" . . . the conscience of man is sacred and to be respected; and that liberty thereof produces widening of ideas, amendment of morals, improvement of conduct, disclosure of the secrets of creation, and manifestation of the hidden verities of the contingent world. . . . So in the world of existence two persons unanimous in all grades (of thought) and all beliefs cannot be found. 'The ways unto God are as the number of the breaths of (His) creatures,' is a mysterious truth. . . . "

Again, about twenty years later, Abdul Baha said:

" . . . Just as in the world of politics there is need for free thought, likewise in the world of religion there should be the right of unrestricted individual belief. Consider what a vast difference exists between modern democracy and the old forms of despotism. Under an autocratic government the opinions of men are not free, and the development is stifled, whereas in democracy, because thought and speech are not restricted, the greatest progress is witnessed. It is likewise true in the world of religion. When freedom of conscience, liberty of thought and right of speech prevail, that is to say, when every man according to his own idealization may give expression to his beliefs, development and growth are inevitable.” *

We can see from the foregoing that Abdul Baha emphasized the necessity of man's being able to exercise freedom of conscience, as Baha'o'llah did.

The reason Mr. Holley, as spokesman for Shoghi Effendi, made this incredible statement that “. . . the individual conscience must be subordinated to the Spiritual Assembly, . . .” is that since Abdul Baha passed from this world the Bahai teachings have been garbled in such a way as to lead people to suppose that when Baha'o'llah said that mankind must obey its governments he meant the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is!

In order to realize how this inversion could have taken place we must understand that Baha'o'llah gave to the world, as one of the cardinal points of his teachings, the necessity for a Supreme Tribunal, composed of the wisest men in each nation, and he used such expressions as “Assembly” and “National Assembly,” in speaking of these anticipated Parliaments of the world. This title, “National Assembly,” was adopted by the Bahai's when they began their activities in America over forty years ago. Whether the leaders of that time did this with the intention of making the writings of Baha'o'llah appear as if they referred to the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is whenever he spoke of the National Assemblies, or Parliaments of the world, I do not know. But I do know that Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahá'ís are forcing this interpretation upon the Bahá'í world today.

The only valid subordination of the individual conscience is, according to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and of Abdul Bahá, in civil matters, as for instance in the election of Mr. Roosevelt for president. He won by majority vote, therefore those who had voted for Thomas Dewey had to subordinate their individual conscience, that is their preference, to the wishes of the majority.

During the lifetime of Abdul Bahá the attempts of the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahá'ís to organize the Bahá'í Religion were held in abeyance, but after he passed from this world, under the dictates of Shoghi Effendi, they swung it into an organization the like of which has not been seen since the dark ages. They tried to exercise the power over the Bahá'í world that Bahá'u'lláh said would be vested in the SUPREME TRIBUNAL of the future world governments. In order to enforce this power they excommunicated those who would not accept their pronouncements, and twice the members of the National Assembly sued at law in order to try and prevent other Bahá'ís from promulgating the religion which they held in common; but, fortunately, they lost both these suits. Judge Valente, reprimanding them, reminded them of the Bill of Rights, which grants freedom to every man to practice his religion unmolested. All of this the reader can learn in the ensuing pages.

The Tablet that Abdul Bahá wrote to the Court for Durable Peace at The Hague, referred to in the preceding pages, is one among many instances that could be cited confirming what has here been stated — that when Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha speak of "Assembly," and "National Assemblies" in relation to world governments, they do not mean the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is. Part of this Tablet of Abdul Baha's follows:

To the Central Organization for Durable Peace

Office of Secretary:

19 Prinsesegracht

The Hague, Holland

Executive Committee

"O ye esteemed ones who are the pioneers among the well-wishers of the world of humantiy!

"There is not one soul whose conscience does not testify that in this day there is no more important matter in the world than that of Universal Peace. . . .

". . . the teachings of His Holiness Baha'o'llah were not limited to the establishment of Universal Peace . . .

". . . Among these teachings was the independent investigation of reality . . .

". . . the oneness of the world of humanity . .

". . . religion must be the cause of fellowship and love . . .

". . . religion must be in conformity with science and reason. . . .

". . . religious, racial, political, economic and patriotic prejudices destroy the edifice of humanity. . . .

“Regarding the economic préjudice, it is apparent that whenever the ties between nations become strengthened and the exchange of commodities accelerated, and any economic principle is established in one country, it will ultimately affect the other countries and universal benefits will result. . .

“As to political prejudice, the policy of God must be followed and it is indisputable that the policy of God is greater than human policy. We must follow the Divine policy and that applies to all individuals. He treats all individuals alike: no distinction is made, and that is the foundation of the Divine Religions.

“And among the teachings of His Holiness Baha’o’llah is the origination of one language that may be spread universally among the people in order that this universal language may eliminate misunderstandings from among mankind.

“. . . the unity of women and men. The world of humanity has two wings — one is women and the other men. Not until both wings are equally developed can the bird fly. . . .

“. . . voluntary sharing of one’s property with others among mankind. This voluntary sharing is greater than equality, . . . But this should not be introduced by coercion so that it becomes a law and man is compelled to follow it. Nay, rather, man should voluntarily and of his own choice sacrifice his property and life for others, and spend willingly for the poor, . . .”

“And among the teachings of His Holiness Baha

'o'llah is man's freedom, and through the ideal Power he should be free and emancipated from the captivity of the world of nature; . . .

"And among the teachings of Baha'o'llah is that religion is a mighty bulwark. If the edifice of religion shakes and totters, commotion and chaos will ensue and the order of things will be utterly upset, for in the world of mankind there are two safeguards that protect man from wrong doing. One is the law which punishes the criminal; but the law prevents only the manifest crime and not the concealed sin; whereas the ideal safeguard, namely, the religion of God, prevents both the manifest and the concealed crime, trains man, educates morals, compels the adoption of virtues and is the all inclusive power which guarantees the felicity of the world of mankind. But by religion is meant . . . the foundation of Divine Religions and not human imitations.

"And among the teachings of Baha'o'llah is that although material civilization is one of the means for the progress of the world of mankind, yet until it becomes combined with Divine civilization the desired result, which is the felicity of mankind will not be attained. . . . Divine civilization is the lamp itself and the glass without the light is dark. Material civilization is like the body. No matter how infinitely graceful, elegant and beautiful it may be, it is dead. Divine civilization is like the spirit, and the body gets its life from the spirit, otherwise it becomes a corpse. It has thus been made evident that the world of mankind is in need of the breaths of the Holy Spirit. . . .

"In fine such teachings are numerous. These manifold principles, which constitute the greatest basis for the felicity of mankind and are of the bounties of the Merciful, must be added to the matter of Universal Peace and combined with it, so that results may accrue. Otherwise the realization of Universal Peace (by itself) in the world of mankind is difficult. As the teachings of His Holiness Baha 'o'llah are combined with Universal Peace, they are like a table provided with every kind of fresh and delicious food. Every soul can find, at that table of Infinite bounty, that which he desires. If the question is restricted to Universal Peace alone, the remarkable results which are expected and desired will not be attained. The scope of Universal Peace must be such that all the communities and religions may find their highest wish realized in it. At present the teachings of His Holiness Baha'o'llah are such that all the communities of the world, whether religious, political or ethical, ancient or modern, find in the teachings of Baha'o'llah the expression of their highest wish.

"For example, the question of Universal Peace, about which His Holiness Baha'o'llah says that the SUPREME TRIBUNAL must be established; although the LEAGUE OF NATIONS has been brought into existence, yet it is incapable of establishing Universal Peace. But the Supreme Tribunal which His Holiness has described will fulfil this sacred task with the utmost might and power. And his plan is this: that the national assemblies of each country and nation — that is to say parliaments — should elect two or three persons who are the choicest men of that nation, and are well-informed concerning international laws and the relations between governments and aware of the essential needs of the world of humanity in this day. The number of these representatives should be in proportion to the number of inhabitants of that country. The election of these souls who are chosen by the national assembly, that is, the parliament, must be confirmed by the upper house, the congress and the cabinet and also by the president or monarch so that these persons may be the elected ones of all the nation and the government. From among these people the members of the Supreme Tribunal will be elected, and all mankind will thus have a share therein, for everyone of these delegates is fully representative of his nation. When the Supreme Tribunal gives a ruling on any international question, either unanimously or by majority-rule, there will no longer be any pretext for the plaintiff or ground of objections for the defendant. In case any of the governments or nations, in the execution of the irrefutable decision of the Supreme Tribunal, be negligent or dilatory, the rest of the nations will rise up against it, because all the governments and nations of the world are the supporters of this SUPREME TRIBUNAL. Consider what a firm foundation this is! But by a limited and restricted LEAGUE the purpose will not be realized as it ought and should. This is the truth about the situation, which has been stated."

Dr. Zia M. Bagdadi
Mirza Lotfullah Hakim,
Dr. J. E. Esslemont.

The reader will note that whenever Abdul Baha speaks of "National Assemblies," he always adds "The Parliaments of the world."

This Tablet, a résumé of some of Baha'o'llah's teachings, deals chiefly with the necessity of establishing a SUPREME TRIBUNAL. The United Nations Organization is an embryonic SUPREME TRIBUNAL such as he envisioned eighty years ago, and even though the results of this first attempt may still be far from successful, yet the beginning of the fulfillment of this prophecy is a harbinger of better things to come.

When Baha'o'llah spoke of the necessity for the establishment of the SUPREME TRIBUNAL, he released with those words the leaven of the Spirit to all mankind. Those who were receptive, including people who may never have heard of Baha'o'llah, became animated by this leaven to carry parts of the Bahai Teachings into action. And this leaven has been working ever since. For eighty years it has worked in many ways — worked through constructive means, such as inspiring those with scientific talents to discover great inventions — airplanes, radio and many others — which united the world physically in preparation for its spiritual unification. This leaven worked even through destructive forces such as the great chastisement of the two world wars. During and after this last world war we have heard it said frequently that "there are no atheists in the fox holes."

Abdul Baha's method of conveying the Bahai Message was largely by way of tests. He gave the universal teachings in three ways — by speech, by deeds, and as Baha'o'llah did, by the leaven of the Spirit. He rarely said, "Do not do this or that." He never interfered with anybody's conception of religion. If one could not learn by precept, and example, and the awakening of the Inner Light, one had to learn by the more difficult way of tests and chastisements. The spiritual law of tests is one of the cardinal points of every religion that ever existed; it is Christ's spiritual law of Cause and Effect — "As a man sows so shall he reap." It is one aspect of the Buddhist and Hindu Law of Karma. It applies to all of us whether we believe in it or not, and regardless of what religion we belong to, or even if we belong to none at all. The following, by Abdul Baha, on "Tests" embodies this fundamental law of all religions:

In this day everyone must be tested, as the time of the Chosen Ones to prove their worth is indeed very short. The Day of Attainment is drawing to a close for them. The First Fruits must be ripened in Spirit, mellowed in Love, and consumed by their self-sacrifice and severance. None other are acceptable as First Fruits and all that fail to attain to the standard through the tests are relegated to the many who are called.

The more one is severed from the world, from desires, from human affairs and conditions, the more impervious does one become to the tests of God. Tests are a means by which a soul is measured as to its fitness and proven out by its own acts. God knows its fitness beforehand and also its unpreparedness, but man, with an ego, would not believe himself unfit unless proof were given him. Consequently his susceptibility to evil is proven to him when he falls into the tests and the tests are continued until the soul realizes its own unfitness, then remorse and regret tend to root out the weakness.

The same test comes again in a greater degree, until it is shown that a former weakness has become a strength and the power to overcome evil has been established.

The worst enemies of the Cause are in the Cause and mention the Name of God. We need not fear the enemies on the outside for such can be easily dealt with. But the enemies who call themselves Friends and who persistently violate every fundamental law of Love and Unity are difficult to deal with in this Day. . . .

This last paragraph applies overwhelmingly to the activities of Shoghi Effendi, and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is. They have violated the principles of brotherhood and unity because of their inversions of the Bahai teachings. These inversions are all the more tragic at this particular time when the world has been made receptive, through much suffering, to the great universal principles of the Bahai Religion. Two prophecies of Baha'o'llah have been so accurately fulfilled — the discovery of Atomic Power, and the embryonic Supreme Tribunal as manifested in the United Nations Organization that we would do well to consider the third — the possible destruction of our planet unless we circumvent this threatened fate by a balanced spiritual civilization.

The following prophecy of Abdul Baha, recorded by Charles Mason Remey in answer to some questions that he asked in 1911, may also be an indirect allusion to atomic power:

What is the significance of the prophecy, 'Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand, three hundred and five and thirty days (1335)?' Daniel 12:12.

A. After that date a great disturbance — a terrible (material) calamity is to happen in the world.

Q. Is it to be in the form of war and strife, or will it be as an earthquake, such as has happened in Messina and elsewhere?

A. Wars and earthquakes, such as you have mentioned, will happen, but these, compared with this great catastrophe to come, will be as nothing. As in the past whole peoples and civilizations have, through physical changes, been obliterated, so that not a trace has remained, so it will be when this great change shall take place.

Q. In the Bible there is a prophecy: "And it shall come to pass that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die, but the third part shall be left therein" (Zechariah 13:8-9.) Does this refer to the happening in question?

A. Yes.

Q. Will this take place soon after the date 1917 (which is the date mentioned, 1335 days) or 1335

A.H. (after Mohammed), or 1917 A.D., or will it happen in the very distant future?

A. It is not so very soon after nor again is it in the so very distant future.

At a later date Abdul Baha explained that these 1335 days mean 1335 solar years, from the flight of Mohammed from Medina to Mecca, which is the beginning of the Mohammedan era 622. This date added to 1335 is 1957.

Strangely enough, as I finish this book in February, 1946, a radio commentator flashes the news that a nation wide poll representing a cross section of the United States, revealed the fact that millions of people believe that within the next ten or fifteen years Russia and the United States will be at war. If this happens we know it will be an atomic war. We also know that the prophecy in the Bible, ". . . two parts therein shall be cut off and die but the third shall be left therein," might then become a reality. Ten or fifteen years from now would bring the date for this cataclysm within the specified time of both this Biblical prophecy and the foregoing prophecy of Abdul Baha. However, both Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha show that we can circumvent threatened cataclysms through faith in God and prayer, combined with the practice of the principles of religion. In other words, we can deflect any destructive forces leveled at us if enough people will revivify their faith in God and prayer. Baha'o'llah says on this subject:

"The decrees of God as related to fate and predestination are of two kinds. Both are to be obeyed and accepted. The one is irrevocable, the other is, as termed by men, impending. To the former all must unreservedly submit, inasmuch as it is fixed and settled. . . .

The decree that is impending, however, is such that prayer and entreaty can succeed in averting it."

This matter of freedom of conscience is the most important part of the Bahai Teachings. God has given man free-will, and no earthly priestcraft nor dictatorship must interfere with man's using that free-will in matters of faith and the inner relationship between the soul and God. This is the meaning of the spiritual democracy of which Abdul Baha so often speaks — religion percolating through all the affairs of our daily life, and an ideal political government coming into existence as the result of the change of man's nature and belief.

Many great evils are caused by leaders who have tried to control the conscience of man. We have seen this in our day in Russia, where the first canon of communism is atheism. Over the Kremlin is written: "Religion is the opiate of the people." In Nazi Germany political dictators said: "You must believe in no form of government but mine." A religious dictator says in substance: "You must not believe in any conception of God except what I tell you to believe."

This is just the twist that the present leaders of the Bahai organization have tried to give to the Universal Message of Baha'o'llah.

There are many other wholly un-Bahai edicts that Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais have issued beside these two that follow:

" . . . the individual conscience must be subor-minated to the decisions of the Spiritual Assembly,

 . . . and:

“ . . . individual Bahai effort without due consultation is foredoomed to failure.”

Other un-Bahai edicts that are given from time to time in the secret paper BAHAI NEWS, and circulated by the National Spiritual Assembly among its members are:*

1. “Recognized Bahais of the United States and Canada must not take part in any local, provincial or national election, conducted by political parties, where votes are to be cast for one or two or more candidates.” (This forbids voting for our presidents or voting in other government matters.)

2. “Recognized Bahais must not run for any public office as candidates of any political party, nor take part, directly or indirectly, in the promotion of any party or party platform.

3. “Recognized Bahais must not vote in any election based upon a party system.”

4. “Recognized Bahais must abstain from association with movements advocating social changes that presume partisan political action.

5. “Recognized Bahais who speak on Bahai platforms must abstain from making any critical statements about any particular government or national policy.”

6. “Every Local Bahai Center must be responsible for the carrying out of the above laws by the Bahais in their respective communities. Local membership must include only the names of those who faithfully obey these regulations."

*See BROKEN SILENCE, Pages 155-6, by Ahmad Sohrab, New History Foundation, 132 East 65th Street, New York, N. Y.

7. "Recognized Bahais must not retain or apply for membership in any church or religious group."

8. "Bahais failing to give unreserved obedience to the above regulations and to numerous others which are constantly legislated, and month after month spread on the pages of the BAHAI NEWS by the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the United States and Canada, are expelled or excommunicated from the Cause, and the Bahais are not permitted to associate with these expelled or excommunicated ones, regardless of friendship, no matter of how long standing, nor of the depth of their affection or love."

Everyone of these edicts are inversions of the Bahai Teachings, as given to the world by the Founders of the Cause.

In saying that recognized Bahais must not vote in any election based on a party system Shoghi Effendi and his hierarchy have set up what might be considered a government within each government in every country where there are enough of his followers. Over that government he is supreme dictator. His subjects must pay taxes to him (tithes) and he forbids his followers to vote on national and civic affairs. All his edicts no matter how un-patriotic, or how much in violation of the universal principles of the Bahai Religion, must be obeyed under threat of excommunication.

This revival of excommunication is a horrible inversion of the Bahai teachings — the Revelation for which Baha'o'llah suffered imprisonment for twenty-five years, and Abdul Baha for forty years — the Cause for which twenty thousand martyrs sacrificed their lives to establish freedom of conscience and to unite all mankind regardless of religion, race or country. The idea of excommunication is impossible in the world envisaged by Baha'o'llah.

Chapter VII

The Lawsuit of the National Spiritual Assembly

The most shocking act of the Bahai organization considered from the point of view of the intentions of the Founders of the Cause, was the legal prosecution brought by the organization against certain well known Bahais who were trying to spread the teachings in the universal spirit in which they had been first given to the world. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab founded the New History Society in New York in 1929, and The Caravan a year later, with the sincere desire of spreading the Bahai teachings and spirit. They were so successful that Shoghi Effendi 'excommunicated' them, and later, with his sanction, the National Spiritual Assembly brought suit against them in 1941. I quote in full the statement made against them by the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais:

Statement made by plaintiffs:

1. The individual plaintiffs sue, as members of the National Spiritual Assembly and Trustees of the Bahais of the United States and Canada. The Spiritual Assembly of Bahais of the City of New York, a religious corporation, is a co-plaintiff.

The complaint alleges that the name Baha'i denotes a religion identified with the name of the founder BAHÁ.

2. The plaintiffs claim to be the authorized representatives of all the Bahais of the United States and Canada.

3. They allege that they are publishing books and other publications which teach Bahai Religion.

4. They charge that the defendants, who were members prior to April 5, 1929, of the Bahai Congregation of the City of New York, have been conducting, without the authority of plaintiffs, meetings, lectures, classes, social gatherings and other activities, and announcing and advertising the same as Bahai meetings, lectures, classes, etc.

5. They complain that the defendants have been giving these meetings, lectures, etc., a Bahai appearance and atmosphere by teaching, in connection therewith, a religion described as the Bahai Religion and that they have created an erroneous impression that they are connected with and authorized to represent the Bahai religion and to solicit contributions therefor.

6. In addition plaintiffs complain of the opening of a book shop by the defendants under the name of "Bahai Book Shop" and of the listing of the shop in the telephone directory under the name, immediately over the name of Baha'i Center" which represents the listing of plaintiffs' New York office and book shop.

The following is the decision rendered by Supreme Court Justice Louis A. Valente in favor of Mrs. Chanler and Mirza Sohrab:

1. In the Court's opinion, the complaint fails to state a good cause of action. The plaintiffs have no right to a monopoly of the name of a religion.

2. The defendants, who purport to be members of the same religion, have an equal right to use the name of the religion in connection with their own meetings, lectures, classes and other activities.

3. No facts are alleged in the complaint to indicate that the defendants have been guilty of any act intended or calculated to deceive the public into believing that their meetings, lectures or book shop are identified with or affiliated with the meetings, lectures, etc., and book shop of the plaintiffs.

4. (a) Defendants have the absolute right to practice Bahaism,

(b) to conduct meetings,

(c) to collect funds,

(d) to sell literature in connection therewith, and

(e) to conduct a book shop under the title of "Bahai Book Shop."

Evidently the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is were unable to see that in bringing this lawsuit, they were not only utterly un-Bahai but also they were asking for something that could not be granted without violating the constitution of the United States. For the Bill of Rights grants freedom of conscience and the right of each citizen to practice his religion without interference.

The Assembly appealed to the Appellate Division of the Superior Court three months later to have the decision of the Supreme Court Justice Louis A. Valente set aside. But again the National Spiritual Assembly lost, and they were put on record for all time as not only trying to violate the constitution of the United States, but also of violating one of the most important teachings of the Bahai religion, which they purport to represent — freedom of conscience and the right of every man to practice his religion without interference.

These two lawsuits had the same significance to Bahais as if the followers of one Christian sect had sued the followers of another sect to prohibit them from calling themselves "Christian" or from practicing their religion. For the name BAHAI means a follower of Baha'o'llah just as the word CHRISTIAN means a follower of Christ.

One more matter in which the organization of Bahai's under Shoghi Effendi has departed from the original intent and practice of the Founders, is in their attitude toward money: they have organized the Bahai Cause on a commercial basis. Nothing could be more abhorrent to the true Bahai spirit than this. They themselves described their organization when they applied to the commissioner of Patents for a copyright on the name 'Bahai' as follows:

"National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, a common law corporation, organized and operated under a declaration of trust doing business at . . ."

National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada."

(Signed) Horace Holley.

All of this is utterly un-Bahai and anti-religious from every point of view. The members of the Assembly instituted a Bahai Fund, and made subscriptions to this fund an article of faith. In their Bahai catechism entitled "Twenty lessons in Baha'i Administration" there is this question:

"Why are the contributions to the Baha'i Fund the measure of the faith of a believer?"

Shoghi Effendi's position and procedure in instituting this Bahai Fund and in making contributions to it an article of faith, has the same significance as if, after the crucifixion of Christ, a so-called Guardian had arisen and proceeded to commercialize Christ's teachings, and had instituted a Christ Fund. If Peter had been asked to contribute to this Fund he would have replied:

"But I have no money. Christ told me to go forth without purse or script, and spread his teachings."

"Never mind what Christ said," the Guardian replies, "you contribute to this Christ Fund or you are not a believer in Christ, and you will be excommunicated."

"Furthermore don't go out and teach individually, for your efforts will be foredoomed to failure."

The other disciples would be subjected to this same treatment. Yet despite this they would go forth and spread Christ's teachings as he told them to. Shortly after, they would be summoned to court on the complaint of this supposed Guardian and his organization, who reports to the judge:

"Judge, our organization has trade-marked the name of Christ, and we have incorporated the religion of Christ, and these men who call themselves his disciples have no right to use that name, or to teach without our permission."

To this the judge replies:

"But Peter and Paul and everyone in the world has an equal right to call themselves "Christians" and to teach Christ's Cause. You cannot copyright the name of Christ, nor restrain men from spreading His teachings. Religion is free, and every man has a right to practice his religion and to spread it to others."

And so the Guardian would lose his suit and Christ's teachings would be placed in the public domain.

This is an exact parallel of the attitude of the Baha'i organization to the universal teachings of Baha'o'llah, and in particular of the Assembly's insistence upon a money contribution as being the gauge of a believer's faith.

Chapter VIII

A Modern-day saint.

To come back to the matter of independent Bahai effort and the results which it achieves when carried out in a spirit of sincerity. I myself have tried to follow the teachings in my every-day life and I know that I have been guided and used according to my capacity, just as each one everywhere will be if he prays continually to know the will of God, and reads the signs along the way to find out that will.

This is a different age from that of Saint Peter, and the 'purse and scrip' that we are counseled to leave behind today in spreading the Bahai Cause is a different kind — we must not be attached to worldly possessions. One of these disciples of Baha'o'llah, and of Abdul Baha, who exemplifies changing civilization, but with no change in fervor of devotion, is Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, against whom the Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is brought suit. Although she had wealth, social position, and education, she armoured herself with the necessary equipment for discipleship. She uses her wealth, her time and her talent entirely in spreading the Bahai teachings. This includes the publication of the magazine, NEW HISTORY, and also THE CARAVAN, which she, together with her late husband, Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, and Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, founded in 1933. Her four-story house is used as an office building to carry on the work, and these efforts have been crowned with enormous success. In the first twelve years of the publication of THE CARAVAN, from 1933 until January 1945, 480 chapters were established in twenty-four countries, with a membership of 80,000. This in spite of a global war which made correspondence difficult and sometimes impossible. At the present writing, January, 1946, there are 838 Chapters — an increase of 435 Chapters in one year and a total of 100,000 members.*

Each Chapter receives its special charter, with membership pins — a globe flying a green flag with the words, 'The world is everybody's home.' The Chapters work independently on the lines of the 'Nine Bahai Principles,' a compilation of the fundamental Bahai teachings; and through the Pen Friends' Guide, thousands of boys and girls in all parts of the world learn to be friends without reference to race, color or creed. The CHILDREN'S CARAVAN has had such a phenomenal success that the NEW HISTORY magazine has been discontinued, (the last issue was January 1946) and a new and larger periodical entitled THE CARAVAN, to be issued quarterly, has taken its place.

Now let us see by contrast what happened to Shoghi Effendi's administration. During Abdul Baha's lifetime, according to the WORLD'S ALMANAC for 1916, there were 2,884 Bahai's in the United States belonging to the National Spiritual Assembly of Bahais. But in 1926, after the first five years of Shoghi Effendi's administration, there were only 1,247 — a decrease of more than half. In 1936 the figures were still below those of 1916.

*See THE CARAVAN, January, 1946
132 East 65th Street, New York, N. Y.

This shrinkage was due to two reasons. One was that when an alleged will was produced, after the death of Abdul Baha, appointing Shoghi Effendi as the Guardian of the Cause, evidently those with spiritual insight seceded from the Assemblies, because they could not accept an unwitnessed, and undated document, which contradicted what Abdul Baha had said during his lifetime. A second reason evidently was that when others realized that Shoghi Effendi was substituting inverted principles in place of the teachings of Baha'o'llah, they also seceded.

Again in 1941 and 1942 the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is suffered an enormous loss after their defeat in two lawsuits, and their activities were recounted in that excellent history, BROKEN SILENCE.^{*} It is said that more than half of their assemblies had to close through lack of members.

I do not wish to imply that the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is are ogres. Not at all. They are highly conventional, highly respectable, and narrow. In fact they are the counter-part of those whom Christ stigmatised as Pharisees. They lack the sympathetic humanitarianism that is the earmark of a spiritual person. But most of all they lack the faith in what Christ called "The Mysteries," and Abdul Baha calls "The Intuitions of the Holy Spirit." Lacking this attribute, on which depends the success of the other principles of religion, such as universal peace, they reduce religion to an organization. And unwittingly they are trying to convert people to Pharaseeism because they really believe it is the religion itself. As a result in their hands they have reduced the great universal Bahai Teachings to a mediaeval cult. The religion for which 20,000 believers were martyred — for which Baha'o'llah suffered imprisonment for twenty-five years, and Abdul Baha forty years. Now the type of persecutor has changed. Shoghi Effendi, who purports to be the "Guardian" of the Bahai Religion, is the arch persecutor of the religion itself, and of many of the disciples of Baha'o'llah and of Abdul Baha. In other words, by his inversion of the teachings of the Founders of this religion, and by his persecution of their disciples, such as we witnessed in the lawsuit, he and the Baha'i Assembly have done more damage to the Bahai Cause than did those who were its open and avowed enemies.

Whether the alleged will of Abdul Baha is authentic or spurious, the results of the administration of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is stand as an historical indictment against them. They no more represent the Bahai Religion than the bigots of the dark ages represented Christianity.

We had the dark ages because the bigots of that era got control of Christ's teachings and tortured all those who did not comply with their interpretation. Shoghi Effendi, and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is, cannot in this day resort to physical torture to enforce their will, but they have resorted to mental torture by blackmailing with excommunication all those who do not comply with their inverted teachings.

Despite these distressing conditions that I have felt obliged to record at the cost of much time and money, my life has been strangely happy, successful, and intensely interesting. For there is no romance in life so glorious as that of being willing to follow a spiritual trail and be true to it whether the work assigned to one is pleasant, or disagreeable and difficult. The things that seem disagreeable and difficult are only apparently so. For the moment we begin to do them in the same spirit as if they were coated with heavenly nectar, we discover that they contain surprising, wonderful and beautiful elements.

Due to the alternating experiences I have had — first a Roman Catholic, then a Protestant, then an agnostic, then a near-Communist, and then a Bahai, I know that the greatest evil that can befall man is the loss of faith in God. When I became a Bahai there was restored to me not only the best in Christianity, but the best in every religion that ever existed. And because Abdul Baha restored to me faith in God I have written this book, hoping that those who read it, even if they have little faith to start with, may realize that this can be increased through prayer.

The universality of the Bahai Religion enabled me to appreciate and enjoy all religions. Today I can still go to a Roman Catholic Church and, despite the prejudices that I once had against it, pray to the Virgin Mary, and find no contradiction between this and my faith. I could likewise pray in Protestant churches, in a Mosque of Islam, or in a Hindu Temple, and I could pray in all the edifices of all the holy places in the world with deep reverence, knowing that they stand as a testimony of man's faith, of his effort to contact the vital Spirit of God. I feel a great kinship with all those who are striving for this contact. We need the unity of all the pro-Gods in the world in order to counteract the influence of the rising tide of the anti-Gods, and the Bahai Religion is the synchronizer of all religions. Abdul Baha said:

There are prepared souls in every religion. Today God is working in all the churches instructing many souls in celestial brotherhood. These souls are related by invisible and spiritual ties and are being ripened by the Holy Spirit.

Abdul Baha warned that if those calling themselves "Bahai" could not rise to the greatness of the Bahai principles, then other individuals and groups would gradually put the principles into practice, even if they remained unaware from whence their inspiration arose. We see evidences of this all over the world today. There is a quickening of the spirit, and a great attempt is being made toward the unification of humanity.

Also there are some individuals who are already endowed with this consciousness of the new era. Since meeting Abdul Baha I have come in contact with three of these great intuitives — humanitarians who arrived at their destination through widely different channels. One stemmed his influence from the saints of Islam; one stemmed his influence from the saints within Christianity; and the most recent one I have contacted, within the last year, stems his influence from a great Avatar in India. These great intuitives exemplify the point, that those who live in accordance with the fundamental teachings of all religions can attain God consciousness regardless of the religion from which they stem. Those who make this attainment strive for the same goal — the spiritual unification of the race and the unification of man with God.

This is what Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha wish us to do. They did not come to establish a religion of withdrawal from other religions and to form a separate group, but to awaken in us an appreciation of the truths in all religions — to merge with our fellow men, and to come into that consciousness which Baha'o'llah described eighty years ago:

“The foundation of the Palace of Peace is the consciousness of the oneness of mankind.”

Baha'o'llah also indicated that there are as many paths to God as the number of his creatures. For the Bahai Religion is as wide and as deep as humanity itself and higher than its highest aims.

The magic flute of religion is again being heard in the world. Out of divers cults and reforms and sects people are stepping in tune to this call. Some are stirred to a new awakening, others are made uneasy, others are frightened, and others inspired to great achievements, according to each individual's capacity. Man is on the march and will never find peace until he finds his way back to God, the mystical fount without which he cannot survive. In the words of Abdul Baha:

. . . A new era of divine consciousness is upon us. The world of humanity is going through a process of transformation. A new race is being developed. The thoughts of human brotherhood are permeating all regions. New ideals are stirring the depths of hearts and a new spirit of universal consciousness is being profoundly felt by all men.

Chapter IX

Excerpts from the Writings of Abdul Baha.

FRIENDSHIP

Now is the time when you must affiliate with all nations with joy and the utmost kindness —. . .

In every dispensation the Command of friendship and the law of Love have been revealed, but it has been circumscribed within the circle of believing friends and not with those outside of it. Praise be to God that in this wonderful cycle the laws of God are not confined by any limitations; neither must they be exercised toward a special community to the exclusion of another. He (Baha'o'llah) hath commanded the friends to show love, friendship, amity and kindness to ALL the people of the world.

Now the believers of God must live in accord with these divine Teachings. They must become kind fathers to the children of humanity; affectionate brothers to the youths of mankind and soul-sacrificing children toward those who are laden with age . . . show love and kindness to all, even to your enemies. . . .

Abdul Baha in Egypt
by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab

All mankind must attain to spiritual fraternity, that is to say, fraternity in the Holy Spirit; for patriotic, racial, and political fraternity are of no avail. Their results are meager but . . . spiritual fraterinty is the cause of unity and amity among mankind.*

* * *

If you desire to love God, love thy fellowmen. In them you can see the image and likeness of God. If you are eager to serve God, serve mankind. Renounce the self in the Self of God. When the aerial mariner steers his airship skyward, little by little the inharmony and incongruity of the world of matter are lost, and before his astonished vision he sees widespread the wonderful panorama of God's creation. Likewise when the student of the Path of Reality has attained unto the loftiest summit of Divine Love, he will not look upon the ugliness and misery of mankind; he will not observe any differences; he will not see any racial and patriotic differences; but he will look upon humanity with the glorified vision of a seer and a prophet. Let us all strive that we may attain to this highest pinnacle of ideal and spiritual life.

REAL FRATERNITY

Creation is the expression of motion. Motion is life. A moving object is a living object whereas that which is motionless and inert is as dead . . . Nothing is stationary in the material world or in the inner world of intellect and consciousness.

Religion is the outer expression of the divine reality. Therefore it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. If it be without motion and non-porgressive it is without divine life; it is dead . . . All things are subject to re-formation. This is a century of life and renewal . . . Sciences of former ages and philosophies of the past are useless today . . . Old ideas and modes of thought are fast becoming obsolete . . . for this is clearly the century of a new life, the century of the revelation of the reality and therefore the greatest of all centuries . . .

. . . The prophets of God have founded the laws of divine civilization. They have been the root and fundamental source of all knowledge . . . The spiritual bortherhood which is enkindled and established through the breaths of the Holy Spirit unites nations and removes the cause of warfare and strife. It transforms mankind into one great family and establishes the foundation of the oneness of humanity. It promulgates the spirit of international agreement and insures Universal Peace . . . Until all nations and peoples become united by the bonds of the Holy Spirit in this real fraternity, until national and international prejudices are effaced in the reality of this spiritual brotherhood, true progress, prosperity and lasting happiness will not be attained by man. This is the century of new and universal nationhood. Sciences have advanced, industries have progressed, politics have been reformed, liberty has been proclaimed, justice is awakening. This is the century of motion, divine stimulus and accomplishment; the century of human solidarity and altruistic service; the century of Universal Peace and the reality of the divine kingdom.*

THE ILLUMINATI

About six hundred years ago a Society was formed in Persia called the Society of Friends, the members of which gathered together for silent communion with the Almighty.

They divided Divine Philosophy into two parts: That which can be acquired through lectures and study in schools and colleges; and the philosophy of the Illuminati, or Followers of the Inner Light. The schools of this philosophy were held in Silence and meditation, and by turning to the Source of Light. From that Central Light the mysteries of the Kingdom were reflected in their hearts. All the Divine problems were solved by this power of illumination.

Among the great questions unfolding through the rays of Divine Reality upon the mind of man, is the question of the reality of the spirit of man; of the birth of the Spirit; of his birth from this world into the world of God; the question of the inner life of the Spirit, and of the fate of the Spirit after its ascension from the body.

They, likewise, meditate upon the scientific questions of the day, and these also are solved. "Followers of the Inner Light," they attain to a superlative degree of power, and are entirely freed from blind dogmas and imitations. Men rely on their statements. By themselves, within themselves, they solve all mysteries.

If they find a solution by the assistance of the Inner Light, they accept it, and afterwards declare it; otherwise they would consider it a matter of blind imitation.

They go so far as to reflect upon the essential nature of Divinity, Divine Revelation, and the Manifestation of God in this world. All philosophical, divine, and scientific questions are solved by them through the power of the Spirit.

Baha'o'llah says there is a sign from God in every phenomenon. The sign of the intellect is contemplation, and the sign of contemplation is silence, because it is impossible for a man to do two things at the same time. He cannot both speak and meditate.

It is an axiomatic fact that while you meditate you are speaking with your own spirit. In that state of mind you put certain questions to your Spirit, the Spirit answers, the Light breaks forth, and reality is revealed.

You cannot apply the name of "man" to any being devoid of the faculty of meditation. Without it he would be a mere animal.

Through the faculty of meditation man attains to eternal life; through it he receives the Breath of the Holy Spirit. The bestowal of the Spirit is given in reflection and meditation. Through it, the Spirit of man is informed and strengthened. Through it, affairs of which man knows nothing are unfolded before his view. Through it one receives Divine inspiration. Through it one partakes of Heavenly food.

Meditation is the key for opening the doors of mysteries. In that subjective mood, withdrawing himself from all outside objects, man can unfold the secrets of things within himself, because he is immersed in the ocean of spiritual life.

Through the power of meditation man frees himself from the animal nature, discerns the reality of things, and is put in touch with God. This faculty brings forth from the invisible plane the sciences and arts. Through the meditative faculty inventions are made possible, and colossal undertakings are carried out. Through it governments can be run smoothly. Through this faculty man enters into the very Kingdom of God.

Nevertheless, some thoughts are useless to man. They are like the waves ebbing to and fro in the sea without result.

But if the faculty of meditation is bathed in the Inner Light, and characterized with Divine attributes, then the results will be wonderful.

The meditative faculty is akin to the mirror. If you put before it earthly objects it will reflect them. Therefore, if the spirit of man is contemplating earthly subjects, he will be informed of these. But if the mirror of the Spirit is turned heavenwards, the heavenly constellations and the rays of the Sun of Reality will be reflected in the heart, and the virtues of the Kingdom will be attained.

Let us, therefore, keep this faculty rightly directed, turning it to the Heavenly Sun and not to earthly objects, so that we may discover the secrets of the Kingdom, comprehend the allegories of the Bible, and the mysteries of the Spirit. May we indeed become mirrors reflecting Heavenly Realities, and may we become so pure as to reflect the Constellations of Heaven.

Spoken at a meeting of the Society of Friends,
St. Martin's Lane, London, January 12, 1913.

RADIANT ACQUIESCENCE

Freedom is not a matter of place, it is a condition. I was thankful for the prison, and the lack of liberty was very pleasing to me, for those days were passed in the path of service, under the utmost difficulties and trials, bearing fruits and results.

Unless one accepts dire vicissitudes, he will not attain. To me prison is freedom, troubles rest me, death is life, and to be despised is honor. Therefore I was happy all that time in prison. When one is released from the prison of self, that is indeed release, for self is the greater prison. When this release takes place, then one cannot be outwardly imprisoned. When they put my feet in stocks, I would say to the guard, "You cannot imprison me, for here I have light and air and bread and water. There will come a time when my body will be in the ground, and I shall have neither light nor air, nor food nor water, but even then I shall not be imprisoned." The afflictions which come to humanity sometimes tend to center the consciousness upon the limitations, and this is a veritable prison. Release comes by making of the will a door through which the confirmations of the Spirit come.

The confirmations of the Spirit are all those powers and gifts with which some are born (and which men sometimes call genius) but for which others have to strive with infinite pains. They come to that man or woman who accepts his or her life with radiant acquiescence.*

The human will must be subdued and trained into the Will of God. It is a great power to have a strong will, but a greater power to give that will to God.

* * *

Sacrifice your will to the Will of God. The Kingdom is attained by the one who forgets self. Everything becomes yours by the renunciation of everything.

* * *

. . . Whosoever is occupied with himself is wandering in the desert of heedlessness and regret! The master key to self-mastery is self-forgetfulness. The road to the palace of life is through the path of renunciation.

GARDENERS OF HUMAN TREES

Thus there have been many holy Manifestations of God. One thousand years ago, two hundred thousand years ago, one million years ago the bounty of God was flowing, the radiance of God was shining, the dominion of God was existing.

. . . These holy Manifestations of God are the educators and trainers of the world of existence, the teachers of the world of humanity. They liberate man from the darkness of the world of nature, deliver him from despair, error, ignorance, imperfections and all evil qualities . . .

. . . Were it not for the coming of these holy Manifestations of God all mankind would be found on the plane of the animal. They would remain darkened and ignorant like those who have been denied schooling and who never had a teacher or trainer . . .

. . . The holy Manifestations are the ideal gardeners of human souls, the divine cultivators of human hearts. The world of existence is but a jungle of disorder and confusion, a state of nature producing nothing but fruitless, useless trees. The ideal gardeners train these wild uncultivated human trees, cause them to become fruitful, water and cultivate them day by day so that they adorn the world of existence and continue to flourish in the utmost beauty.

Although the stars are scintillating and brilliant, the sun is superior to them in luminous effulgence. Similarly these holy divine Manifestations are and must always be distinguished above all other beings in every attribute of glory and perfection, in order that it may be proven that the Manifestation is the true teacher and real trainer; that he is the Sun of Truth endowed with a supreme splendor and reflecting the beauty of God. Otherwise it is not possible for us to train one human individual and then after training him, believe in him and accept him as the holy manifestation of divinity. The real Manifestation of God must be endowed with divine knowledge and not dependent upon learning acquired in schools. He must be the educator, not the educated; his standard intuition instead of tuition. He must be perfect and not imperfect, great and glorious instead of being weak and impotent. He must be wealthy in the riches of the spiritual world and not indigent. In a word, the holy divine Manifestation of God must be distinguished above all others of mankind in every aspect and qualification, in order that he may be able to effectively train the human body-politic, eliminate the darkness enshrouding the human world, uplift humanity from a lower to a higher kingdom, be able through the penetrative power of his Word to promote and spread broadcast the beneficent message of Universal Peace among men, bring about the unification of mankind in religious belief through a manifest divine power, harmonize all sects and denominations and convert all nativities and nationalities into one nativity and fatherland.*

DREAMS

When thou desirest and yearnest for meeting in the world of vision; . . . turn toward the court of the Peerless One, offer prayer to Him and lay thy head upon the pillow. When sleep cometh, the doors of revelation shall be opened and all thy desires shall become revealed.*

As to truthful dreams: I beg of God that thy inner eye (insight) may be opened that thou mayest thyself differentiate between truthful and untruthful dreams.

*The Promulgation of Universal Peace. Vol. I, pp. 458-464.

Tablets, Vol. 1, page 196.

. . . Prayer is a key by which the doors of the kingdom are opened. There are many subjects which are difficult for man to solve. But during prayer and supplication they are unveiled and there is nothing that man cannot find out.

Remember not your own limitations. The help of God will come to you. Forget yourself. God's help will surely come.

When you call on the mercy of God waiting to reinforce you, your strength will be tenfold.

INTERCESSORY PRAYER

. . . Those who have ascended have different attributes from those who are on earth, yet there is no real separation.

In prayer there is a mingling of station, a mingling of condition. Pray for them as they pray for you! When you do not know it, and are in a receptive attitude, they are able to make suggestions to you, if you are in difficulty. This sometimes happens in sleep. But there is no phenomenal intercourse! That which seems like phenomenal intercourse has another explanation . . . The spirit of those that have passed on are freed from sense-life, and do not use physical means . . .*

Followers of the prophets have also this power of praying for the forgiveness of souls; therefore we may not think that any soul is condemned to a stationary condition of suffering or loss, arising from their absolute ignorance of God. The power of effective intercession for them always exists. All the people in the other world, are they not the creatures of God? Therefore they can progress in the other world. As they can receive light from supplication here, there, they can also receive light from supplication. The rich in the other world can help the poor, as the rich can help the poor here. In every world all are the creatures of God. They are always dependent upon Him, not independent, nor can they ever be so. While they are needful of God, the more they supplicate, the richer they become. What is their merchandise? What is their wealth? In the other world what is the means of help and assistance? It is intercession. First undeveloped souls must gain progress through the supplications of the spiritually rich; afterwards, they can progress through their own supplications.* *

FAITH, PRAYER AND HEALING

There are three kinds of Faith: first . . . a child is born of Mohammedan parents, he is a Mohammedan. This faith is weak traditional faith: secondly that which comes from knowledge, and is the faith of understanding. This is good, but there is a better, the faith of practice — this is real faith.

• • •

There is but one power which heals — that is God. The state or condition through which the healing takes place is the confidence of the heart. By some this state is reached through pills, powders, and physicians. By others through hygiene, fasting, and prayer. By others through direct perception.

* * *

All that we see around us is the work of mind. It is mind in the herb and in the mineral that acts on the human body, and changes its condition.

Disease is of two kinds: material and spiritual. Take for instance, a cut hand; if you pray for the cut to be healed and do not stop its bleeding, you will not do much good; a material remedy is needed.

Sometimes if the nervous system is paralyzed through fear, a spiritual remedy is necessary. Madness, incurable otherwise, can be cured through prayer. It often happens that sorrow makes one ill, this can be cured by spiritual means.

There is nothing sweeter in the world of existence than prayer.

Man must live in a state of prayer. The most blessed condition is the condition of prayer and supplication. Prayer is conversation with God. The greatest attainment, or the sweetest state is none other than conversation with God. It creates spirituality, creates mindfulness and celestial feelings, begets new attractions of the Kingdom, and engenders the susceptibilities of the higher intelligence. The highest attribute given Moses is the following verse: "God carried along a conversation with Moses."

What is prayer? It is conversation with God. While man prays he sees himself in the presence of God. If he concentrates his attention he will surely at the time of prayer realize that he is conversing with God. Often at night I do not sleep and the thoughts of this world weigh heavily on my mind. I toss uneasily on my bed. Then in the darkness of the night I get up and pray — converse with God. It is most sweet and uplifting.

Prayer and supplication are so effective that they inspire one's heart for the whole day with high ideals and supreme sanctity and calmness. One's heart must be sensitive to the music of prayer. He must feel the effect of prayer. He must not be like an organ from which softest notes stream forth without having consciousness of sensation in itself.

PRAYER AND LIFE AFTER DEATH

A friend asked: "How should one look forward to death?"

Abdul Baha answered: "How does one look forward to the goal of any journey? With hope and with expectation. It is even so with the end of this earthly journey. In the next world, man will find himself freed from many of the disabilities under which he now suffers. Those who have passed on through death, have a sphere of their own. It is not removed from ours; their work, the work of the Kingdom, is ours; but it is sanctified from what we call 'time and space.' Time with us is measured by the sun. When there is no more sunrise, and no more sunset, that kind of time does not exist for man. Those who have ascended have different attributes from those who are still on earth, yet there is not real separation.

In prayer there is a mingling of station, a mingling of condition. Pray for them as they pray for you! When you do not know it, and are in a receptive attitude, they are able to make suggestions to you, if you are in difficulty. This sometimes happens in sleep. But there is no phenomenal intercourse! That which seems like phenomenal intercourse has another explanation.

. . . The spirit of those who have passed on are freed from sense-life, and do not use physical means. It is not possible to put these great matters into human words; the language of man is the language of children, and man's explanation often leads astray."

Someone present asked how it was that in prayer and meditation the heart often turns with instinctive appeal to some friend who has passed into the next life.

Abdul Baha answered: "It is a law of God's creation that the weak should lean upon the strong. Those to whom you turn may be the mediators of God's Power to you, even as when on earth. But it is the One Holy Spirit that strengthens all men." Hereupon another friend referred to the communing of Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration with Moses and Elijah; and Abdul Baha said: "The faithful are ever sustained by the Supreme Concourse. In the Supreme Concourse are Jesus, and Moses, and Elijah, and Baha'Ullah, and other Supreme Souls: there, also, are the martyrs."

—Abdul Baha in London.

The following five talks were given by Abdul Baha while my husband and I were his guests during seventeen out of the last nineteen days of his life on earth:
November 21, 1921

At the evening meal Abdul Baha said:

. . . .

When man enters the Kingdom then all good qualities will become apparent in him. The natural characteristics which are destructive will be banished, and the Divine characteristics will take their place, just like the iron that is put in the fire. The natural characteristics of the iron are hardness, coldness, and blackness. But in the fire these are transformed. The blackness turns to red, the coldness to heat, the hardness to liquidity and softness. All its natural characteristics are transmuted, and it takes on the conditions of the fire.

Likewise when man enters the Kingdom the characteristics of the world of nature are transmuted. In some animals there is great cruelty, in others great greed and ferociousness; these are the necessities of the world of nature. In man these characteristics are also seen, but when he enters the Kingdom his selfish animalistic characteristics change. That is why we say man is reborn, for he has attained to a new life, he has become freed from the characteristics of the world of nature and attained to the life of the Kingdom.

When man is ill he is not good tempered — he becomes irritable and morose, but when he attains health he becomes more kindly and is happy. Likewise man's characteristics change completely when he is endowed with the health of the Kingdom.

November 22, 1921

This is what Abdul Baha said at luncheon:

It is necessary for man to eat otherwise he becomes feeble. He cannot say that the food he ate yesterday suffices for today.

God's bounty is unending. Every day he bestows a new bounty. For example, yesterday the sun gave out light, heat, and energy, and today it has repeated that bounty. It does not say, 'Yesterday's rays and heat are sufficient.'

Every day should have its new nourishment, for all things are constantly renewed — thoughts policies science medicine, and the arts. Then is it possible that the bounty of God should not be renewed?

In ancient times old thoughts sufficed. People felt there was no need of new methods. But material civilization has advanced a thousandfold. How foolish it would be if man were to say that the old civilization suffices. The same is true regarding the Divine Civilization. This has also been renewed. Today it is not possible to put some of the commandments of the earlier prophets into practice, for people have progressed to a higher state of civilization. For instance, in the time of Moses, a man's hand was cut off for a comparatively slight theft. Today if a man stole a million dollars this law would not be enforced.

As long as the sun exists we shall have the bounties of light, heat, and energy, which are the manifestations of the sun. And as long as God exists we shall have His bounties, graces, and activities, renewed through His Manifestations. As long as God is King, He will have soldiers, riches, empires, because this is the basis of His Kingdom. We cannot say that God created an empire and left it.

November 23, 1921.

At luncheon Abdul Baha said:

No matter how much one helps a brother it is animated largely by a sense of duty. But regarding a spiritual brother it is not the same. Any help that might be given is animated by the spirit and is never forgotten, for it is not done for the sake of duty.

The important relationship is the spiritual kinship. This is composed of the heart and soul, while the material relationship is of water and clay. It often happens that the ordinary brother becomes an enemy, but with the spiritual brother this is an impossibility.

When they brought Christ's mother to him someone said: 'Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without desiring to speak with thee.' But he answered and said unto him that told him, 'Who is my mother? And who are my brethren? . . . For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is heaven, the same is my brother, and sister and mother.'

How many times has it happened that a gardener cuts off a weak branch from a tree and grafts a strong one in its place. The weak branch is fit only for the fire.

November 24, 1921

Tonight we were again blessed with the presence of Abdul Baha — his last supper with us. He said:

Man has two aspects, the spiritual and the physical. His body is made of clay but his spirit is from the Divine. His body is the shell, and his mind the pearl within the shell. The shell is not so important, but the pearls are very precious. This is the case with man. But the Manifestations of God have other Powers and these Powers are supernatural. They are the Powers which produce such marvelous effects in the world — through which events are foretold thousands of years in advance.

Then he arose from the table and, after washing his hands in the customary oriental fashion, stood in the doorway looking so thoughtfully and for so long a time toward his prison home across the Bay of Acca, that it seemed a portent of something about to happen. Suddenly he turned and bade us goodnight. With one accord we followed him down the steps and watched him as he went up the road, preceded by his tiny grandchild who always lighted her grandfather on his way although she could hardly toddle with the weight of the lantern.

The next afternoon Abdul Baha sent for Lawrence and me and told us we were to depart on the train that left that night. That same evening he said to us:

I shall always be with you, always. Try to remember this — that the physical presence is nothing — that the real union is the spiritual union. In the days of Baha'o'llah many people believed in him who had never seen him, and there were others who lived close to him all the days of their lives, yet were very far from him.

These last talks of Abdul Baha are especially significant considering what happened later as recounted in this book. He repeated what he had so often said — that the spiritual relationship, and not the physical, is all important. He also repeated what the Founders of every religion have taught, the overwhelming importance of faith in the power of the Holy Spirit — that it works as potently through them, after they pass from this earth, as it did while they walked among us in the flesh. The following is what he said on this subject:

“ . . . the meaning of Christ's resurrection is as follows: the disciples were troubled and agitated after the martyrdom of Christ. The Reality of Christ, which signified his teachings, his bounties, his perfections, and his spiritual power, was hidden and concealed for two or three days after his martyrdom, and was not resplendent and manifest. No, rather it was lost; for the believers were few in number and were troubled and agitated. The Cause of Christ was like a lifeless body; and when after three days the disciples became assured and steadfast, and began to serve the Cause of Christ, and resolved to spread the divine teachings, putting his counsels into practice, and arising to serve him, the Reality of Christ became resplendent and his bounty appeared; his religion found life, his teachings and his admonitions became evident and visible. In other words, the Cause of Christ was like a lifeless body, until the life and the bounty of the Holy Spirit surrounded it."

Some Answered Questions; pages 120, 121.

Also he promised this to those who would rise up in the Cause of God regardless of what their religion might be:

I say unto you that anyone who will rise up in the Cause of God at this time shall be filled with the Spirit of God, and that He will send His Hosts from heaven to help you, and that nothing shall be impossible to you if you have faith. And now I give you a commandment which shall be for a Covenant between you and me: that ye have faith; that your faith be steadfast as a rock that no storms can move; that nothing can disturb, and that it endure through all things even to the end; . . . for I am with you always, whether living or dead; I am with you to the end. As ye have faith so shall your powers and blessings be . . .

As this book goes to press an article in a newspaper* about General Patton exemplifies the point that I have tried to bring out in these pages — the power of prayer if it is backed up by right action and sacrifice. General Patton was a deeply religious man despite the fact that he used much profanity. He believed he shortened the war in Europe, according to the account given by Col. James H. O'Neil, by distributing a prayer to every man under his command that God would stop the rains.

Part of this article is as follows:

"It was December 13, 1944, three days before

*Magazine section of Los Angeles Examiner, March 31, 1946.

Von Rundstedt's army made its disastrous breakthrough into Luxembourg and Belgium. The rains which preceded and cloaked preparations for the Nazi thrust worried Patton. He sent for O'Neil.

. . . .

"Something," he said, "must be done about these rains. Padre, you've got to pray as you've never prayed before. I want the men to pray, too, to stop the rains commanders can do much, but in every contest there is that margin, in battles as in life, that might be called the breaks. That does not come from men: it comes from God. It is a tide in the events of men and in battle. A tide that makes the decision. I want a prayer written to stop these rains."

The prayer was written by Col. O'Neil and on December 19, it was distributed in the form of Christmas cards to 250,000 men. The following day the rains stopped, the sun shone, the Germans came out in the open, where General Patton wanted them, and the battle was won.

Today there is a greater battle being waged than that of the world war — the battle between the anti-God totalitarians, and the pro-God democracies. This battle can be won by the pro-Gods for the freedom of mankind, if we become pro-Gods in reality, if we apply our religion. Then our prayers will be effective, regardless of our religious affiliations. Then shall we be able to win the battle against the anti-Gods — be able to offset the destructive forces of materialism, and circumvent the possible destruction of our planet through mis-use of atomic power.

THIS IS TO CERTIFY that the Miscellaneous Manuscripts Collection of the Library of Congress Manuscript Division contains an item from the papers of Abdul Baha entitled REPORT ON THE WRITING SHOWN ON THE PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE ALLEGED WILL OF ABDUL BAHÁ BY DR. C. AINSWORTH MITCHELL and that the attached photocopies - the title page, the presentation page, 1 unnumbered page [page 1], and pages 2 through 4 - are a true representation from that work.

THIS IS TO CERTIFY FURTHER, that the work is marked with the handwritten notation "Presented to the Library of Congress by Ruth White, September 2, 1930."

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the seal of the Library of Congress is affixed hereto on February 22, 2007.

I have made a minute examination of the writing in the photograph and photographic enlargements of the alleged will of Abdul Baha, and have compared it with the authenticated writing of Abdul Baha in a series of photographs and photographic enlargements received from Mrs. E. Lawrence White.

In the absence of the original document, I have examined the original document and any conclusions to be drawn from the examination of the photographic enlargements must necessarily be of a provisional character, and will be upon the accuracy of the photographic records. Moreover, some of the facts which are taken into consideration in the scientific examination of an original document cannot be perfectly studied in a photographic reproduction, such as, for example, the ink, paper, penstrokes, and so on.

Assuming that the authenticated specimens of writing are of approximately the same period as that at which the disputed will is alleged to have been written and signed, the points which can be accurately compared in the photographic enlargements are the formation of the writing, the changes in pressure, the direction of the penstrokes, and the relationship in the size of parts of the letter as written.

ON THE WRITING SHOWN ON THE PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE ALLEGED WILL OF ABDUL BAHÁ.

I have made a minute examination of the writing in the photographs and photographic enlargements of the alleged will of Abdul Baha, and have compared it with the authenticated writing of Abdul Baha in a series of photographs and photographic enlargements received from Mrs. H. Lawrence White.

In the absence of an opportunity to examine the original document, any conclusions to be drawn from an examination of the photographic enlargements must necessarily be of a provisional character contingent upon the accuracy of the photographic records. Moreover, some of the facts which are taken into consideration in the scientific examination of an original document cannot be perfectly studied in a photographic reproduction, such as, for example, the ink, paper, penstrokes, and so on.

Assuming that the authenticated specimens of writing are of approximately the same period as that at which the disputed will is alleged to have been written and signed, the points which can be accurately compared in the photographic enlargements are the mode of formation of the writing, the changes in pressure, the form of individual letters, and the relationship in the size of parts of the letter to the whole.

A fact requiring explanation is the presence of apparent erasures on some of the pages of the will, namely in lines 12 and 13 of page 2, and line 13 of page 4. Without a microscopical examination of the original document it is not possible to state whether a chemical agent has been used, but assuming there have been erasures at these points I think it probable that they were done mechanically, not chemically. The apparent erasure on page 5, line 11, may possibly be the result of an imprint from other written matter while the ink was wet.

The photographic reproductions of authenticated specimens of the writing of Abdul Baha were the following:-

1. Writing from the Book of the Unitarian Church, Montclair, New Jersey.
2. Writing from the Guest Bible for 1912, City Temple, London.
3. Authenticated signatures on two letters to Mrs. Stannard on a photograph, and a possible authentic signature in the possession of Mrs. Devine.
There is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the signature from Mrs. Devine, since it agrees closely with the other signatures.

The Signatures on the Envelope:- A comparison of the four signatures on the envelope of the alleged will with the four authenticated signatures reveals many striking differences in the mode of formation of the characters, as for example:

ll
In the authentic signatures the width of these characters, compared with their height, is much greater than in the signatures on the envelope. The strokes are also much firmer in the envelope signatures than in the authenticated signatures.

me In the authenticated signature the entire character is roughly $2\frac{1}{2}$ times the width of the open space between the uprights; in the disputed signatures the corresponding figure is twice as great. In the authentic signatures the cusp is rounded; in the disputed signatures it is pointed. In the authenticated signatures the relationship between the depth of the gap and its breadth is as 1 : 1.4 to 1.6, whereas in the disputed signatures it is as 1 : 2.3 to 2.6. Thus the ratio is totally different. In my opinion these differences are not consistent with the signatures upon the envelope being in the writing of the writer of the authenticated signature.

The Body of the Will:- A comparison of the formation of the writing on the envelope with that on pages 9 and 10 of the will shows so many points of resemblance that there is no reason to doubt that they were written by the same person.

I have also studied minutely the photographic enlargements of the writing on the other pages of the will, and have formed the following conclusions:-

C. AINSWORTH MITCHELL, D.Sc., F.I.C.

85, ECCLESTON SQUARE,

TEL: VICTORIA 8363.

-4-

LONDON, S.W. 1.

The other pages, namely 5, 6, 7 and 8, agree in the characteristics of writing with the writing on Page 4. That is to say, the writing does not agree with the hypothesis that it was all written by one person.

The writing of Abdul Baha has certain distinctive features, among which are a sudden change of pressure in some of the strokes, wavering formation of some of the curves, and the formation of sharp angles in some of the characters. These characteristics are sharply indicated in the enlarged photographs of the writing in the City Temple, London, and in the Montclair writing.

A minute comparison of the authenticated writing with the writing on every page of the alleged will, and in particular with the lines 10, 11 and 12 on page 5, has failed to detect in any part of the will the characteristics of the writing of Abdul Baha, as shown in the authenticated specimens.

In addition to these differences in writing habits, there are also differences in the shapes of many of the parallel characters in the body of the document compared with the authenticated writing, as in the case of the signatures mentioned above.

No one could possibly write a

Dear Mrs. Smith:

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated Nov. 5th 1931. Shoghi Effendi does not attribute much importance to those who deny the authenticity of the Will because their attitude is not due to a desire to seek the truth, but merely oppose & bring doubts to others. From the very start he relegated that task to the spirit of the Master who is always vigilant to protect his Cause against the inroads of its enemies. And thank

• the governor in the office of the latter. The expert compared the original Will with the handwriting of the Master which Mrs. White had sent him as authentic samples. He said that they are both written by the same person & that the person who had decided otherwise does not know what he is speaking about. The expert was an Englishman who knew nothing of the Cause or the Baha'is & was absolutely impartial. I think the High Commissioner sent to Mrs. White the result of his findings but she preferred to keep quiet about it.

The whole trouble is that Mrs. White & her sympathisers are animated with the wrong spirit, a spirit of hatred rather than impartial seeking.

God the Master has helped him & made their opposition a cause of success for His Faith, rather than a danger to its ^{own} existence.

About five or six months ago Mrs. White - who is at the head of ~~such~~ this movement to set the Master's Will aside - wrote the High Commissioner in Palestine on the subject & asked him to find about the authenticity of the document. The High Commissioner wrote to the governor of Haifa & sent the government expert to verify the hand-writing. Shoghi Effendi was written on the subject & asked to send the Will to the government. He sent me with the will & the expert studied it before me to either the Will or the institution of the Guardianship but to the personnel of the National Assembly & the manner it is functioning.

The future will surely reveal not only the truth but also will testify in a manner that none can question the wisdom of the verities enshrined in so precious & momentous a document.

With the assurance of Shoghi Effendi's prayers for your spiritual advancement & the removal of every doubt that may still perplex your mind.

Yours Sincerely,
H. Rabban

(To Mr E. E. Khazgi)

July 10th, 1931

Dear Babá'í Brother,

I am directed by Shoghi Effendi to inform you of the receipt of your letter dated June 12th, 1931.

Your whole letter centers around the authenticity of Abdu'l-Babá's Will, a thing which no one in the Orient among the believers & the enemies of the Cause has thought to challenge.

Shoghi Effendi has felt it below his dignity to subject so sacred a document to a scientific expert examination so long as no serious doubt has been entertained by any considerable number of believers throughout the world.

Shoghi Effendi³ never felt the need, nor does he feel it at present, in spite of your letter, to expatiate upon such matters. The very progress of the Cause, the extension of the Administration, will in themselves constitute the surest evidences of the authenticity of the Will as well as of the soundness of all its provisions.

He wishes you, therefore, not to indulge in premature & hasty considerations which can bring in their wake nothing but disillusionment & regret.

Even in Germany where a certain number of believers have fallen the slave to Mrs. White's foolish assertions, a few among them have expressed themselves as having been misled in this matter. They have plainly stated that their objections have not been directed

It might² interest you to know, however, that the Will in its entirety has been closely examined by experts appointed by the Palestine government authorities. Not even the slightest objection or the faintest doubt has been expressed concerning its authenticity by them.

'Abdul-Bahá has never stated that the House of Justice would be the only body that would administer the affairs of the Cause after Him. In fact He has in a Tablet revealed to Persian believers who had questioned Him about this point stated plainly that this was "a hidden secret concealed within the shell of the Cause" & that its significance would surely be revealed in the future.

Correspondence between the High Commissioner of Palestine and Ruth White, regarding the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas.

By Ruth White
March, 1932.

In a previous pamphlet, "Abdul Baha's Alleged Will is Fraudulent" I published a letter that I had written to the High Commissioner of Palestine on Dec. 31, 1928, asking him to investigate my charges that the alleged will of Abdul Baha is fraudulent. This request for an investigation seems to have troubled the minds of the adherents of Shoghi Effendi, since the following appeared in "The Baha'i News Letter," no. 31, for April 1929.

"Instructions concerning Attitude Towards Those Attacking Cause.

"A copy of the pamphlet published by Mrs. Ruth White was sent to Shoghi Effendi in January. This matter is taken up by the Guardian in his letter to the National Spiritual Assembly recently reprinted (as recorded in summary of last Assembly meeting), but the following words written in a briefer letter on February 27, 1929 are instructive: 'I have in a letter addressed to the National Assembly set forth my views regarding the contents of Mrs. White's pamphlet. I have thus far received no intimation from the Palestine authorities, and have no reason to believe that they will consider it worthy of their consideration. The friends, however should avoid hurting her feelings and should abstain from provocation. Her case will suffer the fate which has met Dyar's opposition in 'Reality', and should be totally disregarded by the believers...'"

A sincere man in Shoghi's position should gladly have accepted my challenge for an investigation. Any man confident of the justice of his case would, in fact, have courted and insisted upon an impartial and judicial examination of the alleged will and of all the facts bearing on his claim to Guardianship. Shoghi Effendi however, it can be seen, was congratulating himself that there was no likelihood of the Palestine authorities considering the question. He shunned a test of the alleged will and of his claims. And I have every reason to believe that his advice to his followers not to hurt my feelings at that time was with a view to prevent me from pursuing the matter further.

In reply to my letter to the High Commissioner I received a letter from His Excellency written through his chief secretary and dated February 6, 1929 to the effect that any information I wished to obtain must be obtained privately and that I would be well advised to employ an advocate in Palestine. This letter was, of course, a great disappointment to me. Not until two years later did it occur to me that I could cite an instance which would prove indubitably that the fraud was one under the jurisdiction of the Palestine authorities and that then the British Government would have to take notice. In other words, in my first letter I had cited only the fact that Shoghi Effendi was collecting money from the Bahais of America based on the authority granted in an alleged will of Abdul Baha. In my next letter to the High Commissioner, written October 7, 1930, I brought the fraud forward as operating right in Palestine. And because of this fact, on account of the collection of money having taken place in Palestine I received a different response from the High Commissioner. The following are the letters that have passed between us.

To His Excellency
The High Commissioner of Palestine
Jerusalem, Palestine.

October 7, 1930

Your Excellency:

As a victim of a fraud, which is being perpetrated under the Mandatory Power now governing Palestine, I wish to make a complaint against Shoghi Effendi, of the Persian Colony, at Haifa Palestine.

Shoghi Effendi is collecting money from the people of the various nations of the world under the powers granted him in an alleged will which he claims is the will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas, and in which he is appointed successor of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas. I base my assertion that a fraud is being perpetrated by Shoghi Effendi on the following facts:

About three months after the death of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas, in November 1921, typewritten copies of an English translation of a document were sent to England, America, and other countries, which Shoghi Effendi alleged is the will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas, appointing him his successor. This alleged will is undated, unwitnessed, unprobated, and unstamped by the Government. It also contradicts the intent that its alleged maker held during his lifetime. For the alleged will commands people to obey Shoghi Effendi as if he were God, and to pay a tax to him. This is the motive of the fraud--money and power.

I have submitted the photographs of the alleged will to Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell, the renowned English handwriting expert; and editor of The Analyst, at 85 Eccleston Square London, S.W.1. and his report shows that this document is fraudulent. No part of it was written by Abdul Baha, although Shoghi Effendi, and the family of Sir Abdul Baha assert that every word of its ten pages was written by Sir Abdul Baha. Shoghi Effendi ignored my request for permission to send a handwriting expert to Haifa to examine the original document.

Aside from my having contributed to various Bahai activities in America I also sent $200. to Palestine, in response to a solicitation from Shoghi Effendi, which he made through The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahais of the U.S. and Canada, urging them to send money to him to buy land on Mount Carmel, in order to protect the Tomb of the Báb. No financial statement was ever given to me regarding the purchase of this land, although I have requested an account of it. I enclose photostat copies of the appeal, and the receipt, for contributions to this fund, also two letters of acknowledgment of my contribution. I also enclose a photostat copy of Dr. Mitchell's report.

I am not making this complaint merely because of the money I have contributed, as this is small compared to the expense that I have incurred in collecting evidence against Shoghi Effendi. But I am making this complaint in order to protect the public from a fraud, and a movement, which under Shoghi Effendi has become far more subversive than that of Bolshevism. For Shoghi Effendi aims to become world dictator, and he is establishing enemy states within each state, and collecting taxes from the people of these enemy states. All this is contrary to the teachings of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas whose successor he claims to be.

Will you please investigate these charges, and upon verifying Dr. Mitchell's report take such steps as lies within your jurisprudence to prohibit Shoghi Effendi from perpetrating the fraud that he is the successor of Sir Abdul Baha.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) Ruth White.

Madam,

I am directed to refer to your letter of the 7th October regarding the will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas and to ask that I may be furnished with the document purporting to be the will, or a photograph of it, which you caused to be examined by Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell.

Steps will then be taken, if possible, to compare that with the original will which is in Palestine.

December 12, 1930

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your letter of November 25, 1930, 1232/29. It gives me great pleasure to send you the photographs of the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas which I herewith enclose. These photographs are copies of a set of photographs which Mr. Horace Holley lent me. Mr. Holley is the secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States and Canada, and this organization officially represents Shoghi Effendi, the alleged successor of Sir Abdul Baha. I also enclose two samples of the authentic writing of Sir Abdul Baha. One sample is a photograph made from the Book of the Unitarian Church at Montclair, New Jersey, in which book he wrote directly after he delivered a sermon at the church on May 12th, 1912. The other sample is a photograph made from the Bible at the City Temple, London, in which book he also wrote directly after he had finished delivering a sermon there in 1911. One cannot be certain of any writings purporting to be those of Sir Abdul Baha except those secured from church records, and other public books in which he wrote. For almost all of his later letters were written by his secretaries, and many of these secretaries were related to him, hence they are interested parties, as all of Abdul Baha's family share in the tax that is derived from the powers granted in this alleged will.

If you will pardon me for digressing a little I would like to recount to you an incident that occurred while I was in London last May and June, having the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha examined by Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell, which made me certain that a Higher Power was guiding this affair. Two years prior to this I had tried to get in touch with the British Analyst of Palestine (as I thought at that time that he was the proper official to address regarding the investigating of the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha) and I was assured by one of the officials at the British Embassy, here in New York City, that there was no British Analyst in Palestine. Then what was my astonishment one night in London, while at a meeting of distinguished scientists, to meet Mr. Gerald Baker, who I learned had been the Analyst there for Great Britain about nine years. I thereupon recounted to him the incident and asked him if he would go to Dr. Mitchell's office and see the enlarged photographs of the alleged will, as well as the authentic samples of Sir Abdul Baha's writings. This he did. I am sure that he will be glad to tell you what he has heard personally from Dr. Mitchell.

Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of my book, "The Bahai Religion and Its Enemy the Bahai Organization." Between pages 165 and 200 you will find the printed reproduction of the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha, and the English translation of its complete text. Also a sample of his authentic writing.

If I can do anything further to assist you, please call upon me as I shall be only too happy to help you in any way I can.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) Ruth White

P.S. Between pages 178 and 184 of my book you will find the appointment of Shoghi Effendi.

Madam,

In continuation of my letter No. 1232/29 of the 7th of January, 1931, on the subject of the will of the late Sir Abdel Baha Abbas, I am directed to inform you that Mr. Afnan Shoghi Effendi Rabbani permitted a comparison to be made between the document which is reported to be the original will of the deceased and the photographs which you have produced.

Such examination revealed that the photographs appeared to be authentic reproductions of the document produced as the will of the deceased.

June 5th, 1931

Your Excellency:

Thank you for your letter of May 19th, Y/58/31, sent through your secretary.

I am glad that the first step has been accomplished, and that you have compared the photographs I sent you of the alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas with the original document purporting to be his will, and found that the photographs are reproductions of it. Thank you for taking this very necessary step. But you of course are aware that my request for an investigation was not in order to ascertain whether the photographs I sent you were copies of this purported document, for I never doubted that they were. My request was for you to ascertain whether the document is authentic or fraudulent. When Dr. Mitchell examined the enlarged photographs of the alleged will he said that he had done all he could with photographs, and that the next step should be for an expert to examine the original alleged will at Haifa in order to ascertain many points that can be ascertained only through an examination of an original document, as for instance--the chemical analysis of the ink, its age, and evidences of erasures, and also evidences of paper having been pieced together, and many other points familiar to a handwriting expert.

After Dr. Mitchell told me this I sent Shoghi Effendi Rabbani a registered letter asking him to grant me permission to send a handwriting expert to Haifa and have the original examined. But to this he did not reply, nor did I expect him to, inasmuch as he has done everything to prevent an investigation. Yet he has not hesitated to collect money from me and other Bahais under the powers granted in this alleged will.

I most respectfully repeat my request to you that inasmuch as I am one of the victims of this fraud, and inasmuch as this fraud is continuing to be perpetrated internationally upon the public, and great sums of money collected under the powers granted in this alleged will, that you have the original alleged will of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas examined by a handwriting expert and report your finding to me. Your report that the photographs examined by the handwriting expert to whom I submitted these (Dr. Mitchell) have been verified as accurate reproductions of the original document, in conjunction with the report of Dr. Mitchell make a prima facie case of fraud against those who have used this alleged will as a basis of soliciting money from the public, and you will hence recognize the necessity of further action on your part.

You already have Dr. Mitchell's report which shows that his examination of the photographs of this alleged will proves it to be fraudulent. You also have photostats of the receipts showing that I contributed to this Bahai Fund (from which Shoghi Effendi receives his tax). And at the time I contributed to this fund it was without knowledge that the alleged will had not been fully authenticated. Therefore as all indications are overwhelmingly in favour of the belief that this alleged will, which was undated, unwitnessed, unprobated and unstamped by the government, is fraudulent, and especially as this belief is backed up by the report of Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell showing it to be fraudulent, I am confident that you will take the final step and have the document examined and make a report so that these victims may no longer be defrauded by Shoghi Effendi Rabbani, who claims to be the successor of Sir Abdul Baha Abbas, and that restitution may be made to me, and to many others, from whom large sums have been obtained under false pretences.

A report coming from the British Government would have an overwhelming effect in putting a stop to the fraud and thereby His Majesty's Representatives would live up to the wonderful reputation they have established all over the world for rectifying injustices.

I have great hope in the British Government, as I have lived many years in England, and am conversant with the fact that they do not pigeon-hole such matters as is often done in the United States. My confidence in the British Government's sense of justice also made me select Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell as the handwriting expert to examine this alleged will.

Please let me know what action you take in the matter, and please send your report by registered mail.

With many thanks for your prompt attention to this matter, I am Very truly yours,

Mrs. H. Lawrence White,
Butler Hall, 88 Morningside Drive,
New York City, U.S.A.

The reader will note that the High Commissioner, in his letter of November 25th asks for photographs of the alleged will in order to compare these photographs with the document from which they had been photographed! This letter astonished me as well as disappointed me as it so evidently evaded the thing I had asked for. I never doubted, nor did anyone else, that the photographs which I had received through Shoghi Effendi were photographs of the alleged will. There could have been no motive in his sending over photographs of something else and saying that they were photographs of this document.

What I had asked for, and what Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell, the expert in London, had said should be done, was for experts to go to Haifa and make a long and careful study of the original alleged will in order to ascertain many things that cannot be ascertained from a photograph such as, for instance, the chemical analysis of the ink and its age, water marks on the paper and the age of this paper, evidences of erasures, or of the piecing together of paper and many other things familiar to handwriting experts. This would have required weeks, and perhaps months of careful research by experts, and yet Ruhi confesses that so brief a time was consumed, in looking over the photographs, that he waited in the office while this was being done. And now, in order to deceive the Bahais, Shoghi Effendi pretends that the comparison of the photographs of the alleged will with the document from which they had been photographed is an authentication of the alleged will!

At first the statements emanating from Shoghi Effendi were worded very cautiously though clearly intended to mislead. Thus in a letter written through his secretary to Mr. E. E. Kluge of Chicago, dated July 10, 1931, he says:

"It might interest you to know, however, that the Will in its entirety has been closely examined by experts appointed by the Palestine Government authorities. Not even the slightest objection or the faintest doubt has been expressed concerning its authenticity by them."

Here the implication is made that the alleged will was examined by the authorities with a view to ascertain whether or not it was authentic and that the result was that nothing could be discovered that impugned its authenticity. How far this is from the truth can be seen from the correspondence between the Palestine Secretariat and myself previously given here.

Those who begin to deceive by the implication of their words are likely soon to proceed to plain prevarication, and it is hard to regard as anything else another letter from Shoghi Effendi dated December 1, 1931 to Mrs. Carroll Smith of Dallas, Texas. Mrs. Smith wrote to Shoghi and stated that it had been reported to her that an official comparison had been made of the will with documents known positively to be in the handwriting of Abdul Baha, and she ends the letter as follows:

"Please tell me if such an official comparison really has been made and let the believers know that as a result the Palestine Government certified that the Will was in the Master's handwriting and was genuine.."

To this Shoghi Effendi replied through his secretary, Ruhi Afnan, in a letter part of which is as follows:

"About five or six months ago Mrs. White -- who is at the head of this movement to set the Master's Will aside -- wrote the High Commissioner in Palestine on the subject and asked him to find about the authenticity of the document. The High Commissioner wrote to the Governor of Haifa and sent the Government expert to verify the handwriting. Shoghi Effendi was written on the subject and asked to send the Will to the Government. He sent me with the Will and the expert studied it before me and the governor in the office of the latter. The expert compared the original Will with the handwriting of the Master which Mrs. White has sent him as authentic samples. He said that they were both written by the same person, and that the person who had decided otherwise does not know what he is speaking about. The Expert was an Englishman who knows nothing of the Cause or the Baha'is' and was absolutely impartial. I think the High Commissioner sent to Mrs. White the result of his findings but she preferred to keep quiet about it."

This statement of Shoghi Effendi asserts that "The expert compared the original Will with the handwriting of Abdul Baha which Mrs. White had sent him as authentic samples." This absolutely conflicts with the statement of the High Commissioner in his letter dated May 19, 1931 that "the photographs appeared to be genuine reproductions of the document produced as the will of the deceased." As Soghi Effendi's statement stands it means that the photographs of the two samples of the authentic writings of Abdul Baha which I had procured from two Bibles, in two different churches, one in America and one in England, were duplicates of a will which had been written in the Orient and buried under ground years before! This as the reader can see is not only sheer nonsense but was written with intent to deceive.

I wish to call the attention of the reader to another point also. Shoghi Effendi wrote to Mr. Kluge that experts examined the will. Later he wrote to Mrs. Smith that only one expert examined the will--an Englishman. The extracts from these two letters are as follows:

"...the Will in its entirety has been closely examined by experts.... not even the slightest objection or the faintest doubt has been expressed concerning its authenticity by them."

Six months later he wrote to Mrs. Smith through his secretary as follows:

"The High Commissioner wrote to the governor of Haifa and sent the Government expert to verify the handwriting... the expert studied it before me and the governor in the office of the latter. The expert compared the original Will... He said that they were both written by the same person...The expert was an Englishman..."

After the final statement of the High Commissioner in his letter of May 19th, the reader will note that I again urged him in my letter of June 5th to make the examination I had asked for, and his last letter to me, dated July 10th shows that the Government would not take the actions I had asked for, as the following statement shows:

"I am directed ... to say that the Government do not feel disposed to take any further administrative actions in the matter."

The "further administrative actions" I had asked for was an examination of the alleged will by experts which would have required weeks and perhaps months of careful work. If the Government really had had the alleged will examined by experts, and had made a definite report showing whether it was spurious or authentic, then as that was all I had asked for there would have been no sense in their replying that, "The Government do not feel disposed to take any further administrative actions in the matter."

Furthermore if there had been any authentication of the document wouldn't Shoghi Effendi have been only too eager to have blazoned this to the Bahai world, considering that for four years I had publicly challenged him with the fact that this document was spurious? Wouldn't he have gloried in publishing such a report in all the Bahai publications thereby trying to prove me wrong? But this he did not do. He has kept silent on the subject, except where he could not do otherwise in the two letters already cited. For in these two letters of Mr. Kluge and Mrs. Smith, ~~xxxxxxx~~ he was asked point blank whether there had been an official authentication of the alleged will, and he therefore was placed in the embarrassing position which necessitated a reply. His policy has been, and still is to keep quiet, and caution the Bahais to keep as quiet as possible about the matter, hoping that by so doing it will die. But it will not die. What will die is the papistry that Shoghi Effendi and his coterie have set up. For in this enlightened age it is impossible for the people to revert to this mediaeval institution; especially as it is wholly irreconcilable with the Bahai teachings. The reader may ascertain for himself the truth of the statement that the papist group is rapidly diminishing by looking in THE WORLD ALMANAC for 1931 on page 391. There he will find that in 1916 the number of Bahais in the United States and Canada was listed as 2,884. But since this group became papists under Shoghi Effendi their numbers have diminished to 1,247 under his "Guardianship." On the other hand all the groups who have rejected Shoghi

Effendi are rapidly increasing, with the result that the largest number of Bahais are in the ranks of those who are no longer under this papist domination.

There are three attitudes of mind among the Bahais today toward the alleged will of Abdul Baha. First there is the attitude of this papist group, known under the names of "Spiritual Assemblies", "Local Assemblies" and "National Spiritual Assemblies of Baha'is". The members of this group accept Shoghi Effendi as the "Guardian" whom they believe they are commanded to obey as if he were God, likewise feeling under the obligation to pay a tax to him, according to the directions given in the alleged will.

The second attitude of mind is that of certain dissident Bahais who although they have thrown off the authority of Shoghi Effendi still nominally accept as authentic the alleged will of Abdul Baha on which this authority is based. This attitude is not a very consistent one, for a Bahai who believes that Abdul Baha bequeathed the powers of "Guardian" to Shoghi and yet refuses to follow the latter is disobeying what he thinks are the commands of Abdul Baha. It is setting a harmful example to future generations to violate deliberately what one believes to be an important teaching of Abdul Baha. However I am confident that the Power which has guided these Bahais in breaking away from the Papistry of Haifa will lead them further in the right path and that they will ultimately completely reject this so-called Will.

The third attitude toward the alleged will is the right one because it is following the course that Abdul Baha told us to take -- to reject any document or letters, purporting to be his, which grants any authority to anyone unless it is proved beyond the question of a doubt that they are his. Therefore, as not only did this alleged will grant Shoghi Effendi more potential authority than a king and pope combined but moreover the application of it nullifies the teachings of both Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha, all those who remain true to the Bahai Teachings must reject it as it has never been proved authentic but on the contrary has already been shown to be spurious.

The papal group claimed that a successor or "Guardian" would keep the Bahais united. Far from this having proved true it has brought intense inharmony among the Bahais and chaos to the Cause. Their position is utterly unlogical. That is why we have the astounding spectacle of this group promulgating any number of conflicting principles, without being in the least aware that they are conflicting. For instance they purport to promulgate the principles of Baha'o'llah and of Abdul Baha, the foremost of which was to free all religions from sectarianism, and at the same time they promulgate Shoghi's ideas of a super-sectarian cult more dogmatic and narrower than any other in existence.

The attempt to pervert the Bahai Movement by subjecting it to Organization domination is a parallel to the corruption of primitive Christianity by ecclesiasticism. Recently in trying to ascertain on what authority Christianity was able to establish a papistry new light came to me on this matter. Christ said, after Peter had divined His station: "Blessed art thou, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee but my Father which is in Heaven...thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church." The meaning of this verse seems to have wholly escaped Christians. Christ meant that Peter's inner guidance had revealed to him the station of Christ, and on this spiritual principle of innate knowledge would the church of Christ be built. Not on an outer church or organization confined to bricks and stones but on an inner Church founded on the right of freedom of conscience of every individual. The necessity of freedom of conscience in religion was emphasized by Baha'o'llah and Abdul Baha and they laid great stress on inner guidance which is another aspect of it.

But there is this satisfaction about the whole matter. The officials of the British Government took these steps in order to secure all the information possible from me and to keep this information on file for use in the future should the emergency arise, and through the data I have put at their disposal they are in a position at any time to take decisive action against Shoghi and his organization should he and his adherents ever become powerful. But they will not become powerful, as already shown his organization is rapidly decreasing in numbers, for no movement founded on fraud can succeed.

Re: Civil Action No. 64 C 1878

Dear Judge St. Eve:

As amici curiae, members of the Reform Bahai Faith are concerned about the impact of the present lawsuit upon our denomination, though differing in view from all named parties. Religious liberty is not only involved but is the issue before the Court.

While all named parties essentially differ over their interpretation of the purported will and testament of Abdu'l-Baha, members of the Reform Bahai Faith agree with the 1929 opinion of Bahai Ruth White and the 1930 Report of Dr. Charles Ainsworth Mitchell that the will is a fraudulent document.

Dr. Mitchell was a leading forensic researcher of the time at the British Museum and his work is still cited in academic sources. His Report is deposited with the Library of Congress (LC Control No.: mm 81000871) and a recently obtained certified copy is herewith provided to the Court.

The key passage of Dr. Mitchell's Report, on the last page, second to the last paragraph, reads, "A minute comparison of the authenticated writing with the writing on every page of the alleged will . . . has failed to detect in any part of the will the characteristics of the writing of Abdu'l-Baha, as shown in the authenticated specimens."

They are undeniably Pseudo Baha'is

<http://www.Bahai-Guardian.com>

The following information was published in United States Baha'i News No. 172, (page 17), December 1944, with respect to an amendment that the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States and Canada had made to the By-Laws of their Declaration of Trust, based on directions that had been received from Shoghi Effendi during the previous year:

Their statement follows:

"In the first place, the constitution and by-laws of a National Spiritual Assembly are, as far as possible, uniform and identical with those of every other National Assembly, thus laying the administrative basis of the Baha'i electoral bodies which later are to elect the members of the Universal House of Justice, and give every Baha'i community in the entire world the same organic law. Thus, the American National Assembly does not, of its own volition, initiate amendments, since to do so by independent action, would create differences between the various national constitutions, but takes such action only when the Guardian himself has sent directions which require amendments, as in the present case. . . .

Article II. The Baha'is of the United States and Canada, for whose benefit this Trust is maintained [Canada would establish its own NSA later], shall consist of all persons resident. . . who are accepted by the National Spiritual Assembly as fulfilling the requirements of membership in the Baha'i Community under the following qualifications set forth by the Guardian of the Faith:

"(a) Full recognition of the stations of the Bab as Forerunner, of Baha'u'llah as Author and of 'Abdu'l-Baha as True Exemplar of the Baha'i religion, unreserved acceptance of, and submission to whatsoever has been revealed by their Pen; loyal and steadfast adherence to every clause of 'Abdu'l-Baha's sacred Will; and close association with the spirit as well as the form of Baha'i Administration throughout the world. . ."

It may be noted from the qualifications enumerated by Shoghi Effendi above that the believer must maintain "steadfast adherence to every clause of 'Abdu'l-Baha's sacred Will." Shoghi Effendi has explained in his spiritual testament: "The Dispensation of Baha'u'llah" that this Will should be considered not only as the Will of 'Abdu'l-Baha but, as well, an expression of the Will of Baha'u'llah, and, as such, actually "their Will and Testament" — "the Heir of both the Originator and the Interpreter of the Law of God" — and in consequence thereof, "the Child of the Covenant." Moreover, Shoghi Effendi has emphasized that "the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha, which together with the Kitab-i-Aqdas, constitutes the chief depository wherein are enshrined those priceless elements of that Divine Civilization, the establishment of which is the primary mission of the Baha'i Faith . . . are not only complementary, but . . . mutually confirm one another, and are inseparable parts of one complete unit" and therefore the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha is clearly nothing less than a part of the explicit Holy Text, all of whose provisions have been promised to endure and remain in effect for at least a full thousand years.

Shoghi Effendi, as quoted above, has stipulated that one of the essential requirements that must be fulfilled to be accepted as a Baha'i is: "Steadfast adherence to every clause of 'Abdu'l-Baha's sacred Will."

This Will calls for an unbroken line of Guardians of the Cause of God as long as the Dispensation of Baha'u'llah's endures, each of whom, following the appointment of the first Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, by 'Abdu'l-Baha, inherits the Guardianship solely through an appointment made by his predecessor "in his own life-time." (i.e., not by testamentary document)

This Will states that "The mighty stronghold shall remain impregnable and safe through obedience to him who is the guardian of the Cause of God." and enjoins all "to show their obedience, submissiveness and subordination unto the guardian of the Cause of God, to turn unto him and be lowly before him"

Moreover, this Will stipulates that the Guardian of the Cause of God presides as "the sacred head and the distinguished member for life" of the Universal House of Justice and provides him with the sole authority to appoint Hands of the Cause.

In the light of the foregoing, it is crystal clear that those individuals who identify themselves as Baha'is but belong to an organization that does not have a living Guardian of the Cause of God as the Head of the Faith — "The Center of the Cause" — and the "sacred head" of its Universal House of Justice, as stipulated under the provisions of the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha, are seriously deluded and, however blindly, are blatantly misrepresenting themselves as Baha'is, who, undeniably, at best, are no more than pseudo Baha'is.

Relation between British Govt. and Haifan Baha'is

It appears that the British establishment and the Haifan Bahai establishment are no longer attempting to mask their long established ties to one another. Mr Barney Leith, a long-time serving member of the AO of the UK Bahai community, has recently been knighted for "serv[ices] to the Bahai Faith..."

<http://www.guardian.co.uk/uk/2011/jun/11/queens-birthday-honours-obe> (scroll down alphabetically)

"The Honourable John Barnabas Leith, For serv the Baha'i Faith and to Inter-Faith Relations."

It is fascinating to me that "...services to the Bahai faith..." constitutes grounds for granting a knighthood by the British Queen of the House of Windsor to someone. Does anyone have anymore doubts that Haifan Bahaism is the bastard child of the British Anglo-American establishment, puppeteered by the Corporation of London itself <http://taxjustice.blogspot.com/2009/02/corporation-of-london-state-wi...> & <http://www.newstatesman.com/economy/2011/02/london-corporation-city?>

...Today the Bahai cult is hated in Iran, and is considered correctly to be an arm of the British Crown. During the destabilization of the Shah in 1978, it was widely reported that in several instances the Bahai cult secretly funded the Khomeini Shi'ite movement. In part, the money would have flowed through the cult's links to the same international 'human rights' organizations, such as Amnesty International, that originally sponsored the anti-Shah movement in Iran. These movements also derive from the "one world" currents associated with the Bahais since the early 1900s. (If any Iranians have been misled on the question of the Bahais by the supposed antipathy of Khomeini's clique to the Bahais, it should be noted that the Bahai cultists often deliberately encouraged anti-Bahai activities as camouflage)...

Bahais engage in acts of cyber-terrorism against Iran (2010 Report)

Reference: <http://www.infowars.com/iran-arrests-30-over-u-s-linked-cyber-ring>

TEHRAN (Reuters) – Iran has arrested 30 people suspected of belonging to a U.S.-linked cyber network gathering information on Iranian nuclear scientists and sending people abroad for training, a news agency reported on Saturday.

It said the group sought to recruit people through the Internet for training in Iraq with the People's Mujahideen Organisation, a leftist exile group which launched attacks on the Islamic Republic from Saddam Hussein's Iraq

"Thirty people were arrested in connection with an organised American cyber war network via a series of complex security measures in the field of information technology and communications," the Fars news agency said.

Tehran's general and revolutionary court said one of the group was linked to an outlawed sect — a reference to the Baha'i religious minority, the agency said.

"Among the charges against this network are creating an intelligence gathering network, including identification of the country's nuclear scientists and staging illegal demonstrations and encouraging the public to take part in them after the presidential elections," it said.

Iran has seen its biggest domestic crisis since the 1979 revolution as supporters of candidates who lost to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last year took to the streets in protests, provoking a strong security clampdown.

Iran is locked in a dispute with Western countries who fear its nuclear energy programme is a front for developing nuclear weapons. Washington and its allies have condemned Iran for its treatment of the opposition movement. (Editing by Jon Hemming)

Baha'i Culture!!!

2006 New Year's party. A fun way to ring in the new year in a positive Baha'i atmosphere. All proceeds from this evening go towards the Scottsdale/Paradise valley Baha'i Center.

Universal Auxiliary Language – What nonsense!!!

The Bahai Faith has introduced the idea of having an auxiliary language. This is an important Bahai principle which claims to be a step towards bringing world peace, as Abdul Baha has been quoted to have said: “One of the great steps towards universal peace would be the establishment of a universal language.” (Paris Talks, The Eighth Principle)

Considering the fact that it is included amongst the important 12 Bahai principles, it would be worthwhile to know its conformity with divine laws.

The religion of God is always complete and perfect. In it, there is no confusion and all explanations have been provided. It does not leave man in the state of ambiguity and contradiction. In fact, its fundamentals are explicit and it outlines a defined path.

A look at the principle of universal language, raises many doubts about the validity of such a belief. The least needed for this idea to be divine was that the Bahai Faith should have provided a clear guideline about the language. The confusion exists not only amongst this day Bahais, but even among the Bahai leaders, themselves. Bahauallah in his writings has “recommended” Arabic as the universal language. “That proposition which is especially beloved, when presented before the Heavenly Throne, is that all should converse in the Arabic language. This, inasmuch as it is the most comprehensive of all languages (absat az kull al-lughat). (Tablet of Bahauallah commenting on the verse of Aqdas about the selection of International Auxiliary language and script)

The Bahai holy book of Aqdas too was written in Arabic, which reflects its importance and the possibility of becoming the universal language. But, with the disastrous failure of the Bahai Faith in the Muslim world, and the growing popularity of Esperanto (a constructed language) Abdul Baha miscalculated: “Esperanto has been drawn up with this end in view (of being the universal language): it is a fine invention and a splendid piece of work, but it needs perfecting. Esperanto as it stands is very difficult for some people... . Therefore appreciate ‘Esperanto’, for it is the beginning of the carrying out of one of the most important of the Laws of Bahá’u’lláh, and it must continue to be improved and perfected.” (Paris Talks, The Eighth Principle)

However, Esperanto could not sustain itself, and the widespread usage of English had the Universal House of Justice declare: The need for it (a universal auxiliary language) is now recognized on all sides, as reflected in the circumstances that have compelled the United Nations and much of the non-governmental community to adopt several “official languages”. Until a decision is taken by international agreement, the effect of such developments as the Internet, the management of air traffic, the development of technological vocabularies of various kinds, and universal education itself, has been to make it possible, to some extent, for English to fill the gap. (The Universal House of Justice, Century of Light (2001), p. 128)

The least one would expect from a religion is to outline the path. The central figures themselves were so confused that Abdul Baha declared: “An international Congress should be formed, consisting of delegates from every nation in the world, Eastern as well as Western. This Congress should form a language that could be acquired by all, and every country would thereby reap great benefit.” (Paris Talks, The Eighth Principle)

Why should the Congress form a language? Is this not a Bahai teaching? It is disgusting to note that religious leaders are so powerless, that they have to seek assistance from world diplomats. This teaching was easier said than done. Do you not think that if the interpreter of the religion is so confused that he cannot provide the solution, something is wrong with the faith?

Also, it would be worthwhile to note that Abdul Baha says a common language would pave the way for universal peace (quoted in the beginning), Shoghi takes a U-turn. What Bahá’u’lláh is referring to in the Eighth Leaf of the Exalted Paradise [Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh, p. 68, above] is a far distant time, when the world is really one country, and one language would be a sensible possibility. From a letter written on behalf of Shoghi Effendi to an individual believer, March 16, 1946 republished in Lights of Guidance, p. 340

Confusion abound in this teaching, and the incessant change in the Bahai interpretation, emphasizes the missing link between the Faith and God. While truth is clear and explicit, and religion focusses on clearing confusion and doubts, the Bahai faith only adds to contradiction.

Is the Bahai Faith a religion?

An important element to establish the truthfulness and divine origin of any religion is to examine the prophecies made by their leaders.

The importance of prophecies is derived from the fact that Prophets (or Manifestations of God, as the Bahais call them) are sent by God. God, the Almighty, is Knower of All things. Since our knowledge is limited to the present and the past, God makes known the future to His appointed ones as a sign of their truthfulness. So while predictions can go wrong, prophecies are true and bound to happen. Thus, the foretelling by Prophets are prophecies, and any wrong forecasting is a manifest proof to establish the falsehood of the claimant.

Quranic verses and Prophetic traditions are exemplary evidences of prophecies, which the Bahais also acknowledge.

My intention, here, is not to scrutinize all the Bahai teachings and convert this article to an argument of academic interest. But my objective is to present to you an honest case and let you examine the Bahai Faith.

“In each cycle the guardian and holy souls have been twelve. So Jacob had twelve sons; in the time of Moses there were heads or chiefs of the tribes; in the time of Christ there were twelve Apostles; and in the time of Mohammad there were twelve Imams. But in this glorious manifestation there are twenty-four; double the number of all the others, for the greatness of this manifestation requires it.”

Some Answered Questions, Chapter 11: Commentary on the Eleventh Chapter of the Revelation of St. John, page 29-30

“O my loving friends! After the passing away of this wronged one, turn unto Shoghi Effendi as he is the sign of God, the chosen branch, the Guardian of the Cause of God, he unto whom all the Aghsan, the Afnan, the Hands of the Cause of God and His loved ones must turn.” Will and Testament of Abdu'l Baha, page 11

So far so good, but what about the remaining?

The Will and Testament continues “He (Shoghi) is the Interpreter of the Word of God and after him will succeed the first-born of his lineal descendants.” Will and Testament of Abdu'l Baha, page 11

And lo! Shoghi died without children. God guided mankind and proved Abdul Baha a liar.

Dear readers, Abdul Baha played a trick, he was blind about the unseen future. How will he show you the way, who himself is lost?

Baha'i Faith Core activites exposed

Baha'i Faith

Bahá'í Faith is banned in most of the countries.

“IT APPEARS THAT AS HARD AS THE BAHÁ'IS MIGHT HAVE TRIED OVER THE YEARS TO DISMISS WHAT THEY ‘CONSPIRACY THEORIES’ REGARDING THEIR CONNECTIONS TO THE BRITISH ESTABLISHMENT, MORE AND SUCH THEORIES CONTINUE TO PERSIST- WHILE WITH EACH DAY MORE EVIDENCE EMERGES PROVING THEORIES AS FACT RATHER THAN THEORY”.

During the 19th century, Britain had firm control over India; at the same time Russia had been expanding south and east into Central Asia toward India, and a rivalry started between Britain and Russia over territorial and political control in Central Asia. The piece of land that was located between India and Russian holdings, included Persia, was a highly coveted region, where both Russia and Britain worked to gain influence.

Briefly, the situation was –

- Support of the United Kingdom during the Constitutional Revolution,
- Anglo-Russian convention which solidified boundaries that identified control between Britain and Russia in Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet,
- The occupation of Iranian territory during the First World War by the UK, Russia and the Ottoman Empire, as well as the coup d'état of 1921 which was backed by the British.

In such circumstances the Russian Government, to gain control over central Asia – especially Iran created a false Religion called as Bahatism.

The Bahá'í Faith and the Bahá'ís have had ties to foreign powers, and were agents of Russian imperialism, British colonialism, American expansionism and International Zionism.

Bahá'í teachings promote to be loyal to one's government and not be involved in politics but the fact is exactly contrary to what is preached. Baha'ís are always involved in politics and seen with political leaders. They are known to have been involved in espionage activities in each and every country. This is the reason why they are banned in most of the countries. These countries found the followers of Bahá'í Faith, having dual loyalty and of being involved with foreign or hostile powers.

Some of these countries are:

EGYPT

The late PRESIDENT JAMAL ABDUL NASSER BANNED THE BAHÁ'Í FAITH IN EGYPT IN 1960. His government found relationship between Baha'í Faith and Zionism. The President decree was as under:

Clause 1: All Bahá'í Assemblies and Centers existing in the two regions of the Republic are hereby dissolved, and their activities suspended. Individuals, bodies and institutions are forbidden to engage in any activity, as was conducted by these Assemblies and Centers. The Minister of the Interior will issue the necessary instructions to bring to an end the activities of these Assemblies and Centers.

Clause 2: The properties of the Bahá'í Assemblies and Centers shall be taken over by officials appointed by the Minister of the interior. The Minister shall designate a guardian to be in custody of the funds, documents and papers owned by the said Assemblies Clause 3: Any infringement of this law is an offence deserving imprisonment of a minimum of Six months, and/or a fine from 100 to 1000 Egyptian pounds.

Clause 4: This Decree shall be published in the Official Gazette, and will be enforced from the Date of publication.

INDONESIA The President of Indonesia in 1960 dissolved Bahai Administration and made every Baha'í activity illegal. Recently in 2009 Bahá'ís were arrested in Indonesia on Criminal Charges of violating “The Law of Child Protection”. The Bahá'ís were prosecuted under the Law of Child Protection 23-2002 trying to convert children of other faith as young as 9 to 10 years.

IRAQ President Saddam Hussain not only dissolved Baha'i organization in Iraq but issued an order that any Baha'i activity will be met with death sentence. Following the Baathist coup in 1963, the then leaders drastically limited the freedoms previously guaranteed to the Iraqi citizens. The new regime began with attempts to prevent Baha'i activity in Iraq in 1967. This culminated in the decision of the Directorate of Civil Status No. 358 24 / 7 / 1975 that stopped registration of Baha'is in the records of civil status.

In May 1970, the Iraqi Government banned all Baha'i Institutions and Baha'i activities. In mid December 1973, an incident created a stir which engulfed the life of many Baha'is. In a government owned school, many Baha'i girls were secretly propagating the Baha'i Faith to other classmates. The girls reported the matter to the authorities that propagation of an Israeli based Faith is going on in the campus. The matter was reported to the Ministry of education. He ordered the investigation on the following day. The investigation revealed a network of Israeli based organization is behind it. The head Master was dismissed and the girl was arrested together with her three Baha'i classmates. Almost fifty people were arrested in the course of next few months. A military court sentenced fourteen of them to life imprisonment, three to fifteen years and nine to ten years in jail. Further severe action was taken against suspected members of this organization involved in conversion and espionage.

USSR The former USSR called Baha'is as Enemy of State. Surprising indeed from a country which nurtured the Faith initially.

In 1937, "NKVD" (People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs) outlawed about 40 Bahá'í communities existing at that time in USSR. From the 13th of October, all the members of the Bahá'í Spiritual Assembly of Baku and dozens of community members were arrested. All of them were punished for their illegal and anti State activities

The chairman of the Spiritual Assembly, Faraj Jaffargulu Gasimov (the nephew of the first Bahá'í from Salyan, Hadim Javad) and his wife, Fizza Muradova were imprisoned. The "NKVD" people called him "national enemy". Many were imprisoned and a few Baha'is were exiled to Siberia.

In October 1938 the building of the Bahá'í center was confiscated in Baku. Now there is a kindergarten in this building.

In November 1982, KGB started arresting the Bahá'ís. S.D. Asadova, I.F. Gasimov and I.G. Ayyubov were arrested. All their meetings were declared illegal and every Baha'i activity forbidden. Even the greetings on the phone "Allah'u'Abha" were forbidden.

UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC The UAR Government called Baha'is as "state within the state".

GERMANY In 1937 Heinrich Himmler signed an order disbanding the Bahá'í institutions in Germany. In 1939 and in 1942 there were sweeping arrests of former members of the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is of Germany. In May 1944 there was a public trial in Darmstadt. The Bahá'ís were heavily fined and it's institutions continued to be disbanded.

Following the fall of Nazi Germany, and with American and British control of Germany, an American Bahá'í, John C. Eichenauer (a medic of the 100th Infantry division then at Geislingen) started searching for the Bahá'í community in Stuttgart. He drove through Stuttgart looking and asking for Bahá'ís and was able to find an individual. The next day saw the first meeting of Bahá'ís since their disbandment in 1937.

Two other American Bahá'ís, Bruce Davison and Henry Jarvis, in Frankfurt and Heidelberg respectively, also connected with the Bahá'í community in Germany. At the beginning of the partition of Germany there were about 150 German Bahá'ís in the American section and they became registered with the American authorities. The National Spiritual Assembly was re-elected in 1946. Needless to say, US was involved in establishment of Bahaism in post-war Germany. John C. Eichenauer, Bruce Davison and Henry Jarvis were established US secret agents.

IRAN The Iranian Authorities always believed that Baha'is are the face of Israel in Iran. It is a well known fact that the Bahai Administration has issued statements for the Baha'is of Iran to go and teach the Iranians and face whatsoever consequences came. One should ask the Baha'is "where is the obedience to government" principle of the religion in this case?

Bahá'ís held many prominent positions in Iran during the Shah regime. In the government of Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, half of the Shah's cabinet were Bahá'ís.

Shah's personal physician, Abd al-Karim Ayadi was a Baha'i. Amongst other Bahá'í who held position in the Shah regime was Asadullah Sanii. The then Minister of Defence, Parviz Sabeti, was raised in a Bahá'í family. The Prime Minister Amir-Abbas Hoveida was a Bahá'í. The Baha'is agree that Hoveida's father was a Baha'i but say that Hoveida himself was not religious. Other Bahá'ís included Mahnaz Afkhami, who was the Minister for Women's Affairs and the daughter of a Bahá'í mother and Farrokhroo Parsa, another cabinet member.

CIS COUNTRIES More recently the Baha'is are being under strict surveillance in CIS countries like AZERBAIJAN, UZBEKISTAN, TAJAKISTAN etc. In fact Baha'is are being deported from Uzbekistan for secretly converting children under 15 years. (Refer <http://uzbekbahai.blogspot.com>)

KYRGYZSTAN The 2009 Religion Law, passed under former President Kurmanbek Bakiev was aimed at curtailing the Baha'i Activities. It stated "If a community has "administrative centres located beyond Kyrgyzstan or having foreign citizens in its administrative body" it is classified as a "mission". This community must re-register every year and does not have legal status. It's registration can be refused if it poses "a threat to the state and social security, the inter-ethnic and ecumenical concord, health and morality of the population, or in other cases anticipated by legislation."

YEMEN The Baha'i Faith is banned in Yemen since 2008. Many Baha'is were deported because of their conversion activities. Last year in Yemen four Baha'is were arrested by the Interior ministry for secretly propagating their religion. The three Baha'is of Iranian origin, Zia'u'llah Pourahmari, Keyvan Qadari, and Behrooz Rohani, were arrested in Sana'a, on the night of June 20, 2008. A fourth Baha'i, Sayfi Ibrahim Sayfi, was also arrested around the same time and was deported to Iraq.

According to the source close to the group, the men were arrested and taken to the national security headquarters' prison where they spent 40 days – most of the time in isolated cells – before being sent to Sana'a General Investigation Department.

Countries like SAUDI ARABIA, OMAN, JORDAN, MOROCCO also see Baha'is as hands of Zionists.

The Bahá'í Faith was banned in the 1970s in several countries like: BURUNDI in 1974; MALI in 1976; UGANDA in 1977; CONGO in 1977; NIGER in 1978.

INDIA The world's largest democracy India with all its secular credentials has come out with "Anti conversion law" in its 11 states so as to prevent this very secret sect from deceptive propagation. The law states:

Prohibition of forcible or deceptive conversion No person shall convert or attempt to convert, either directly or otherwise, any person from one religious faith to any other religious faith by the use of force or by inducement or by any FRAUDULENT means nor shall any person abet any such conversion.

Punishment for contravention of the provisions of Section 3 Any person contravening the provisions contained in section 3 shall, without prejudice to any civil liability, be punishable with Imprisonment to the extent of two years and fine up to ten thousand rupees.

According to a report published in India's leading Newspaper, The Hindustan Times in July 2006, as per a complaint filed in city court – the members of National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of India were accused by their colleagues of using impersonations and forgery to clandestinely penetrate into prohibited defense establishment of the country and get hold of classified documents and supplied them to Israeli and Iranian spying agencies.

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA AND NORTH KOREA Bahá'í Faith is not recognized in the People's Republic of China and North Korea and so there is no organized Bahá'í activity.

JAPAN AND SOUTH KOREA Even in countries such as Japan and South Korea, where there is religious freedom, the position of the Bahá'í Faith resembles that of Western Europe where Baha'is are only on paper.

MOROCCO In Morocco in 1962-1963, 15 Bahá'is were arrested for their religious convictions; three were given death sentences and several others years of prison term at hard labor. There were months of diplomatic efforts which bore no results.

On March 31, 1963 during a visit to the United States and the United Nations, King Hasan of Morocco was interviewed on television. He addressed the audience saying that "Though the Bahá'í Faith was against good order and morals" that he would still pardon the death sentences. It is evident that he succumbed to the US pressure.

Arrest of Baha'is occurred again in 1984, due to their secret teaching activities and sending confidential reports to Israel. Bahá'is have more recently been denied passports and can practice their religion only in private.

ISRAEL Last but not the least... strange indeed – Baha'is are not supposed to teach in Israel. There is a total ban. The matter is very mysterious that although Israel supports Baha'is in all aspects, yet why the State of Israel does not permit the Baha'is to propagate the Bahai Faith.

Quote : Whenever an Israeli citizen living in the West, irrespective of his background and religious affiliation, declares his belief and interest in becoming a member of the Bahá'í community, he should be informed that the Faith is not taught in Israel and that there is no Bahá'í community there apart from those who are associated with the Bahá'í World Center. He cannot be accepted into the Bahá'í community if he is planning to return to Israel to reside there. If he plans to continue to reside outside Israel, his enrollment can be accepted, but he will then be subject to the same restrictions about travel to Israel as any other Bahá'í, in that he could do so only with the express permission of the Universal House of Justice. In any event, the Universal House of Justice should be informed of any such declaration.

(Letter from the Universal House of Justice, dated October 20, 1994, to several National Spiritual Assemblies)

This is why, should Jews wish to become Bahá'í even now, they need to leave Israel first.

WITH SUCH SUSPECT BACKGROUND, IS THERE A DOUBT ABOUT THE INTENT OF THIS FAITH???

Baha'i faith and Al-Qaida

The Baha'i faith stands for universal love, for tolerance, and for a separation of religion and state. The need for religious leaders to let politicians do the ruling is a key value stated over and over again in Baha'i scripture.

Unfortunately, a weird Baha'i sub-cult has arisen. It structurally resembles al-Qaida, and differs from al-Qaida only with regard to methods, not ideals. It does not usually employ violence or terrorism (though persons with this mindset have beaten up friends of mind).

And, most frighteningly of all, it has taken over and subverted the main institutions of the Baha'i faith.

1) Al-Qaida believes in the destruction of secular, civil governments and replacing them with a fascist theocracy.

Baha'i theocrats believe in the destruction of secular, civil governments and replacing them with a fascist theocracy. Ian Semple, a member of the Baha'i Universal House of Justice, has for decades cast scorn on civil governments and spoken of his dream of a future when Baha'i Institutions will rule in their stead.

One pilgrim wrote,

"I recall being in Haifa in the '70s ('72 and '78) and hearing long talks about this from Ian Semple, on how the world was destined to be ruled by houses of justice and there will eventually be no distinction between church and state, with rather snide and smug comments about how at last the world will finally get it right and have God and Government fused through the power of the Baha'i covenant."

Note that this is the opposite of what 'Abdu'l-Baha says in the Treatise on Leadership:

<http://www2.h-net.msu.edu/~bahai/trans/vol2/absiyasi.htm>

Ian Semple also put out a letter from the Secretariat of the UHJ:

"As for the statement made by Shoghi Effendi in his letter of 21 March 1932, the well-established principles of the Faith concerning the relationship of the Baha'i institutions to those of the country in which the Baha'is reside make it unthinkable that they would ever purpose to violate a country's constitution or so to meddle in its political machinery as to attempt to take over the powers of government. This is an integral element of the Baha'i principle of abstention from involvement in politics. However, this does not by any means imply that the country itself may not, by constitutional means, decide to adopt Baha'i laws and practices and modify its constitution or method of government accordingly."

In this passage he basically argues for a Nazi-like tactic of getting elected democratically and then abolishing democracy. By the way, the Islamists (with al-Qaida links) tried this in Algeria, and the democrats and secularists fought back, embroiling the country in a civil war that has cost 100,000 lives. This is the sort of conflict between theocratic Baha'is and the rest of society that Semple is urging on the world. At that point would the Baha'i theocrats refrain from violence?

2) Al-Qaida wishes to reestablish the Islamic Caliphate as the One World Government. Baha'i theocrats substitute the House of Justice for the Caliphate and envision it ruling the world.

3) Al-Qaida despises parliamentary democracy as corrupt, money-driven and unrepresentative. It wishes to overthrow parliaments and institute authoritarian religious rule instead. Baha'i theocrats despise parliamentary democracy and wish to substitute their religious institutions, which are not freely elected, for civil government. Long-time Baha'i leader Firuz Kazemzadeh said in 1988:

"If somebody is dissatisfied with a local assembly, he is not prevented from appealing to the NSA . . . It is something else when whispering campaigns or petitions are sent around for signatures objecting to the activities of the institutions. That also may be something which is countenanced by American democracy but has nothing to do with the Bahauallah and Baha'i Faith. We must always remember that our institutions are an unusual and unique combination of theocracy in the best sense of the term with democracy. The institutions of the Baha'i Faith have not been created by us, the institutions have been created by God.

Actually, Kazemzadeh's version of the Baha'i institutions has been created by Kazemzadeh.

4) Al-Qaida establishes cells throughout the world to work for theocracy, and recruits innocent Muslims at mosques. Baha'i theocrats have secret cells within the Baha'i community, and recruit Baha'is at deepenings and other events into their twisted world-view. Many "Auxiliary Board Members" and Assistants are secret theocrats who play dirty tricks on ordinary Baha'is to force them out of the Faith.

The Ian Semple / Kazemzadeh theocratic ideology aims at destroying American democracy. It aims at gutting the Constitution and abolishing Congress in favor of Kazemzadeh's weird, secretive, authoritarian way of ruling.

5) Al-Qaida demands absolute obedience from its recruits, and no dissent is permitted.

Baha'i theocrats demand absolute obedience to "the Institutions" and tolerate no dissent. Kazemzadeh told a group of Baha'i intellectuals, "the word dissent implies separating oneself from the activities of the group and putting oneself outside the mainstream of the community, and that is contrary to Baha'i practice.

You can't disagree with the NSA.

The dangers to the pristine Baha'i faith, with its values of tolerance, allowing the expression of diverse points of view, and firm commitment to the separation of religion and state, of this theocratic cult that has taken control of the community cannot be overstated. Moreover, it is a threat to the whole world.

Now that we have seen where such authoritarian theocracy leads, on September 11, I call upon all Baha'is to step back, reread the scriptures, and adhere to the real values of our religion.

Baha'is Long Obligatory prayer is similar to Muslim's prayer

The Kitáb-i-Aqdas Long Obligatory Prayer

TO BE RECITED ONCE IN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS

Whoso wisheth to recite this prayer, let him stand up and turn unto God, and, as he standeth in his place, let him gaze to the right and to the left, as if awaiting the mercy of his Lord, the Most Merciful, the Compassionate. Then let him say:

O Thou Who art the Lord of all names and the Maker of the heavens! I beseech Thee by them Who are the Daysprings of Thine invisible Essence, the Most Exalted, the All-Glorious, to make of my prayer a fire that will burn away the veils which have shut me out from Thy beauty, and a light that will lead me unto the ocean of Thy Presence.

Let him then raise his hands in supplication toward God – blessed and exalted be He – and say:

O Thou the Desire of the world and the Beloved of the nations! Thou seest me turning toward Thee, and clinging to Thy cord, through whose movement the whole creation hath been stirred up. I am Thy servant, O my Lord, and the son of Thy servant. Behold me standing ready to do Thy will and Thy desire, and wishing naught else except Thy good pleasure. I implore Thee by the Ocean of Thy mercy and the Daystar of Thy grace to do with Thy servant as Thou wilt and pleasest. By Thy might which is far above all mention and praise! Whatsoever is revealed by Thee is the desire of my heart and the beloved of my soul. O God, my God! Look not upon my hope and my doings, nay rather look upon Thy will that hath encompassed the heavens and the earth. By Thy Most Great Name, O Thou Lord of all nations! I have desired only what Thou didst desire, and love only what Thou dost love.

Let him then kneel, and bowing his forehead to the ground, let him say:

Exalted art Thou above the description of anyone save Thyself, and the comprehension of aught else except Thee.

Let him then stand and say:

Make my prayer, O my Lord, a fountain of living waters whereby I may live as long as Thy sovereignty endureth, and may make mention of Thee in every world of Thy worlds.

Let him again raise his hands in supplication, and say:

O Thou in separation from Whom hearts and souls have melted, and by the fire of Whose love the whole world hath been set aflame! I implore Thee by Thy Name through which Thou hast subdued the whole creation, not to withhold from me that which is with Thee, O Thou Who rulest over all men! Thou seest, O my Lord, this stranger hastening to his most exalted home beneath the canopy of Thy majesty and within the precincts of Thy mercy; and this transgressor seeking the ocean of Thy forgiveness; and this lowly one the court of Thy glory; and this poor creature the orient of Thy wealth. Thine is the authority to command whatsoever Thou wilt. I bear witness that Thou art to be praised in Thy doings, and to be obeyed in Thy behests, and to remain unconstrained in Thy bidding.

Let him then raise his hands, and repeat three time the Greatest Name. [Alláh-u-Abhá]

Let him then bend down with hands resting on the knees before God – blessed and exalted be He – and say:

Thou seest, O my God, how my spirit hath been stirred up within my limbs and members, in its longing to worship Thee, and in its yearning to remember Thee and extol Thee; how it testifieth to that whereunto the Tongue of Thy Commandment hath testified in the kingdom of Thine utterance and the heaven of Thy knowledge. I love, in this state, O my Lord, to beg to Thee all that is with Thee, that I may demonstrate my poverty, and magnify Thy bounty and Thy riches, and may declare my powerlessness, and manifest Thy power and Thy might.

Let him then stand and raise his hands twice in supplication, and say:

There is no God but Thee, the Almighty, the All-Bountiful. There is no God but Thee, the Ordainer, both in the beginning and in the end. O God, my God! Thy forgiveness hath emboldened me, and Thy mercy hath strengthened me, and Thy call hath awakened me, and Thy grace hath raised me up and led me unto Thee. Who, otherwise, am I that I should dare to stand at the gate of the city of Thy nearness, or set my face toward the lights that are shining from the heaven of Thy will? Thou seest, O my Lord, this wretched creature knocking at the door of Thy grace, and this evanescent soul seeking the river of everlasting life from the hands of Thy bounty. Thine is the command at all times, O Thou Who art the Lord of all names; and mine is resignation and willing submission to Thy will, O Creator of the heavens!

Let him then raise his hands thrice, and say:

Greater is God than every great one!

Let him then kneel and, bowing his forehead to the ground, say:

Too high art Thou for the praise of those who are nigh unto Thee to ascend unto the heaven of Thy nearness, or for the birds of the hearts of them who are devoted to Thee to attain to the door of Thy gate. I testify that Thou hast been sanctified above all attributes and holy above all names. No God is there but Thee, the Most Exalted, the All-Glorious.

Let him then seat himself and say:

I testify unto that whereunto have testified all created things, and the Concourse on high, and the inmates of the all-highest Paradise, and beyond them the Tongue of Grandeur itself from the all-glorious Horizon, that Thou art God, that there is no God but Thee, and that He who hath been manifested is the Hidden Mystery, the Treasured Symbol, through Whom the letters B and E (Be) have been joined and knit together. I testify that it is He Whose name hath been set down by the Pen of the Most High, and Who hath been mentioned in the Books of God, the Lord of the Throne on high and of earth below.

Let him then stand erect and say:

O Lord of all being and Possessor of all things visible and invisible! Thou dost perceive my tears and the sighs I utter, and hearest my groaning, and my wailing, and the lamentation of my heart. By Thy might! My trespasses have kept me back from drawing nigh unto Thee; and my sins have held me far from the court of Thy holiness. Thy love, O my Lord, hath enriched me, and separation from Thee hath destroyed me, and remoteness from Thee hath consumed me. I entreat Thee by Thy footsteps in this wilderness, and by the words "Hear am I. Here am I" which Thy chosen Ones have uttered in this immensity, and by the breaths of Thy Revelation, and the gentle winds of the Dawn of Thy Manifestation, to ordain that I may gaze on Thy beauty and observe whatsoever is in Thy Book.

Let him then repeat the Greatest Name thrice, and bend down with hands resting on the knees, and say:

Praise be to Thee, O my God, that Thou hast aided me to remember Thee and to praise Thee, and hast made known unto me Him Who is the Dayspring of Thy signs, and hast caused me to bow down before Thy Lordship, and humble myself before Thy Godhead, and to acknowledge that which hath been uttered by the Tongue of Thy grandeur.

Let him then rise and say:

O God, my God! My back is bowed by the burden of my sins, and my heedlessness hath destroyed me. Whenever I ponder my evil doings and Thy benevolence, my heart melteth within me, and my blood boileth in my veins. By Thy Beauty, O Thou the Desire of the world! I blush to lift up my face to Thee, and my longing hands are ashamed to stretch forth toward the heaven of Thy bounty. Thou seest, O my God, how my tears prevent me from remembering Thee and from extolling Thy virtues, O Thou the Lord of the Throne on high and of earth below! I implore Thee by the signs of Thy Kingdom and the mysteries of Thy Dominion to do with Thy loved ones as becometh Thy bounty, O Lord of all being, and is worthy of Thy grace, O King of the seen and the unseen!

Let him then repeat the Greatest Name thrice, and kneel with his forehead to the ground, and say:

Praise be unto Thee, O our God, that Thou hast sent down unto us that which draweth us nigh unto Thee, and supplieth us with every good thing sent down by Thee in Thy Books and Thy Scriptures. Protect us, we beseech Thee, O my Lord, from the hosts of idle fancies and vain imaginations. Thou, in truth, art the Mighty, the All-Knowing.

Let him then raise his head, and seat himself, and say:

I testify, O my God, to that whereunto thy chosen Ones have testified, and acknowledge that which the inmates of the all-highest Paradise and those who have circled round Thy mighty Throne have acknowledged. The kingdoms of earth and heaven are Thine, O Lord of the worlds!

“Who gave the right to Britain to grant Palestine to the Jews?”

And Abdul Baha was awarded the title ‘SIR’ by the Britishers for his valuable services.

Quote “...Sir ‘Abbas Effendi ‘Abdu’l Baha had travelled extensively in Europe and America to expound his doctrines, and on the 4th December, 1919, was created by King George V. a K.B.E. for valuable services rendered to the British Government in the early days of the Occupation.”

The General claims of Baha'i Faith

The conception on which Bahaism bases its claim is false. Truth does not grow old, nor is it possible to change the religion with the growth of the race. A universal religion must present truth in a form that will reach men in every stage of civilization, for the reason that in every period of the world since the dawn of history there have been simultaneously men in every stage of intellectual development.—W. A. Shedd in "Miss. Review of the World."

It (Bahaism) has not enough assurance of personal immortality to satisfy such Western minds as are repelled by the barren and jejune ethical systems of agnostics, positivists, and humanitarians who would give us rules to regulate a life which they have rendered meaningless.—Professor Browne in Phelps' "Life of Abbas Effendi," p. xviii.

The essence of being a Bahai is a boundless devotion to the person of the Manifestation and a profound belief that he is divine and of a different order from all other beings.—Professor Browne, Art. "Bab" in Ency. of Religion and Ethics.

THE claims of Bahaism are many and varied. They cover a wide range. I will first consider its general claims and of these the most significant.

I. First of all, Bahais claim that a new religion is needed. All the great religions, they say, were true in their day; not only Moses, Christ, and Mohammed, but Zoroaster, Confucius, and Buddha were Divine Manifestations, and revealed God's truth. But now the old religions are dead. Abdul Baha says: "The Spirit has passed away from the bodies of the old religions. While the forms of their doctrines remain, the Spirit has fled." "The principles of the religion of Christ have been forgotten. It is then clear and evident that in the passage of time religions become entirely changed. Therefore they are renewed." "There is to-day nothing more than traditions to feed upon. ... The world of humanity is in the dark." One chapter in Thornton Chase's "The Bahai Revelation" is headed "The Bahai Revelation is needed." This he argues, stating that Christianity is condemned because after 1900 years it has not been accepted by all people; because it refuses to reject miracles and the blood atonement and will not confine itself to the "principles of Jesus," as the Brahma Samaj; because it tends to separate peoples, holding itself to be the only religion authorized by God; because people are dwelling in bondage and are no longer satisfied. Tares are many and Baha Ullah must come and uproot them. "The old order of things is passing away," says Sprague; "people are being tossed about with every wind of doctrine." "True religion is forgotten," says Phelps, "or has become a hollow name; faith has waned, men are wandering in the dark." This decay, they teach, is inevitable and in accord with divine arrangement. They deny the belief of Christians that Christianity is the permanent religion of humanity; and that of Moslems, that Mohammed was the "seal of the prophets," and hold that Christianity was succeeded by Islam, Islam by Babism, and Babism by Bahaism. Abdul Baha says: "Time changes all things. Transmutation and change are requirements of life. All religions of God are subject to the same law. They are founded in order to blossom out and develop and fulfill their mission. They reach their zenith and then decline and come to an end." "A new cycle must begin, for the world needs a new luminary."

It is not necessary to refute the fundamental fallacy of this first claim, for it is patent that Christianity is alive and growing. Its manifold spiritual activities, its varied and progressive efforts for righteousness and peace among men, for social and moral reforms, its zeal for Missions and their marvellous success, show that Christianity is neither stagnant nor dead. It has a forward triumphant movement. The Church renews its strength from its divine Head; He, alive forevermore, is its Light and its Life.

II. Bahaism claims to be the divine Revelation in this new cycle—a new Dispensation or Covenant. It disclaims being a new religion, affirming rather that it is a renewal of religion or religion renewed. One writes: "The Revelation is not a new religion, but the very essence of God's word as taught by Christ (and Moses and Mohammed), but not perceived by Christians at large" (nor by Jews nor Mohammedans). Baha Ullah says: "Of the utterances of the prophets of the past we have taken the essence, and in the garment of brevity clothed it." Abdul Baha says: "The same basis, which was laid by Christ and later on forgotten, has been renewed by Baha Ullah." "All that is true in all religions will stand; by the new Dispensation, new spirit is infused into these teachings." Phelps says: "The body of doctrine which Bahaism teaches is not put forward in any sense or particular as new, but as a unification and synthesis of all other religions." Of its system of morals the same is true. It is a restatement in unsystematic form of common ethics. It reiterates the second table of the Mosaic Law, and the New Testament principles of brotherly love and unity. Yet in some of his addresses Abdul Baha names certain principles as new in the Bahai faith, such as universal peace, the unity of humanity, arbitration, compulsory education of both sexes, the harmony of science and religion, the evil of prejudice and fanaticism, need of investigating the truth, etc. Not one of these is new; not one owes its position in the world of thought or activity to the Bahai propaganda. But whether Bahaism claims to be new in its principles or disclaims it, in fact it is a new religion. The disavowals are, no doubt, made for the sake of obtaining easier access to the followers of the old religions, and are only a temporary expediency. In this they are simply following the example of Mohammed, who proclaimed his message to the people of Arabia as the religion of Abraham, and as the same as that of the Law and the Gospels. But it is evident that Bahaism is inconsistent with Christianity, as indeed with Islam. Bahais' claims, if admitted, would lead to the superseding of Christianity. This will appear when I state its doctrines.

The present attitude of Bahais in maintaining connection with Christian Churches and at the same time worshipping Baha and propagating Bahaism is one of intellectual stultification or of moral blindness. In the same way, in Moslem lands, Bahais conform to the externals of Islam. In the case of the latter the cause of this is often moral obliquity or fear; with deceived Christian brethren it is probably ignorance; by the Bahai propagandist it is allowed from astute policy. It is an intellectual impossibility for one to accept the teachings of Baha Ullah and to be his disciple and at the same time to be an intelligent disciple of our Lord Jesus Christ. The one excludes the other.

Bahaism is a distinct religion. It is not even a sect of Islam. It abrogates and annuls it. Professor Browne says: "As Christianity is a different religion from Judaism, and as Islam is distinct from Christianity, so Bahaism is a separate religion, distinct from Christianity or Islam." It even superseded and abrogated Babism. The Bab has been relegated to the background, and put into the position of a John the Baptist. His book, the "Bayan," is long ago neglected to such an extent that Professor Browne had difficulty in obtaining a copy in Persia. Remey says: "Babism fulfilled its purpose, and when this was accomplished in the appearance of Bahauddin, it, as such, ceased to exist." Mirza Abul Fazl says: Babism "is not the same religion or creed as Bahaism”

What is Baha'i Faith?

As an introduction to a discussion of Bahaism and its claims, I will sketch briefly and simply its origin and history. Bahaism is derived from Babism. Babism has its roots in Shiahism, a soil impregnated with the doctrines of the Imamate and Mahdism. The atmosphere is filled with millennial hopes and dreamy mysticism, with Sufi philosophies and allegorical fancies of its poets. This soil has been fruitful of many sects. The Shiahism of Persia is called the "Religion of the Twelve" because its fundamental doctrine is that the twelve Imams, the lineal descendants of Ali and Fatima, the daughter of Mohammed, were the rightful Caliphs of Islam, in succession to Mohammed. In the tenth century (329 A. H. or 940 A. D.) the Twelfth Imam disappeared into a well, and still lives in Jabulka or Jabulsa whence he is expected to reappear as the Mahdi or Kaim. After his concealment, four persons in succession were channels of communication between him and the faithful. The title given to these was Bab or the Gate. Among the sects which sprang up among the Shiahs or were related to them were the Ismielis, Carmathians, Druses, Hurufis, Ali-Allahis or Nusairiyeh, Assassins, Batinis and many others. A group of these were called Ghulat, because they rendered excessive honour to the Imams, believing them to be incarnations of the attributes or essence of God. Those holding this view anticipated that the Imam Mahdi would be a divine Manifestation.² At the beginning of the nineteenth century, a sect arose in Persia, called Sheikhis. It received its name from its founder, Sheikh Ahmad of Ahsa, 1752-1827. He taught that there was always in the world a "perfect Shiah," who held communication with the absent Imam and revealed his will. Sheikh Ahmad was that "perfect one." He was favoured by the Kajar Shahs and had a considerable following. His successor, Haji Kazim of Resht, near the time of his death, announced to his disciples at Kerbela that the Manifestation was at hand. One of his disciples was Mirza Ali Mohammed of Shiraz. When twenty-four years of age in 1844, he laid claim to be the "promised one." He took the title of "Bab," the Gate or Door of communication of the knowledge of God. His followers were called Babis. He soon advanced his station and claimed to be the Kaim or Mahdi. Still advancing he took the title of Nukta or Point of Divine Unity and announced his "Revelation" or "Bayan" as the abrogation of Islam and the Koran. From Shiraz he went to Mecca and proclaimed his manifestation. On his return he was imprisoned. Many of the Sheikhis became his zealous followers and by their active propaganda caused great agitation throughout Persia. The Bab was transferred to the extreme northwest of Persia and confined in prison at Maku and Chirik. His sectaries, oppressed and persecuted, rose in arms against Mohammed Shah, anticipating victory through divine interposition. The Bab was executed at Tabriz in 1850. The insurrections were put down and many of the brave captives were treacherously slaughtered. A few Babis, seeking revenge, attempted to assassinate the new Shah, Nasr-ud-Din. This led to cruel reprisals. Four score Babis were executed at Teheran. Others fled into exile, especially to Bagdad. Among these was Mirza Yahya whom the Bab had appointed his successor. His title was Subh-i-Azal, the Dawn of the Eternal, or His Holiness the Eternal. A special point of the Bab's teaching was the announcement of the coming of "Him whom God should manifest." After his death a number of the Babis claimed to be the promised incarnation. There was a "chaos of divine manifestations," including Hazret Zahib, Janab-i-Azim, Nabil and others. Among these claimants was Mirza Husain Ali, a son of Mirza Abbas, surnamed Buzurk, and his concubine. The father was steward or "vizier" of the household of Imam Verdi Mirza, Governor of Teheran. He was half brother to Mirza Yahya and thirteen years his senior. His title was Baha ullah, the splendour or glory of God. For many years Baha acted in Bagdad (1852-67) as factotum for Azal, and acknowledged him as supreme. Then he announced that he himself was "He whom God should manifest," and took active measures to supplant Azal. About this time the Turkish Government transferred them to Adrianople. Here developed bitter jealousies, quarrels and foul play. The Sultan intervened and sent Subh-i-Azal to Famagusta, Cyprus, and Baha Ullah to Acca (Acre), Syria, August 1868. Both were granted pensions and kept under police surveillance as parties dangerous to religion and the state. Azal continued to be the head of the Babis, called henceforth also Azalis. Baha attracted most of the Babis to himself, and they became known as Bahais. Baha relegated the Bab to the position of a forerunner, and declared the "Bayan" and other books of the Bab to be superseded by his own "Revelations." He changed in a measure the doctrines and laws of Babism, liberalizing its provisions. He put himself forward as the Lord of a new dispensation, the founder of a new religion. During the next quarter of a century Bahaism made little stir in Persia. Its advancement was by no means as rapid as during the earlier years of the Bab. The zeal and devotion of the followers sensibly slackened. Tagiya (dissimulation regarding one's religion) was allowed and practiced. The fierce warriors turned to professing the doctrines of expediency, condemning as unwise zealots the fighting Babis of the previous generation. During these years they escaped bloody persecutions except in rare instances. They tried to make their peace with the Shah, constantly emphasizing their loyalty, expurgating their books to suppress condemnation of the dynasty, and inducing the Sadr-Azam, the Prime Minister of Nasr-i-Din Shah, to tolerate and befriend them. In Acca, too, Baha soon acquired considerable freedom, built a palace, called Bahja, in a delightful garden and freely received the pilgrims. He sent out many tablets, composed his Books of Revelation and had them published in Bombay. He died at Acca in May, 1892, in his seventy-fifth year. His temple tomb is near the Bahji. Baha's haram consisted of two wives and a concubine. After his death, the sons of the different wives quarrelled regarding the succession. Abbas Effendi, the only son of the oldest wife, proclaimed himself the successor, the Interpreter, the Centre of the Covenant, the Source of Authority. Mohammed Ali and his brothers strenuously opposed Abbas and intense animosity was engendered which divided the followers in Acca and Persia. Abbas drew the greater number with him. He assumed the title of Abdul Baha (Servant of Baha). He has the ambition to make the faith a world religion and has inaugurated a propaganda in the West. After the proclamation of constitutional liberty in Turkey, he resided in Egypt. Later he made several journeys to Europe and one to North America. His visit to the Occident brought him into the lime-light. He was given good opportunity to present his cause. The addresses of this "Infallible Interpreter" of the cult did not reveal clearly the real doctrines and aim of the movement. Abdul Baha confined himself mainly to the utterance of popular platitudes such as are stock-in-trade for a multitude of social and religious reformers, and most of which are original and accepted principles and precepts of Christianity. The real claims of Bahaism are set forth in the Books and Tablets (Epistles) of Baha Ullah and Abdul Baha, and in a considerable literature by Persian and American Bahais. Abdul Baha is an intelligent, well informed man, of fair sagacity. He was educated at home after the custom of Persia. He says of himself, "I have studied Arabic profoundly and know the Arabic better than the Arabians themselves. I have studied the Persian and Turkish in my native land, besides other languages of the East. But when I visit the West I need an interpreter." He said to Doctor Jessup, "Yes, I know your Beirut Press and your books." His references to ancient and modern philosophers, to historical events and to European writers, quoting from the same, show some familiarity with literature. He repudiates the claims of some of his disciples that he has no literary culture, as that of Abul Fazl or of M. A. Lucas who says: "He has had no access to books, yet his knowledge is unbounded." On this point Professor Cheyne remarks: "His public addresses prove that through this and that channel he has imbibed something of humanistic and even scientific culture. He must have had some one to guide him in the tracks of modern inquiry. I venture to hope that his expounding may not, in the future, extend to philosophic, philological, scientific, and exegetical details. Abdul Baha may fall into error on secular problems, among which it is obvious to include Biblical and Koranic exegesis.” “I am bound to say that Baha Ullah has made mistakes and the almost equally venerated Abdul Baha has made many slips.” A word should be said about the number of Bahais. I have many data on this point, but can here give only a summary. Regarding their numbers, the Bahais have indulged in gross exaggeration. “Millions” is the usual figure used by American Bahais. Thus Phelps speaks of “the millions of Bahais in Persia.” MacNutt, in “Unity through Love,” declares that “His followers number millions from all the religious systems of the world.” Kheiralla says: “Abdul Karim, 1896, assured me that the believers in Baha were fifty millions. I wrote to Syria to ask. Sayid Mohammed, secretary of Abbas Effendi, said that the number was fifty-five million souls.” Kheiralla afterwards denounces it as a gross deceit. As to Persia, they place the proportion at one-third or one-half. Dreyfus writes,¹² “Probably half the population of Persia is Bahai.” Some judicious non-Bahai writers allow them half a million or less in Persia on a basis of ten millions of population. American missionaries, as Jordan at Teheran, Frame at Resht and Shedd at Urumia, calculate that the number in Persia does not exceed 100,000 to 200,000. After careful inquiry I agree with this estimate.

As to other races and countries, let us see. Abul Fazl claims¹³ that “Jews, Zoroastrians, and Nusaireyah by thousands” are Bahais. M. Haidar Ali says: “The majority of Zoroastrians are recognized as Bahais in all sincerity.” On the contrary Professor Browne writes: “I had been informed that Zoroastrians were accepting Bahaism. However after much intercourse with the Zoroastrians of Yezd and Kerman for the space of three and a half months, I came to the conclusion that few, if any, had adopted the Bahai creed.” In India the proportion of Parsee-Bahais is very small. As to Jews:—Remey says: “In Hamadan there is a large Israelitish following of Baha.” A census made by a European Jew showed exactly 59 parents and with their children 194 persons out of a population of 6,000 Jews. As to the United States, I give some particulars in the closing chapter. The census of 1906 reported 1,280 Bahais, which may have increased to two or three thousand.

In the Turkish empire they are few, for Sunni Moslems are utterly indifferent to Bahaism. The Egyptian Gazette says of Egypt where Abdul Baha resided for two years, “The new religion has made little perceptible progress; Islam remained indifferent, and the Christian community was ignorant of his presence.” Of Syria, Mr. Phelps wrote: “All the Bahais in Acca are Persians. No other nationalities are among them.” The inference is plain that no native of Acca had become Bahai through forty years of contact with Baha and his seventy followers. Bahais outside of Persia are probably all told not more than 15,000 and one-third of these are Persians in Russia. Abdul Baha gave the impression that many of the Christians of Persia are converts to Baha. Dr. J. H. Shedd wrote, 1894, “I have heard of no case of a Christian conversion to Bahaism.” Dr. G. W. Holmes wrote, 1903, “I do not know of a single Christian in Persia, who has been converted to Bahaism. Some Bahais who made a profession of Christianity turned back to Baha.” Rev. J. W. Hawkes declares that in his observation none of the members of the Syrian (Nestorian) or Armenian churches in Persia have become Bahais. I have known of one Armenian family in Resht and two men in Maraga, one of whom was a notorious ne’er-do-well, who kept up his opium using as before.

The divorce law of Baha'i Faith

The regulation of divorce is another matter that vitally affects the relation of man and woman. The divorce law of Baha, as prescribed in the "Kitab-ul-Akdas," is a loose one.

I again quote from Professor Browne's translation.³⁵⁶ It will be noticed that the conditions of the law are set forth from the standpoint of the man. "If quarrels arise between a man and his wife, he may put her away. He may not give her absolute divorce at once, but must wait a year that perhaps he may become reconciled to her. At the end of this period, if he still wishes to put her away, he is at liberty to do so. Even after this he[166] may take her back at the end of any month so long as she has not become the wife of another man." "The practice of requiring a divorced woman to cohabit with another man before her former husband can take her back is prohibited." (This abolishes one of the vile laws of Mohammedanism.)

"If a man is travelling with his wife and they quarrel, he must give her a sufficient sum of money to take her back to the place they started from and send her with a trustworthy escort." From these quotations it is evident that the wife is dependent on the good pleasure and whim³⁵⁷ of the man. He may put away; he may take back. The law says nothing of her right to divorce him. It does not appear that she has the right to divorce her husband even in case he is guilty of adultery.

The penalty for adultery is slight. A fine of nineteen miscals of gold, equal to fifty to sixty dollars, is imposed for the first offense and this is doubled for the second offense. The fines are to be paid to the "House of Justice."

According to the "Bayan" of the Bab the husband must pay the divorced wife a dowry of ninety-five miscals of gold ($300) if they are city folks, and ninety-five miscals of silver ($10) if they are villagers. These are paltry sums even on the basis of Persian poverty. I may say, in passing, that the Laws of Inheritance give to the father a greater portion than to a mother, to a brother greater[167] than to a sister, and gives the family residence to a male heir.

Freedom from the marriage bond is made easy by desertion. "Married men who travel must fix a definite time for their return and endeavour to return at that time. If their wives have no news from them for nine months, after the fixed period, they can go to another husband. But if they are patient it is better, since God loves those who are patient."

How the husband who is away from his wife can act, we may judge by the example of a celebrated Bahai,³⁵⁸ Maskin Kalam, who was agent for Baha to watch over and spy upon Azal and the Azalis in Cyprus. His wife was in Persia; he simply took another in Cyprus.

The ease with which desertion may be practiced under Bahai law is seen in the conduct of Doctor Kheiralla, one of the first apostles of Bahaism to America, and founder of the Chicago Assembly. Dr. H. H. Jessup wrote: "A cousin of Doctor Kheiralla, who is clerk in the American Press in Beirut, gave me the following statement: 'Doctor Kheiralla, after the death of his first wife in Egypt, in 1882, married first a Coptic widow in El Fayum, whom he abandoned, and then married a Greek girl, whom he also abandoned, and who was still living in 1897 in Cairo. He then married an English wife, who abandoned him when his matrimonial relations became known to her.'" ³⁵⁹

According to the claims of Bahais these loose and imperfect divorce and marriage laws are to be accepted and administered universally under the future kingdom of Baha in its world-wide triumph!

It may be remarked in passing that Bahaism encourages the mixture of races by marriage. Already several American Bahais have married Persian women, and Persian men American women. One American Bahai woman has married a Japanese.

Abdul Baha illustrates the relation of the races by a reference to animals. "Consider the kingdom of the animals. A pigeon of white plumage would not shun one of black or brown." In a tablet sent to America, he directs: "Gather together these two races, black and white, into one assembly and put such love into their hearts that they shall even intermarry."³⁶⁰

Again he says:³⁶¹ "The coloured people must attend all the unity meetings. There must be no distinctions. All are equal. If you have any influence to get the races to intermarry, it will be very valuable. Such unions will beget very strong and beautiful children." Mr. Gregory, an American negro, followed this advice by marrying an English woman, Miss L. A. M. Mathew

The Quarrel over the succession in Baha'i Religion

Baha Ullah died at Acca in May, 1892, in his seventy-fifth year. The death of the father was the signal for a bitter quarrel among his sons.

The occasion was the succession to the leadership. The cause, no doubt, lay partly in that jealousy which results from a polygamous household. This polygamy was the occasion of misfortune even at the time, for the Persian consul at Bagdad, named Mirza Buzurk Khan Kasvini, had desired to wed one of the women and vented his disappointment on the Bahai community by making accusation against them before the Persian and Turkish Governments. Baha Ullah had twelve children.

The four sons who grew to manhood received "great swelling" titles. Abbas was entitled "The Greatest (Azam) Branch of God" and regarded as the "return" of Jesus; Mohammed Ali, "The Mightiest (Akbar) Branch of God" and the "return" of Mohammed; Ziah Ullah, "The Purest Branch and as Abraham" (died 1898); Badi Ullah, "The Most Luminous Branch and as Moses."

Abbas Effendi was the son of Aseyeh.

The other three were sons of Ayesha or Madh Ulya. Abbas Effendi claimed the succession, basing his right and title on the Will of Baha, called the Kitab-il-Ahd and on previous declarations. His right was disputed by the other brothers.

I have a manuscript by a lifelong Bahai which gives the following account: "Nine days after the 'ascension' of Baha, Abbas Effendi desired nine of the chief men to come to the house of Mohammed Ali Effendi. He opened the will. It was in Baha's own handwriting and two pages long. The nine men saw it. On the second page, over a part of the writing, Abbas had put a blue paper that it might not be read, and he refused to have it read. On the same day, the whole congregation (men) gathered to the palace of Baha. Mirza Majd-i-Din (Abbas' sister's son) rose and read the will up to the blue paper. Later the women were called to the Kasr Bahja and the will was again read, but the concealed portion was not made known.

It was evident that it was for his own selfish purposes that Abbas concealed it, because the future authority did not pertain to him.

From Persia and India many wrote, saying: 'Show the last portion; it is the writing of His Holiness.' He refused. To this day it is concealed."

Abbas assumed authority as the Supreme Ruler of the new dispensation, the Centre of the Covenant, and the Infallible Interpreter of its teachings.

His claim is clearly set forth in a Tablet wherein, speaking in the third person, he declares: "All Bahais must obey the Centre of the Covenant and must not deviate one hair's breadth from obedience to Him." "He should be looked upon as authority by all." "Obedience and submission must be shown Him and the face turned to Him completely." He was given such titles as "His Holiness the Master," "Our Lord," "The Centre of the Cause of God," "Dawning Place of the Divine Light," "Dayspring of the Light of the Covenant." Indeed his first Apostles to Persia bore the message, "I am the Manifestation of God. My paps are full of the milk of Godhead. Whosoever will, let him come and suck freely." His claims to headship were strenuously opposed by his brothers and some of the nearest disciples.

A bitter quarrel began as a consequence and has raged to the present time. Letters were sent by each party to the Persian Bahais, involving them in the quarrel.

Mohammed Ali composed a book, called the "Ityan-i-Dallil," presenting proofs of the invalidity of Abbas' claims, from the writings of Baha.

They charge Abbas with concealing and annulling Baha's will, perverting his teachings, changing the writings of Baha, publishing expurgated and interpolated editions of them, and attempting to suppress the authorized Bombay editions. Specifically they accuse him of publishing a Lawh-i-Beirut, a Tablet in which Abbas is greatly exalted, and attributing it to Baha, though it is spurious; that he has inserted verses into letters written in the hand of Baha's amanuensis and published them as genuine; has omitted verses from the "Tablet of Command"; made up the "Treasure Tablet" from parts of several others; appropriated to himself Tablets pertaining to Mirza Mohammed Ali; and commanded to destroy all Tablets of Baha which have not his (Abbas') seal upon them. Per contra the party of Abbas accused his brothers of intemperance and profligacy and of heresy, covenant-breaking and fraud. Mr. Hadad reported M Mohammed Ali and Badi Ullah as "being profligate and wanton, frequenting wine shops and being spendthrifts."

Mr. Getsinger said he had seen Badi Ullah in the street intoxicated and being helped home by two servants, that he and his brother had taken and pawned the effects of Baha, rugs, hand-bags, etc., and a pearl rosary belonging to Baha which was valued at $10,000 (!) and had squandered the money."

Abbas said to Mrs. Grundy, "Mohammed Ali has appropriated many papers and tablets written by the Blessed Perfection (Baha). It is possible for these writings to be altered, as the meanings in Persian are greatly changed by a single dot here and there. Before His Ascension, the Blessed Perfection said to me, 'I have given you all the papers.' He put them in two satchels and sent them to me. After His Ascension, Mohammed Ali said, 'You had better give me the two satchels to take care of.' He took them away and never returned them."

He said that Mohammed Ali deceives, "for the Will was also written by Mohammed Ali's own hand from dictation of the Blessed Perfection. By violating the Covenant (Will) he has become a fallen branch. All the beautiful blossoms upon the Tree of Life were destroyed by Mohammed Ali."

Abbas proceeded to the use of boycott and anathema. He ordered that no one of the Acca community should send any letters anywhere without first showing them to him, and commanded the Bahais in Persia not to receive any letters that were not sealed by him, but to send them back to him, and that in writing to Acca they should send their letters open.

These restrictions on freedom gave great offense. Abbas also prohibited his followers from associating with his brothers and their followers, strictly ordering them “not to sit, meet, speak or correspond with them, not even to trade or associate with them in any profession.”

Khadim reports that “once in his own house, Abbas rose up and furiously attacked” his stepmother, who, in return, reviled him and fled from the house, wailing. “At the sacred tomb he used cruelly to treat the brothers and sisters.”

“On one occasion he repeatedly struck his youngest (half) sister in the presence of her little ones and many believers,” scolding her “with a loud voice, uttering many harsh words.” On another occasion he “insulted and beat Khadim (Mirza Aga Jan, Baha’s amanuensis) at the sacred place” and afterwards “ordered his followers to imprison and cruelly beat him, which they did.”

He sent adrift Abdul Gaffar Ispahani, called Abdullah, one of the first believers on Baha, in such destitute condition that he died of hunger and was buried in a potter’s field at Damascus. “Alas! Alas!” exclaims Mirza Aga Jan, “Abbas Effendi has caused his followers to display such vehemence of hatred and rancour, the like of which has never been shown by barbarous nations, and even by the most ignorant tribes.” Of Abbas, Mrs. Templeton writes: “His pride, alas, is great. ... He seems to be blinded. ... With regard to business matters Abbas Effendi has not been just to his brothers, who have suffered a good deal in consequence.”

Abbas Effendi cut off the living of his stepmothers, brothers and their dependents.

Baha Ullah and his household had a stipend from the Turkish Government, as Azal and the Babis in Cyprus had, and it was not an ungenerous allowance. “The family had an income from the Government, as well as a revenue from three villages.”

“These funds Abbas Effendi appropriated and with these made his charitable gifts (?) leaving the forty dependents of the younger brothers to live as best they could.” This excluding the protesters from their share of the income and offerings embittered the strife, at the same time weakening their ability to propagate their contention. Bitterness and enmity increased; recriminations and accusations inflamed the passions of both sides. Mirza Abul Fazl, the philosopher of the movement, gives, as a partisan of Abbas Effendi, an account of these times in his “Bahai Proofs.”

He describes the “ruinous discords and divisions,” “the world-consuming flame of jealousy and hatred of the people of error,” “the hard hearts of the men of hostility,” “the animosity and groundless pride,” “the senseless hatred, degradation and shame of the violators of the covenant.” He gives the opprobrious title of Nakhazeen to Mohammed Ali’s party.

He continues, “The evil intrigues, calumnies, false pamphlets and accusations, evil tongues and cursings of the Nakhazeen divided the community and filled it with foul odours.” Several outside parties tried to act as mediators and bring about a reconciliation. Among these were the British Consul at Haifa and Mrs. Templeton. The younger brothers agreed to the terms. Abbas Effendi was formally requested to show the Will before impartial witnesses and all were to abide by its word. “This he resolutely refused to do and he must stand condemned for this before all impartial men.”

After the failure of these efforts at reconciliation, the anger and bitterness waxed hotter. To quote Abul Fazl again: “The Nakhazeen cursed and insulted the visitors to the tomb of the Blessed Perfection,” so that there was danger of its desecration. “Consequently Abbas Effendi asked the local (Turkish) Government to supply a guard to accompany and protect” his party. Abbas also went to Tiberias and made complaint to the Government there.

As a result of all these conditions, “The people of hostility and violation,” says Abul Fazl, “availed themselves of political machinations,” in other words, Mohammed Ali’s party, “those dwellers in hellfire,” appealed to the “fanatical men of those lands,” i.e., those same Turkish Authorities. Mohammed Ali formally complained to the Governor of Damascus, Nazim Pasha, sending Mirza Majd-ud-Din as his special messenger.

They accused Abbas of retaining their stipends, of confiscating their patrimony, including the father’s gold watch which had been donated to Mohammed Ali. Above all, according to the interesting narrative of Abbas’ sister, Bahiah Khanum, they made accusation that the shrine which was being erected on Mount Carmel “was intended as a fort, in which Abbas and his followers would intrench themselves, defy the Government, and endeavour to gain possession of this part of Syria.”

To use the words of Abbas, they said that “he had hoisted the banner of independence; upon that he had inscribed ‘Ya Baha-ul Abha’: that he had summoned all to assemble that he might found a new monarchy.” Therefore “an inquisitorial body (a Commission) was appointed by the Government.

To them the copartners of my brothers confirmed them (the reports) and added to them.” After the report of the Commission and in consequence of these charges and counter-charges of the “Greatest Branch of God” and the “ Mightiest Branch of God,” a telegram was received from the Sultan to the Governor “issuing a firman, decreeing the original order, by which Baha’s family were confined within the walls of Acca.”

After nine years of quarrelling (nine being the sacred number of Bahais) this order was put in force, 1901 A.D. They were still confined to Acca in 1906 when I visited Haifa. I saw the shrine and the fine residence of Baha at Haifa, just beside the English Mission. It deserves to be emphasized that the cause of the Bahai leaders being restricted to Acca was not religious persecution by Moslems but their own quarrellings.

Baha'i rift: Baha'is upset with Orthodox Baha'i Faith

Mainstream group doesn't want the name Baha'i by any other group May 18, 2009

|By Manya A. Brachear, Tribune reporter

Every religion has been riven by struggles over authority and authenticity.

Buddhism began when a maverick Hindu prince inspired disciples to embrace asceticism. Judaism has sprouted branches from ultra-orthodox to ultra-liberal, even Jews for Jesus. Christianity went through numerous profound splits, including the Protestant Reformation sparked in the 16th Century by Martin Luther in Germany and the 19th Century Mormon movement led by Joseph Smith in the U.S.

Now the Baha'i Faith, the organization representing the most recent sect to spring from Islam, is struggling to defend its identity in federal court in Chicago, where North American Baha'is have been based ever since believers came to the U.S. about 90 years ago. They contend that a tiny band of believers known as the Orthodox Baha'i Faith can't call themselves Baha'i or use one of its key symbols without violating trademark law or a previous court ruling more than 40 years ago.

In the hands of the federal 7th Circuit Court of Appeals, the case could set a precedent for settling religious schisms, doctrinal disputes and claims to truth.

"The word Baha'i carries with it implications for a certain sets of beliefs — and we have to protect that," said Robert Stockman, a practicing Baha'i and religious studies instructor at DePaul University.

Adherents of the Orthodox Baha'i Faith believe the international community has strayed from the religion's original teachings. That deviation, they say, threatens to interfere with God's plan for the world.

Baha'u'llah, who founded the faith in Iran in the mid-19th Century, is regarded by Baha'is as the most recent messenger of God in a long line including Abraham, Buddha, Krishna, Jesus and Muhammad. Baha'is believe Baha'u'llah revealed God's plan by which humanity one day would unite to become a single race.

On a Web site called www.truebahai.com, the orthodox group faults the mainstream denomination for corrupting that plan.

The mainstream Baha'is have responded with a lawsuit that tries to bar the orthodox from calling themselves Baha'i and sharing the "The Greatest Name," a sacred and trademarked symbol. Baha'is believe they are not only safeguarding their identity. They are defending the truth with a capital T.

The Orthodox say that is not a matter for the courts to decide.

"We're the true faith. That's what we would say," said Jeffrey Goldberg, a member of the Orthodox Baha'i Faith who left Chicago to be closer to an Orthodox community in New Mexico. "That has to be decided in the hearts and minds of the Baha'i, not by a secular court order."

The Baha'is first took breakaway believers to court in 1966 after a tumultuous time for their community. Nine years earlier, Shoghi Effendi, guardian of the faith and direct descendant of the founding prophet, had died unexpectedly and allegedly without naming a successor.

Leaders decided a Universal House of Justice envisioned by Effendi would oversee the faith. But shortly after the leaders announced their solution, one of them declared that Effendi actually had intended for him to serve as the next guardian.

Charles Mason Remey, then in his 90s, said Effendi had addressed him in letters as his son or spiritual descendant.

The National Assembly of France and about 100 others followed Remey. But the rest of the Baha'i community declared Remey a covenant breaker, expelled him from the faith and successfully sued his followers, barring them from calling themselves Baha'i and using the sacred symbol. Remey's group disbanded, but orthodox believers reorganized and continued to maintain the guardianship.

Thirty years later, Goldberg, an active Baha'i in Barrington, came upon the splinter group while surfing the Internet. He became convinced that he had been duped.

With no explanation, Goldberg quietly resigned from the community because he knew the consequences. When Bahai's are declared covenant breakers, they are shunned or ostracized with the exception of business relations.

But Janice Franco wouldn't let Goldberg go that easily. She insisted on knowing why he left and, when he told her, went on a quest to prove him wrong. After plunging herself into Baha'i literature, Franco discovered Goldberg might have a point.

Indeed, both Goldberg and Franco were declared covenant breakers and shunned. Goldberg's wife was encouraged to divorce her husband. Franco's home-schooled children lost a number of friends. To this day, they are wary of organized religion.

"It was devastating news to find out the larger group had strayed," Franco said. "I want to follow the truth. I don't want to support a mistake. The consequence is I don't have a community."

Then in 2006, the mainstream Baha'is filed a lawsuit, accusing the orthodox believers of violating the court order issued 40 years earlier.

The Orthodox Baha'is insist they aren't the same group. They also say a religious denomination can't trademark truth. The term Baha'i refers to a follower of Baha'u'llah. That applies to him and other Orthodox Baha'i, he said.

"From our point of view, if you believe in Christ you can use the word Christ in your name," Goldberg said. "It's a little bit like asking you to recant your faith. It's unacceptable to us."

But Stockman said it is the religion's responsibility to protect the Baha'i name.

"Baha'is are told again and again to try to exercise discipline on what they say about their faith and don't confuse the public. ... We have our own community to build," he said.

There are 5 million Baha'is in the world — 150,000 in the U.S., including 2,000 in the Chicago area. Why the mainstream denomination waited four decades to enforce the court ruling is a mystery. Baha'i leaders declined interview requests.

Barring the Orthodox believers from using the name "Baha'i" prevents them from popping up in Google when users type in that term.

Stockman said the Web is a tricky place to have conversations about spiritual truth.

"It's not our desire to convert people. It's our desire to put our material out there for people to know what the truth is and decide themselves."

Factions and Fractures in the Baha'i Religion

While I find the claim of Mason Remey to be weak and poorly supported, it does highlight the weaknesses of the mainstream Baha'is' claim to administrative authority by the UHJ.

For one, the concept of Guardianship was not a minor point in the Baha'i religion prior to the death of Shoghi Effendi. Indeed, it was no less important to Baha'is than the patriarchies of the Orthodox Christian and Roman Catholic religions.

I would go so far as to say that it is more important, since the Guardianship was far more emphasized in Baha'i writings than was the papacy or patriarchies.

.... the administration of the church was far less—far less emphasized in the Bible than was the case of the Guardianship among Baha'is. Given this critical emphasis upon the Guardianship, its abandonment clearly undermines the claims of the Baha'i religion to divine inspiration.

This is especially true since the transmission of Guardian authority would have been such an easy matter to arrange. At the least, Shoghi could have put in writing (in multiple copies for security) the name of his successor, and if he wished to keep the matter a secret until the right moment, could have sealed the appointment and deposited it for safekeeping in any of a number of secure repositories.

He didn't.

Why? That's a huge inconsistency, just absolutely huge.

In order for majority-faction Baha'is to explain this, they have to abandon large chunks of the basic foundations of their religion. For example, they could no longer claim superiority of writings. Their writings (scripture) could no longer be regarded as definitive compared to translated copies of the Bible, for example. Everything suddenly had to be "interpreted."

Publications had to be subject to censorship. The Guardianship had to be de-emphasized, indeed, scuttled, as if it had never really been important (when in fact it had been crucial). Suddenly, with the passing of Shoghi Effendi, the claims of divine revelation had been revealed to be the works not of God, but of man.

The point I made was to contrast the stated crucial importance of the guardianship during Shoghi's life, and afterward. While he was alive, there was enormous emphasis on a continuing, inherited or appointed, guardianship. But upon Shoghi's death, with no heir apparent, all that crucial importance became discarded as if it had never been written about. This is an enormous discrepancy, and I have never seen a reasonable reconciliation of the two teachings on the guardianship.

Baha'is One World Government

The Baha'i Faith envisions a one-world government, complete with a universal language, worldwide currency, and a unified religion.

The problem with this is that prophecy foretells two consecutive world governments. The second one will be ruled by Jesus. But the first one will be ruled by Satan, and its consequence will be, for a time, a hell-on-earth torment.

However, at first it will not seem that way. At first, it will seem that a utopian society has been established. Peace will reign, prosperity will abound, and all the major problems that beset the world today will seem to have been resolved.

Only a very few will warn that this is a disguise, an outwardly mighty oak, but full of inner rot. After a brief period, that inner rot will cause the entire house of cards to collapse. And then the wrath of Satan will descend on all the world.

The trap into which Baha'is are falling is a deadly one. The trend toward a world government is already very clear, and many Baha'is see this trend as a fulfillment of their religious beliefs. They celebrate the coming to fruition of all the foretellings and guidance of their prophet.

Worse yet, Baha'is may be instrumental in bringing about this one-world government. Even though Baha'is are supposed to remain aloof from secular politics, they are not. They are actively promoting, under various guises, the authority of the United Nations, which itself has no real authority to command any nation, but is only a gathering place where nations can sort out problems among themselves.

In this way, Baha'is are themselves becoming part of the problem.

In the United States, government is not predicated on the divine right to rule, which underlay the tradition of European monarchies. The US model is that the rulers are the people.

The Euro model is that if the people obey the government, the king will take care of the needs of the people.

The American model is that if the government obeys the people, the people will take care of their own needs, and will restrain the government to the confines of its limited and enumerated duties.

Sadly, the Euro model has infiltrated North America, and has savagely undermined the practice of the Constitution, until legislators feel free to pass into law, bills which they have not so much as even read.

So yes, the socialist model is in full ascendancy, and will eventually place everyone under its heel. For a time, this will seem to have been the best course—at least according to people who trade freedom for free things.

But eventually, the velvet glove will come off, and the iron fist will prevail until Jesus Himself defeats it.

Guardian Problem in Bahai Faith

To summarize the Guardian problem:

1. The station of Guardian was decreed by the Last Will and Testament of Abdul Baha, a document which some have alleged to be a forgery.
2. If the LW&T is not a forgery, then the Guardian's failure to obey his self-described duties are contrary to what a divinely appointed authority would be expected to do.
3. These self-described duties include the critical task of appointing a successor guardian, who would take over after the death or incapacitation of the preceding guardian. The successor was to have been appointed in a manner that would leave no room for doubt as to the validity of the successor's appointment.
4. There is no credible evidence that any successor guardian was ever appointed in such an unambiguous manner, although there were claimants.
5. No provision had ever been made concerning the contingency of a guardian dying without having appointed a successor. Indeed, such a possibility had never even been mentioned by Shoghi. That is why his death intestate led to the crisis it did.
6. The combination of these facts decisively refutes the notion that the Guardianship was ever a divine institution. It also demonstrates that Shoghi himself never believed that it was. He never made any attempt, neither to ensure a clear line of succession, nor to anticipate the lack of a succession.
7. Upon Shoghi's unexpected death, the Hands of the Cause took it upon themselves to resolve the matter by declaring that henceforth, the Baha'i Faith would have no living guardian. But they had no authority to make that declaration.
8. Shoghi's death created an unresolvable discrepancy, a contradiction, that pits the alleged divine authorship of the station against the physical facts. One cannot have it both ways. For the station to be of divine authorship, there must be a succession of guardians, or absent that, some provision to account for a lack of succession.
9. While the Hands made the best they could of a bad situation, their best was not enough. Nor could it be. It should become apparent that such an irregularity could not be explained in terms of a divinely appointed station. Shoghi Effendi had been inexcusably, and inexplicably, derelict in his duties, duties which he himself had repeatedly affirmed in the most emphatic manner.
10. Claimants to the succession of guardianship make such a weak and flimsy case for their divine authority that their claims make no improvement regarding the failure of Shoghi Effendi to be clear and unambiguous in the appointment of a successor.
11. Attempts by the UHJ to uphold the actions of the Hands are equally flimsy and unjustifiable. Even their most contorted explanations do not suffice to resolve the contradictions.
12. In all likelihood, the LW&T was a forgery by those who sought power in what they thought would become a powerful world religion. Even if it was not a forgery, it certainly had no divine authorship, as demonstrated by its abject failure to bear the fruit which it had promised.

Baha'i Faith is Hypocrisy Personified

The Baha'i faith as it stands today faces a challenge of becoming irrelevant to the sayings of Baha'u'llah and Abdul Baha. Having failed to attract converts and not getting acceptance from the world society, the Baha'i Faith today is trying to serve itself as a religion in terms of writing OPEN LETTERS (as against Holy writings!!) that have no bearing whatsoever on the targeted people.

Very recently we heard about a petition made by 31 Imminent Indians to the Government of Iran, on another occasion we heard that Baha'is wrote an irrelevant letter to the people of Egypt.

There was again an 'Open letter' in the Wall Street Journal republished Dr. Kishan Manocha, Director of the Office of External Affairs of the Bahá'í community of the UK. The document, dated 7th December and addressed to Ayatollah Mohammad Sadeq Larijani, stating the injustices meted out to Iranian Baha'is. Many more open letters must be in the pipe line.

These open letters afford Baha'is opportunity to be in touch with Media, non-governmental organizations, various government officials and prominent individuals.

Although The Guardian of the Baha'i Faith has forbidden Baha'is to take part in any such campaign, which is political in character, the present Baha'is have resorted to this as a last measure. Extract of the Guardians advice is indicated below:

"The Baháís should refrain from signing petitions designed to bring pressure on the Government which may have any political character whatsoever. There are so many other people who can carry on progressive types of activity, but only the Baháís can do the work of Baháulláh"... (Shoghi Effendi, dated March 19, 1946, in The Unfolding Destiny of the British Baháí Community, p. 44)

The Baha'is know it very well that these reactions will harm the Baha'is in Iran but the fact is that the UHJ wants MARTYRS IN IRAN so th they can shout BLOOD, BLOOD, BLOOD, Money, Money, Money.

The Baha'is of World have done nothing to help their fellow Baha'is inside or outside of the Iran. They have been content to benefit economically and extract cheap propaganda for themselves. The Baha'is are an inward-looking community which can sacrifice its own people for monetary gains.

We see so much injustice and oppression prevailing in the world, and thousands are dying, but the only thing that comes to the mind of Baha'is is perceived threat, violence to themselves. No mention is made of the fact that Jews, Christians and Muslims have been threatened or attacked. The Baha'is seem to judge the justice of a regime according to how well it treats the Baha'is. An unjust regime treating the Baha'is well is tolerated or even extolled, while a popular regime which deprives Baha'is of certain freedom (perhaps along with other religious groups) is regarded as evil.

When UHJ was approached to give a statement on 'Iraq invasion' it said that we follow the policy of non-involvement in politics. This 'non involvement' tag on Baha'is are 'get-out passes' from just about everything.

Needless to say, the Baha'is are gradually gaining a reputation for hypocrisy and self-interestedness.

The world of Internet has exposed the Baha'i Community that has a deliberate agenda of using education / educational institutions / educational programmes to promote their activities and their faith.

The Baha'is also have a deliberate policy of targeting prominent people, including teachers and other educationalists – all influential strata of society. Issues of common concerns are used to attract these strata but without making apparent it is the Baha'i Faith propagation that gets priority. Crowds are drawn in the names of these prominent personalities but intentions are different.

Look at how events are twisted to know the true character of the Baha'is. Baha'is were caught teaching Baha'i Faith to the children in IRAN, which is an illegal activity in Iran. Instead of humbly accepting their mistake, the Baha'is said they were teaching the underprivileged children (knowing Baha'i nature this can only be far from truth!!!). Baha'is indulge in such 'social' activities (read 'anti-social') for influencing the children of other community not only related to Iran but in many countries where such activities are not seen appropriate. A question arises in ones mind – is need of education in Baha'i community totally established that they have to educate only other communities?

In Uzbekistan, during a police raid, the Baha'is were caught proselytizing the children as young as 10 years about Baha'i Faith. On being questioned, if they had the consent of the parents, they said, "we were having Tea together and for having a cup of tea neither the consent of parents nor any authority is required". Have you heard ten year olds having tea with matured men? Needless to say the Baha'is were immediately deported out of Uzbekistan.

Refer <http://uzbekbahai.blogspot.com/> for details.

In India they said, "We are creating Promoters of the Community Well being". When the Baha'is were taken to the police station, Baha'i officials said that "we were conducting practicals for these students". They were told that schools were better places for the students to get their practical training. On further questioning, the students confessed that they were going to villages for conduction of Baha'i religious classes for children and youths and they were told by their teachers that their course will be completed only when they do these activities. The teacher had also warned them to be 'TACTFUL' while propagating the Baha'i religion. On seeing the Baha'i books it became clear for the Police that it was a conversion class. As the 'Ruhi Book' that they were having, contained Baha'i religious material and chapters such as

“UNDERSTANDING THE BAHÁ’I WRITINGS.” (Refer <http://panchgani-bahais.blogspot.com/> for details)

In Indonesia the Bahá’ís were arrested and prosecuted under the Law of Child Protection (23-2002) trying to convert children of other faith as young as 9 to 10 years. The Police found that there is very compelling evidence for the crime and violation of law of land. The Indonesian Government requires that Religious groups and social organizations must obtain permits to hold religious concerts or other public events. Permits usually are granted in an unbiased manner; unless there is concern that the activity could anger members of another faith who live in the area. Baha’is had once again violated the code of conduct (refer <http://agamabahai.blogspot.com/> for details)

In 2008 in Yemen four Baha’is, Mr. Zia’u’llah Pourahmari, Mr. Keyvan Qadari, Mr. Behrooz Rohani. and Mr. Sayfi Ibrahim Sayfi, were arrested and deported on charges of “proselytizing” in a manner against Yemeni law.

Reports are also there that the Christian priests have warned the Baha’is, in no uncertain terms, that they should conduct the Ruhi book courses only with Baha’i children and not with non Baha’i children.

With such frustrating experiences the Faith has no option but to gain sympathy from world by writing ‘Open Letters’. The world has now seen the true face of Baha’is and can no longer be deceived. History has never seen such deception ever. The Baha’is should spend rest of the time left for the Faith and reflect on validity of their Faith and the hoax care-takers of the Faith (the Universal House of Justice).

Reality will not be hidden then. In the interest of humanity this is a MUST.

Universal House of Injustice

BAHA'I CONTROL ON THEIR ELECTORAL SYSTEM (IT IS SELECTION NOT ELECTION)

From UHJ to NSA to SBC/RBC down to LSAs all are selections in the name of elections

A- UHJ Elections

1-Every member of the present UHJ is from International Teaching Centre (ITC).It is clear indication that a Baha'i is first appointed on board of counselor, then he is promoted to ITC and finally he is elevated as UHJ member.

2-Mr. Razavi and Correa when promoted to ITC, they were given a world tour (Made a part of the Orchestra) to justify their programmed predetermined election.

3-Mr. Omid Seioshanseian in India and Mr. Jabbar Eidhelkhani in Bangladesh are sending false reports to UHJ with the intention of getting appointed on ITC.

4. India has the highest population of Baha'is of more than 2.2 million, but never even a single Indian has been elected as member of the UHJ. This speaks of the STAGE MANAGED, UHJ election.

5-There are National Spiritual assemblies in almost 200 countries but four members out of nine (45%) on UHJ are Persians.

All with approval of UHJ.

B- Nexus between UHJ and NSA

1-UHJ sees that no undesired member is elected on the NSA. This is done with collaboration of the UHJ member responsible for that country and the continental counselors.

2-Members of NSA also use fraudulent means of getting himself and his group elected every year.

3-When there are so many active local Indian Baha'is and more than half the delegates are Indian then how come the members elected are Persians.

4-Some of those members of the NSA, who are being elected year after year, do not possess an impressive record of services to the Faith.

5-The circle is so vicious and so tightly bound that there doesn't appear to be any way out of it for sincere active Indian Baha'is.

6-A Baha'i delegate purposely made his ballot invalid by writing 10 names but the report of the chief teller said there was no invalid votes.

7-Those members who get elected to the NSA by fraudulent means, also manage to manipulate the election/appointments to the State Baha'i Councils and Regional Baha'i Councils of their States, besides taking improper action on other matters.

8-There is a close nexus between these people. This has been going on.

All with approval of UHJ.

C- Counting process

The counting process of the Baha'i election is Stage managed, because, it is at this stage that the names mentioned in the votes are not read out correctly to the tellers that is why, year after year, the same men manage to get themselves on the National Assembly. Can appropriate handling of Funds be expected from such cheats!

D- Meetings of NSA

1-Whenever one or two 'prominent' members (Persian members) are not able to attend a meeting, the meeting is either cancelled or postponed.

2 Decisions are taken on phone. Although Baha'i administration do not allow for consensus decisions over the phone.

3 Decisions taken in this manner are improper and cannot be acted upon.

4-Mrs. Sorabjee after being removed as counselor tried very desperately to become NSA member despite her advanced age. She use to attend National Conventions and did thorough canvassing for her. With the approval of UHJ (Payman Mohajir) she was declared elected.

5-Certain members like Mr.Anil Sarwal, Dr. Mogbelpur and Dr. Ansari were made to resign to clear the way for Mrs. Sorabjee, Mrs. Farideh Vahedi and Ms. Nazneen Rohani. The love for women is not only the specialty of Dr. Payman but it is of entire Mohajir clan.

6-The undesired member Dr. Ansari was reelected but was again asked to resign after a month to clear the way for Dr. Sohail Mohajir.

7-Days are numbered for Dr. Telli, Mr. Ramsevak and Mr. Ali Merchant.

8. The decision by these women is taken in consultation with Mr. Mohajir and conveyed to the other respected members and they are left with no option but to accept it or else the door is open. Hats off to Mr. Ansari for maintaining his self esteem.

9. When no women member is allowed on the UHJ, then how come on the NSA we have a majority of decisions making by women and the others are made to look like show pieces just to fill in the seats.

All with approval of UHJ

WHO REALLY ARE THE BAHÁ'IS?

Many of the concepts and approaches of the Baha'is are admirable human qualities. But there are also some major problems and inconsistencies in the Baha'i Faith.

World control and domination

A wide variety of approaches and activities are used by Baha'is to promote their Cause (religion) and make it more acceptable to the general community – including active involvement in, and initiation of, community programmes on issues such as: peace, unity, the environment.

The Baha'i Community has a deliberate agenda of using education/educational situations/educational programmes to promote their activities and their faith (see books such as: Each One Teach One – A Call to the Individual Believer [e.g. pp.10-11], Baha'i Education, Education – A Baha'i Perspective, The Individual and Teaching – Raising the Divine Call, Teaching the Baha'i Faith).

The Baha'is also have a deliberate policy of targeting prominent people, including teachers and other educationalists – as well as indigenous people (e.g. see chapters 5 & 6 Teaching the Baha'i Faith). They often join with, or collaborate with, other groups when community issues or concerns can be mutually raised or addressed. But Baha'is are reminded of the real purpose of all such ventures: 'In their collaborations with such associations they would extend any moral and material assistance they can afford, after having fulfilled their share of support to those institutions that affect directly the interests of the Cause. They should always bear in mind, however, the dominating purpose of such a collaboration which is to secure in time the recognition by those with whom they are associated of the paramount necessity and the true significance of the Baha'i Revelation in this day' (p.125-126 Baha'i Administration, see also pp. 348-369 [chapter 15] in the 3rd edition, 1996, Local Spiritual Assembly Handbook).

The ultimate goal and hope for all Baha'is is the ushering in of a Golden Age where the world will be unified under the Baha'i Faith and the complete rule of its ultimate authoritative body, the Universal House of Justice. This New World Order, which ALL Baha'is are hoping and praying for, and working towards, 'must in no wise be regarded as purely democratic in character' (The Dispensation of Baha'u'llah p.61).

This coming centralised, autocratic and anti-democratic Baha'i World Government will enact legislation in order to introduce and enforce the obligatory laws of Baha'u'llah (which will include total submission to the 'Will of God' – as interpreted by Baha'u'llah, the 'Guardians' who followed him, and the Universal House of Justice; obligatory daily prayers; keeping special Holy Days; fasting; and more). (ibid. p.61-62)

These Baha'i laws will be introduced world-wide by 'a world executive, backed by an international Force.' A uniform and universal language, monetary system, literature, communication system, religion, science, and more, will be introduced throughout the world. It will be 'a system in which Force is made the servant of Justice' – that is the justice of the Baha'i Universal House of Justice! (e.g. see The World Order of Baha'u'llah pp.201-205).

Local Baha'i Assemblies will become the local representatives for the rule and world government of the Universal House of Justice.

Unequal equality

The Baha'is often refer enthusiastically to their stated belief and practice of the equality of men and women. There is no clergy class, and women, as well as men, are involved in local leadership.

However, the absolute and supreme ruling authority in the Baha'i Faith is the Universal House of Justice, 'membership is confined to men' (9 men and NO women) – there are clear indications that it is not envisaged for any women to be part of that authoritative body in this era. The statement: 'As women are the educators of the next generation, the education of girls takes precedence over that of boys' must also raise some questions about the much promoted total equality (e.g. see pp.76 & 231 A Basic Baha'i Dictionary).

Lack of Acceptance

Baha'is pride themselves, publicly, for their loving openness and acceptance of everyone, including those of other religious faiths. In theory they can make it sound very good, and very convincing. In reality, they are no different to many other religious groups who are intolerant of those whose religious viewpoints disagree with theirs, and especially of those who dare to leave the Baha'i Faith.

The Baha'is promote and practice 'SHUNNING' – as much as Jehovah's Witnesses, Exclusive Brethren, or similar groups.

The message is that Baha'is are 'to shun entirely all Covenant breakers as they are afflicted with what we might try and define as a contagious spiritual disease...most of them don't want to repent' (p.17, Directives from the Guardian). Those who leave the Baha'i Faith and are considered Covenant Breakers and regarded as a cancer to be cut out of the body.

The much promoted Baha'i concept of Unity is a 'Unity amongst friends' that includes 'the absolute shunning of whomsoever we feel to be an "enemy of the Cause"' (- see p. 16, Baha'i Administration).

Covenant Breakers are those who have been Baha'is but who then dare to contradict or 'attack', especially publicly, any aspects of the Baha'i Faith or any of its leaders, including the Universal House of Justice.

The message is currently reinforced with statements such as: 'Baha'is must shun Covenant-breakers entirely in order to preserve the unity of the Faith.' Such an attitude, behaviour and action is regarded as 'One of the greatest and most fundamental principles of the Cause' (see p.346 in the 3rd edition, 1996, Local Spiritual Assembly Handbook. See also Directives from the Guardian, Will and Testament).

The reading of material by Covenant Breakers (often referred to as Apostates in other cultic groups) is discouraged with warnings such as: 'The friends are warned in the strongest terms against reading such literature because Covenant-breaking is a Spiritual poison and the calumnies and distortions of the truth which the Covenant-breakers give out are such that they can undermine the faith of the believer and plant the seeds of doubt unless he is fore-armed with an unshakeable belief in Baha'u'llah and His Covenant and a knowledge of the true facts' (p.347 in the 3rd edition, 1996, Local Spiritual Assembly Handbook).

FORGOTTEN FACTS & DISUNITY

Like most cultic groups there are some true facts of which the Baha'i leaders would prefer the followers NOT to have any knowledge or awareness. These include some aspects of Baha'i history and the continuing disunity amongst the Baha'is themselves.

Baha'u'llah (Mirza Husayn Ali – who gave himself the title, 'Baha'u'llah' – 'Splendour/Glory of God') was supposedly a close follower of the Bab (the followers were known as the Babis), who later discovered that he was the special manifestation of God referred to by the Bab as 'He-Whom-God-Will-Manifest.' What is rarely acknowledged is that the Bab declared that he was a special manifestation of God and that the next manifestation would not come before 1511 years, but not later than 2001 years, after the Bab, which would disqualify Husayn Ali – Baha'u'llah!

Also omitted from official Baha'i writings are references to the fact that the Bab actually appointed Husayn Ali's younger step-brother, Mirza Yahya Subh-i-Azal, as his official successor. After some years Husayn Ali rejected his younger step-brother's authority and position, claimed a greater one for himself, and gathered followers. Followers of Husayn Ali/Baha'u'llah (Baha'is) killed many of the followers of the official successor to the Bab, the step-brother, Subh-i-Azal (Azalis). And at least one of the brothers tried to poison and kill the other. The Turkish government separated the two warring factions in 1868, with Subh-i-Azal and the Azalis being sent to Cyprus, and Husayn Ali/Baha'u'llah and the Baha'is sent to Akka (Acre) in Turkish ruled Palestine. In Akka Baha'u'llah and his followers did not use his full title, kept much of their Baha'i activity secret and pretended to be Sunni Muslim. They were so successful in this deception that, after their deaths, Sunni Muslim clergy conducted the funerals of both Baha'u'llah and his son and successor, Abbas Effendi.

The Baha'is under the authority of the Universal House of Justice, and the general public, are not informed of another schism that occurred after the First Guardian of the Faith, Shoghi Effendi, died in 1957. For several years affairs were led by a small group known as the Hands of the Cause, and then in April 1963 the Universal House of Justice was established. It has been claimed, by the mainstream Baha'i movement, that there was no appointed successor to the First Guardian of the Faith. However, this is disputed by a group of Baha'is lead by The Mother Baha'i Council of the United States, in Roswell, New Mexico. This group of Baha'is claims that Shoghi Effendi DID appoint a successor, the president of the original Universal House of Justice – which they say Shoghi Effendi proclaimed in embryonic form in 1951. This president, Charles Mason Remey, proclaimed his accession to the Guardianship in 1960. In 1961 he appointed Joel Bray Marangella as his future successor, and in 1966 publicly handed the authority of the Guardianship over to Joel Marangella. The Third Guardian, Joel Bray Marangella, has been living in Western Australia and first notified the Australian public about the existence of the ('True') Orthodox Baha'i Faith in AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HETERODOX BAHAI'S published in the West Australian newspaper in April 1982. Members of the 'Orthodox' Baha'i Faith seem fearfully reluctant to confirm the current (December 1996) whereabouts of the Third Guardian of the Faith, Joel Bray Marangella. Many of the mainstream ('Heterodox') Baha'is seemingly have either not heard of the Third Guardian, or don't want to hear of him.

So much for all the talk of peace and unity.

The more one examines Baha'i primary sources, and other historical information, the more disturbing the picture becomes. Exaggerated stories of mass persecutions are used to emotionally cloud issues (we acknowledge that there have been persecutions of Baha'is – which are wrong and unacceptable – but evidence also suggests that some claims have been exaggerated). Documentary evidence shows that the image of peace loving, open and tolerant people, firmly united throughout the past as well as in the present, is a false image. The Baha'is were described, not many decades ago, as a 'small obscure Islamic sect' – they have worked hard to change their image and to become acceptable in a naïve and ill-informed Western Society. They have misused the Bible and distorted both theology and history to conceal their true nature and promote an image of being a respectable major world religion with a message of love, peace and unity. Be aware of the Baha'is – their true cultic nature and ultimate agenda.

Baha'is in Israel

The Baha'i administration claims there is no resident Baha'i population in Israel. The 650-700 Baha'is who can be found here at any given time are all volunteers who have come from some 85 countries to do service for periods ranging from a few months to a few years. The Baha'is who live here as tourists or temporary residents do not engage in any form of missionary activity. Some people erroneously believe that this is in accordance with the country's anti-missionary laws, but in fact it is a self-imposed Baha'i prohibition against seeking or accepting new believers into the Baha'i faith in the Holy Land that dates back to the time when the country was still under Ottoman rule.

No one knows why. It is one of several inexplicable Baha'i regulations.

It is a well known fact that according to a letter of Universal House of Justice¹ the Baha'is are not suppose to teach and convert the Jew population in Israel. Infact if a Jew outside Israel wants to accept Baha'i Faith and settle in Israel, then his declaration card is not to be accepted.

But The world Christian encyclopedia (WCE)² has something else to offer.

In the year 1990, the number of Baha'is residing in Israel were 9500.

The source of the information was Barrett, David B., World Christian Encyclopedia (2001), Data transcribed by Simeon Kohlman Rabbani

In the year 2000, the Baha'i population in Israel was 13734 which constituted 0.22% of the total population of Israel, again the source of this information was David B., World Christian Encyclopedia (2001),

Data transcribed by Simeon Kohlman Rabbani

If the WCE information is true than it is clear that the Baha'i Administration at Haifa is misusing the Hospitality offered so generously by the State of Israel, This is indeed a deceit to the Host country which has so generously offered all its help and hospitality to the Baha'is and the Baha'i Administration. Their hypocrisy has been exposed by WCE; the other facts which are inexpiable are following facts:

- For years the Haifan Baha'i leadership have been telling visiting pilgrims that they envisioned a day when the Baha'i establishment would become the government of Israel and that the Israeli population would convert en masse to Baha'i Faith.
- One of a very senior Baha'i official Mr. Ali Akbar Forutan said that a day will come when the Universal House of Justice will rule over the Israel.
- The present Persian counselors say in private that, we have to launch Intensive program of growth in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Most of the Persian counselors have two passports one Israeli and other Persian.
- As far as I am concerned, the unchecked presence of Haifan Baha'is in Israel is as big and long-term existential threat to Israel itself.

When you have an organization openly fantasizing about becoming the governing authority over all of Israel-Palestine and giving false information about the presence of Baha'is in Israel then it is certain that it is more a threat to the State of Israel then blessing...

(1)For your information, the people in Israel have access to factual information about the Faith, its history and general principles. Books concerning the Faith are available in libraries throughout Israel, and Israelis are welcome to visit the Shrines and the surrounding gardens.

However, in keeping with a policy that has been strictly followed since the days of Bahá'u'lláh, Bahá'is do not teach the Faith in Israel. Likewise, the Faith is not taught to Israelis abroad if they intend to return to Israel. When Israelis ask about the Faith, their questions are answered, but this is done in a manner which provides factual information without stimulating further interest.

(2) World Christian Database (WCD) – Updated and maintained by the Center for the Study of Global Christianity, the World Christian Database is based on information provided by the World Christian Encyclopedia and World Christian Trends. Both of these books serve as standards for international religious statistics, and provide comprehensive estimates of religious affiliation around the world.

Until the late 1990s the UHJ was telling its visiting pilgrims that one day all the residents of Israel would become Bahais and that the UHJ would emerge as the government of Israel. This was stated point blank to a group of Bahai pilgrims in 1982 as well as 1986. Don't know whether they are saying these things anymore as brazenly as they once did, but if it is still the case, one could make the argument that the UHJ Haifan organization is ultimately a national security threat to the state of Israel itself.

The Reform Bahai Faith

<http://www.reformbahai.org/about.html>

The Reform Bahai Faith affirms the universal spiritual and moral principles taught in all of the great religious traditions. Similar to Mahayana Buddhism, Reform Bahais believe the Example set by Abdul-Baha during his travels to Europe and the United States in the early 20th century, an Example of universal love and brotherhood, was perhaps his greatest teaching.

As Abdul-Baha often suggested, far from having the exclusive truth and the fanaticism to which that notion has so often led, Reform Bahais look to what is universal and non-creedal in the world's religious experience, and include prayers and meditations from other religions in their private and community worship, listen to and learn from God's other religions all of which is to say the Reform Bahai Faith has moved on from its historical and cultural roots, as all living religions have and do, and is now a global, universal faith.

Abdul-Baha taught that the Bahai Movement was a way for people of all religious persuasions to come together in neutral territory and worship the Divine Being in a mutually respectful atmosphere of peace and harmony. Speaking in England, he said, "You can be a Bahai-Christian, a Bahai-Freemason, a Bahai-Jew, a Bahai-Muhammadan."

Reform Bahais believe Abdul-Baha's Interpretation for the modern world of his Father Baha u'llah's Teachings is much more profound than the prevailing conception of religion.

Speaking in Europe and North America from 1911 to 1913, Abdul-Baha stated on a number of occasions that he was a man just like anyone else and that the Bahai Faith could not be organized, yet often spoke paradoxically of the growth of the Bahai community throughout the world, grounded in democratic pluralism. Known during Abdul-Baha's time as the Bahai Movement or Cause, the Reform Bahai Faith is not an organization, but a way of life.

More "Protestant" along the lines, in some ways, of Unitarian Universalism or other similarly liberal denominations, Reform Bahais believe it's largely the responsibility of the individual to read the Bahai Writings and prayerfully decide, prayerfully discern, how to follow the spiritual message of Baha'u'llah, Founder of the Bahai Faith, and those of Abdul-Baha, the Interpreter of Baha'u'llah's Covenant, striving for spiritual development and service to humankind.

God has created the individual soul to develop in the integrity and freedom of his or her own search for spiritual maturity and conscience, through prayer and meditation, transforming the community and the world one soul at a time, achieving the timeless goal of self-sacrificing love, compassion, and service to humanity.

In practice, there are individual Reform Bahais who follow all or many commonly shared Bahai forms and teachings observed by other Baha'i denominations because they themselves believe they should or want to; not because they're pressured into them. There are other Reform Bahais who don't feel comfortable with one thing or another, believing perhaps the time is not right for themselves and others, or the particular teaching may be more culturally bound to the past than the more universal principles of Baha'u'llah. Reform Bahais follow Abdul-Baha's 1912 Authentic Covenant, which he delivered publicly in New York City, a broad, open, loving vision of God's relation to humanity.

While emphasizing what is universal in humanity's religious experience, Baha u'llah taught the changing, evolutionary, and progressive nature of religious truth, demonstrating it by his own example and teaching which evolved away from much of the teaching of his forerunner the Bab. Similarly, Abdul-Baha demonstrated essentially a re-Interpretation of Baha u'llah's teachings for the modern world. Reform Bahais do not regard the Bahai message as a rigid set of unchanging and inflexible doctrines and formulas. Nor is the universality of the Bahai vision frozen in a form subordinate to the exclusivism of the Judeo-Christian or Islamic and Sufi cultural heritage of the Bahai Faith. The universal, global Teachings of Baha'u'llah transcend the limitations of all past Dispensations, inspire and envision a new spiritual worldview and civilization.

Baha u'llah and Abdul-Baha taught that it is the Spirit that is important, not form, doctrine, or organization.

Accordingly, God is interested in the human heart, sincere worship, communion, and prayer, the individual cultivating the virtues of the spirit in selfless service to humanity, in practice and deed, not merely doctrine and theory, in every walk of life, respecting the unique cultures of the earth, even while revering what's universal or held in common by humankind.

Abdul-Baha envisioned the Bahai House of Worship as open to the faithful of all religions and traditions, as a place of universal prayer and meditation, not exclusively Bahai. Consequently, Reform Bahais honor the spirit wherever it is found and expressed in the writings and oral traditions of wisdom and belief.

Following Abdul-Baha, Reform Bahais elect Spiritual Assemblies, with nine members, for community consultation and guidance. Largely "congregational" in structure, local communities are independent grass-root associations, though they will ultimately elect national and an international unit with non-binding advisory and coordinating duties and responsibilities. While Abdul-Baha stated he had not "appointed" anyone to succeed him, he did not mean that the local, democratically elected assembly could not appoint people to serve in any position necessary, "to engage in service of the Kingdom." At every level of Bahai consultation, the independence and integrity of the individual is preserved.

Reform Bahais believe Baha'u'llah taught that the separation of church and state is the Will of God and distance themselves from any interpretation of an eventual Bahai theocracy, following Abdul-Baha's vision of a global spiritual democracy, enriched by pluralism.

Reform Bahais are free to express, write, and publish, without any type of “review” or censorship. The Reform Bahai Faith does not teach or practice shunning, nor any form of excommunication, following Abdul-Baha’s teaching that “The conscience of man is sacred and to be respected.”

Blood thicker than water?

This is a short account of Bahauallah and his brother Mirza Yahya Noori, their lives together and the animosity between them. The objective of this article is simply to bring to the fore that fact that Bahauallah did not practice what he preached.

Let us see how.

Mirza Yahya "Subh-e-Azal" was 13 years younger than Bahauallah. He became a Babi at the age of 14. According to Nuqtatul Qaaf, when Mirza Yahya went in the presence of Qurratul Ayn at Barfarosh, "She truly nourished him with her milk until he became strong in manners and ethics under her training and guidance."

Since Mirza Yahya was a great favorite of Quddoos and Qurratul Ayn, all the other Babis also humored him. Consequently, he became everybody's 'darling'. Even the Bab himself sent him prized personal possessions like his ink pot, papers, writings, dresses and rings to Mirza Yahya. Moreover in his will he clearly nominated Mirza Yahya as his successor.

The Emperor of Iran had executed the Bab. Naturally, the Babis bore a lot of animosity against him. A feeling of revenge had crept into them. All this resulted in an unsuccessful attempt by the Babis to assassinate the Emperor. This attempt having failed, the Emperor now knowing of the intention of the Babis was furious at them. He imprisoned all those involved in the assassination attempt. In this connection, Bahauallah was imprisoned, whereas, Mirza Yahya escaped to Baghdad posing as a Sufi. After spending 9 months in prison, Bahauallah was released after the intervention of the Russian Embassy. After his release, Bahauallah went to Baghdad.

For the next 10 years the two brothers lived in Baghdad. During this period, since Bab appointed Mirza Yahya as the successor, Bahauallah too surrendered to his orders and executed his commands as his agent. This becomes clear from his writings during this period, which are full of expression and devotion to Mirza Yahya and announce his obedience to him.

(Ref: Book of Iqan, by Bahauallah, Page 195)

This continued until a dispute arose between the brothers over the leadership of the followers. It is from here that the power struggle between them becomes apparent. Bahauallah abandoned obedience to Yahya's orders and represented himself as the envoy of God and the leader of the Bahais. This claim which was in contradiction with the beliefs and the sayings of the Babis caused disunion and in this manner a conflict arose between Yahya and Bahauallah and consequently among their followers.

In this conflict, all human manners like 'politeness', 'etiquette', were conveniently forgotten. Bahauallah called his brother as 'lamb' (Ref: Asrar al Athar-e-Khususi, Vol 4 page 197), 'Satan' (Ref: Asrar al Athar-e-Khususi, Vol 4, page 101 and Vol 5, page 346) and entitled him as a 'bull' (Bahauallah, the Book Badi, page 772) He abused him as a 'deceptive snake' (Asrar al Athar-e-Khususi, vol 4 page 34) and called his followers as 'dogs'. (Ref: Asrar al Athar-e-Khususi, Vol 5 page 177) He considered their sayings as the calls of the 'wolf' and the 'pig' (Ref: Asrar al Athar-e-Khususi, Vol 5 page 177). At this time the brothers started divulging their hidden secrets. Consequently many of the concealed sins and unspeakable sins and defects hidden from the sight of the public were disclosed.

The disunion and conflict between the brothers and the followers did not cease with the name-calling and mud slinging, and after a while the followers of Bahauallah began to massacre the adherents of Yahya at his command. They trapped the opponents through foul lots and swooped down upon them and murdered them in cold blood.

Bahauallah had a sister by the name of Madame Iziyah, who wrote a book entitled "Awakening the Sleepy." She points out to the inhuman massacres of the Babis in various parts of the book and names many people who had been killed through cutting off their necks or ripping off their bellies, or suffocating them in the river or shooting them, because of not believing in Bahauallah. (Ref: Iziya-e-Khanum, Tanbih-al-Na'imin, page 15-16)

This article is not about the inhuman acts of the group. The aim of the investigation has not been to prepare a report of their crimes, because only a list of them will form a voluminous book. We wanted to see only how this ideology which claims to be divine, has met the needs of men for unity and solidarity.

We saw that the foundation of this religion was essentially built on opposition to unity and correlation. We know that the family is the smallest and the most correlative organ of society and the cornerstone of the high mansion of "Oneness of Mankind."

Now if someone does not want to and is unable to establish unity in this small unit and on the contrary induces an abusive and bloody conflict in its place, he will never be able to think of "Oneness of Mankind", and will make no effort to create it. Rather he will make an attempt to destroy it as far as he can.

The above article and the references make it clear that Bahauallah was unable to maintain a united relationship with his brother. While he adhered to him in lesser times, he conveniently abandoned him at the first available opportunity. Truly, this reflects on the personality of Bahauallah and opens our eyes to their deception.

Biography of Neal Chase

Neal Chase is the great grandson of ‘Abdu’l-Baha, third President of the Universal House of Justice of Baha’u’llah (www.UHJ.net) and current Guardian of the Baha’i Faith seated upon the throne of King David which is to last for ever (Psalms 89; Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Baha, page 15).

Background and Education

Neal Chase was born on Candlemas Sunday, January 30, 1966 in Bridgeport Connecticut, home of the Charter Oak. As a child he attended Live Oaks elementary School. Later his family moved to Oak Park, Michigan, where they lived in Stratford Court near 8 Mile Road on the limit of the city of Detroit. He received his secondary education at Cranbrook School in Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, was elected to student government without campaigning, and graduated as President of his class. He attended college for two years at Michigan State University, in East Lansing Michigan, located near the home of Malcolm X (El-Hajj Malik El-Shabazz), where he first came into contact with the Baha’i religious faith in 1985.

In 1987, on March 21, he moved to Madison, Wisconsin, where he helped to establish the Mid-Western Baha’i Center of the United States, giving public talks at the University of Wisconsin, on diverse subjects such as the Harmonic Convergence, the Prophecy of Great Pyramid of Giza, the Book of Revelation as well as holding Baha’i Firesides in his home, and continuing his research and educational work.

After moving to Montana in August of 1990, he lived in the city of Deer Lodge, Montana, continuing research on prophecy fulfillment and publishing his book “Ezekiel’s Temple in Montana”. He later re-entered school in 1995 at the University of Montana, receiving his Bachelors Degree in Psychology on 22 December, 2000 AD, with a minor in History, and a specialization in symbolic systems in Mathematics, of which he also received the Mac Johnson Family Scholarship award for Mathematical Analysis in 1997. He currently holds a Master’s Degree, Master of Science in Psychology, and is working on his doctoral program toward completion of his Ph.D. Thesis.

Religion and Spirituality

As a young boy in Connecticut, Neal Chase, began to be aware of religious and spirituality experiences occurring in every day life. In a recent interview he explained that though he was not able to articulate it then due to his extreme youth, it came in general the form of a supernatural, yet invisible, persistent Presence. This Presence had a definite mind, will and purpose, and though its effects were noticed and observed by all those present during these occasions, the other people would come up with excuses to deny its existence, or to explain away its effects as mundane coincidences. He explains, “This Presence or Entity, was attempting to communicate, not just to myself, but apparently to everyone – it had a definite message to communicate to all the world of humanity, and was continually and persistently trying to make itself known. However, these attempts would wax and wane, like the Moon and the Tides, depending upon the amount of love or light in the room. It would appear to withdraw during episodes of negativity, and in its absence calamity, accidents and catastrophes would occur to greater and lesser degrees.

“The people I was surrounded by at that time were scientific, but avowed atheists, of a purely materialistic foundation. Ethnically my background of my family of origin is Jewish on both my father and my mother’s side. Jewish means descended from the tribe of Judah. That is the tribe of King David. But as atheists, secular Jews, I was, therefore brought up with no religious indoctrination or belief system of any type, which was a great blessing for myself on this plane, for it provided me with no preconceived ideas whatsoever.

“At any rate, directly experiencing and observing the effects of this phenomenon we have mentioned, helped to create in myself a life-long dedication and desire to both love to know and to come into constant direct contact with this Presence. Later, as I got older, I found that others had reported such events within their own life-times, or had pursued the evocation and invocation of such experiences – and that many of these people came from my own hereditary background as Hebrews from the family and lineage of Abraham, who himself had these types of natural, yet metaphysical, lifelong experiences. For example, Jesus, a descendant of Abraham through King David through his father Joseph (Rom. 1:3, 4 KJV) had similar experiences as this, until finally, un-submerging from the Jordan River – Jordan means the descender – he went up onto the Mountain for 40 days and 40 nights, and met with the Devil and Satan.

“Moses likewise went up onto a mountain where it is said he conversed with God while in the presence of bush that burned but which was not consumed. This is actually a species of plant from that area called the gas plant that Moses happened to be standing in front of upon Sinai when he had his experience. These plants secrete an oil from its leaves, which when very hot become gaseous and ignite on fire, thus the leaves give off a gas that burns with a flame of fire from every individual leaf, yet the species of bush is not consumed at all. It is all very scientific. Likewise Buddha under the bow tree in India, Krishna in the war chariot of Arjuna, Adam in the Garden of Qadman, Muhammad in the Cave of Hira, Zoroaster (of the Magi) at the setting sun, the Bab in a dream, and Baha’u’llah in the Siyah-Chal (the dungeon of the Black Pit), Who describes this presence as the appearance of a Beautiful Maiden, as well as all the other believers such as Galileo, Bruno, Newton, John Dee, Einstein, MLK (Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.), the Hebrew prophets, Nostradamus, Joseph Smith, Wavoka, Black Elk, etc., all relate similar experiences to greater and lesser degrees.”

Born Again Baha’i

After having reached the age of maturity in his teens, Neal Chase, had a born again experience which resulted in his accepting Jesus and the scriptures of the Bible as authentic, though it obviously contained many mysteries that were unexplained. These would later be explained to him through the methodology of his mentor Dr. Leland Jensen, the last remaining Knight of Baha’u’llah. He explains that though he now recognized and accepted Jesus he was unable to join any Christian church or organized religion. Later he found out about Christianity, like Judaism and Islam, and the other world religions including Baha’i had been hijacked and turned into money making schemes by usurpers called “clergy” for their own aggrandizement and empowerment. In fact when all the promised ones and messengers from God appeared they were one and all opposed by this same "clergy class" of every day and age. The Jewish clergy such as Caiaphas was opposed to Jesus, the Christian clergy was against Muhammad, the Islamic clergy against that of the Bab, the followers of the Bab, like the followers of John the Baptist that were opposed to Jesus, were against Baha'u'llah, the "Baha'is" were against 'Abdu'l-Baha and killed his grandson Shoghi Effendi, the first Guardian, and so the ball of corruption continues to roll down throughout the ages.

At the age of 19 while attending Michigan State University, he first learned of the Baha'i Covenant preserved in the School of Dr. Leland Jensen, the last remaining Knight of Baha'u'llah. After a thorough interview he was matriculated into the college, where he received an education in religion, free of price.

He explains that all throughout his life, experiences and education, where God is the Real Teacher, he has always remained on one steady course. That he never actually converted to any other religion or Truth other than that which he had always held and experienced from the beginning – instead it has been a continual process in deepening into the Reality, never being separated from it. That through these many experiences though he has grown and matured spiritually as an individual, he has always remained the same personality and same individual since birth. He explains that this is not always the case for other people. For example take the famous cases of Paul or Nebuchadnezzar. These people belong to a religion or hold certain views that are different from that which is grounded in the Reality. Therefore when they come into contact with this Light and shines penetrating deeply into the core of their being, they undergo a conversionary experience which changes their personality and identity. Thus Saul became Paul. And Nebuchadnezzar lost his mind and ate grass like a cow, it says in Daniel, for 7 years, until his mind returned to him and was restored to the Kingdom under a different identity and different name re-created as wholly different person.

"Now this is different from the regular path of growth and transformation that is predestined for all in stages of maturation from the cradle to the grave, until in the final transformation the spiritual being is released from the mortal coil, as the caterpillar is released from the cocoon as a butterfly. The work in Greek for butterfly is psyche which literally means Soul. The Egyptians wrapped their dead in windings like a cocoon for the symbology of this reason. Thus the ancients had concept of the immortality of the soul as well, living transformed like the winged butterfly in the spirit world which is our real home of magic, love and light, where the Presence of God is absolute. Jesus called this true home the Kingdom of God. Now Baha'u'llah – The Revelation of the Most Great Name – has brought this Kingdom on earth as it is in heaven. Thus this is heaven or earth. The purpose the Davidic Kingship seated upon the throne of King David is so that we can recognize the true Universal House of Justice of Baha'u'llah from fakes frauds and imitations. This is so we can all live inside the shelter of this Spiritual City while our bodies are gathered together here on earth and our hearts dwell within this Kingdom. Those outside of this Kingdom, like those deprived of food and shelter in this world, suffer, are in darkness, and feel the sorrows of remoteness and are sad. Therefore as the door of this Kingdom are continually open, we call to them and invite them to the Supper of God. However, in that state outside the Kingdom, wars over oil and false religion occur on a daily bases. Rape, murder, injustice, ignorance, poverty, disease and all forms of depravity and illness are inflicted against the people almost on a daily basis. Therefore the people pray to God for relief. And God, being the Source of loving kindness IMMEDIATELY comes to their aid and answers their prayer. He sends them Baha'u'llah, the Prince of Peace and His everlasting Covenant of the Davidic Kingship to Comfort the people and establish this peace on earth from this time forth and for ever more.

"Thus the people pray for peace on earth and God immediately sends them the Prince of Peace, Baha'u'llah with His Covenant of peace. But the people don't want Baha'u'llah and don't want His Covenant. So the wars go on and the world remains in this state. This is prophesied to continue until the unimaginable point of unbearability. Then the people will think again and turn unto God. This will only occur after greater and greater levels of escalating catastrophes. Thus World War II was worse than World War I. Vietnam was worse than World War II. This current War which really started with the 9-11 is worse than all the other wars put together, and is getting worse and worse every day. As it is based upon violence it is unwinnable. Only establishing the Covenant of peace will remove these difficulties. This will not be accomplished through war, but through education and understanding. This is the true foundation of this Kingdom. This is why God has sent us the love of 'Abdu'l-Baha and the wisdom and guidance of Baha'u'llah. So that we could use the document of the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha to frame our own constitution for the Kingdom of God upon the earth. Everything is possible in this Kingdom. Nothing is possible outside of it. This is why it is written, "Behold I make all things new".

"As long as we form that Council with the Davidic Kingship as a working loyal, loving and equal co-member of the family of man, we remain under the provisions of the covenant. If we reject this living person and deprive or deny him his personal rights, freedoms and inheritance, then we have rejected denied and robbed everyone of their individual rights, freedoms and inheritances as well. His inheritance is not he greatest inheritance it is only the most public the most visible. Thus it is a "sign from God" (W&T, p. 11). A sign that as he is deprived all shall be deprived; As he has received all shall receive. Now for me personally, I have not one worldly desire or aim. My whole life demonstrates this for all who know me. Thus I have achieved my goals and received my inheritance of both this world and the next. Can we say that Jesus was deprived and cast out by God because he hung on the cross? Absolutely not! Can we say that Baha'u'llah was deprived of God's love, Presence and grace, because he was imprisoned and in exile for 40 years? Heavens no! Thus like 'Abdu'l-Baha, and all the other servants of this Kingdom, I am firm in secure in my inheritance, and as I have received this to shall all the true believers under the provisions of this everlasting covenant receive and in greater bounty and shares than that which I myself have been so generously given in both this world and the next."

Exilarch

Neal Chase says that the best way to understand his position in society is that of an Exilarch. The Exilarchs are the exiled monarchs of King David. The word Exilarch literally means EXILED monARCH.

The first Exilarch is King Jehoiachin who was the last King to sit on the throne of King David in Jerusalem and the first King to be seated upon the throne of King David in exile, in Babylon. It states in the Bible that Nebuchadnezzar brought the Davidic King and the throne of King David in exile into Babylon with him. Later that one of Nebuchadnezzar's successors took Jehoiachin out of prison and set him back upon the throne of David and exalted the throne of King David above the throne of the other kings in captivity. From that time forward the throne-line of King David has continued in exile down to the present day.

The most famous of all the historical Exilarchs of the past is the Exilarch Bostanai. Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Baha are direct male sperm descendants of King David through Solomon and Exilarch Bostanai through his Persian wife Dara of the throne-line. Neal Chase is also a direct-male sperm descendant of the Exilarch Bostanai through his Persian wife Dara, but from the cadet branch of the family of Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Baha that moved North into Russia out of the country of Persia which is modern day Iran.

Shiloh Prophecy

The Shiloh Prophecy of Genesis 49:10 states that the scepter shall depart between the feet and legs of Judah when Shiloh comes (KJV) and when it comes to whom it belongs (RSV). Between the feet and legs of Judah are the reproductive organs. The Shiloh prophecy is therefore the well known prophecy that when the second coming of Christ comes in the Potency of the Everlasting Father seated upon the throne of King David (Is. 9:6-7) He – The Ancient Root – will have physical son – the BRANCH – of which Baha'u'llah had 'Abdu'l-Baha the Most Great Branch, and then after this Root and Branch, the throne-line shall pass out from between the feet and legs of Judah in fulfillment of this Shiloh Prophecy and thus be continued by adoption – the Grafted Branch (Heb. Tsemach). Thus 'Abdu'l-Baha writes:

“Consider! The Divine Gardener cuts off the dry or weak branch from the good tree and grafts to it a branch from another tree. He both separates and unites. This is that which His Holiness Christ says: that from all the world they come and enter the Kingdom, and the children of the Kingdom shall be cast out.” ('Abdu'l-Baha, Master's Last Tablet to America, cf. Baha'i World Faith, p. 438)

This is what is meant when it states that the Gentiles will inherit the Kingdom. This is through adoption of the throne line. The prophecy further states (see Paul Romans 11 for more) that a natural branch shall then be grafted back in to inherit, when it comes “to whom it belongs”. This Shiloh Prophecy therefore is fulfilled in the throne-line succession directly following Baha'u'llah's son 'Abdu'l-Baha.

In fulfillment of Biblical prophecy 'Abdu'l-Baha adopted an American from the prophesied family of Masons. This American is Charles Mason Remey Aghsan. His father's family is that of Rear Admiral Remey of which an American battleship is named, and his mother, of the female line, is from the promised family Mason. Thus his middle name is actually the family name of the female line, and he was known to his friends as Mason Remey.

AGHSAN means BRANCH

As 'Abdu'l-Baha adopted Mason Remey to be his son, Mason Remey not only inherited the throne of King David after his father 'Abdu'l-Baha, but also the family sur-name of Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Baha entitled “Aghsan”. Aghsan literally means “branches” Ghush being the singular in Arabic and Persian for one branch. Baha'u'llah referred to all his sons and male descendants as Aghsan – branches. Thus 'Abdu'l-Baha was called the Most Great Branch. Therefore Mason Remey AGHSAN, is the direct male line successor to 'Abdu'l-Baha upon the throne of King David. An adopted son has all the rights and privileges of a natural son including the kingship. Mason in turn adopted his son Pepe, to succeed him as the only remaining aghsan in all the world. In 1991, Pepe adopted Neal Chase, a natural branch from the same family as that of Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Baha back into the throne-line succession to inherit as his only son both the name of AGHSAN and the legal succession to the throne of King David after him. In the year 2001 AD, on the day of September 21, the Autumnal or Fall Equinox, God fulfilled His promise and brought forth his “servant the BRANCH [Aghsan]” (Zech. 3:8 KJV) and this was the projection of the identity of Neal Chase in this role as the modern day Exilarch seated upon David's throne into the media, the internet and the court system.

As this kingship is not recognized by the majority of the people who are still unaware of this, the actual implementation of government for the material affairs of all mankind remains impeded; and thus this kingship and the current guardian remains in exile. Also as the mainstream “Baha'is” led by Ruhyyih Khanum and the “Hands” have violated the Covenant of Baha'u'llah and broken every single provision of the sacred Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha which is the Charter of the Kingdom, this kingship remains in exile from the historical Baha'i World Center properties of the Heroic and Formative Age in Haifa Israel as well. Thus it is in exile as an Exilarch.

However, in the place of its exile, the snow-white spot where 'Abdu'l-Baha designated its Rest in the Rocky Mountains of the United States during his visit in 1912, this fulfills the visions of the Book of Revelation for the New Jerusalem prophecies in the Rocky Mountains. This prophecy has been fully explained in the Book “Ezekiel's Temple in Montana” by Neal Chase and is depicted upon the map here <http://www.bupc.org/new-jerusalem.html> at <http://www.BUPC.org>.

Thus everything is how it should be!

Prophecies, Predications and Press Releases

Though the author of many books, letters, papers and articles of many subjects, Neal Chase has received the most public notoriety for his press release in which he accurately predicted the many future events now all come to pass, pertaining especially to the siege of the city of New York (the 9-11) and the War on Terror with al-Qaeda, and the invasion of Iraq and the killing of Saddam Hussein. These are fully explained at <http://www.BUPC.org>. What is unusual about this controversial subject, is the confirmation of many witnesses to this that themselves are of the mainstream or material perspective, as this article from the Missoula Newspaper demonstrates:

“In an editorial in The Missoulian, editor Mark Matthews, who had conducted several personal interviews with Neal Chase in his home in Missoula years earlier writes in ‘A Time to Weep’, written only days after the 9/11 attacks: “How could this have happened [the 9-11 attacks]? Some will say it's the beginning of the Biblical End Times. For a number of years, members of... Baha'is Under the Provisions of the Covenant have predicted that the World Trade Center Towers would be bombed by terrorists.” (The Missoulian, Editorial, September 20, 2001) A year after the 9/11 attacks The Missoulian newspaper also published a statement from Victor Woods, that Neal Chase had accurately predicted the date of the attacks. (Missoulain article September 16, 2002). The accuracy of this prediction is well known to everyone in Montana that saw or watched Neal Chase on MCAT (Missoula Community Access Television, on his program Baha'i Phone-live that aired from 1992 until 2001" (Michaud, J. Understanding Prophecy Fulfillment)

Thus Mark Matthews a Journal independent of the Baha'i faith documents that for many years Neal Chase, along with Dr. Jensen had predicted the current state of world affairs of the now so-called "War on Terror", which Neal Chase described as a "World Civil War" as well as the triggering event, the destruction of the Trade Towers. Still yet come is the expectation of the nuclear attack on the UN Building, and the escalating entanglement with Israel and Iran. Neal Chase accurately predicted over a half a dozen events in what he published as a prophetic time-line, as well as giving the exact dates from the scriptures for the execution of Saddam Hussein, stating that the final attack on the UN Building is to occur after the assassination of Saddam which was fulfilled on Eid al-Adha, several years ago. This prediction can be viewed on YouTube, <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=un1q-03RrPU> and the Prophecies Press Release and Predictions can be studied here <http://www.bupc.org/bupc-press-releases.html> at <http://www.BUPC.org>.

Court Cases: Montana and Colorado

After September 21, 2001, Neal Chase has been continually attacked by the Covenant-breaking Baha'is in variety of court cases and venues. Of the collateral damage in these cases is the loss of his two children and the dissolution of his first marriage.

The Covenant-breakers first tried to hijack the second IBC/UHJ that Dr. Leland Jensen had established on January 9, 1991, exactly 40 years after Shoghi Effendi had established the first one in January 9, 1951. Exactly as the Hands and the liaison officer of the first Council Ruhyyih Khanum had one and all rejected Mason Remy AGHSAN and attempted to hijack away the first IBC/UHJ and set up a headless Monster "UHJ" in its place, remarkably enough, the newly appointed members of the second IBC/UHJ including the second Liaison Officer, also attempting to dissolve the second IBC/UHJ. Neal Chase along with the other loyal members of the Council, active and firm in the Covenant were able to prevent this, and the council remains established since 1991.

Having found themselves removed from the Council by their own nefarious activities, outside the provisions of the sacred Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Baha, and unsuccessful in their attempt to imitate Ruhyyih Khanum and the "hands" – their coalition coup fell apart each going their own separate ways and making different claims. This resulted in the formation of more than one minority factions, none of which in and of itself amounted to either a quorum or majority of the Council.

One notorious faction led by the former Treasurer of the Council, allied itself with another faction led by the former wife of Neal Chase, who had taken away his two children via the American family court system, using religion and his role as the Guardian as pretext, all the while telling the children that their father had been expelled from the Baha'i Faith as Covenant-breaker (that is by her group allied with the group of the Treasurer) and therefore they should shun him and have no contact with him on these religious grounds whatsoever. This joint scheme was first run through the Courts system of the local Colorado Baha'i Council and then up through to the second IBC/UHJ. When it failed there, that is it divided the IBC/UHJ members, these two factions then took the case to the State Courts of both Montana and Colorado: to Montana to destroy the IBC/UHJ and in Colorado, to separate the children from their father.

However in the interim, these two factions separated themselves from the rest of the community, declared Neal Chase and those with him to be Covenant-breakers, and began to indoctrinate and alienate his own children into this way of thinking as well. It was Mason Remy all over again. Families were destroyed, homes wrecked, by these usurpers who – with no authority from the Will and Testament and text of the Covenant – aggrandized to themselves the switcheroo to declare those who remained firm in the Covenant as violators.

This choice of tactic by his former wife, though reported to the Colorado court as definite "parental alienation" by the Court appointed special advocate was upheld and enforced against him and two minor children by the Colorado Family courts. Not knowing what else he could do, not wishing to further disrupt the lives of his children who received threats and alienation tactics by the other parties after his visits with him, and after a very long and protracted attempt to be able to preserve visitation and relationships with his children, and after going into debt into the amount of tens of thousands of dollars, when asked about this, he said, "These types of things happen to many people – therefore why should I be spared from these things, when my mission is to help the people. Jesus was not the only person crucified thousands of years ago, this was a common occurrence that happened to many people. Another famous example is Spartacus. Examples such as these lead to the fall of the Roman Empire. America must transform or fall as well. The choice rests its leadership in government, in education, in the media, etc. The Baha'i faith brings justice for all, not justice for one. Therefore Baha'u'llah suffered 40 years of injustice, 'Abdu'l-Baha 40 years, Dr. Jensen suffered this type of injustice as well, and so shall I. This is because this faith, the true Baha'i Faith, establishes something the world has never seen before, Justice. Therefore those that promotes this learn a lesson in justice through these type of glaring injustices. Many of the people have lost their families and loved ones in these types of violations of the Covenant. Having survived these things many of these people – have seen through the lies, slander and calumny of the enemy and have seen and felt the real love and light and kindness and perseverance of those true ones under the provisions of the Covenant and have now come back from the many other groups (who masqueraded as "Baha'is") and have found refuge, haven and reunion with their families and loved here under the provisions of the Covenant in the true Kingdom, in association and communion with the living Davidic King, an aghsan, the great grandson of 'Abdu'l-Baha, in exile. It is the love of 'Abdu'l-Baha and his sacred Will and Testament that has drawn them all back, and re-grown the beautiful leaves, flowers and fruit on this blessed tree of the international community of the Covenant.

"This is what 'Abdu'l-Baha himself has said in his Last Tablet to America, "Behold from all over the world they come and enter the Kingdom, and the children of the Kingdom are cast out!" The real thing is to live the life, this means not hating anybody or anyone for any reason. Jesus said we must love on another. Thus you must love you neighbor, but you don't have to love the bad things he does to you. I have fullest confidence of God's wisdom in all things. In the end all the people will come back under the Covenant. They will do this in this life or the next. What choice have they? There is no where else to go, but into the Light. Surely they can hide from this from a few short years here, but in the end, as we live on his earth, and breath his air, and eat his food, there is no where else to go, no other place, haven or refuge. The problem for the people, is the type of adjustments they may need to make based upon what they have done. Therefore ours is not to judge or condemn, but to leave them over to God for He is the prayer hearing prayer answering Lord! For example is the prayer or sacred verse “There but for the grace of God go I!” Therefore in cases such as these we must be every cautious to not only remain firm in the Covenant according to the letter, but to the spirit as well. When my other children are mature and are grown into their own, I will see them again, soon enough. This is predestined, if they share these same qualities and attributes we have spoken of here today.”

The attempted to destroy the IBC/UHJ in the Montana Courts bore no fruit for the violators either. In the end, they disbanded and went their own separate ways. All that remains, is the evidence, proofs, bona fides and legal credentials within the court system, for lawyers to see how the succession of the throne-line of King David continues legally from Baha’u’llah, to ‘Abdu’l-Baha, to Mason, Pepe and then to Neal Chase.

Court Cases: United Nations and United States Federal

<http://www.bupc.org/wipo/wipo-press-release.html>

Began a little while after, but continued con-currently with the Colorado and Montana cases, began the assault against the UHJ (www.UHJ.net) by the original group or ex-IBC members and their successors the ones that attacked Mason Remey AGHSAN back in 1957-1960. Thus while the ex-menders of the second IBC set up by Dr. Jensen were attacking the Guardian, the ex-members of the first IBC set up by Shoghi Effendi attacked him as well. They first attacked him in the United Nations through World Intellectual and Property Organization, whose international courts are based in Geneva Switzerland. Having no formal background in law whatsoever, he single handedly wrote the legal response to their caviling and claims citing the Will and testament of ‘Abdu’l-Baha and showing that they were the ones outside the legal provisions of the CHARTER (the sacred Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Baha, see Shoghi Effendi, World Order of Baha’u’llah, page 144 for more) and therefore could not be the actual Universal House of Justice that Baha’u’llah revealed, ‘Abdu’l-Baha delineated and Shoghi Effendi constituted on January 9, 1951 that continues on to this day at <http://www.UHJ.net>. They lost the case. Thus Goliath fell to one small stone flung by a descendant of King David. The Guardian therefore won the right for all the Baha’is of the world to teach the faith under the provisions of the Covenant internationally at the United Nations venue. Is it any wonder that the teaching effort has exploded on the scene internationally since that time? Now the majority of people are becoming educated to the meaning and provisions of very single verse of the sacred Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Baha.

Not satisfied with this sudden and devastating defeat, the Covenant-breakers then dragged the dead carcass of their defeat into United States Federal Court in the city of Chicago – forcing the Guardian to come down off the mountain with the other members of the UHJ to be deposed as well as to testify in open court. They lost again.

This episode has been chronicled by the station chief of the United States Mid-West Baha’i Center who attended the proceedings as witness to these historic events. The Covenant-breakers appealed the decision. So this Cause progresses through opposition as it is written: “What man plans for evil God plans for Good so that many people shall be saved”.

Select Works

Television and Radio. Every Friday night from 1992-2001, Neal Chase, hosted a weekly live call-in talk show on MCAT (Missoula Cable Access Television) called Bahá’i Phone-in Live. The format allowed callers to discuss issues ranging from religion, world events, politics, and special interests. Neal Chase was also invited to be a guest on the Art Bell radio show Coast to Coast AM on March 25, 1993, soon after the first World Trade Center Bombing which he accurately predicted. Neal Chase also appeared on Michael Moore’s TV Nation Episode Five where Dr. Leland Jensen was featured.

Neal Chase has also appeared in many other publications, reviews and literature, some of which focused upon the scientific study of the Baha’i Faith.

“One of the most significant events in the history of the [Baha’i Faith] BUPC was the recruitment of Neal Chase, a spiritual seeker from Wisconsin who proved to be brilliant at synthesizing Jensen’s teachings [establishing Baha’u’llah] with other prophetic beliefs... By 1990, Jensen, then seventy-six, had turned much of the responsibility for interpreting the scriptures over to Chase.” (Stone, J. R. Expecting Armageddon, p. 271, 272).

Personal Life

Neal Chase is re-married and currently lives in the United States of America in the Rocky mountains with his wife and their two children.

Publications. Aside from the large body of his published and unpublished letters, writings, press releases and research materials, some of his most notable publications include:

Ezekiel’s Temple in Montana.

Lazarus the Sick World.

Higher Dimensional Geometry in Mathematical Modeling.

Religion and Spirituality in the Psychology of Personality.

Universal Cycles of Time: 2012 and the Celestial Magi.

Persecution of Bahais – Sign of Truth?

Visit any Bahai website and you will find a mention of “Persecution of Bahais”. While I condemn any kind of persecution, I believe we should not accept any claim at its face value. Moreso, if it comes from the Bahais. (Please read: Advancing the Status of Women and other articles).

Before we delve further, it would be very important to note, this discussion has very little to do with the Bahai Faith. This discussion is more for social interest than religious significance. Simply because being persecuted or not is not a proof for establishing the truthfulness of the claimant or the veracity of the claim.

To explain this further, if being persecuted was a characteristic of a Prophet, every executed traitor would become a Manifestation of God. This would become an established methodology of recognising a Prophet.

In fact, the Ghulam Ahmed Qadian, a contemporary of Bahaullah, was in a more formidable position to be a Prophet instead of Bahaullah, as the Qadianis are seeing more difficult times than the Bahais. On the other hand, the Bahais would then be required to deny the Prophethood of king and Prophet David (the one from whose progeny would be the Manifestation of God (read Bahaullah) as claimed by the Bahais). In short, being persecuted or not is not a sign of being a divine religion.

Let me touch upon an important aspect of this discussion. Past prophets have been harassed and persecuted – Prophet Mohammed (pbuh) is the best example. He was troubled by the Quraish, the polytheists, the Christians and the Jews. Please note, he was troubled by all those whose beliefs he abrogated. By ALL, and not by the followers of the previous Prophet only. Bahais, as they claim, are persecuted in Muslim countries, only give a new dimension to our discussion. Why is it that the Bahais are persecuted in Muslim countries and supported by non-Muslim countries? Is Bahaullah not a Prophet for the Jews, as well? Are Israeli Jews not eligible for salvation by accepting the Bahai Faith? Then why the arrangement between the Bahais and the Jews of Israel that the Faith would not be sold to them? Why are Jews supporting the Bahai Faith (as long as they do not preach the Jews)? Why is the West (primarily Christian countries) supporting the Bahais? Is this the continuation of persecuting the Muslims, now ideologically? So is it the Bahais who are being persecuted or is it the Muslims?

So, if persecution establishes the veracity of a religion, then we can simply close the discussion and submit to Islam. Muslims are not only being persecuted politically, but ideologically as well.

I am sure the Bahais would now insist that being persecuted is no proof for truthfulness.

Huququallah- The Right of God

There is a great importance of Huququallah in the Bahai Faith.

Huququallah is an Arabic word comprised of two words. Huquq meaning “Right” and “Allah” meaning “God”. Therefore Huququallah means “Right of God”, a part of the individuals possession and income offered at the Threshold of God. Huququallah being the Right of God and bounty for the people is clear from the Bahai Holy writings of sayings of The Bab, Bahauallah and Abdul Baha.

Writings of The Bab

O people of the world, whatever ye have offered up in the way of the one true God, ye shall indeed find preserved by God, The Preserver, and Intact at Gods Holy Gate.

Thus the embryo of the sacred law of Huququallah was established by the Bab in the Persian Bayan, His book of Laws. Bahauallah brought some modifications in its content and fashioned it as one of the worlds shaping ordinances of His stupendous Revelation.

Writings of Bahauallah:

Bahauallah affirms “...the payment to the Right of God is conducive to prosperity, to blessing and to honour and divine protection” “As to Huququallah, this is the source of blessing and the mainspring of God’s loving kindness and tender love vouchsafed unto men”.

In Kitab-i Aqdas verse 97, it has been revealed by Bahauallah:

Should anyone acquire one hundred mithqals of gold, nineteen mithqals thereof are Gods and to be rendered unto him, the fashioner of the earth and heaven. Take heed o people, lest you deprive yourselves of such a great bounty. This we have commanded you, though though we are well able to dispense with you and with all those who are in the heavens and on earth, in it there are benefits and wisdoms beyond the ken of anyone but God, The Omniscient, the All-informed Say, By this means He hath desired to purify what ye possess and to enable you to draw nigh unto such stations as none can comprehend save those whom God hath willed, He in truth is the Beneficent The Gracious, The Merciful .O people deal not faithlessly with the Right of God , Nor without His leave , make free with its disposal .Thus hath his commandments been established in the holy tablets and in this Exalted book .He who dealeth faithlessly with God shall in justice meet with faithlessness himself , He , however , who acteth in accordance with Gods bidding shall receive a blessing from the heaven of the bounty of His lord , the Gracious , the Bestower , the Generous , the Ancient of Days.He verily hath willed for you that which is yet beyond your knowledge , but shall be know to you when , after this fleeting life , your souls shall soar heaven wards and the trappings of your earthly joys are folded up.Thus admonished you He in Whose possession is the Guarded Tablet.

Writings of Abdul Baha: –

O friends of Abdul Baha The Lord as a sign of his infinite bounties hath graciously favoured His servants by providing for a fixed money offering (Huqooq) to be dutifully presented unto Him, through He m, the true One and His servants have been at all times independent of all created things, and God verily is the all-possessing, exalted above the need of any gift from His creatures. This fixed money offering however causeth people to become firm and steadfast and draweth Divine increase upon them. (Will and Testament of Abdul Baha)

Abdul Baha commenting on the manifold powers latent in the Law of Huququallah writes”

“...In accordance with His inscrutable wisdom and in order to apply a unique test to distinguish the friend from the stranger, He hath enjoined the Huqooq upon His servants and made it obligatory.”

From all the above quotations it is amply clear that the source of energy for upholding the law of huquallah is the individuals love and loyalty to the covenant.

As Abdul Baha, Himself says that it distinguishes the friend from the stranger; this is nothing more or less than a test of ones firmness in the covenant.

The Two Mirzas

Mirza Golam Ahmed

Mirza Hosain Ali

What do they say for each other?

This is what the Ahmadiyyas have to say regarding the Baha'is :

The following important differences between the Ahmadiyya claims and the Bahai claims :

1. One of Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad's basic aims was to teach the world the Islamic doctrine of the absolute oneness of God, which strongly rejects the concept that any human being can ever be a manifestation of God. The Bahai teachings are that there have been various manifestations of God on earth (Moses, Jesus, Muhammad, Baha-ullah). Therefore Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad was teaching the opposite of the Bahai beliefs.
2. As noted above, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad proclaimed that the Islamic scripture, teachings and law are valid forever, and will never be abrogated or replaced. Again this is exactly the opposite of Bahai beliefs which teach that Baha-ullah's scripture and law have abrogated and replaced the Holy Quran and the Shari'ah of Islam.
3. The Prophet Muhammad taught that prophets before him had been sent by God to all nations, and he required his followers (Muslims) to believe in all of them. Moreover, he taught, as stated in the Quran, that these prophets had prophesied to their nations of the appearance of the Prophet Muhammad and had instructed their followers to believe in that Promised Prophet when he came. So the Prophet Muhammad became the converging point of the previous prophets and religions. He addressed the whole of humanity, while the previous prophets addressed only their individual nations. He was thus the Last and Final Prophet through whom all humanity is to be united.

To preach the oneness of humanity and to seek to unite religions on fundamentals in the seventh century, as the Prophet Muhammad did, at a time when no one even knew what the whole world consisted of, is a clear proof of the Prophet Muhammad getting revelation and knowledge from God. But for someone in the nineteenth century like Bahaullah to repeat similar ideas (i.e. unity of humanity) cannot be called new revelation coming from God, particularly when he himself originally arose from within the religion of Islam.

<http://www.muslim.org/intro/bah.htm>

These are the ideas of Baha'is regarding Ahmadiyya Muslims :

While some of the few quotes of their (Ahmadi) writings I have read seem quite forceful and rarely seem inspired, the correlations to Baha'i scripture is quite astounding. Their founder also claims to be the Mahdi and Messiah, as well as claiming the same ties to Buddhism and Hinduism. They also promote non-violence and uphold jihad as personal struggle not the warring aspects Muslims have accepted widely.

They differ in many ways, they uphold more closely everything in the Qu'ran and much of their writings are about this book. He also claims Jesus didn't actually die on the cross, but rather journeyed to India where he died an old man of natural causes.

Obviously, I do not believe time based prophecies apply since it was founded in 1889, thus 45 years late for Jewish, Christian, Muslim, and Hindu prophecy at least. They also call their leader Caliph, which I agree with Riggs is the mark of the beast – the 666 referred to in Revelation. Still, it is interesting, could their leader have been exposed to Baha'u'llah's writings at this time? There are already 200 million members of this group apparently, so I think it would be a valuable group to target with pioneering, they already accept many things Baha'u'llah has said so presenting time based prophecies might be enough to bring them to the Baha'i Faith?

I sort of liken them to Mormonism in that they have writings that correlate to what Baha'u'llah has said – and in the case of Mormonism, accurately describes the Baha'i dispensations coming – however entirely focus on a previous dispensation rather than bringing anything new.

What the Christians have to say about both of these "Mahdi"s? <http://www.iranian.com/main/blog/covenant/bahauallah-biblical-prophecy>

Manish Desai's response to the shrewd Baha'is who are using prominent Indians to serve their purposes.

The petition written by Baha'is and signed by prominent Indians can be found here <http://www.bahai.in/news/national-news-of-the-bahais-of-india/petition-to-the-iranian-government-for-immediate-release-of-the-staff-and-faculty-of-the-bahai-institute-of-higher-education.html>

Here is a response to it by Mr. Manish Desai. It is pretty immature on the part of 86 Indians' Petition to the Iranian Government for Immediate Release of the staff and faculty of the Bahá'í Institute of Higher Education. As most of these eminent personalities are highly educated – some even authorities on law – it would have been appropriate that they should have verified the facts before making a petition. Has anyone of these personalities checked with the Government of Iran? Are petitions to be signed purely on single side of the story? On whose influence are signatures taken? Do these personalities know that the Government of India cannot support a resolution which is country specific?

This was none of the business of so called imminent citizen to issue an petition. If they were so concerned about the Release of the staff and faculty of the Bahá'í Institute of Higher Education, they would have just conveyed their concerned to the government of India and not breaking into pens or shouting from roof tops. The shrewd Baha'is have used these imminent citizens of India.

Now let us see the facts! 1. The Baha'i community has repeatedly been convicted in several sensitive countries of carrying espionage activities. The Baha'is have been under scanner for violating law of the land in several countries for carrying out religious conversions by deception. It seems the Baha'i administration is interested in having "martyrs" for its cause in different countries rather than to see their own people save their lives.

2. Baha'is involved in espionage in India. Why, even in India there are cases filed against the Baha'i faith members for possessing fraudulent documents and carrying out espionage activities and for supplying classified defense documents to Iranian and Israeli spying agencies in return making huge amount of foreign currency. (Refer Hindustan Times 13th July 2006 New Delhi Edition,)

3. Baha'i Administration with all modern techniques involved in conversion of Simple Indians. Recently Universal House of Justice, the apex organization of the Baha'i Faith in a new encyclical has issued a call to Baha'is to go out and actively convert Indians. In this era of globalization, Baha'i administration with unlimited funds use sophisticated, deceptive techniques to lure, brainwash and convert innocent people.

They forcefully convert Hindus by inducement and deception. Many poor illiterate tribal people in Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh were deceptively converted into Baha'i Faith, although anti-conversion law is passed in 11 of the states in India. This will have a disastrous effect on India's political, cultural and social fabric.

For centuries Indians have been forcefully converted into other religions. Religious conversion has profoundly affected our cultural legacy by the after-effects of genocidal coercive religious conversion. It has left its wounding imprint on our individual psyches and our collective consciousness.

Although coercive religious conversion of Hindus in India and abroad has deep historical roots, recent deceptive religious conversion techniques used by Baha'i movement pose serious political, social, ethical and psychological problems. <http://ruhibooks.blogspot.com/>

4. Baha'i Teaching Institutes involved in deceptive conversions. On 3rd March 2011, the locals of Wai district in Panchgani caught the Baha'is red handed indulging in conversion activities. The Baha'is arrived in a Mini Bus to propagate Baha'i religion to the local people in Wai. The Baha'is were taken to the police station where Baha'i officials said that "we were conducting practicals for these students". They were told that why the students can't go to different schools and get their practical training.

The students confessed that they were going to villages for conduction of Baha'i religious classes for children and youths and they were told by their teachers that their course will be completed only when they do these activities. The teacher warned them to be 'TACTFUL' while propagating the Baha'i religion.

On seeing the Baha'i books it became clear for the Police that it was a conversion class. As the 'Ruhi Book' that they were having, contained Baha'i religious material and chapters such as "UNDERSTANDING THE BAHAI WRITINGS."

The Police officials reprimanded Baha'is of their hypocritical behavior and warned them not to teach Baha'i Faith to the students/staff of NETTC as well as locals of Wai and Panchgani.

On further inquiry it was revealed by the staff, that

There are numerous complaints against all the three institutes of Baha'is namely:

- NETTC • New Era School and Junior college • New Era Baha'i Academy

The conversion activities going on in these institutes are in the name of Children Moral Classes, Youth Classes etc. In fact some of the staff of these institutes have given a written complaint to the government authorities that these institutes demands 'Conversion' in return of confirmation and promotion in these institutes. Therefore some of the staff just to gain the facilities provided by these institutes like good salary, food, boarding and lodging have apparently accepted the Baha'i Faith, but in actuality they practice their ancestral Religion.

The heads of all the three Baha'i institutions are Iranians who have hired local Indians to go to the villages, schools, colleges and universities to teach Baha'i Training courses which are nothing but purely 'Baha'i Religious Teachings'. Some of these people are well versed in local languages so they cunningly escape the authority scanners.

The staff further gave information that sometimes they have to conduct 'Ruhi Classes' for all the students of the class. The students are least interested in these courses but the staff and students have to do it compulsorily for hours and hours together. These courses have hidden agenda of teaching of Baha'i religious passages. The students are supposed to memorize long Baha'i prayers and quotations in order to enrich themselves with Baha'i Teaching and culture.

Even the tiny tots are not spared from Baha'i teachings. They too have to undergo various Baha'i children courses designed for them, that are based on Ruhi books.

One of the senior staff who has retired from the school and now taken another assignment in one school elaborated the whole teaching process of the Baha'is. He said that Baha'i Faith has no acceptability in the society. Baha'i Faith has nothing new to offer to the society although they claim that they have solutions for all the problems, but first the people should accept Baha'i Faith. In fact Baha'i teachings have been copied from other religions. Therefore in order to spread the Baha'i teachings, the Baha'i Administration emphasizes on establishment of Schools and considers the children as best and fruitful targets.

Some of the parents have seriously objected to Baha'is proselytizing going on in these Baha'i Institutions. But then they have limitations to change the schools at this stage. <http://panchgani-Bahais.blogspot.com/>

BAHA'I METHODOLOGY It has been the habit of the Baha'is to have active public relations and persuade high ranking government official and eminent personalities in every country to speak for them. Why do the Baha'is never speak of the huge injustice and oppression being meted out to fellow Indian citizens in different parts of world? Are Indian Baha'is, first Baha'is and then Indians? It is not the first time that the 86 Indian have fallen into the trap of cunning Baha'is. Earlier in 2010 there were 31 eminent Indians who were taken by the Baha'is for a ride. In the Issue of 7 Baha'i prisoners in Iran. This point to a very strong Baha'i network operating in India.

In India from Sorabjees to Mistris, from Corporators to Member of Parliaments and from State Minister to Cabinet Ministers are being contacted to bring pressure on Iran as if the Government of India has nothing else to do except protect the Baha'is. In spite of these efforts the Baha'is do not lack behind in claiming that we do not interfere in politics.

Unfortunately, the petition by eminent Indian citizens has served the following purpose for the Baha'is

1. Propagation of Baha'i Faith in India 2. Defamation of Iranian Government 3. Attempt to sabotage the good and cordial relation between India and Iran.

I earnestly request Indian politicians and bureaucrats not to succumb to Baha'is charming persuasion and verify facts and evaluate long term repercussions before taking-up a stand.

Parents Be Aware of “Baha’i cup of Tea” for Your Children

Following 15-day jail terms handed down to two Baha’is in Tashkent, one of the two, Timur Chekparbayev, who was subsequently expelled from Uzbekistan. The authorities accused the two of missionary activity and proselytism, following a police raid on a meeting for teenage Children.

Chekparbayev stated that these were not conversion meetings with young children and Jr. Youth but it was just to drink a cup of tea together. In response, Akram Nematov of the Justice Ministry told Forum 18 that “They can drink tea – that’s not forbidden, but they must inform the Department when they HOLD RELIGIOUS EDUCATION WITH YOUNG PEOPLE.”

It is clear that Mr. Chekparbaev arrived in Uzbekistan with the aim of propagating Baha’i Faith in the country, drawing on the support of generous donations from sponsors. By the way, the headquarters of the Baha’is operate in the open in Israel. Certain elements from that country find it very useful to use the Baha’i community to shatter the unity of the Muslim ranks, since the Jews see Islam as the main opponent of Judaism. It is also interesting that in the dawn of Baha’ism, Russia offered asylum to one of the leaders of this persecuted religion. And in Ashkhabad [Turkmenistan], one of the Baha’i communities was built.

Timur Chekparbayev carried out missionary and proselytizing activity without having the consent of the Uzbekistani authorities and the consent of the parents, it was in clear violation of the Uzbekistani law, and the rules governing stays in the country.

On the 24th of July of this year, Mr. Chekparbaev was arrested and sent to the court for holding yet another “meeting” in house 36 on Bayikurganska Street in the Khamzin region of Tashkent. The regional court gave him a rather lenient sentence: 15 days in prison followed by an expulsion from the country without a right to return.

Chekparbaev couldn’t carry out his proselytizing activity because Baha’i isn’t recognized as a religion by the world community. Therefore, this ideological sabotage had very clear goals that are connected to increasing the geo-political influence of Israel, and sowing confusion in the minds of millions of Uzbekistani citizens. It seems that such a decisive step taken by Mr. Akram Nematov will defiantly stop this sort of deceptive proselytizes activity aimed at destroying the unity and moral fabrics of Uzbekistan. It will also serve as a warning to all those who wish to test their luck based on the questionable field of false prophets.

The decision taken by Uzbekistani authorities should be an eye opener for the CIS Countries to counter the moral damage inflicted on the fragile souls on young people (by the way, Mr. Chekparbaev’s so-called flock included minors!). A constant vigil at this deceptive and Zionist created false and fabricated religion is the need of the time.

This is Zionism attempt of transferring the work of false prophet Baha’u’llah from their country to Muslim countries and take vital information of CIS and Middle East countries.

Baha'i writings on covenant breakers

The Status of UHJ

Here's one of the Haifa Baha'i counselors speaking about the UHJ:

"We don't want to be like those people who want to see God with their own eyes, or hear His melody with their own ears, because we have been given the gift of being able to see through the eyes of the House of Justice and listen through the ears of the House of Justice." – Baha'i Counselor Rebeque Murphy

To hear this section of her talk go to:

Note that this idolatrous statement has not been reputed by the UHJ, it is the level of enthrallment to themselves that they now expect: unquestioning obedience.

Cheers

Caste System in Baha'i Faith

Currently, the Baha'is think of humanity as being divided into a few official groups or castes. I have organized them in a list from "best" to "worst" based on how many rights they would have in a future Baha'i world order:

1. Baha'i in good standing 2. Baha'i with administrative rights removed 3. non-Baha'i 4. Covenant-breaker

If you include more subtle gradations, which may possibly acquire a greater degree of official status in the future, the list would look like this:

1. Baha'i in good standing, active
2. Baha'i in good standing, inactive
3. Baha'i with some administrative rights removed
4. Baha'i with all administrative rights removed (Feast attendance, voting, eligibility for election, contribution to Funds, contribution to Huququ'llah, plus anything I'm forgetting to mention)
5. non-Baha'i (never been a Baha'i)
6. ex-Baha'i, left voluntarily (not an opponent)
7. ex-Baha'i, membership revoked/expelled by UHJ (not an opponent)
8. opponent or enemy of the faith, non-Baha'i
9. opponent or enemy of the faith, ex-Baha'i
10. child or grandchild of Covenant-breaker, not practicing in Covenant-breaker organization
11. Covenant-breaker, not officially declared by UHJ but member of Covenant-breaker organization
12. Covenant-breaker, officially declared by UHJ

Groups 10-12 constitute the Baha'i version of the "untouchable caste." Groups 4-12 (the vast majority of categories) would not have the right to vote in elections for the highest governmental positions, i.e. the Baha'i Houses of Justice that would have final authority at the local, national, and international levels.

How's that for unity of all people, huh?

Best, Eric Stetson (Group 11 – I think ☐)

Iran justifies it's stance on Baha'is

In addition to cooperation and connection with colonialists supporting and accompanying the dictatorships have been among the principles of this sect.

The tie between Bahaism and the Pahlavi regime reached it peak after the coup of 19 August 1953 and the Bahaists mounted to the highest political, economic, cultural and military positions in the last two decades of the rule of Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

Presence of the leaders of this misled sect in the important political, military and economic positions also prepared the ground for expansion of its propagation activities against the Shiites in the cradle of Shiites (Iran) from which they took the highest benefit.

It is noteworthy that ties to colonialists still continue in the forms of official support of the white House and the Occupier Regime of Palestine for them and the apparent cooperation against the Islamic republic of Iran.

Wahid Azal's "Ridvan" Message to the Universal House of Justice

19 Terms and Conditions for the Unconditional Surrender of the Haifan Baha'i cult

Now that the Baha'i cult has been thoroughly weakened, cut to minute size and is therefore hemorrhaging to an assured and well-deserved (and long overdue) death, I am hereby making the following offer to you Haifan Baha'is to unconditionally surrender, walk away, and save whatever you have left of your personal lives. I urge you to seriously consider this offer because if you don't, whatever else shall unfold will be on your own heads personally. Now that this demand has been spelled out, here are the 19 terms for your unconditional surrender:

- 1) The immediate dissolution of the ITC (international teaching center), the written and unequivocal dismissal of all haifan Baha'i continental board of councilor members and their underlings (Auxiliary board members, etc), to be followed by the immediate resignation without equivocation of all 9 members of the bogus and illegal universal house of justice based in Haifa, Israel;
- 2) The immediate and unequivocal dissolution of the entire infrastructure of the haifan Baha'i administration and bureaucracy globally – in every capacity and function – and the dismissal/dissolution of every national spiritual assembly, regional council and local assembly tied to your specific organization on the planet; as well as the immediate and unequivocal suspension of all activities under the name and rubric of the haifan Baha'i organization;
- 3) The immediate and unequivocal dissolution and suspension of all Ruhi Institutes globally;
- 4) The immediate and unequivocal relinquishment and full disclosure in writing of all assets, chattels, investments, funds, stocks, bonds, monies and otherwise belonging to the haifan Baha'i organization in Israel, North America, the United Arab Emirates, Europe and throughout the rest of the world; whether immediately tied or tangentially;
- 5) The immediate and unequivocal disclosure in writing of all subsidies and all monies and perquisites received by your organization since 1910 – in any capacity whatsoever – by any individual(s), entities or groups, governments or otherwise, not immediately tied to your organization, and specifically from the state of Israel since 1948;
- 6) The immediate financial and documentary auditing of your entire organization on all continents, beginning with the Baha'i world centre in Haifa, Palestine;
- 7) The immediate and unequivocal surrender of all legal and official documentation as well as letters and correspondences of your organization from the dates of 1871 to present;
- 8) The immediate and unequivocal surrender of all files and archives kept in any policing or surveillance capacities by the haifan Baha'i organization whatsoever upon individuals, whether these be files regarding rank-and-file members of the haifan Baha'i cult or those put out by it as well as those not;
- 9) The immediate and unequivocal surrender in writing of the full names, addresses, duties and capacities of all those serving under your Internet Committee based in the United States and spread out throughout the globe as well as the full unequivocal disclosure of the date of its establishment and any/all outside aid obtained;
- 10) The immediate and unequivocal surrender of the entirety of the archives of all texts and source documents (as well as artefacts) of a specifically scriptural and historical nature to a panel consisting of members of the Bayani community, the Reform Baha'i movement, the Orthodox Baha'i Communities – 1) Marangella and 2) Soghomonian -, the Baha'is Under the Provisions of the Covenant, ex-Baha'i academics of a reputable nature such as Denis Maceoin as well as those such as Margrit Warburg etc, and any others determined in consensus by the Panel;
- 11) The immediate and unequivocal disclosure of the facts regarding the fate of the National Spiritual Assembly of Iran circa 1979 and a complete explanation with documentation as to the reasons for the conspicuous silence of the so-called universal house of justice in world fora afterwards regarding the fate of this body;
- 12) The immediate and unequivocal release and publication of the Will and Testament of Shoghi Effendi to the worldwide Baha'i community;
- 13) The immediate and unequivocal and unhindered and unimpeded return of all documents, texts, scriptures, histories, papers and effects in your possession belonging to one Mirza Yahya Nuri Subh-i-Azal, which were illegally and fraudulently obtained by one Mirza Husayn 'Ali Nuri Baha'u'llah in Baghdad and Edirne in the 1860s, to the Bayani community;
- 14) The immediate and unequivocal return of all the properties of Bahji to its rightful owners, namely, the descendents of Mirza Muhammad 'Ali ibn al-Baha' and Mirza Badi'ullah ibn al-Baha';
- 15) The case one Hozhabr Yazdani (NOW DEAD) to be thoroughly examined for his execution of state sanctioned and protected criminal activities on behalf of your organization in Iran from the years 1953-1979;
- 16) The immediate and unequivocal disclosure in full regarding the criminal hawala networks operated by members of the haifan Baha'i organization throughout Asia, the Middle East, South America, Europe, North America and elsewhere, and an explanation with documentation regarding the nature of such activities and especially the names, addresses and capacities of those persons involved with these criminal hawala networks;

17) The immediate and unequivocal disclosure of all documents and papers regarding the unexplained murder of one Dan Jordan in New York City in 1982 as well as the immediate and unequivocal disclosure of all documents and papers regarding the suspicious murder of one Hedi Ma'ani in New Zealand;

18) The immediate arrest and criminal prosecution of misters Peter Khan, Alan Waters, Stephan Hall, Manijeh Rayhani, Robert C Henderson, et al., including their various staff, helpers and agents;

19) The immediate opening of the fake and disputed shrine on Mt. Carmel to an independent team of international scientific examiners expert in forensic scientific analysis in a completely uninhibited scientific determination involving the exhumation of the body claimed to be that of Siyyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi, the Bab, and its free and unfettered scientific determination as to whether this body in fact be that of the person claimed;

a) No individuals either haifan Baha'i or peripherally tied to the Baha'i religion (from any denomination) may serve on this team of scientific forensic experts;

b) An independent and impartial team shall serve as an oversight committee to the work of the scientific team in question which shall report on a daily basis to the aforementioned panel above on the status of the work.

Gay marriage in the City of the Covenant

Abdul Baha said : This American nation is equipped and empowered to accomplish that which will adorn the pages of history, to become the envy of the world and be blest in both the East and the West for the triumph of its people... The American continent gives signs and evidences of very great advancement. Its future is even more promising, for its influence and illumination are far-reaching. It will lead all nations spiritually."

Abdu'l-Bahá in His addresses in America and elsewhere frequently expressed the hope, the prayer and the assurance that the banner of international peace would be first raised in America. At Cincinnati, Ohio, on November 5, 1912, He said:—

America is a noble nation, a standard-bearer of peace throughout the world, shedding her light to all regions. Other nations are not untrammelled and free of intrigues like the United States, and are unable to bring about Universal Peace. But America, thank God, is at peace with all the world, and is worthy of raising the flag of brotherhood and International Peace. When the summons to International Peace is raised by America, all the rest of the world will cry: "Yes, we accept." The nations of every clime will join in adopting the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, revealed over fifty years ago. In His Epistles He asked the parliaments of the world to send their best and wisest men to an international world parliament that should decide all questions between the peoples and establish peace ... then we shall have the Parliament of Man of which the prophets have dreamed.

(Dr. J. E. Esslemont, Baha'u'llah and the New Era, p. 242)

During his visit to America in 1912, he prayed for the American elections and American nation thus :

O Thou kind Lord! This gathering is turning to Thee. These hearts are radiant with Thy Love. These minds and spirits are exhilarated by the message of Thy glad-tidings. O God! Let this American democracy become glorious in spiritual degrees even as it has aspired to material degrees, and render this just government victorious.

Confirm this revered nation to upraise the standard of the oneness of humanity, to promulgate the Most Great Peace, to become thereby most glorious and praiseworthy among all the nations of the world.

O God! This American nation is worthy of Thy favors and is deserving of Thy mercy. Make it precious and near to thee through Thy bounty and bestowal.

No clergy in Bahai faith!!

The Baha'i Faith proudly states that it has no priesthood, yet Auxiliary Board Members, Counselors of Continental Boards, individual travel-teaching "stars" and other influential individuals have, to a large extent, either been given or have taken on priest-like duties.

Peter an ex Bahai writes.....

Let us review some Bahai rules about gender equality

* No women are included in the 9-member Universal House of Justice (UHJ) with the sole exception of the widow of Shoghi Affendi.

Why only this lady is included? Is she not a normal woman!

* The shroud to be given by the eldest male child. Women are disallowed.

* Dower to be given to women only.

* Polygamy is acceptable but polyandry is banned.

* If a man wishes to travel he should inform his wife of the time duration, which if exceeds nine months the lady has right to remarry. Then if the husband does not specify the time of his journey the wife should wait for him all her life. * Maintenance of women is obligatory on the man.

* Only women should attend to the household chores.

* No Hajj for women. Nor are they expected to keep the fasts lapsed during the days of menstruation. Why?

Tahera Qazvini sanctified her life for Bahauallah but her grave is not included in the Hajj.

Why was her body not brought to Akka like others?

* The house and the clothes of a deceased are the sole property of the eldest male child and nothing is there for women.

Is this not inequality?

Stupidity of nineteen days months in bahai faith

19 days month in Bahai Faith is totally unscientific and absurd.

And then to make a year of 365 days they have made a stupid adjustment of 4 days- also called as inter-calary days. Why this adjustment is done?

If at all Bahai faith is a religion of God, then why they have deviated from 12 months calendar when all other divine religions have 12 months year. The debate is open for discussion. The only apparent reason for converting the number of month to 19 is due to the significance of number 19 in Bahai faith(as the number of early converts were 19).

Scandal in Kalimat Press

The Scandal involving Kalimat Press.

Posted by Dale Husband on November 30, 2010

Kalimat Press is a small Baha'i owned book publishing company that was recently at the center of a huge controversy, one that shocked me and apparently was the primary reason for Dann May and his wife Phyllis Bernard to leave the Baha'i Faith.

<http://www.kalimat.com/about.html>

Kalimat Press was founded in 1978 by Anthony A. Lee and Payam Afsharian, Bahá'ís in the Los Angeles area, during the Bahá'í month of Kalimat (words). It is a small, privately owned publishing company which is exclusively oriented towards the publication of books and other materials on the Bahá'í Faith. From its inception, Kalimat Press has sought to encourage the publication of new ideas and new approaches to the Bahá'í Teachings. The company has been especially interested in the publication of books for Bahá'í children, materials on Bahá'í history, translations from Persian, original Bahá'í scholarship, and essays on the relevance of Bahá'í teachings to contemporary social issues. Since 1978, Kalimat Press has published over one-hundred titles. These include the scholarly series Studies in the Bábí and Bahá'í Religions. The eighteen volumes of this series have included essays on history, theology, poetry, and other academic topics. These include essays on the Bahá'í Faith in America, in Europe, in India, and in other parts of the world. Kalimat Press now publishes only one or two books per year. Our intention is to ensure the continued production of serious Bahá'í books which will enrich and diversify the range of Bahá'í literature available in English. We are particularly interested in books on Bahá'í history, and more than half of the titles that we have produced have been directly related to this concern. We have published the Bahá'í Holy Day series in order to provide local Bahá'í communities with reference materials for important Bahá'í anniversaries. The titles include: The Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh, Days of Ridván, The Declaration of the Báb, Twin Holy Days, Naw-Rúz: New Day, The Passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá The Martyrdom of the Báb, and A Feast for the Soul. Why does Kalimat Press publish only one or two books a year, instead of dozens like a normal book publishing company would? Because of these:

We ask you to comply with the decision we have made that all national and local Bahá'í agencies cease to distribute books and other items marketed by this publisher. However, you may continue to sell whatever you may have in stock until your inventories are depleted. Individuals are free, of course, to decide to purchase books from any publisher. Our decision was regretfully reached as a result of increasing concern in recent years that a number of titles handled by Kalimat Press, aside from those which have enriched Bahá'í literature over the years, contain matter inimical to the best interests of our Faith. It is highly inappropriate for Bahá'í institutions, which are obligated to safeguard such interests, to provide channels of distribution for publishers promoting such titles. The National Assembly's decision was reached as a result of increasing concern in recent years that a number of titles published by Kalimat Press, aside from those which have enriched Baha'i literature over the years, contain matter inimical to the best interests of the Faith. The National Assembly believes that it would therefore be inappropriate for it, as the institution obligated to safeguard such interests in the United Kingdom, to provide channels of distribution for such material. Baha'i Books UK and its agents may continue, however, to sell whatever Kalimat titles remain in stock until their inventories are depleted. Further, individuals are free to decide to purchase books from other suppliers. With loving Baha'i greetings National Spiritual Assembly What brought that on? Who knows? What caused Joseph Stalin during the 1930s to purge and execute many members of his own Communist Party, along with many Soviet military officers who were otherwise loyal to Communism and/or the Soviet Union, but perhaps not to Stalin personally? That had the effect of weakening the Soviet Union so that when Nazi Germany attacked it in 1941, it almost fell. Likewise, the credibility of the National Spiritual Assemblies of the United States and the United Kingdom have been destroyed by this arbitrary and ridiculous decision to denounce and attempt to shut down a small book publishing company that by all accounts and appearances is a loyal promoter of the Baha'i Faith itself, rather than the whims of the current Baha'i leadership! <http://www.petitiononline.com/cgi-bin/mlk?http://bahaisonline.net/petition> The Bahá'í Faith is perceived by most people — Bahá'ís and non-Bahá'ís — as a generally liberal religion, far closer to the Unitarian-Universalists than to the Southern Baptists. Yet over the last 30-40 years the governing institutions of the Bahá'í Faith have become ever more conservative in nature and in many ways are adopting strict control mechanisms on Bahá'is to maintain a form of Bahá'í fundamentalism. Bahá'í fundamentalism is an odd development. The scriptures of the Bahá'í Faith are generally progressive — calling for cooperation and understanding among faith communities, equality of the sexes, promotion of the oneness of humanity, the harmony of science and religion, the elimination of extremes of wealth and poverty, support of the United Nations and international order. In contrast to this liberal dimension, the Bahá'í community, especially through its conservative administrative order, promotes theocracy, forbids women to serve on the highest elected offices of the religion, defines homosexuality as a psychological disorder, forbids Bahá'is to join progressive groups like Amnesty International or the Interfaith Alliance, requires Bahá'is to stay aloof from controversial political issues, requires mandatory pre-publication censorship of all that individual Bahá'is seek to publish about their faith, has implemented internal spying on suspected believers, exercises administrative expulsion of Baha'is, and threatens shunning of Bahá'is who are targeted as "internal enemies." Kalimát Press has been a leader in Bahá'í publishing since its founding in 1978. It has experienced a series of conflicts with the Bahá'í administration over its attempt to publish academic studies of the Babi and Bahá'í religions. Although Kalimát Press has faithfully followed the demand of the Bahá'í administration to submit all works by Bahá'is to pre-publication censorship, the process of pre-publication review and censorship has created tension between Kalimát Press and the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States. The Universal House of Justice, the international head of the Bahá'í Faith based in Haifa, Israel, has been drawn into these disputes and has also expressed its dissatisfaction with Kalimát Press's agenda to foster Bahá'í studies. Besides works by Bahá'is published under the Kalimát Press imprint, other academic books from Bahá'í and non-Bahá'í publishers are distributed by Kalimát to their main market: the American Bahá'í community. These distributed titles include books on Islam and Iran. A handful of books written by non-Bahá'is, former Bahá'is, or liberal Bahá'is published by university presses or self-published has triggered the National Spiritual Assembly's call for a boycott of all Kalimát Press titles. The offending titles appear to be the following: 1. Juan Cole's Modernity and the Millennium: The Genesis of the Bahá'í Faith in the 19th-Century Middle East (Columbia University Press). 2. Abbas Amanat, Resurrection and Renewal: The Making of the Babi Movement in Iran, 1844-1850 (Cornell University Press). 3. William Garlington, The Bahá'í Faith in America (Praeger Publisher). 4. Sen McGlinn, Church and State: A Postmodern Political Theology. Book One (self published, MA thesis, University of Leiden). All of these books have received positive reviews and are not particularly radical. Each of them does however rub against popular Bahá'í beliefs and the favorite theological views of conservative members of the Bahá'í leadership. For example, Sen McGlinn's book provides an exhaustive examination of Bahá'í texts, from Bahá'u'lláh to Shoghi Effendi, on Church-State relations and makes the case that the Bahá'í founders did not expect a Bahá'í theocracy to emerge in some distant future. Mr. McGlinn was subsequently expelled from the Bahá'í community by the Universal House of Justice for publishing his research. The Universal House of Justice complained that the author was attempting to impose his theology on the Bahá'í community. McGlinn was expelled from the Bahá'í community without a hearing or any semblance of due process. Shortly after the expulsion of Mr. McGlinn, the boycott of Kalimát Press was announced. So I have signed this petition to end the boycott of Kalimát Press and urge others to do the same: <http://www.petitiononline.com/kalimat/petition.html> Meanwhile, the courts in the USA are no longer taking the Haifa Baha'is as seriously as they might have in the past:

After losing his license to practice medicine in Ontario, due to several patients of his coming forward with allegations of sexual abuse, Hossain Danesh was protected by the NSA and given a plum job running Landegg Academy in Switzerland. That was a comfortable, out of the way posting. Especially since it allowed him to put the distance of half the world between himself and what had transpired recently. Danesh then applied his considerable executive talent to that organization.

The result?

Landegg closed its doors in 2005 declaring bankruptcy. So Danesh headed back to Canada. Now that 16 years have passed, washing away most people's memories, it seems that he is ready for his newest public incarnation. And he is being heavily promoted by the NSA.

Earlier this year Hossain Danesh started to give seminars on marriage and family life – akin to a pedophile priest giving a seminar on child rearing. Apparently the NSA is kicking things into high gear with a string of high profile seminars planned around Canada to promote Danesh even further and reintroduce him to the community as a public figure. Soon Bahai Rants will begin to give odds on when Danesh will end up back on the NSA.

Hossain Danesh's jam packed schedule includes workshops on such topics as "Unity of Faith and Reason in Action" and one targeted specifically to youth: "Shaping Our Destiny: An Open Forum for Youth and Young Adults". There is also his usual type of workshop which is being promoted under the auspices of the Baha'i Marriage and Family Life Committee. There is no question that this has the full support and backing of the NSA of Canada, the institution that Danesh served on for many years before his fall from grace in 1994.

The same institution that continues to have a healthy number of members that were his peers back then. All this makes me wonder if within a few years Franco Ceccherini will be promoted by the Italian NSA to go around that country giving workshops and talks on the fund.

Position Paper of Tarbiyat Baha'i Community

Introduction

This paper constitutes one believer's attempt to objectively summarize the crux of the dilemma in which the Baha'i World found itself after the death of the First Guardian in 1957, and the genesis of the group of Baha'is who subsequently came together as the Tarbiyat Community. It is thoughtful and well-written, but nonetheless reflects a single individual's understanding and, for brevity's sake, cannot be comprehensive. In the spirit of independent investigation of truth, the Community plans to add other material and points of view to this web site in the future, and invites the reader who wants more information in the meantime to inquire directly by email, letter, or telephone.

Background

There have been many inquiries as to the distinction between the Baha'i World Faith, centered in Haifa, Israel, and Wilmette, Illinois, on the one hand, and the Tarbiyat Baha'i Community, centered in Las Vegas, New Mexico, U.S.A., on the other. This paper is an attempt to explain this difference. First, it is necessary to emphasize that the Tarbiyat Baha'i Community and the group known as the Baha'i World Faith do not differ in their fundamental beliefs and theology; they share the same Sacred Writings, and follow the same religious practices. It is essential to set the background by summarizing briefly the history of the Faith.

All major religions have predicted that another Prophet or Manifestation of God would arise in good time, to bring mankind a further revelation of God's Word to serve as a guide for the present and future. This prophecy was fulfilled in double measure by the appearance in Iran (then Persia) of the Bab, followed shortly by Baha'u'llah, the founder of the Baha'i Faith. Baha'u'llah was persecuted by the civic and Islamic leaders of Iran, as a prominent member of the Babi Faith, which was considered to be apostate. It was while He was incarcerated in a foul dungeon in Teheran that Baha'u'llah Himself became aware of His true mission as a Manifestation of God. However, this was not announced to the Babi's, nor to the world, for several years. Eventually, after many vicissitudes and much suffering, He and His family were imprisoned in the ancient crusader's fortress in Acca, Palestine (now known as Akka, Israel). Here, and in the near vicinity, He spent the remainder of His life. His final two years were lived out under house arrest in the mansion of Bahji, a few miles north of Acca.

During His lifetime, Baha'u'llah authored a large number of writings, including many "tablets" or epistles addressed to specific individuals, and many prayers and shorter works. Baha'is believe all of these to have been divinely inspired or revealed. A great number of these writings, in English translation, have been compiled into book form, and are among the most treasured assets of the Baha'i Community.

Among the most significant works of Baha'u'llah is the Kitab-i-Aqdas (The Most Holy Book), which contains, in the flowery language of the time, a blue print for the conduct of the faithful and for the eventual civil government of mankind as well. In this and a related work called the Kitab-i-Ahd, He appointed His eldest son, Abdu'l-Baha, as the "Center of the Faith" to whom the faithful should turn after His (Baha'u'llah's) passing. It was clearly set forth that Abdu'l-Baha would not share His Father's station as a Divine Manifestation, but would rather be the "Perfect Exemplar" of the Faith, endowed with infallibility in the interpretation of His Father's teachings.

Baha'u'llah departed this life in 1892, and Abdu'l-Baha, often known as "The Master", assumed the leadership of the Faith. During His long ministry Abdu'l-Baha added many writings to those of His Father, and Baha'is consider them to have been divinely revealed. The position of Abdu'l-Baha was not unchallenged, but his opponents eventually all fell by the wayside and are not remembered.

Of greatest import for the Faith among the papers left by the Master is his Will and Testament. This remarkable document is considered to be an extension of the Kitab-i-Aqdas, in which the details of the plan for governance of the Faith and of the world are filled in. Three features in particular must be emphasized as leading to the present position of the Tarbiyat Community. These have to do with the establishment of a governing body to be known as the Universal House of Justice; with a body of persons known as the Hands of the Faith; and with the inauguration of the hereditary office of Guardian of the Cause of God. Abdu'l-Baha's grandson, Shoghi Effendi, was named as the first Guardian of the Faith. Pertinent portions of the Will and Testament can be paraphrased as follows:

Cracks in the Covenant

Bahais present their “Covenant” as something unique to their religion. They present it as an undisputable documented contract of inheritance, a will and testament, if you will, that is protected by God so that any violaters against it will be rendered impotent by it.

The Bahai Faith’s history is full of fragmentation, and the course the Bahai Faith has taken has taken quick surprise turns on a number of occasions.

Bahai Faith is itself a product of Covenant Breaking

First Covenant Breaking

The act that brought the Bahai Faith itself into existence was in defiance of such a covenant. The Bab’s successor, was actually Mirza Yahya and Not Bahauallah. Bahais produced evidence that Bahauallah was the Bab’s intended successor, but did not deny that the Báb appointed Mirza Yahya.

Second Covenant Breaking

Bahauallah appointed his eldest son Abdul Baha as his successor and after him his younger son Mohammed Ali. After the death of Abdul Baha although Mohammed Ali was alive still many followed , Shoghi effendi the grandson of Abdul Baha. Not following Mohammed Ali was Covenant Breaking of Bahauallah’s writing.

Third Covenant Breaking

Later, the third Bahai leader, Shoghi Effendi, died childless. Having failed to produce a will, and having failed to leave any clear indication of a successor, Shoghi left the Bahai world in a precarious situation. What he did was in apparent violation of the Bahai Covenant.

The Bahais whose allegiance lies with the heterodox organisation, those loyal to the Universal House of Justice currently seated in Haifa, Israel, maintain that those who are true to the Covenant will be empowered by the Covenant.

Bahai history shows us a different picture. At many times, the Bahais who eventually prevailed were nearly vanquished. Only recently has there been such a dominant sect in the Bahai Faith, but even that denomination seems impotent and obscure, lacking the influence to even familiarize the world with the word Bahai in this information age.

Bahai history is mottled with inheritance disputes. In defense of their Covenant, Bahais regard the darker periods as divine tests, arguing that egos are often tested by opportunities for power.

What Bahais do not acknowledge is the fact that their history is just as fragmented as other religions, with breaks occurring from its first years to the years following the death of Shoghi Effendi.

At present The Bahais are fragmented in following sects:

Defeat of Haifan Baha'is

iranian.com

25-Nov-2010

BUPC.org

This is a victory for the Baha'is Under the Provisions of the Covenant, and a victory for the freedom of speech, the separation of church and state and the core values of the American system as espoused and envisioned by the American founding fathers.

Now at the 390th year anniversary of the Mayflower Compact and the Pilgrims landing on Plymouth Rock both in 1620; and in precise time for both the Day of the Covenant celebration and the memorial ascension of Abdu'l-Baha commemorating the activation of the sacred Charter of the Kingdom (see World Order of Baha'u'llah, p. 144) the Will and Testament (W&T) of Abdu'l-Baha, on the 26th and 28th of November respectively; as well as coinciding with the American Thanksgiving Holiday: once again the Covenant-breakers in Wilmette and Haifa have been thwarted in their attempts to shut down the public teaching effort and close down all the websites and publications of the Baha'is under the provisions of the Covenant.

In order to get out of the 6-66 injunction Joel Marangella and the other splinter groups fearing that if Abdu'l-Baha's aghsan son, Mason Remey was bound by the 6-66 injunction, this would pass on down to his successors, stood up and publically confessed in the courts of law that in fact they were not the successors to Mason Remey at all but his RIVALS!! Thus a legal confession to being a) boldfaced usurpers attacking Mason; and b) to being outside the provisions of the Covenant altogether. Thus, in order to save their own butts, so to speak, they admit they are not the successors to Baha'u'llah, Abdu'l-Baha, Shoghi Effendi and Mason Remey the son of Abdu'l-Baha!!!

In the case of the BUPC, we were able to testify in open court, 1) that Dr. Jensen who left the NSA in New Mexico in 1964 was never bound by the 6-66 injunction at all. We further pointed out that the Publishers and the IBC/UHJ established by him are not the successorship to Mason Remey, but are the lineal successorship to Baha'u'llah, Abdu'l-Baha and Shoghi Effendi, and then comes the UHJ set up on January 9, 1951 by Shoghi Effendi as that first IBC that the Hands demolished and which was then re-established on January 9, 1991 by Dr. Leland Jensen. As such, none of the entities, Dr. Jensen, the Publishers or the IBC/UHJ (www.UHJ.net) were in legal succession to Mason Remey, therefore none of them are bound by the 6-66 injunction.

Judge: Baha'i believers can call themselves Baha'i

November 23, 2010 9:11 PM

Chicago News

A federal court in Chicago has ruled a group of self-proclaimed orthodox Baha'i believers can keep calling themselves Baha'i despite a 1966 court decision that stopped an offshoot organization from using the Baha'I name. Today, the federal 7th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the 1966 decision does not apply to a different offshoot known as the Orthodox Baha'i Faith. Though the judges criticized the ruling from more than four decades ago as wrongfully trying to resolve a question of religious authority, they determined it was moot point since the original defendants led a denomination that no longer exists. Tuesday's ruling sidestepped any questions about whether a religious organization can trademark its name or icons. North American Baha'is have been based in Chicago ever since believers came to the U.S. about 90 years ago. Adherents of the Orthodox Baha'i Faith—about 50 strong in the U.S.—believe the mainstream Baha'i faith — about 5 million strong in the world — has strayed from the religion's original teachings.

BAHA'I CONTROL ON THEIR ELECTORAL SYSTEM – EXPOSED

Posted by alex stewart

The Baha'i Influence at the United Nations

There are nearly 130 agencies and organizations operating within the UN system, each overseeing programs that require vast sums of money and massive bureaucracies to operate. These UN programs are all strategic parts of a plan to achieve global governance and eliminate national sovereignty from the planet. Most of these programs are never covered in the world's media and are able to operate outside of the awareness of the public they hope to govern. This giant bureaucracy is so far outside the realm of accountability that most people have no idea how it is operating or what agenda it is moving forward. Most Christians would be shocked to know how deeply involved the United Nations is in the spiritual agenda of the interfaith movement. Just as they are striving for a world government, they are also working with religious leaders and organizations to create the one world religion found in Bible prophecy – the religion that is to be an integral part of the Antichrist's rise to power.

The Baha'i community has, as a duly accredited non-governmental organization, long worked closely with the United Nations, supporting many of its goals and programs, and taking a leadership role in several international gatherings. Its involvement in the United Nations dates back to the founding of the UN in 1945. In 1947, the Baha'i communities of the United States and Canada were recognized by the UN Department of Public Information (DPI), and the next year, the Baha'i International Community itself was recognized by the UN DPI as an international non-governmental organization. In May 1970, they were granted consultative status with the UN Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), allowing for a greater degree of interaction with the Council and its subsidiary bodies. Since then they have also been granted consultative status with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and relationships with the many UN bodies have deepened and expanded over the years. Today for example, the Baha'i organization has a working relationship with the World Health Organization (WHO), is associated with the United Nations Environment Programme, and is involved in joint activities with UNIFEM and UNICEF as well as many other religious, environmental and social programs within the UN, to include peace-building, human rights, women's affairs, education, health, and sustainable development.

When you examine the beliefs and writings of the Baha'i community, it is not hard to understand the United Nations' support and confidence in this organization. Their end goal is the same. Just as the United Nations believes that a new world order is just around the corner, the Baha'i believe the human race is nearing the next stage in their spiritual evolution – a phase that brings us one rung higher on the evolutionary ladder toward world peace and utopia. In their belief statement they write that, "The current world confusion and calamitous condition in human affairs is a natural phase in an organic process leading ultimately and irresistibly to the unification of the human race in a single social order whose boundaries are those of the planet." They use their voice at the United Nations to convince global leaders of the need for a spiritual element in the development of the new world order. In the Baha'i document "A Vision of World Peace", written by the Universal House of Justice, they state that "no serious attempt to set human affairs aright, to achieve world peace, can ignore religion." The Baha'i "incarnation of God", Abdu'l-Bahá, said, "religion is the greatest of all means for the establishment of order in the world." They refer to the organized religions of today as "stuff of history" and claim that these religions of exclusivity, intolerance, and perversions of truth are the root of all evil and the cause for all of the world's social, political, and economic ills.

"A Vision of World Peace" goes on to say that "those who have held blindly and selfishly to their particular orthodoxies, who have imposed on their votaries erroneous and conflicting interpretations of the pronouncements of the Prophets of God, bear heavy responsibility for the confusion and artificial barriers erected between faith and reason, science and religion". They blame the resurgence of "fanatical religious fervor" occurring across the globe for what they call a "dying convulsion that is undermining the spiritual values which are conducive to the unity of mankind".

In 2 Peter 3:3-5, the Bible warns the following: "First of all, you must understand that in the last days scoffers will come, scoffing and following their own evil desires. They will say, Where is this 'coming' he promised? Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation. But they deliberately forget that long ago by God's word the heavens existed and the earth was formed out of water and by water."

Always eager to fulfill prophecy, a Baha'i statement reads: "The time has come when those who preach the dogmas of materialism, whether of the east or the west, whether of capitalism or socialism, must give account of the moral stewardship they have presumed to exercise. Where is the 'new world' promised by these ideologies? Where is the international peace to whose ideals they proclaim their devotion?" Of course the new world of peace will come when our Lord Jesus Christ returns to establish His kingdom on earth.

I Thessalonians 1:10 "...and wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead—Jesus, who rescues us from the coming wrath."

God warns us not to be deceived by those who will try to pave the way for the Antichrist's false peace and deception.

II Thessalonians 2:3, 6-7 "Let no one in any way deceive you for it (the Day of the Lord) will not come unless the apostasy comes first, and the man of lawlessness is revealed, the son of destruction. And you know what restrains him now, so that in this time he may be revealed. For the mystery of lawlessness is already at work; only he who now restrains will do so until he is taken out of the way."

The Bible teaches us that in the end times a global religion will be established. It is referred to as Mystery Babylon, the mother of all harlots, and it will ride in on the Beast that is Antichrist. We can see the beginnings of this global faith today in our increasingly ecumenical religious leaders, such organizations as the United Religions Initiative, the Parliament of World Religions, and in the United Nations.

The Baha'i faith sees the United Nations as the vessel by which the unifying of the world's religions into one faith will come to fruition. Their plan for the future of our world and the role of the United Nations and a regionalized world, are an eerily complete and detailed picture of Bible prophecy. Baha'i writings state "the oneness of humanity implies an organic change in the structure of present-day society, a change such as the world has not yet experienced...It calls for no less than the reconstruction and the demilitarization of the whole civilized world – a world organically unified in all the essential aspects of life, its political machinery, its spiritual aspiration, its trade and finance, its script and language.” They also promote a redistribution of wealth and a communist system of government that would be able to bring about this leveling of the playing field. This brings to mind the Antichrist’s future financial system in which no one will be able to buy or sell without the mark of the Beast.

While the Baha’i praise the United Nations as the only hope for the “world peace promised by all the major religions”, they are not satisfied with its progress and are a loud voice on the international stage for stepping up the pace of our “spiritual evolution”.

In a statement to the World Summit on Sustainable Development in August 2002, the Baha’i Community wrote, “despite significant achievements, the United Nations has yet to grasp fully both the constructive role that religion can play in creating a peaceful and prosperous global order, and the destructive impact that religious fanaticism can have on the stability and progress of the world.” They go on to say “while the United Nations’ human rights machinery has been used to condemn religious intolerance and persecution, UN development policies and programs have hardly begun to address religious bigotry as a major obstacle to peace and well-being.” While we do not deny that the world has seen a great deal of death and violence due to religious fanaticism (most prevalently today from Islamic fundamentalists), the Baha’i view goes further. The Baha’is won’t be satisfied until Bible-believing Christians join them in believing that all paths lead to God, and all claims to truth are silenced. In response to what they call religious fanaticism, they suggest that religious leaders need to “work untiringly to exorcise religious bigotry and superstition from within their faith traditions and renounce claims to religious exclusivity and finality”. And who decides what is superstition and what is truth? The Baha’i and the world community, of course. “Abdul-Bahá, the Baha’i “incarnation of God”, in “The Promulgation of Universal Peace”, defined superstition as “beliefs and opinions that are found contrary to the standards of science; for the antithesis of knowledge is ignorance, and the child of ignorance is superstition.”

Baha’i writings also stress that force and coercion in matters of religion and belief are violations of the Divine command. This sounds reasonable. No one should be forced to accept a religion. However, Baha’i writings also consider simple proselytizing to be coercive. They believe humans should be able to investigate reality for themselves, and to present your truth to another is to violate that spiritual right. They believe all religions are equally valid and just different expressions of the same God, so there is no reason share your faith with others.

The Baha’i make no distinction between the government and private citizens when condemning intolerant religious speech and expression. They support building on the “Convention Against Discrimination in Education” to include sanctions for those who, in the name of religion, would use education and media to oppress freedom of conscience and to promote division. Whether public or private, they say, there should be no tolerance for educational institutions and initiatives, or media policies and programs that promote intolerant attitudes and behaviors. Remember, as proselytizing to others, claiming an exclusive path to salvation, or condemning a lifestyle like homosexuality is deemed intolerant, this would apply to private religious schools and quite possibly churches. In a statement to the United Nations on the spiritual dimension of Sustainable Development, the Baha’i International Community wrote “Ultimately, the creation of a peaceful and just global civilization, in which the diverse peoples of the world live in harmony with one another and with the natural world, will require a significant reorientation of individual and collective goals and a profound transformation in attitudes and behaviors.”

So, just how do they plan to bring about this transformation? In a statement to the World Summit on Sustainable Development, the Baha’i community presented several possible next steps for transforming the United Nations. As a first priority, they proposed holding a convention on freedom of religion and belief to be drafted and ratified as expeditiously as possible by all of the governments of the world. They suggested the foundation within the United Nations system of a permanent religious forum, patterned on the UN’s recently founded Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues. The creation of this body would be responsible for beginning the integration of religion into the UN’s work of establishing a peaceful world order.

Of course, to participate in this forum, religious leaders would need to meet certain criteria. Their proposal states “only those religious leaders who make it clear to their followers that prejudice, bigotry and violence have no place in the life of a religious person should be invited to participate in the work of this body.” You can be sure that any religious leader who actually believes that Jesus is “the way, the truth and the life, and no one comes to the Father except through Him”, would be disqualified from participation. A belief in the Bible as absolute truth puts you in the category of intolerant and would make you guilty of prejudice.

The statement closes by saying that “until the religions of the world renounce fanaticism and work wholeheartedly to eliminate it from within their own ranks, peace and prosperity will prove chimerical. It is they who must raise their voices to end the hatred, exclusivity, oppression of conscience, violations of human rights, denial of equality, opposition to science, and glorification of materialism, violence and terrorism, which are perpetrated in the name of religious truth.” How very tolerant! Oppress someone’s conscience, have the nerve to believe the Bible is the only absolute truth, or claim there is only one path to God, and you will be eliminated. Once again, the Baha’i have written their script for the world’s future directly from the prophecies of the Bible, and have given us a perfect example of the Spirit of Antichrist that marks all false prophets and false religions.

Are Baha'i Christian?

Foundations of Christianity vs. Baha'u'llah

Baha'i Faith and Christianity

It is said that Baha'i people are committed follower of Jesus Christ, but denies what the New Testament declares as truth in the same process. Basic Baha'i faith are diametrically opposed to biblical Christianity. The Baha'i also rejects the fundamental teachings of the New Testament such as:

1. The Trinity
2. The Deity of Christ
3. Virgin Birth of Christ
4. The physical Resurrection of Christ
5. Christ's Atonement (the doctrine concerning the reconciliation of God and humankind,)
6. Salvation by Faith In Christ Alone
7. The Holy Scripture as Final Authority
8. The Second Coming of Christ

This shows that what Baha'i faith followers follows in Jesus and embrace are only those they consider authentic teachings of Christ that are in accord with their principles. This means to say is they "pick out" the ones that agrees the teaching of Baha'u'llah.

This also means that only some part of the Bible is from God but this is contrary to what the Scripture says, "All scripture [is] given by inspiration of God, and [is] profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3:16).

Baha'i in its relativistic system teaches that all religions are valid way to God. Again, this goes against to what Jesus said namely that He is, "The Way, The Truth, The Life" (Jn. 14:6). As you can clearly see, Baha'i Faith is irreconcilable with Christianity. As Dr. Walter Martin said,

There is very little indeed that a true Christian can have in common with the faith of Baha'i. There is simply no common ground on which to meet... The Baha'i Faith is at its very core anti-Christian theology [The Kingdom of The Cult].

Reform Bahai Faith

The Reform Bahai Faith has once again been born anew from tyranny and oppression, from essentially the same spiritual upheavals as that of Ruth White, Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, Julie Chanler, and the thousands of Bahais who left in protest under the imposition of an oppressive organization based on the fraudulent will and testament of Abdul-Baha throughout the 1920s, '30s, and '40s. God has, throughout the decades, preserved the historical record of events for perceptive minds and souls.

Despite all fanatical, fundamentalist attempts to suppress all memory of Abdul-Baha's vision and interpretation of Baha'u'llah's Faith, to root it out, to coerce and slander, malign and expell, shun and besmirch the testimony of the Writings and the early believers, the Bahai Movement has continued to endure, quietly persist, giving testimony to the vision of God's oneness, the oneness of humanity and religion, and the human potential for peace and brotherly love.

The books and publications of White, Sohrab, and Chanler have kept this vision alive, while the Baha'i upheavals and conflicts of the last three decades have led many thousands of Baha'is to experience for themselves the depth and degree to which the Faith of Baha'u'llah has been traduced and desecrated by people who seek to use and exploit it for their own worldly benefit, power, glory, and material gain.

The Divine Being has created a world of impermanence, evanescence, where nothing lasts forever, and all humanity is subjected to the vicissitudes of life, the fragility of health and constitution, the limits of human existence that He alone knows and sets. With an increasing sense of mortality, I feel it is incumbent upon me to set down, in writing, my own testimony of what I believe to be the truth about the Bahai Faith, having now been a member for over thirty years and having watched or participated in many struggles and debates and studied or watched those of many other souls in their search for truth and understanding.

Thinking of Martin Luther and John Wesley, I feel it especially as a duty and obligation to leave a record of my views for the Reform Bahai Convocation, which, God willing, one day, shall convene to restore and revive the moderate, spiritual religion of Baha'u'llah and Abdul-Baha and clearly set a new course away from the fanatical and fundamentalist Islamist sect of the Haifans, based on their fraudulent will and testament, propagating a manipulative creed intended only to coerce the individual believer and subject him or her to the tyranny of an illegitimate and mutilated organization.

Article I

"The Revelation which, from time immemorial, hath been acclaimed as the Purpose and Promise of all the Prophets of God, and the most cherished Desire of His Messengers, hath now, by virtue of the pervasive Will of the Almighty and at His irresistible bidding, been revealed unto men. The advent of such a Revelation hath been heralded in all the sacred Scriptures." – Baha'u'llah.

Article II

Baha'u'llah's appointed heir and Interpreter, the Center of the Covenant, is Abdul-Baha.

Article III

As scientifically judged by Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell, the purported will and testament of Abdul-Baha is a fraudulent document: "That is to say, the writing does not agree with the hypothesis that it was all written by one person." "A minute comparison of the authenticated writing with the writing on every page of the alleged will . . . has failed to detect in any part of the will the characteristics of the writing of Abdul-Baha, as shown in the authenticated specimens." – Dr. C. Ainsworth Mitchell, Report on the Writing Shown on the Photographs of the Alleged Will of Abdul-Baha, Library of Congress, 1930.

Article IV

The Baha'i organizations, based upon the fraudulent document, including the writings of Shoghi Effendi*, are inescapably defective and deficient: "There is apparent contradiction between this section of the Will and his lifelong teachings" (56). "Abdul Baha had never in speech or writing given the slightest indication that there would be a successor to himself. On the contrary, a number of addresses delivered by him on various occasions had made the opposite impression" (61). – Mirza Ahmad Sohrab. The Will and Testament of Abdul Baha, An Analysis. New York: Universal Publishing, 1944.

Article V

The results of the spurious document has reverberated down the generations and decades, as Ruth White rightly perceived: "Whether the alleged will of Abdul Baha is authentic or spurious, the results of the administration of Shoghi Effendi and the National Spiritual Assembly of Baha'is stand as an historical indictment against them. [Boldface in original] They no more represent the Bahai Religion than the bigots of the dark ages of Christianity" (100). – Ruth White. Abdul Baha's Questioned Will and Testament. Beverly Hills: White, 1946.

Article VI

"The Bahai Movement is not an organization. You cannot organize the Bahai Movement." – Abdul-Baha. The mystery of that paradox calls all Bahais to seek its meaning and return to the universal, liberal Teachings of Baha'u'llah and Abdul-Baha and their Writings.

Article VII

Far from creating a theocratic tyranny, the Founders of the Bahai Faith taught a moderate, universal, global religion, grounded in a spiritual democracy, teaching the separation of church and state, with science in its own respected domain, each a profound differentiation of social duty and responsibility, as in Abdul-Baha's "Sermon on the Art of Governance":

"The religious law is like the spirit of life, the government is the locus of the force of deliverance. The religious law is the shining sun, and government is the clouds of April. These two bright stars are like twin lights in the heavens of the contingent world, they have cast their rays upon the people of the world. One has illuminated the world of the soul, the other has caused the earth to flower. One sowed pearls in the oceans of conscience, while the other has made the surface of the earth a garden of paradise." (Tr. Sen McGlinn)

Article VIII

With every passing year, the Writings of Baha'u'llah are being restored to humanity, from those who debased and lowered them to the level of a trademark and copyright.

Article IX

Reform Bahais choose to leave those who choose hatred, shunning, and interminable recrimination over the fraudulent will and testament and over stultifying legalisms, and look to the Spirit of brotherhood and love, knowledge and understanding, prayer and meditation, worship and community, service to one's country and the world of humanity.

With the assurance of Abdul-Baha that humanity has entered the stage of maturity, wherein the individual can independently search for truth, Reform Bahais testify, in this universal, global age, that He reserves for Himself the "hearts of men," rendering to Caesar what is Caesar's, as Baha'u'llah taught in the Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, accepting and embracing His multifaceted vision, the mystery that surpasses understanding.

Reform Bahais invite all Bahais, all humanity, to a Convocation of celebration, peace, love, and brotherhood, to seek humbly together His Will and service, for the good of all people and nations of this spinning globe. The Reform Bahai Faith 95 Theses – On Bahai Liberty

Why is Zoroastrianism under-represented on Iranian.com?

If a casual, non-Iranian observer were to stroll into this site and attempt to gauge a perspective on Iranian religions they would quickly form the mistaken impression that after Islam the only other Iranian religion being practiced amongst Iranians was Bahaism. Yet besides Islam or Bahaism Iran has a rich tapestry of various religious views and practices that are neither Islamic nor Baha'i. Zoroastrianism is where Iran and Iranians maintain their historical roots of religious views and practices. But barely is this ancient creed mentioned here. There are countless postings by Bahais promoting their product (only recently less than usual) but barely by the Zoroastrian community talking about themselves. In the interests of balance can longstanding members of the Zoroastrian community kindly step forward and share their perspective and experience. They are the only true ancient Iranian religion of present minority capacity and their views on Iran's past and future should matter more than any other of the various religious minorities here. www.iranian.com

The Role of Baha'i Administration

The convert is liberated from his or her tradition, spiritual practices, ethical norms and social helping networks and is enslaved with irrational, blind, dogmatic faith.

The converts must then submit to the monopoly of the Baha'i Administration. Spiritual desires are suppressed and converts are forced to carry the toxic belief system and to serve the true owner, the UHJ. The Counselors and ABMs, in effect function to consolidate the conversion activity. The Baha'i institutions are used as instruments of personal, family and social control and conditioning. The converts are forced to reject tolerance, pluralism, temple visit, Hindu religious practices and they are permitted no compromise with other divinities, except Bahauallah. The convert must abandon all past spiritual practices and must wholly belong to the new world order. They are psycho programmed to consider Hindus as non-believers or devil worshippers and faith in Bahauallah is the only way for salvation... The converts are brainwashed to consider outsiders as condemned forever.

Any disobedience or questioning of the Baha'i orders either from local national or international bodies are met with administrative or spiritual sanctions. The converts become aliens in their land until delivered by death.

Converting Indian in large numbers

For centuries Indians have been forcefully converted into other religions. Religious conversion has profoundly affected our cultural legacy by the after-effects of genocidal coercive religious conversion. It has left its wounding imprint on our individual psyches and our collective consciousness. Although coercive religious conversion of Hindus in India and abroad has deep historical roots, recent deceptive religious conversion techniques used by Baha'is movements pose serious political, social, ethical and psychological problems. Recently Universal House of Justice, the apex organization of the Baha'i Faith in a new encyclical has issued a call to Baha'is to go out and actively convert Indians. In this era of globalization, Baha'i administration with unlimited funds use sophisticated, deceptive techniques to lure, brainwash and convert innocent people. They forcefully converted Hindus by inducement and deception. Many poor illiterate tribal people in Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh were deceptively converted into Baha'i Faith, although anti conversion law is passed in 11 of the states in India. This will have a disastrous effect on India's political, cultural and social fabric.

Q: What is the difference between the Tarbiyat Baha'i Community and other Baha'i groups?

A: The only difference between the Tarbiyat Baha'i Community and the rest of the Baha'i world relates to the spiritual leadership of the Faith. The Tarbiyat Baha'i Community believes that the institution of the hereditary Guardianship, delineated by Abdu'l-Baha in his Last Will and Testament, is necessary to preserve the long-term integrity of the Faith. The Tarbiyat Baha'i Community believes that the Guardian must come from the bloodline of Baha'u'llah, and that a Guardian from the Holy Family will arise in due time. The largest Baha'i group, with American headquarters in Wilmette and international headquarters in Haifa, Israel, believes that the institution of the Guardianship terminated when the Faith's first Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, died without children and, apparently, without appointing a successor Guardian.

Cracks in the Covenant

Bahais present their “Covenant” as something unique to their religion. They present it as an undisputable documented contract of inheritance, a will and testament, if you will, that is protected by God so that any violaters against it will be rendered impotent by it.

The Bahai Faith’s history is full of fragmentation, and the course the Bahai Faith has taken has taken quick surprise turns on a number of occasions.

Bahai Faith is itself a product of Covenant Breaking

First Covenant Breaking

The act that brought the Bahai Faith itself into existence was in defiance of such a covenant. The Bab’s successor, was actually Mirza Yahya and Not Bahauallah. Bahais produced evidence that Bahauallah was the Bab’s intended successor, but did not deny that the Báb appointed Mirza Yahya.

Second Covenant Breaking

Mirza Muhammad Ali

Bahauallah appointed his eldest son Abdul Baha as his successor and after him his younger son Mohammed Ali. After the death of Abdul Baha although Mohammed Ali was alive still many followed , Shoghi effendi the grandson of Abdul Baha. Not following Mohammed Ali was Covenant Breaking of Bahauallah’s writing.

Third Covenant Breaking

Later, the third Bahai leader, Shoghi Effendi, died childless. Having failed to produce a will, and having failed to leave any clear indication of a successor, Shoghi left the Bahai world in a precarious situation. What he did was in apparent violation of the Bahai Covenant.

The Bahais whose allegiance lies with the heterodox organisation, those loyal to the Universal House of Justice currently seated in Haifa, Israel, maintain that those who are true to the Covenant will be empowered by the Covenant.

Bahai history shows us a different picture. At many times, the Bahais who eventually prevailed were nearly vanquished. Only recently has there been such a dominant sect in the Bahai Faith, but even that denomination seems impotent and obscure, lacking the influence to even familiarize the world with the word Bahai in this information age.

Bahai history is mottled with inheritance disputes. In defense of their Covenant, Bahais regard the darker periods as divine tests, arguing that egos are often tested by opportunities for power.

Copper converted to gold

In Kitab-i-Iqan or the Book of Certitude, Bahauallah claims that copper, in a span of 70 years would be converted to gold. "For instance, consider the substance of copper. Were it to be protected in its own mine from becoming solidified, it would, within the space of seventy years, attain to the state of gold. There are some, however, who maintain that copper itself is gold, which by becoming solidified is in a diseased condition, and hath not therefore reached its own state.

Be that as it may, the real elixir will, in one instant, cause the substance of copper to attain the state of gold, and will traverse the seventy-year stages in a single moment. Could this gold be called copper? Could it be claimed that it hath not attained the state of gold, whilst the touch-stone is at hand to assay it and distinguish it from copper?" [12]

Certainly interesting for Alchemists who have turned into Biochemists! Regarding Bahauallah's scientific wisdom, I can only add that such ignorant and incorrect statements, presented by Bahauallah as solid and clear facts, naturally questions his credibility and mental sanity. Now let's look into some of Bahauallah's and Baha'ism's universal and superior directives. The punishment of theft

In the Kitab-i-Aqdas, Bahauallah instructs his followers to punish thieves [13]. On the first offence the thief is exiled, on the second, imprisonment is prescribed and on the third offence a mark is placed on the thief's forehead. This means that if a thief is caught for the first time, he is to be exiled. In the new city he continues to steal and when caught people will not know of his past, so he will be exiled to another city and will keep on stealing. Let's though assume that a thief is recognized and caught on the third offence, will the mark on his forehead now prevent him from stealing if exile and imprisonment did not? Is the mark on the thief's forehead a license to continue his crimes? What about those caught for the fourth time? How will they be punished? The punishment for adultery Adultery and fornication according to Bahauallah is punishable by a fine paid to the Universal House of Justice, (UHJ). On page 15 of Kitab-i-Aqdas (The Most Holy Book), he writes, "It is a must for every adulterer and adulteress that they must pay to the Universal House of Justice and give 9 mithqals of gold. And should they repeat the act, the atonement will be doubled." [14] However if the adulterer/adulteress cannot afford it, then "the poor are the trust of God in your midst" [15] This means that the rich will easily commit adultery and the poor who can't afford the adultery penalty, will still very easily commit adultery as they are "in the protection of God"! Further, I am very curious to know why adultery and fornication have the same punishment- are both crimes considered equally destructive and injurious to the society and the individuals involved?

Also what an honorable way for the men of Universal House of Justice to fill their coffers and 'fulfill their responsibilities'! (The UHJ consists only of Baha'i men since Bahai women are not allowed to participate in the law making process in their faith's supreme governing institution. ...Now, that's called gender equality!) Although Baha'i proponents seem to preach 'unity, peace and equality among mankind' their history, marred by violence, and their teachings, which are in fact twisted and changed Islamic laws, contradict their averred concept of world peace and gender equality.

Infallibility of UHJ

As a historian of religion, I would argue that the disenrollment of Sen McGlinn is another in a series of signs that the Baha'i Faith is becoming a church in the Weberian sense, bound together by doctrinal considerations rather than informal enthusiasm (as was often the case in the 1960s and 1970s). The two doctrines, departing from which has resulted in sanctions, are the absolute infallibility of the Universal House of Justice and its future role at the head of a global theocracy wherein Baha'i administrative institutions will also form the civil government. I know that Baha'i readers will object that Shoghi Effendi expressed reservations about the phrase "theocracy," but I would argue that the doctrine of theocracy now being imposed from Haifa is anyway incompatible with the plain texts of the holy figures. So I am using the word as a social science term, since social scientists would typically consider the assertion that religious institutions will exercise temporal rule a form of theocracy.

The doctrine of the infallibility of the Universal House of Justice has evolved radically in recent decades. Abdul-Baha called the institution ma'sum or "guarded from sin by God," but said its 'ismat was derivative, which certainly makes it sound not very strong, and far from absolute. And, of course, he had also expressed the hope in The Secret of Divine Civilization that the Iranian cabinet would prove "ma'sum," or protected by God from making big errors. Orally, he denied his own infallibility. So he did not mean by the term anything approaching "absolute infallibility." Once a body calling itself the Universal House of Justice was actually elected, at a time when the original plans for the structure of the religion, found in the writings of the holy figures, had clearly fallen through, there was a natural tendency for that body and its appointees and clients to put very strong emphasis on infallibility. It is a way of asserting leadership of a disparate community. They developed the doctrine into one of absolute infallibility. This process is a form of the iron law of bureaucracy, wherein entrenched elites inevitably have far more power over time to shape things than rank and file "citizens." The absolute infallibility of the Universal House of Justice is an implicit, assumed belief, and for those who uphold it, it is one of the things that define being a Baha'i. The doctrine of theocracy is mysterious in its origins, though Sen McGlinn has given many clues as to its development in the Western communities. It certainly directly contradicts the position of the Baha'i holy figures. Precisely because it is contrary to the scriptural texts, policing this doctrine is all the more crucial for those who believe in it (and who have somehow managed to make believing in it a criterion for rising high in the religion). Otherwise, as a doctrine it is volatile and unstable, constantly in danger of deconstructing itself. Actually, insofar as the most great infallibility was reserved by Baha'u'llah for the Manifestations of God, the absolute infallibility of the Universal House of Justice is likewise not scriptural. (And since Baha'is have to live every day with numerous errors made by that body, it is also contrary to common sense). It, too, is an unstable doctrine and so must be imposed zealously if it is to survive.

The adherents of absolute infallibility and of theocracy are reluctant to promulgate these ideas as a formal orthodoxy to be affirmed, e.g., in acatechism. They certainly would like to do so. But they tend to treat the New Orthodoxy (they would deny it is new) as a goal toward which they want to take the community, gradually and over time. In many ways, this Orthodoxy is often a secret from the rank and file, and many Baha'is only encounter it if they move high up in the administration. When the doctrine of theocracy was first discussed on the old This e-mail address is being protected from spam bots, you need JavaScript enabled to view it in the mid-1990s, many posters remarked that they had never encountered it and certainly did not believe in it.

All of the Baha'i scholars and intellectuals who have been threatened, harassed or sanctioned by the Baha'i administration since the late 1970s have been guilty of publicly disputing one of these two doctrines. Since the high administrators believe that these two doctrines define Baha'i orthodoxy and legitimate membership in the community, an open, public, and vocal challenge to them is almost always met with sanctions. The Baha'i administration is well aware that most Baha'is probably have not yet accepted these two doctrines, but is willing to chalk this phenomenon up to the immaturity of the believers. They are not sanctioned because they are not writers, and have no particular influence, and are not so much opposed to the New Orthodoxy as they are just not convinced of it.

The sociological mechanisms whereby Baha'i administrators and intellectuals throughout the world are inducted behind the scenes into this two-fold New Orthodoxy are unclear and need investigation. Many of the signals given by high administrators lack explicitness.

So, it is clear that the Universal House of Justice has called upon members of the National Spiritual Assemblies throughout the world (is that 1100 persons or so?) to refute Sen McGlinn's book, a powerful signal that they must uphold the doctrine of theocracy. It is also clear that removal of McGlinn from membership in the community is a form of excommunication or takfir (takfir is simply saying that someone who considers himself or herself a believer is not actually a believer, because of some essential deficit). And the basis for the takfir is his public refutation of the key doctrine of Theocracy.

Doctrinally-based churches, such as Roman Catholicism, always impose sanctions on believers who publicly reject key doctrines. This move is necessary in part to protect the doctrines themselves, since sanctioning an author brands his or her work with a sort of taboo, making the work less likely to prove able to challenge the Orthodox doctrine within a community eager to stay on the right side of orthodoxy. The Baha'i faith has simply become such a doctrinally-based church. Since so many rank and file believers came in via the old "sect-like" route of popular enthusiasm, the administrative Church above presides unevenly over the remnants of the Sect (in the technical sense) below.

That is why the New Orthodoxy must remain a secret orthodoxy, but must nevertheless be policed, putting the "heretics" in the Kafkaesque position of not knowing exactly why they have been sanctioned. The "doctrine" may not be named as such, the "heresy" may also not be named, and even the sanction, of excommunication of various sorts, may not be called that, either. Naming these things would signal to the rank and file that their administration had become a doctrinal church, of a sort many of them joined the Baha'i faith to get away from.

What has brought the Baha'i Faith to this juncture?

This place where several Baha'i sects vie to be recognized as the one and only true Baha'i sect? Where the Haifan Baha'i sect refuses to even recognize the very existence of other Baha'i sects, claiming that because those sects have so few adherents they are insignificant and virtually non-existent.

How is it that the lofty ideals and concepts that are supposedly central to Baha'i belief have been left in the dust in a blind pursuit to raise one version or another of a supposedly inviolable Baha'i covenant over the several other versions of that Baha'i covenant which are all held to be sacrosanct by those Baha'is who hold to those particular versions?

Why is it that respect for the diversity of religious interpretation is missing amongst all Baha'i sects? Why? Because a respect for the diversity of religious interpretation was not held or practiced by the founders of the Baha'i religion.

Although the founders of the Baha'i religion gave lip service to the principle of the oneness of religion they failed to recognize that they themselves were responsible to apply such principles in their own lives. Mirza Husayn Ali – Baha'u'llah failed to do this in regards to the Babi/Bayani faith and its followers, Abbas Effendi – Abdu'l-Baha' failed to do this in regards to his own half brother Muhammad who chose to hold to a more unitarian interpretation of Baha'ism.

When exceptions are made to the oneness of humanity it is no longer true oneness, it is the same old same old religious exclusivity that has been practiced by religionists since the beginning of organized religion. When there is no respect for a true diversity of religious interpretation religion falters, it then becomes more of a source of disunity than it is source of unity; more of a bane to humanity than a boon.

The present situation amongst Baha'i sects is a case in point. Of course Haifan Baha'is will discount this reality stating that all other Baha'i sects are insignificant and unimportant. While each Baha'i will blindly cleave to their own religious interpretation all along allowing those interpretations to make a mockery of any pretense of a true belief in the oneness of humanity, the oneness of human spirituality.

What is the source of this profound dysfunction? The founders of the Baha'i religion themselves. Men who had words stating that shunning had been abolished, that humanity should no longer see others as their enemies, drawing lines, that the former religious practice of dividing humanity had been removed; while all along out of the other side of their mouths came contradictory words, hypocritical words, counseling their followers to engage in the very religious practices they had supposedly left behind. What you see is the result of these contradictory and hypocritical religious teachings and religious practices.

If Baha'is of all sects truly believe in the oneness of humanity, truly believe in the oneness of human spirituality, they will have to leave the immature, ignorant, and contradictory religious practices of the founders of their religion behind them. They will have to truly embrace religious diversity, as well as diversity of religious interpretation and not see such diversity as a threat to their chosen orthodoxies but as genuine and healthy expressions of human spirituality. Until this occurs the Baha'i Faith as a religion will continue to be more of a source of disunity than it is a source of unity and humanity would be better off without it.

Cheers

Larry Rowe

Caste System in Baha'i Faith

Currently, the Baha'is think of humanity as being divided into a few official groups or castes. I have organized them in a list from "best" to "worst" based on how many rights they would have in a future Baha'i world order:

1. Baha'i in good standing 2. Baha'i with administrative rights removed 3. non-Baha'i 4. Covenant-breaker

If you include more subtle gradations, which may possibly acquire a greater degree of official status in the future, the list would look like this:

1. Baha'i in good standing, active
2. Baha'i in good standing, inactive
3. Baha'i with some administrative rights removed
4. Baha'i with all administrative rights removed (Feast attendance, voting, eligibility for election, contribution to Funds, contribution to Huququ'llah, plus anything I'm forgetting to mention)
5. non-Baha'i (never been a Baha'i)
6. ex-Baha'i, left voluntarily (not an opponent)
7. ex-Baha'i, membership revoked/expelled by UHJ (not an opponent)
8. opponent or enemy of the faith, non-Baha'i
9. opponent or enemy of the faith, ex-Baha'i
10. child or grandchild of Covenant-breaker, not practicing in Covenant-breaker organization
11. Covenant-breaker, not officially declared by UHJ but member of Covenant-breaker organization
12. Covenant-breaker, officially declared by UHJ

Groups 10-12 constitute the Baha'i version of the "untouchable caste." Groups 4-12 (the vast majority of categories) would not have the right to vote in elections for the highest governmental positions, i.e. the Baha'i Houses of Justice that would have final authority at the local, national, and international levels.

How's that for unity of all people, huh?

Best, Eric Stetson (Group 11 – I think ☐)

Division among the followers of Bab and Baha'u'llah

Here is a brief presentation on the history of divisions in the Bahá'í Faith – right from its inception, the Báb, ‘Subh-i-Azal, Bahá'u'lláh, Abbas Effendi, Shoghi Effendi and finally till the present day Universal House of Justice.

Baha'is are not supposed to indulge in politics but the Universal House of Justice does!!!

FREE BAHÁ'Í FAITH

“There are no officers in this Cause. I do not and have not ‘Appointed’ anyone to perform any special service, but I encourage everyone to engage in the service of the Kingdom. The foundation of this Cause is pure spiritual democracy and not a Theocracy.” – Abdul Baha

Free Baha'is is an ideological group trying to disseminate the True Faith of Baha'u'llah as against the Baha'i Administration.

Some of the teachings of the Faith are:- – The oneness of all the world's great religions. – The Oneness of God. – The harmony of science and religion – The oneness of humanity. – Progressive Revelation – God has progressively revealed His attributes through a series of Manifestations or Prophets including Adam, Krishna, Buddha, Muhammad, Christ, Zoroaster, Moses, the Bab, and Baha'u'llah. – Independent investigation of the truth. – Strict adherence to the Covenant of Baha'u'llah and Abdul-Baha. – Free Bahais love the entire world; to love humanity and try to serve it; to work for universal peace and universal brotherhood. – We firmly and strongly believe that Abdul Baha, The Most Mighty Branch, did not appoint Shoghi Effendi as the Guardian and the Alleged Will of Abdul Baha is forged and a fake. Keeping this in mind one should expect that the teachings of the Shoghi Effendi should be a mirror of Baha'u'llah and Abdul Baha's teachings. Therefore we see that Shoghi Effendi's life is contrary to the beliefs and teachings of the Baha'i Faith. There are numerous contradictions in the statements of Abdul Baha and Shoghi Effendi. Let us just take two examples.

1-The infallible Center of the Covenant (Abdul Baha) said that Confucius was a Manifestation (Promulgation of Universal Peace, p.346). Which is the position held today. Shoghi Effendi states, “Confucius was not a Prophet (Manifestation)” (Lights of Guidance, p.349).

2-In the words of the infallible Shoghi Effendi:

“It is too late to save the world. The Message of Baha'u'llah has Been in the world over one hundred years ... but it has been rejected ... The calamity will be sudden ... The Russian submarines will paralyze Great Britain, the United States, Europe, the Atlantic, Pacific and Mediterranean seaboard ... Bahais should not only leave their homes but go away as far as possible from the coasts ... The coming calamity will be worse than war! Whole cities will evaporate! Especially in those cities where it is hardest to teach the Faith such as New York, Chicago, San Francisco ... The calamity will happen before the Lesser Peace.” (Bahai Lore, p. 122 from Ruhaniyyih Ruth Moffet, ‘Visiting the Bahai World Center’ [May 17 – June 1 1954], pp. 7-8.)

This “prophecy” bears all the marks of someone who is afflicted with an overabundance of morbid imaginings, possibly inspired by a fondness for reading “novels.”

For those friends who are new to the Free Faith or those who just want to know about it and how we differ from the Haifan sect.

DUPLICITY AND HYPOCRISY IN BAHÁ'Í FAITH

Bahá'ís indeed have strange and mysterious ways of operating. While to the world they declare that Ruhi books are selfless service of the Faith to the humanity towards moral upliftment, but the hidden agenda is conversion.

Therefore to hide their duplicity and hypocrisy, Bahá'ís always have two types of statements one is for “general public” and other “only for Bahá'ís”. One will find the two statements always in sharp contradiction to each other.

Recently Dr. Payman Mohajer in his speech to the Bahá'ís said that the purpose of core activities is for betterment of society but the actual Messages to the Bahá'ís clearly states that it is for proselytizing and conversion. This is evident when one reads through the messages circulated by the Faith's supreme body the Universal House of Justice.

What Bahá'ís Say : “In the course of the consultations, Dr. Mohajer posed a thought-provoking question to the participants, “What is the purpose of our core activities?”

“Dr. Mohajer then went on to share an explanation, by giving the example of a glass. He said that while it is not inaccurate to say that the glass is transparent, it is evident that transparency is not the purpose of the glass. Transparency is one of the attributes of the glass, but its purpose is to hold liquid. Similarly, one of the attributes of our core activities is that they become portals for entry by troops or instruments for teaching – but that is not their purpose Now if someone were to ask us whether the purpose of our inviting them to join study circles is to make them Bahá'ís, we can confidently say ‘NO’ and tell them that the purpose of our core activities is to assist in the transformation and betterment of society.”

1. The Bahá'ís must realize that the success of this work depends upon the individual. The individual must arise as never before to proclaim the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh. The most effective way for them to carry on their work is for the individual to make many contacts, select a few who they feel would become Bahá'ís, develop a close friendship with them, then complete confidence, and finally teach them the Faith, until they become strong supporters of the Cause of God.

(Shoghi Effendi to all National Spiritual Assemblies, 13 May 1955)

2. The role of the individual is of unique importance in the work of the Cause. It is the individual who manifests the vitality of faith upon which the success of the teaching work and the development of the community depends. Bahá'u'lláh's command to each believer to teach His Faith confers an inescapable responsibility which cannot be transferred to, or assumed by, any institution of the Cause. The individual alone can exercise those capacities which include the ability to take initiative, to seize opportunities, to form friendships, to interact personally with others, to build relationships, to win the cooperation of others in common service to the Faith and society, and to convert into action the decisions made by consultative bodies. It is the individual's duty to “consider every avenue of approach which he might utilize in his personal attempts to capture the attention, maintain the interest, and deepen the faith, of those whom he seeks to bring into the fold of his Faith.”

(Ridván Message 1996)

3. “.... As you know, during the time of the Guardian, emphasis was placed on establishing the Faith throughout the world and in raising up the administrative institutions that would provide the foundation for the prosecution of the Divine Plan. As the House of Justice observed in its Ridván 2000 message, this task has been essentially completed. “The structures of an Administrative System that, at the end of the century, stands before the gaze of the world in the wholeness of its essential form.” The Cause has now entered a stage in its organic development in which it is necessary to prepare the community for entry by troops and, beyond that, mass conversion. The current series of global teaching Plans have focused the energies of the Bahá'ís on stimulating the processes of growth and community development at the level of the cluster, and the friends have been encouraged to teach the Faith where they live. Those clusters with larger Bahá'í populations have been selected for close attention with the expectation that they can more rapidly advance, and the lessons learned can then be applied to other clusters”

DIVISIONS EXIST IN BAHAI FAITH ALSO...

The Bahá'í Faith has had challenges to leadership at the death of every head of the religion. The vast majority of Bahá'ís have followed a line of authority from Bahá'u'lláh to 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Shoghi Effendi to the Custodians to the Universal House of Justice. Sects diverging from this line of leadership have had relatively little success and have failed to attract a sizeable following. In this sense, there is only one major branch of the Bahá'í Faith, represented by at least 5 million adherents, whereas the groups that have broken away have either become extinct with time, or have remained in very small numbers. Globally the Bahá'í community has maintained its unity.

Bahá'í scriptures define a Covenant regarding succession which is intended to keep the Bahá'ís unified. Claimants challenging the widely accepted successions of leadership are shunned by the majority group as Covenant-Breakers, though such claimants likewise regard the others in the same way. Other than on the matter of leadership and organization, there are few if any differences between the schismatic and mainstream Bahá'ís in matters of doctrine and practice.

Bahá'ís are complicit in genocide.

This will be uncomfortable for many Bahá'ís... especially those with truly good hearts. But neutrality and silence in the face of injustice support tyranny. Of all people, Bahá'ís should know this. <https://www.bbc.com/news/articles/cde3eyzdr63o> In what kind of world can one preach justice and claim to stand for truth, while remaining silent about the slaughter of children ...
